that some "historians" refuse to admit that North Carolina furnished more troops for the Confederacy than did any of her sisters. The opponents of established facts have no reverence for nor interest in history as history but only as it is selfishly pleasing: they try to make the facts fit their preconceived opinions instead of making their opinions fit the facts. The true historian, on the contrary, delights in the truth whether it be for him or against him. These chronic doubters resemble the green country lad who in his supreme ignorance thought he knew it all and that a giraffe was a myth and a fraud, and when he was finally confronted with the reality, turned away in disgust exclaiming: "Pshaw, they ain't no sich anny-mule."

Let us grant for the sake of argument that the negative suppositions are true; what difference does it make? The resolutions of May 31, 1775, are not now disputed, though formerly they were condemned along with the more formal declaration of May 20. These undisputed resolutions declared "all laws and commissions, confirmed by or derived from the authority of the King or Parliament, are annulled and vacated" and that "whatever person shall hereafter receive a commission from the Crown, or attempt to exercise any such commission heretofore received, shall be deemed an enemy to his country." This in itself is a declaration of independence that can not be denied. The argument of Colonel Force (paragraph 19) on this point is conclusive. Governor Martin, who had not heard of the Declaration of May 20, sent the Cape Fear Mercury containing the resolutions to Lord Dartmouth with the statement that the action of the Mecklenburg committee "surpasses all the horrid and treasonable publications that the inflammatory spirits of this continent have yet produced." That Josiah Martin was not partial to North Carolina is evidenced by the fact that he fled from that "inflammatory spirit" to the more peaceful harbor of South Carolina in that same month of June of 1775, from which time North Carolina was independent in fact as well as in declaration.

So if the Declaration as claimed for May 20 falls, the resolutions remain, and only eleven days are taken from Mecklenburg's four hundred and eleven days of priority in defiance of Great Britain. Mecklenburg's only reason for maintaining the claim is that it is the truth and that there is no reason for doubting it. The difficulty of obtaining proof at this time sufficient for persons who do not want to believe, is apparent; but the fact that the Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence of May, 1775, was accepted as "common tradition" before 1800 when all the people must have known whether or not it was genuine and when original records were available, is good indications that the tradition was fact.

Any unprejudiced reader of the evidence will be convinced that in the hundred years of activity, the maligners have not been able to controvert the testimony of the participants who certify positively to the proceedings. In examining the arguments of these controversialists, there need be no partiality, but every suspicion and surmise should be considered as to its comparative worth in offsetting the positive declarations of men who were present May 20, 1775, and whose statements have not been and can not be disproven. It should be borne in mind that the negative argument admits the authenticity of the Resolves of May 31, but contends that they were not equivalent to a Declaration of Independence and that there was no meeting or declaration of any kind May 20! We are now to see if either of the two contentions is substantiated.

Negative Contentions.

The foregoing review of the suppositious contentions against the authenticity of the Declaration, is perhaps the best that has ever been presented. The omissions, suppressions and misrepresentations are so few as to raise the presumption that they are unintentional. With a rigid cross-examination, the friends of the Declaration could well afford to let the case go to the jury without further argument. The author omits nothing of consequence that has ever been or could ever be argued for the negative. His discussion includes all of various publications, and being in brief, is superior to any of them.

The one item omitted in the history of the controversy is the attempt to prove that May 20 and May 31 came on the same day on account of the eleven days' change in the calendar in 1752. For a long time this was the chief resource, but that the author here omits it is to his credit, as the fallacy is too apparent to engage the attention of any one who professes to be serious. He also does himself credit in not making the extravagant claim that his case is complete, knowing that surmises at their best can not outweigh direct, positive evidence of any kind. It is to be regretted that he allowed his production to be marred by the vulnerable points hereinafter mentioned, though otherwise he could have asked only for a verdict of "not proven," which indeed is the most he can hope for as it stands.

1. Reference is made repeatedly to the "Mecklenburg Myth" and the "May 20 fraud." This is not argument. It is prima facie evidence of malice. The "criminals" guilty of the fraud must go for comfort to Dr. Johnson:

> "Of all the griefs that harass the distrest,
> Sure the most bitter is a scornful jest:
> Fate never wounds more deep the generous heart,
> Than when a blockhead's insult points the dart."

Sincerely disclaiming any application of the last line to the other participant in this discussion, yet it certainly does apply to the originator of the insult to the Mecklenburg patriots of 1775 who afterwards gave their positive statements in support of the so-called "myth" and "fraud." This is of course entirely apart from the merit of the question at issue, though that the Declaration has never been accepted as a "myth" is shown by its acceptance by Washington Irving in his biography of Washington; Rev. W. H. Foote, of Virginia, in "Sketches of North Carolina;" Alexander Garden, of Charleston; Andrew Jackson who in "The Hermitage" pointed with pride to a handsomely framed copy of the Declaration made in his native county of Mecklenburg; Force, Lossing, Swain and a host of others.

2. There is a continual nagging as to whether the Mecklenburg meeting was a committee or a convention. This is mere quibbling and has about as much to do with the question as the distinction between tweedle-dum and tweedle-dee has with the bias of jurisprudence. The Declaration was made and it matters not what might have been the correct designation of the organization that made it. The national declaration was made by the continental congress, but the congress might with equal accuracy have been called a committee or a convention. By any other name its action would have been the same.

3. Attention is called to the petition from the North Carolina Provincial Congress of August, 1775, declaring allegiance to the King, and which had the approval of the Mecklenburg representatives, some of whom had signed the Declaration. The intended implication is that this proves that these men could not have signed the Declaration or have had anything to do with it. Was such an apparent inconsistency so wonderful at a time when Edmund Burke was charging Parliament with seeking fresh principles with every new mail from America? The continental congress were then discussing a similar petition with Thomas Jefferson as its sponsor, and the provinces were naturally expected to endorse it. That it was only an attempt to seize the last straw of hope and that Jefferson himself had no faith in it is known to all students of history. To charge that North Carolina was submissive in the Fall of 1775 is indefensible in view of the fact that the Royal Governor never dared to set foot in the State after May of that year. So the act of Thomas Polk and his compatriots is not so very inconsistent after all. Besides, it is every bit as incompatible with the May 31 resolutions as with the Declaration, and if the petition argues against one, it argues against the other, and the authenticity of the resolutions is not denied.

4. "With the Alexander papers before him, Professor Philips, aided and abetted by Governor Swain, published in the North Carolina magazine for May, 1853, an exposition of the May 20 fraud. From an official supporter thereof, Governor Swain had now become temporarily a repudiater thereof."

The opinion of Professor Phillips is worth no more than the opinion of any of a hundred others (which fact is evidenced by the attempt to back it up with another) but the opinion of Governor Swain is entitled to more consideration than that of any one else for the reason that he studied the question more thoroughly and impartially than any one else ever has, and because of his known and admitted historical ability and his strength and fairness of mind. The implication of the quotation given is that he had been trying to prove the validity of the declaration but had finally been converted to the side of repudiation. The truth is that he had from the first been a doubter but when he finally was confronted with the overwhelming evidence, he was then converted and became a supporter of what he knew to be the truth.

This version of his conversion is founded upon his own statement in a letter written from Chapel Hill to Hon. George Bancroft, March 6, 1858 (five years after the date above given) and from which the following is a verbatim extract:

"I wish very much it was in my power to have a personal conference with you in relation to the Mecklenburg resolutions, and other events in our revolutionary history. I have held very free and full discussion with Dr. Hawks, after a minute examination of all the papers at my command, and we understand each other better, and are more nearly together in opinion than we were at the time we appeared before your historical society. I would like very much to go over the same ground with you. He never saw the evidence on which I rely as conclusive until his arrival here in June last, after the delivery of his lecture in Charlotte. At the close of the examination I gave him a paper copied below, and expressed the opinion that every fact set forth might be embodied in a special verdict, and established by the evidence before us, if an issue were made up and submitted to a jury.":

The "special verdict," also quoted from the letter, is as follows:

"The documentary evidence in my possession satisfies me that there was a meeting of the citizens of Mecklenburg, at Charlotte, on the 19th and 20th of May, 1775, and that resolutions in relation to independence were discussed and adopted. I entertain no doubt that the record of the proceedings of the Mecklenburg Committee was burned in the home of John McKnitt Alexander, in the month of April, 1800, and that the Davie paper contains what General Graham, Col. Wm. Polk, and other gentlemen of high character, whose certificates appear in the State pamphlet, believed to be a true narrative of the transactions of those two days. I entertain the opinion that the resolutions of the 31st, May, were the resolutions published in the Cape Fear Mercury, and that there was no contemporaneous publication of the proceedings of the 19th and 20th of May. That a copy of the records of these events was placed in the hands of Dr. Williamson, with the intent that they should find a place in history of North Carolina, I believe to be incontrovertible."

Was Governor Swain a man to say a thing like this of a "myth" after he had studied it for twenty years? Was he the kind of man to help perpetrate a fraud?" Instead of that, every one who knows anything about him, knows that he was one of the most broad-minded and conscientious of men, and a historian who sought the truth without prejudice or partiality. His verdict was formed with all the evidence before him for the negative that has ever been produced but without much of the positive evidence.

So this important witness for the doubters develops on cross-examination into a witness for the believers. It would seem that the myth hunter was unmindful of the fable about Dædalus who constructed the famous labyrinth for King Minos of Crete only to find himself imprisoned in it.

5. Considerable space is taken up unnecessarily in proving that the Cape Fear Mercury sent by Governor Martin contained the resolutions of May 31; so far as is known, this is not denied, though there is no proof that it did not also contain the Declaration of May 20. Further, however, the erroneous statement is made that the records cited "show beyond refutation that on May 31, 1775, the committee of Mecklenburg County declared the laws of the province of North Carolina wholly suspended in Mecklenburg County," but "this action was not taken with any view of declaring absolute independence of Great Britain."

There is no occasion for quibbling over these resolutions of May 31. They are before us undisputed and can speak for themselves. In answer to the belittling imputation quoted, here is the first of the twenty resolutions: "That all commissions, civil and military, heretofore granted by the Crown, to be exercised in these colonies, are null and void, and the constitution of each particular colony wholly suspended."

This is an absolute declaration of independence and is not more formal only because of the previous Declaration. That this meeting was an adjourned one from the former is borne out by the purport of the resolutions, and by the obvious fact that this meeting was assembled to provide laws for the independent people "until laws shall be provided for us by the congress." The laws then adopted were "to provide in some degree for the Exigencies of the County in the present alarming period"; but to attempt to limit the declaration to the county requires unlimited imagination in the face of that first resolution. (See paragraph 19.)

6. The court records of Mecklenburg are cited to show that they were carried on in the name of the King after May,

1775, and that therefore there could have been no declaration of independence. This indeed does suggest legitimate doubt but no more than that, and it is of no weight when brought to bear against the positive testimony of the men who were present May 20, 1775, when the declaration was made. This is as much against the undisputed resolutions of May 31 as it is against the declaration, but it is in accord with both. The resolutions adopted after the Declaration constituted the law for Mecklenburg until the adoption of the State constitution December 18, 1776, and as no provision was made for the changing of the court customs and forms, it is but natural that they should have remained unchanged. As they remained so even after July 4, 1776, the logical inference from the argument would be that the people of Mecklenburg also refused to accept the national Declaration of Independence. It is clear that the custom was immaterial and was not changed except by the new constitution; but it is also well to note that there are but a few scattering instances of the practice and that the real affairs of Mecklenburg were in the hands of the independent committee. (See paragraph 3 preceding, and paragraph 12 of Positive Evidence.)

7. After the national Declaration, we are told:

"The home rule government which the committee had provided for Mecklenburg by the resolutions of May 31, 1775, now no longer acknowledged allegiance to the Crown of Great Britain, but to the State of North Carolina."

This insinuation as to the allegiance of the May 31 resolutions to the Crown is answered by the sixteenth of the resolutions in the words "whatever person shall hereafter receive a commission from the Crown or attempt to exercise any such commission heretofore received, shall be deemed an enemy to his country." Is not this sufficient?

8. An exhaustive attempt is made to show that the resolutions of May 31 came to be known as a declaration of independence (which was eminently proper) and that this accounts for the claim as to May 20. Every one who ever testified as to the declaration without mentioning the date is brought forward to strengthen this theory. There is "great argument about it and about, but evermore" he comes out by the same door wherein he went. No piece of evidence of any nature can be found to show that the declaration was not May 20, and there is before us the testimony of men who were there and who testified positively, after mature deliberation, that the Declaration was made as claimed, May 20, 1775.

9. "This production, however, is entirely inconsistent with the history of the time, both as to America in general, and North Carolina in particular."

The author of this remarkable statement answers it himself in the details of the Fayetteville and Wilmington committees. It is answered again in the admitted resolutions of May 31. It was answered by Thomas Jefferson in his letter to Adams wherein he said, "No State was more fixed or forward than North Carolina." It was answered at the battle of Moore's Creek bridge, February 27, 1776, and it is answered in every chapter of the history of North Carolina, which shows from beginning to end that the Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence was a rational manifestation of the will of the people and in perfect harmony with the history of the State from the beginning to the end of the struggle for independence. (This part of the question was covered in the October number of the North Carolina Booklet in the contribution entitled "The Significance of the Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence.")

10. "There is not one contemporary record in evidence to sustain it."

This is answered by the citation given from the Wachovian records in Salem (than which there are none more reliable) written during the revolution and which declares that "The county of Mecklenburg declared itself free and independent" in 1775. This is a contemporary record, the correctness of which no one can question. (See paragraph 2 of Positive Evidence.)

11. "The traditionary references to a declaration of independence, heretofore quoted, are neither contemporaneous nor specific, and will apply as readily to the authenticated resolutions of May, 31, as to this alleged declaration of May, 20."

Now what can this mean in connection with the writer's continuous contention that there was nothing in the resolutions of May 31 to suggest the thought of independence? All of these "traditionary references" are concerning "a declaration of independence" and if this applies "readily to the authenticated resolutions," then the authenticated resolutions must have had something in them to suggest the thought, otherwise the suggestion could have come only from the reality of May 20. Verily, "he falleth into his own pit." His position is ominously suggestive of the great

> "Serbonian bog,
> Twixt Damiata and Mount Cassius old,
> Where armies whole have sunk."

12. "The resolutions of May 31, preclude the possibility of any such action having been taken on May 20. The resolutions provided for the organization of the people of Mecklenburg into a regiment of militia at a future date. It is evident that the colonel of the regiment could not have called a convention of two men from each company when there were, as yet no companies."

That Mecklenburg County was divided into militia districts or companies from its creation in 1762 is a matter of record. This is proven by innumerable items. In particular is the visit of Governor Tryon to Mecklenburg to review the militia companies in August of 1768, shortly after which time (September 12) each of the companies furnished a quota to march to Hillsboro to help preserve peace.

13. "It will be observed that parts of the 'declaration' bear close resemblance to parts of the national Declaration of Independence."

This is one of the stock arguments for the doubters, but it is not a strong one. There are some expressions in the two documents that are identical, but these same expressions were such as had been frequent in the public discussions for years before 1775. The "identical expressions" are in the resolutions of Richard Henry Lee, June 7, 1776, and some of them in the Bond of Union of the Scotch Presbyterians of 1670. That this reasoning is conclusive is demonstrated by Jefferson's letter to Adams of July 9, 1819, in which (though professing disbelief in the Mecklenburg Declaration), there is no intimation that it occurred to him that there was any undue similarity in the two papers. He brought to bear upon it every possible criticism, and it is not likely he would have omitted this if in his opinion there had been any reason in it. Jefferson was also careful to state that he did not positively assert that the declaration was a fabrication. Aside from this, the similarity is only in minor details. There is no similarity in the form and in the details where we would expect to find it, as for instance in the opening paragraph, "When in the course of human events," etc. If the Mecklenburg declaration had been a fabrication, it would have been fabricated by one familiar with all the papers concerned and who would have had before him the resolutions of May 31 and the national declaration. The fact that it is entirely different in structure and general content from both of these documents is proof that it could not have been founded upon either. If, as alleged, the idea of the May 20 declaration grew out of a confusion about the May 31 resolutions, then it would be supposed that the declaration would contain some expressions identical with the resolutions, but there is not one word of the kind. There is nothing in the remote resemblances of the two declarations (as against their greater differences) to raise a legitimate doubt of the positive and uncontroverted testimony. That the charge of plagiarism is futile and that the principles and phraseology of professions of unalienable rights have been similar for hundreds of years, are statements amply confirmed by the fact that the Mecklenburg Declaration and the National Declaration are no closer in resemblance to each other than both of these documents are to the Declaration of the United Provinces of the Netherlands, July 26, 1581. The Dutch defiance of Spain and the American defiance of England (two centuries later) recite their grievances and one says "a Prince whose character is thus marked by every act which may define a tyrant," etc., while the other says "he is no longer a Prince but a tyrant." Both outline the objects of government and the duties of rulers; the one says "when he does not behave thus, the subjects may not only disallow his authority but legally proceed to the choice of another Prince for their defense"; the other says "whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or abolish it, and to institute new government and to provide new Guards for their future safety." These similarities are of substance, and the similarities in exact phrases are the very things that plagiarism would have omitted.

14. The surmises and multitudinous hypotheses concerning the certificates published in the State pamphlet of 1831 are trivial and hardly worthy of mention, though much space is occupied with them. Concerning the certificate signed jointly by Graham, Hutchison, Clark and Robinson (given in full further on in this discussion) the captious criticisms are amusing."

"It is evident from the verbiage of that certificate, that those who gave it refreshed their memories to a considerable extent from the publication in the Raleigh Register." "They said that Colonel Polk was colonel of the militia regiment, and that Ephraim Brevard was the secretary of the meeting which they did not term a convention."

The critic does not go to the trouble of attempting to dis-prove any of these things but expects us to accept his prognostications without question. That there was confusion as to whether Brevard or Alexander was secretary (because of the fact that Brevard did write the declaration) is but natural, but the question at issue is not affected by this. As to the innuendo about refreshing memory and not calling it a convention, we are again reminded of tweedle-dum and tweedle-dee. However, they did refer to the members as "Delegates" several times, and delegates to a committee would have been an anomaly too odd doubtless even for a surmise. It would be interesting to know what is meant by the "verbiage" of the certificate; it is really concise and pointed.

"They said the delegates on the 20th again met. They did not remember an all-night session."

There is certainly no discrepancy here. The statement is made that they met the next day and the Declaration was then read. This is in accord with the general statement that the Declaration was read from the court-house steps at noon of the twentieth.

"They did not say that the resolutions in the Raleigh Register were what they heard read that day. They said that the resolutions went to declare independence, not that they declared it."

This lack of familiarity with the Raleigh Register does not agree with the theory that they "refreshed their memories" from it. If that had been true (which it is was not) is it not probable that they would have said whether or not they were the resolutions they were describing? The other statement is simply incorrect, as by reference to the complete certificate it can be seen that the action is referred to four times as "the Declaration of Independence."

This is all that can be said against that definite detailed statement of four men who were present when the Declaration was made, and who testified to the facts ("and on our honor declare") and whose statement is supported by the strongest of corroborative and contemporary evidence. This certificate, after bearing "the slings and arrows of outrageous fortune" for nearly one hundred years, remains unshaken in its reliability and its accuracy, and so long as this holds true, the Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence will be held as authentic by every one who is searching for the truth and who knows it when he sees it.

15. We are informed that notwithstanding Martin's statement to the contrary, the Declaration as published in his history, was obtained after he said it was. Up to this good time, no one had ever questioned the veracity of Francis Xavier Martin, who emigrated from France and settled in New Bern in 1782, was engaged by the State for a number of years in editing the Statutes, was several times a member of the General Assembly and associated with some of the Mecklenburg representatives who had signed the Declaration, and who was then gathering material for his history of the State. In 1809, he was appointed by President Madison to a position in the Louisiana territory. In the preface to his history dated July 29, 1829, he says:

"The writer imagined he had collected sufficient materials to justify the hope of producing a history of North Carolina worth the attention of his fellow citizens, and he had arranged all those that related to transactions anterior to the Declaration of Independence (July 4, 1776,) when in 1809, Mr. Madison thought his services were wanted."

Further he states that he had hoped to get the time to give more attention to "the work he had commenced in Carolina" but the condition of his health made it necessary for him to put it to press without delay. This is absolutely conclusive evidence that the Martin copy of the Declaration (the one considered as genuine) was in existence long before the discussion arose in the Raleigh Register and hence could not have been manufactured for that purpose. More than this, we have the testimony of Rev. Francis L. Hawks in his Charlotte speech in 1857 that Judge Martin told him that "he had obtained the copy of the Declaration prior to 1800," and that he did not know Garden had printed a copy. Is it likely that this could have been done without the knowledge of John McKnitt Alexander or that Alexander after the destruction of the original, would have certified to an incorrect copy while knowing that the Martin exact copy was in existence? This requires too many ifs for the ordinary imagination. The Martin copy is undoubtedly a verbatim reproduction of the original which was destroyed by the burning of Alexander's house in April of 1800.

16. All that is said against the Garden copy published in Garden's Anecdotes of the Revolution in 1828, is that it is plainly a revision of the Guilford copy published in the Charleston Mercury of July 4, 1828. It happens, however, that the Garden and Martin copies are duplicates except for slight variations such as might well be made by the same copyist in copying from the original, and besides Garden acknowledges as his source of information Dr. William Read (a fellow-citizen of Charleston with Garden) who attended Ephraim Brevard in his last illness in 1777, at the home of John McKnitt Alexander. Neither Garden nor Martin knew of the other's publication until it appeared in print, so there could not have possibly been any comparison of their copies. Hence the only reason that can account for their similarity is that they were both verbatim reproductions of the original, as they were. There is no evidence whatever to the contrary.

17. The various suppositions as to how the certificates might not mean what they say, are aired at considerable length, and particular attention is given to an attempt to demonstrate the unreliability of the papers left by Dr. Joseph McKnitt Alexander who was a son of John McKnitt Alexander. Governor Swain is here brought in again to testify, and he undoubtedly did not attach much importance to the papers; but as Governor Swain said that (without these papers) the documentary evidence was sufficient, it is apparent that the case is complete even without this bit of corroborative evidence. The point raised regarding Dr. Alexander's custom of signing his name to his notes as "J. McKnitt" is of no consequence one way or the other, as he afterwards over his full name accepted the signature as his own.

18. * * * "There was no such person as Richard Harris, Sr." * * * "John Davidson was probably left out because his memory had not been clear." * * * "Captain Jack could not have told William S. Alexander all that they certify that he told them Jack said."

These are samples of unsupported and unsupportable statements. Just how any one would go about proving that "there was no such person as Richard Harris, Sr.," presents a subject for speculation, as does also the statement about Captain Jack. As for John Davidson, he was not "left out" but is accredited as one of the signers of the Declaration and his name is inscribed on the Declaration monument in Charlotte. Why should he have been discriminated against because of defective memory when all of the Mecklenburg people are supposed (by the doubters) to have been similarly afflicted?

19. "But the Alexander 'declaration' had now become a reality with, a part of the Presbyterian religion, of, and a test of patriotism with many North Carolinians and reliable evidence, and logical deductions could not throw it down from the pedestal upon which myth-worshiping idolators had placed it."

This is the last stroke and immediately follows the introduction of the celebrated historian, Peter Force, as a witness for the prosecution. No sentence of equal length ever contained more errors. The relation between the faith in the Declaration and the doctrine of predestination is too remote for discussion here, and the reflection on the Presbyterians generally is in part due to the false assumption that all the inhabitants of Mecklenburg from the earliest times have been Presbyterians. What is there to prove that the inhabitants of Mecklenburg were "myth-worshipping idolators?" To be sure it is a mouth-filling phrase, but it is too far from truth to be passed over in silence. No people in history have been further from fulfilling that description than the ones to whom it is meant to apply. It is much better to let the facts speak for themselves, and the facts with regard to Peter Force prove the doubter a Dædalus again.

December 11, 1841, Colonel Force wrote from Washington to John Vaughan in Philadelphia, a letter in reply to an inquiry as to the Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence. At that time, Colonel Force did not have the complete resolutions of May 31 and was in doubt as to the date of the resolutions, though he had the Davie copy of the Declaration of May 20 as published in the Raleigh Register. He refers to the May 20 Declaration as the "manuscript" and his views (as a witness for the prosecution) are especially interesting in declaring that the resolutions are the more important even if both are considered authentic. The following is the main part of his letter:

"The manuscript (May 20) does not declare the entire dissolution of the laws, government and Constitution of this country. It applies to Mecklenburg County alone; that county only is declared independent—'a sovereign and self-governing association' by itself, separated alike from the Crown and the province, and leaving North Carolina and all the other colonies in subjection to the Crown. The declaration in the printed copy (May 31) is of an entirely different character. It does declare 'the entire dissolution' in that the whole country is declared independent. The declaration (May 31) is not for one county of one colony; it is for all the colonies. It is a Declaration of Independence of the United Colonies, and made by men who saw far into the future—whose patriotism was not limited by the boundaries of their own county. At that early day, the men of Mecklenburg marked out the true course to be pursued by the whole continent for a redress of grievances; this was afterwards found to be the only course. When they took their ground, they stood alone—their own province of North Carolina did not join them. They did not ask their fellow subjects to unite with them in so daring an enterprise without first encountering the peril themselves. They did not wait for others to take the first step—they did not stand at ease until the whole were prepared to advance in line; but they boldly and fearlessly marched out to the front, inviting by their example all the rest to follow. These men were the first to declare that the authority of the King and Parliament over 'their colonies' was annulled and vacated. They were the first to incur the responsibility, whatever it might be, of making such a declaration, and publishing it to the world. If I have succeeded in establishing a single truth, or in removing a single doubt—if I have cleared away one of the many clouds of error, that for twenty years have thrown so much darkness around this brilliant star in our history, I shall be entirely satisfied."

Colonel Force was a native of New Jersey, but lived for the greater part of his life in Washington where he died January 23, 1868. For many years he was among the foremost of writers and historians, and his published works are invaluable. There is no record that he ever visited North Carolina, and he certainly had no cause for partiality, yet from the letter, it might be supposed that he had been one of the leaders among the "myth-worshiping idolators" of the Mecklenburg Presbyterians. Moreover, the long-desired conclusive contemporary record was found among the Moravians who were neither Presbyterians, myth-worshipers nor idolators. No "myth" ever sustained such persistent and bitter opposition as has been for a hundred years directed at the Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence; and the real reason the Declaration grows in favor is not idolatry but that truth that makes doubters and traducers wince: "Facts are stubborn things."

20. With apologies to Disraeli for using some of his words in a certain celebrated saying, it may be said that the concluding paragraph of this latest attack on the Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence, is a spectacular manifestation of the idiosyncrasies of a disputatious carper and historical apostate inebriated with the exuberance of his own verbosity.

The paragraph fulfills the requirements of a maximum of error in a minimum of space.

The doubter claims priority in labeling as a forgery the alleged lost copy of the Cape Fear Mercury published by one S. Millington Miller in Collier's Weekly for July 11, 1905. Facts speak louder than words. July 14, 1905, this humble scribe (who has never yet believed in a myth) declared in a brief letter to the Charlotte Observer that the Miller publication was a forgery and entirely indefensible. August 23, 1905, this same humble contributor published in the same Charlotte Observer a lengthy communication (based on an investigation made in the meantime in the British Public Record office) which according to an editorial in the Charlotte Observer was conclusive. In a letter to this same humble writer August 3, 1905, Miller made this interesting statement: "I can not see why you friends of the Declaration oppose this paper when the public is willing to accept it." Miller could not see that to be a friend of the Declaration is to be a friend of the truth.

December 30, 1905, Miller was interviewed in a Baltimore hotel by Prof. Alexander Graham, Dr. George W. Graham and Mr. R. O. Alexander. This committee had much difficulty in finding Miller and only secured this interview on the strength of an offer of five thousand dollars for the paper if proven genuine. Upon inspection the forgery was self-evident, and it was found to be a reproduction in large part of a document surreptitiously purloined by Miller from the private papers of Dr. Graham while making a "friendly" call some months before. The conclusion of this committee was published in the Charlotte Observer of January 1, 1906, and the case was settled. The committee, however, had secured from Miller his written consent to show his paper to S. Worthington Ford, and hence by their courtesy Mr. Ford January 5 saw the paper which otherwise he certainly would not have seen. Mr. Ford's verdict was published January 12, and later he made himself ridiculous by claiming that he and Mr. A. S. Salley, Jr., had done it all. It is perhaps worthy of notice that all the members of the committee were Mecklenburg Presbyterians and Miller was an Episcopalian. Just what the aforesaid doubter was doing all that time is for him to tell, but whatever it was, it most assuredly had nothing to do with proving the forgery. The fact that this publication was rejected and proven false by the most ardent defenders of the Declaration shows that they were sufficiently sure of their ground to resent any false testimony; and such is the truth. (See "That Cape Fear Mercury," by Alexander Graham, 1906.)

The doubter confesses that at one time he was a believer in a myth, which in itself ought to disqualify him from giving expert testimony in a matter of fact. This humble scribe not only never believed in myths but he never had any faith in myth-hunters.

The doubter says that he was convinced of his error by the late Edward McCrady, who was indeed a true historian and who did great service for the history of the great State of South Carolina without finding it necessary to attempt to pull down the history of another State. McCrady, on page 579, volume 1, of the History of South Carolina in the Revolution, does not discuss the Declaration but says that the Resolves "provided for an independent government." Now if the doubter was open to conviction about May 20, why did he not accept McCrady's view of May 31? The setting up of an independent government is a de facto declaration of independence, while the doubter in the foregoing discussion says in direct contradiction of McCrady that the Mecklenburg government "acknowledged allegiance to the Crown."

Thus endeth the evidence for the State—of uncertainty. The doubter might well have taken for his motto for that concluding paragraph "Ir por lana y volver trasquilado"—which is Spanish, and being interpreted, means in effect "To go for wool and get shorn."

* * * * * * *

Is there left a "hinge or loop to hang a doubt on?" Where is any reasonable basis for legitimate doubt? Is the negative proof conclusive on either of the points at issue—that there was no meeting May 20, and that the Resolves of May 31 did not declare independence? Have not the allegations failed completely in their own presentation?

For many years the doubters charged that the argument for the Declaration was "manufactured" to support an untenable theory. No charge was ever more capable of complete self-application. No one can truthfully say that any of the following evidence is "manufactured," misrepresented or not authentic, but the opposition seems to have as many lives as the "mythical" cat. Ninety years ago they staked their life on opposition to the Resolves and lost. Likewise they lost in the claim that the Resolves were of no consequence. They clamored for the evidence of eye-witnesses as final proof, and received it in abundance. They demanded contemporary evidence and it was produced. They said North Carolina history did not bear out the independent spirit, though any chapter in it proves the contrary. This unashamed brazenness of the doubters suggests the story of the gourd-vine which ran out beyond the top of a stately palm tree and boasted that in a few days it had grown higher than the palm, to which the latter replied: "Yes, and every year of my century of life, a vain hopeless thing like you has made that same boast only to fade away within a few days and be forgotten."

Driven to the last ditch, the enemy now can only "suppose" that the evidence (that they know to be overwhelming) really referred to May 31 in spite of its specific reference to May 20.

Note.—(This is the whole of the argument of William Henry Hoyt in his recent book "The Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence," of which no contention is omitted in the foregoing discussion.) This line of reasoning, on which the doubters now found their last hope, if applied to the biblical account of creation, would give us something like this: "The first chapter of Genesis mentions the creation of only one planet; there is nothing in it that can not by skillful imagination be made to describe Mars; we know that Mars was created; therefore the story of the creation of the earth is a myth and Michael Angelo's statue of Moses is a fraud." There is nothing deficient in the reasoning except the omission of all evidence proving the existence of the earth, and the fact that the description not only "might refer" but does refer to the earth.

The whole controversy "in a nutshell" is the opinions, deductions and surmises (wholly without evidence) of a few modern "historians" for the negative; and for the affirmative is the specific evidence of men who were present May 20, 1775, and the contemporary records that can not be questioned. Which is the more worthy of credence?

Even without the positive evidence of the action of May 20, 1775, there is not sufficient cause for denial of the document that was accepted as authentic among the people who made it. With the documentary evidence (given in the following pages) there is no unbiased jury that could fail to return the verdict claimed by Governor Swain fifty years ago—that the facts as to the Declaration of May 20 are incontrovertible.

Positive Evidence.

The proposition is that the people of Mecklenburg County, assembled in Charlotte, May 20, 1775, declared independence of Great Britain. This proposition depends for proof upon testimony of men who were present, and contemporary documents. The corollary to the proposition is that an adjourned meeting was held May 31 when the formal declaration was extended to apply to the whole country, and rules and regulations were adopted for independent government in the county.

The proof is conclusive that there were two different declations made on two different dates in May of 1775.

This fact is denied by certain disputatious critics who have never been able to agree among themselves even as to their own negative hypotheses or the alleged demonstration of them. On the other hand, there is no difference of opinion on the side of the proposition as above stated, and which is amply proven by documentary evidence of unquestioned authenticity.

The resolutions of May 31, 1775 (printed, and held in tradition as "the Resolves") are admitted as authentic in words and date.

These "Resolves" constitute a declaration of independence, in that the first of them declares: "That all commissions, civil and military, heretofore granted by the crown, to be exercised in these colonies, are null and void, and the constitution of each particular colony wholly suspended."

The Resolves were so-called because all of them except the first were concerned with laws for the government of the independent county; and they were never referred to as "the declaration" because the action of May 20 was more formal (though limited) and were concerned almost entirely with declaring independence.

These unquestioned "Resolves" were nevertheless ample justification for any "popular tradition" about a declaration of independence, as their scope was even wider, and there could therefore have been no motive for "manufacturing" another declaration.

The Davie copy, made from memory by John McKnitt Alexander, could not have had any possible reference to the "Resolves" as there are no points of resemblance in either form or words in the two documents.

This radical difference between the documents (except for the first of the Resolves) is evidence that the one was supplementary to the other.

Alexander was undoubtedly familiar with the Resolves (which had been printed) and he would not have "manufactured" a false copy of an original he knew to be in existence.

He could have had no motive for misrepresentation in the Davie copy of 1800, as at that time and for many years afterward there was no question raised as to the authenticity of either of the declarations.

That there was no misrepresentation is proven by the close resemblance of the Davie copy to the Martin copy (direct from the original) obtained before 1800, according to the statement of Martin to Hawks as given in an address by Dr. Hawks in Charlotte in 1857.

The Resolves needed no proof and there was therefore no occasion for mention of them by the witnesses called on to testify as to the Declaration, and who doubtless remembered the Resolves as the subsequent laws that were based on the Declaration, but "two meetings" are mentioned.

The Resolves were not mentioned as a declaration in the newspapers and hence the "tradition" referred to the other meeting.

The witnesses necessarily knew the Resolves were in print, and therefore would not have testified to another meeting different in organization and results without certainty that their statements were correct in every detail.

Their descripion of the two-days' meeting could not apply to the meeting of May 31, which was described in the published account in the Charleston Gazette with the words: "This day the committee of this county met and passed the following Resolves."

The committee could not have met and adopted all these laws based on a Declaration of Independence in one session except for the fact that the more formal Declaration with the attendant discussion had been attended to at a previous meeting.

Also the description could not have referred to the meeting of May 31, because the witnesses who remembered with distinctness the principal participants and the various details must have also remembered the document at least well enough to distinguish between the two.

The witnesses testified to the Declaration of Independence with the Davie copy before them and knowing that that was the Declaration under discussion; and if it had not been the one they remembered, they would have had no reason for not saying so.

That the proceedings of May 31 were printed is but natural, as any editor of the time with both documents before him would have chosen the later one as being of the more general interest in that it applied to all the colonies.

The theory of a confusion of the two dates on account of the eleven days change in the calendar in 1752 (ten years before the county was created) is entirely untenable. There was no section of America where such error would be less likely to exist than among the scholars of old Mecklenburg. The theory has not one particle of evidence to sustain it. It is pure presumption. In the thousands of private and public records of those times, there is not another instance of such confusion. In the certificate of Joseph Graham, the Declaration date is given as May 20 and that of the battle of Lexington as April 19, this being conclusive that there could have been no confusion.

The theory as to the defective memories of seven witnesses, all of them defective in exactly the same way, demonstrates its fallacy by an automatic application of reductio ad absurdum. Examination of the testimony shows that the details were remembered with distinctness so that there was no discrepancy in the evidence of witnesses who had not consulted together.

Hence we have positive concrete evidence of meetings and declarations on two different days in May of 1775; and there is no positive evidence to the contrary.

The documentary evidence demonstrating these conclusions is here given, and they who desire the fuller details for reference, are referred to "The Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence and its Signers," by Dr. George W. Graham; "The History of Mecklenburg County," by D. A. Tompkins; and "The Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence," (Moravian Records) by Miss Adelaide L. Fries.

* * * * * * *

THE JOINT CERTIFICATE.

1. The first testimony is the joint certificate (published in the Raleigh Register, February 18, 1820) signed by George Graham, William Hutchison, Jones Clark, and Robert Robinson, all of whom were present when the Declaration was made. (For their biographies see the publications above mentioned.) They were prominent men at the time the certificate was made, and no question has ever been raised as to their character and reliability. Their testimony can be impeached only by positive evidence as to their defective memory or fraudulent intent, and either imputation bears its condemnation on its face. They considered the matter carefully and were in such perfect accord in their recollections that they signed the same certificate. No conceivable evidence could be stronger. There is nothing in refutation except surmise, and there is overwhelming evidence in corroboration.

CERTIFICATE.

State of North Carolina—Mecklenburg County.

At the request of Col. William Polk, of Raleigh, made to Major-General George Graham, soliciting him to procure all the information that could be obtained at this late period, of the transactions which took place in the county of Mecklenburg, in the year 1775, as it respected the people of that county having declared Independence; of the time when the Declaration was made; who were the principal movers and leaders, and the members who composed the body of Patriots who made the Declaration, and signed the same.

We, the undersigned citizens of the said county, and of the several ages set forth opposite to each of our names, do certify and on our honor declare, that we were present in the town of Charlotte, in the said county of Mecklenburg, on the 19th day of May, 1775, when two persons elected from each Captain's Company in said county, appeared as Delegates, to take into consideration the state of the country, and to adopt such measures as to them seemed best, to secure their lives, liberty, and property, from the storm which was gathering, and had burst upon their fellow-citizens to the Eastward, by a British Army, under the authority of the British King and Parliament.

The order for the election of Delegates was given by Col. Thomas Polk, the commanding officer of the militia of the county, with a request that their powers should be ample, touching any measure that should be proposed.

We do further certify and declare, that to the best of our recollection and belief, the delegation was complete from every company, and that the meeting took place in the courthouse, about 12 o'clock on the said 19th day of May, 1775, when Abraham Alexander was chosen Chairman, and Dr. Ephraim Brevard Secretary. That the Delegates continued in session until in the night of that day; that on the 20th they again met, when a committee, under the direction of the Delegates, had formed several resolves, which were read, and which went to declare themselves, and the people of Mecklenburg County, Free and Independent of the King and Parliament of Great Britain—and that, from that day thenceforth, all allegiance and political relation was absolved between the good people of Mecklenburg and the King of Great Britain; which Declaration was signed by every member of the Delegation, under the shouts and huzzas of a very large assembly of the people of the county, who had come to know the issue of the meeting. We further believe, that the Declaration of Independence was drawn up by the Secretary, Dr. Ephraim Brevard, and that it was conceived and brought about through the instrumentality and popularity of Col. Thomas Polk, Abraham Alexander, John McKnitt Alexander, Adam Alexander, Ephraim Brevard, John Phifer, and Hezekiah Alexander, with some others.

We do further certify and declare, that in a few days after the Delegates adjourned, Captain James Jack, of the town of Charlotte, was engaged to carry the resolves to the President of Congress, and to our Representatives—one copy for each; and that his expenses were paid by a voluntary subscription. And we do know that Capt. Jack executed the trust, and returned with answers, both from the President and our Delegates in Congress, expressive of their entire approbation of the course that had been adopted, recommending a continuance in the same; and that the time would soon be, when the whole Continent would follow our example.

We further certify and declare, that the measures which were adopted at the time before mentioned, had a general influence on the people of this county to unite them in the cause of liberty and the country, at that time; that the same unanimity and patriotism continued unimpaired to the close of the war; and that the resolutions had considerable effect in harmonizing the people in two or three adjoining counties.

That a committee of Safety for the county were elected, who were clothed with civil and military power, and under their authority several disaffected persons in Rowan, and Tryon (now Lincoln County,) were sent for, examined, and conveyed (after it was satisfactorily proven they were inimical) to Camden, in South Carolina, for safe-keeping.

We do further certify, that the acts passed by the committee of Safety, were received as the Civil Law of the land in many cases, and that Courts of Justice for the decision of controversies between the people were held, and we have no recollection that dissatisfaction existed in any instance with regard to the judgments of said courts.

We are not, at this late period, able to give the names of all the Delegation who formed the Declaration of Independence; but can safely declare as to the following persons being of the number, viz: Thomas Polk, Abraham Alexander, John McKnitt Alexander, Adam Alexander, Ephraim Brevard, John Phifer, Hezekiah James Balch, Benjamin Patton, Hezekiah Alexander, Richard Barry, William Graham, Matthew M'Clure, Robert Irwin, Zacheus Wilson, Neil Morrison, John Flenniken, John Queary, Ezra Alexander.

In testimony of all and every part herein set forth, we have hereunto set our hands.

GEO. GRAHAM, aged 61, near 62.
WM. HUTCHISON, 68.
JONAS CLARK, 61.
ROB'T. ROBINSON, 68.

MORAVIAN CHURCH RECORDS.

2. In the American Historical Review for April, 1906, Mr. A. S. Salley, Jr., secretary of the South Carolina Historical Commission and who has made an exhaustive study of the wrong side of the Declaration controversy, said: "If the controversy over the 'Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence' is ever settled, it will have to be done by genuine contemporary documents." This from one of the most indefatigable of those trying to keep history crooked, voiced the forlorn hope of the hosts of error. They had assured themselves (as they had previously of so many other theories now discredited) that this demand was the one that could not be satisfied and hence was the proper one on which to base their last stand. The demand, however, like all others, was fully met, though the doubters (as was expected) remained of the same opinion still.

"In September, 1904, Mr. O. J. Lehman, of Bethania, N. C., discovered among the Moravian archives at that place" a diary of the Revolution written in German by Traugott Bagge ("The most able man of affairs in Wachovia during the War") in the years from 1775 to 1783. The various events of the period are given in chronological order, and the "genuine contemporary record of the Declaration is here given in the original and in English:

"Ich kan zu Ende des 1775sten Jahres nicht unangemerkt lassen, dass schon im Sommer selbigen Jahres, das ist im May, Juny, oder July, die County Mecklenburg in Nord Carolina sich für so frey u. independent von England declarirte, u. solche Einrichtung zur Verwaltung der Gesetze unter sich machte, als jamalen der Continental Congress hernach ins Ganze gethan. Dieser Congress aber sahe dieses Verfahren als zu fruhzeitig an." "I can not leave unmentioned at the end of the 1775th year, that already in the summer of this year, that is in May, June or July, the County of Mecklenburg in North Carolina declared itself free and independent of England, and made such arrangements for the administration of the laws among themselves, as later the Continental Congress made for all. This Congress, however, considered these proceedings premature."

The most that critical ingenuity can bring against this "genuine contemporary document" is the unsupported hypothesis that because of the indefinite date, the reference is not to May 20 but to May 31. The other items in the Bagge diary show the writer to have been not only well informed but uniformly accurate. It is not therefore within the proper bounds of inference to even suggest that perhaps he meant the Resolves when he said "The County of Mecklenburg declared itself free and independent of England." The Resolves were a declaration of independence, but they were not so known at that time and were not so called in the newspapers for the reason that their main purpose was to form laws for the independent government founded on the Declaration of May 20. The Resolves did not declare independence for "The County of Mecklenburg" but for all the colonies, while the Declaration did declare independence for "The County of Mecklenburg." The indefiniteness as to the date is therefore unimportant as without it the "genuine contemporary document" proves that there was a Declaration of Independence in Mecklenburg in 1775 which was not the Resolves of May 31.

That this document is of unquestionable merit and in itself proof of the Declaration, and with the certificates of participants conclusive proof of the date as being May 20, is evidenced by the following competent expert testimony:

* * * * * * * * * * * *

As merchant, financier, politician, as a sturdy, conscientious man, Traugotte Bagge ranks among the first in the history of the State."—Miss Fries.

* * * * * * * * * * * *

"I have been much interested in the revival of the discussion concerning the Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence, and particularly gratified that through your researches among the Archives of Wachovia you have found records which substantiate the claims made for this important event. I am thoroughly familiar with the records, particularly of the Colonial and Revolutionary periods, of the Moravians in America, and esteem them, local and general, of the highest historical value."—John W. Jordan, Librarian Historical Society of Pennsylvania in a letter, January 21, 1907, to Miss Fries.

* * * * * * * * * * * *

"The discovery of the 'Bagge Manuscript' effectually sets at rest the question of the Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence, except perhaps in the minds of those who are unwilling to consider the matter in a fair and unbiased light.

"The Wachovia Archives are a series of records made contemporaneous with the events themselves, and form an unbroken history of the leading events of our section, and of the principal events of the State, and even of the country at large from 1753 to the present day. In no case has the reliability of these archives ever been brought into question."—John H. Clewell, Archivist of Wachovia and President of Salem College. The Academy, Jan., 1907.

* * * * * * * * * * * *

"I wish to express my enthusiastic appreciation of the extremely interesting piece of historical criticism that you have written. It is certainly most clear and convincing and seems to me to be the final word with regard to the document under examination."—Waldo G. Leland, Department of Historical Research, Carnegie Institution of Washington, in a letter, May 9, 1906, to Miss Fries.

Influence of Exciting News.

3. Joseph Graham, who was present when the Declaration was made, said "The news of the battle of Lexington, the 19th of April preceding, had arrived," and "There appeared among the people much excitement." This reference (corroborated by Rev. Humphrey Hunter) could not have meant the meeting of May 31 in the proceedings of which there is no indication whatever of excitement; in fact the first of the Resolves (declaring independence for all the colonies) is distinctly dispassionate and shows that that matter had already been settled. On the other hand, the Declaration of May 20 is of such a nature as to fulfill the description aside from the fact that various participants testify as to that date, and specific reference is made to the battle.

The Colonial records (Volume IX) demonstrate conclusively that the news of the battle of Lexington was received in Charlotte on or before the nineteenth of May, and hence it could not have excited the meeting of May 31 (in which there was no excitement.) The complete news of the battle was sent out from New Haven April 24 with instructions for forwarding it to every committee in the colonies, and this instruction was carried out faithfully. The news was received at Edenton May 4, New Bern May 6, Wilmington May 7 (late), and at Charleston May 13. (It was printed in the Charleston Gazette of May 16.) From Edenton May 4 (with the note, "For God's sake forward this in haste") it was forwarded to the western counties in North Carolina, arriving at Halifax May 9, and at Hillsboro May 12. From the latter place the news spread rapidly and it undoubtedly was received in Charlotte within the following seven days, and this would have been on or before the nineteenth of May, as Graham and Hunter positively testify. This is cumulative evidence that there were two meetings.

The Martin Copy.

4. The Martin copy of the declaration, accepted as the authentic one, was published in the history of North Carolina, by Francis Xavier Martin, in 1829. Martin was then living in the Louisiana territory where he had gone from North Carolina in 1809, and according to his testimony (which is not open to doubt) all his manuscript was prepared before he left North Carolina and the copy of the declaration was obtained before 1800 before the original records in the possession of John McKnitt Alexander were destroyed. Obviously an incorrect copy would not have existed with the original, and hence the Martin copy must be accepted as genuine and accurate as no evidence has ever been presented to the contrary except the usual theorizing of the doubters—those sad, sad words "it might have been" otherwise. The Martin copy is here given in full, with the names of the signers as agreed upon by the witnesses:

Resolved, That whosoever directly or indirectly abets or in any way, form or manner countenances the invasion of our rights, as attempted by the Parliament of Great Britain, is an enemy to his country, to America, and the rights of men.

Resolved, That we the citizens of Mecklenburg County do hereby dissolve the political bands which have connected us with the mother country, and absolve ourselves from all allegiance to the British Crown, abjuring all political connection with a nation that has wantonly trampled on our rights and liberties, and inhumanly shed the innocent blood of Americans at Lexington.

Resolved, That we do hereby declare ourselves a free and independent people, are, and of right ought to be, a sovereign and self-governing people, under the power of God and the General Congress; to the maintenance of which independence, we solemnly pledge to each other our mutual cooperation, our lives, our fortunes, and our most sacred honor.

Resolved, That we hereby ordain and adopt as rules of conduct, all and each of our former laws, and the Crown of Great Britain can not be considered hereafter as holding any rights, privileges or immunities amongst us.

Resolved, That all officers, both civil and military, in this county, be entitled to exercise the same powers and authorities as heretofore: That every member of this delegation shall henceforth be a civil officer and exercise the powers of a justice of the peace, issue process, hear and determine controversies according to law, preserve peace, union and harmony, in the county, and use every exertion to spread the love of liberty and of country, until a more general, and better organized system of government be established.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be transmitted by express to the President of the Continental Congress assembled in Philadelphia, to be laid before that body.

THOMAS POLK,
EPHRAIM BREVARD,
HEZEKIAH J. BALCH,
JOHN PHIFER,
JAMES HARRIS,
WILLIAM KENNON,
JOHN FORD,
RICHARD BARRY,
HENRY DOWNS,
EZRA ALEXANDER,
WILLIAM GRAHAM,
JOHN QUEARY,
ABRAHAM ALEXANDER,
JNO. M'KNITT ALEXANDER,
HEZEKIAH ALEXANDER,
ADAM ALEXANDER,
CHARLES ALEXANDER,
ZACHEUS WILSON, Sen.,
WAIGHTSTILL AVERY,
BENJAMIN PATTON,
MATTHEW M'CLURE,
NEIL MORRISON,
ROBERT IRWIN,
JOHN FLENNIKEN,
DAVID REESE,
RICHARD HARRIS, Sen.,
JOHN DAVIDSON.

DUPLICATE COPIES.

5. The Garden copy corroborates the Martin copy, though they could not have been compared in any way before publication. The Garden copy was published in Alexander Garden's Anecdotes of the Revolution in 1828, and it is identical with the Martin copy; but as the latter was then and had for many years been laid away among Martin's papers, there could not have been any conjunction in the two publications. Garden acknowledges as his source of information Dr. William Read who attended Ephraim Brevard (author of the Declaration) at his last illness in *1781 at the home of John McKnitt Alexander. There is no reason to doubt that the Garden copy was made from the original papers in the year *1781, and the identity of this with the Martin copy is conclusive that both of them were direct copies from the original, which fact is strengthened rather than weakened by some very slight and unimportant variations in the two copies. As neither of them has any resemblance in structure or detail to the Resolves, the inference is incontrovertible that they are authentic reproductions of another meeting—that of May 20. There is as much difference in the three printed and one manuscript copy of the Resolves as there is in the copies of the Declaration.

6. Another copy was published in the Charleston Mercury of July 4, 1828, which differed only in minor details from the Garden and Martin copies, but as it is not so exact in resemblance, no sound reasoning could claim any collaboration between the producer of it and either Martin or Garden. From the fact, however, that it is in substance the same as the others, it is evident that it must also have been a copy from the original, though a somewhat incorrect one. Garden's Anecdotes were published about the same time as the "Guilford" copy, but the manuscript had of course been completed before the publication, and as Garden gave another source for his information, there can be no justification for the claim that the Garden copy was made from the "Guilford" copy.

*In the manuscript copy, this date was given 1777. It was changed to 1781 by the author.—Editors.

7. In 1793, Dr. Hugh Williamson, who had announced his purpose to write a history of North Carolina, secured a copy of the Declaration from John McKnitt Alexander, which copy Governor Stokes testifies that he saw in Fayetteville in 1793 in the well-known handwriting of Alexander. This in itself is complete proof and this is completely proven. Governor Swain (editor of the State pamphlet of 1831) said in his letter to George Bancroft, March 18, 1858: "A note on page 5 of the State Pamphlet gives us the assurance of Governor Stokes that in 1793 he saw in the hands of Dr. Williamson, in Fayetteville, a copy of this record, together with a letter from J. McKnitt Alexander in relation to it. I wrote the note myself under the direction of Governor Stokes; and though I know he had an exceedingly retentive memory, did not at the time attach much importance to it. I have now before me a letter from Israel Pickens whom I knew familiarly from boyhood * * * represented my native district in Congress * * * first Governor of Alabama * * * died in Cuba after his election to the Senate of the United States * * * I know of no living man whose testimony is entitled to higher consideration than that of Governor Davie, Judge Cameron and Governor Pickens." The letter is then quoted to show that John McKnitt Alexander had many years before told him of sending the copy to Williamson as stated. Williamson did not complete the history as projected (stopping with the year 1771) and his papers were lost. (Judge Cameron had also testified that Alexander told him of the Davie copy in 1800.)

8. The testimony as to the genuineness of the Williamson and other copies is corroborated by John McKnitt Alexander in a statement the authenticity of which is not doubted. Immediately after the burning of his house and the destruction of the original documents in 1800, John McKnitt Alexander made from memory a copy of the declaration for Governor Davie. This copy varies from the Martin copy in some details but is the same in form and substance, and shows that Alexander was very familiar with the original. It is given in the past tense, but could not have had any possible reference to the Resolves nor have been founded on the national declaration from which it is wholly different except in the common phrases of the time. It must have been the record of an entirely different meeting, and as Alexander also gave the date as May 20, there can be no doubt that it was his recollection of that action; and as the paper is practically the same as the Garden and Martin copies, its accuracy is self-evident. Appended to it in the handwriting of John McKnitt Alexander is this conclusive statement: "It may be worthy of notice here to observe that the foregoing statement, though fundamentally correct, may not literally correspond with the original record of the transactions of said delegation and court of enquiry, as all those records and papers were burnt with the house on April 6, 1809; but previous to that time of 1800, a full copy of said records, at the request of Dr. Hugh Williamson, then of New York, but formerly a representative in Congress from this State, was forwarded to him by Col. William Polk, in order that those early transactions might fill their proper place in a history of this State then writing by said Dr. Williamson, in New York."

From this certificate of Alexander, with the corroborative evidence, there can surely be no doubt that a transcript of the original record was sent to Williamson, and Alexander would certainly not have appealed for corroboration of the Davie copy to a genuine original copy without being sure that he was "fundamentally correct." By this alone is fully proven that there were two declarations, and that the more formal one as given in the various copies mentioned was made May 20, 1775.

John McKnitt Alexander left the record of admitted authenticity that he had furnished copies of the Declaration to Davie and Williamson. If he had been referring to the Resolves of May 31, he would not have mentioned these "copies" but would have referred to the fact that the Resolves were printed in various newspapers of the time.

9. The Resolves of May 31 (given elsewhere in this discussion) show for themselves that they constitute a declaration of independence, and that they are corroborative of the more formal declaration of May 20. There is no inconsistency to be found in the Resolves as supplementary to the Declaration, and as the two documents are available to all, they are their own argument. The first of the Resolves is invulnerable proof that Mecklenburg patriots declared independence in May of 1775.

Other Certificates.

10. Capt. James Jack, December 7, 1819, then living in Georgia, testified "respecting the Declaration of Independence by the people of Mecklenburg County, in May, 1775," that he was present "at the time they were adopted," that he was engaged as "the bearer of the proceedings" to Philadelphia, and he delivered "the Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence of May, 1775, to Richard Caswell and William Hooper, the delegates to Congress from the State of North Carolina. Captain Jack's reliability is unquestioned, as is the fact that he did go to Philadelphia with the proceedings, and there is no proof that he meant something different when he said in plain English that it was "the Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence." He further says that Rev. Francis Cummins was a student in Charlotte and present on the occasion mentioned.

11. Rev. Francis Cummins, a Presbyterian minister in Lexington, Ga., November 10, 1819, testified that he was present when the people of the county met in Charlotte in 1775 and "proclaimed independence on English Government"; and that Capt. James Jack "was sent with the account of these proceedings to Congress." The certificates of Jack and Cummins are corroborative, but the authors did not consult together, as Jack suggests Cummins not knowing that his certificate had been made a month before.

11. Joseph Graham, whose biography is available to all and whose reliability is unquestionable, testified October 4, 1830, that he was present "on that occasion"; that he attended two meetings"; that Captain Jack carried a copy of the proceedings to Congress; that the news of the battle of Lexington had arrived; that "the committee appointed to draft the resolutions returned, and Dr. Ephraim Brevard read their report, as near as I can recollect, in the very words we have since seen them several times in print"; and that his statements were "all from personal knowledge." This last statement in connection with the reference to the battle of Lexington, leaves no room for doubt of the plain fact that Graham was testifying to the Declaration of May 20, and to the Davie copy or the Martin or Garden copy, all of which were then in print. The Declaration of May 20 contains an explicit reference to the battle of Lexington, while the Resolves do not refer to it in any way, so this witness could not have been describing the Resolves after having already connected the news of the battle with the meeting. This evidence is therefore conclusive not only of two meetings but of the fact that the formal Declaration as testified to by the witness, was a genuine document and was made on the date he gave—May 20.

12. John Simieson, of Providence in Mecklenburg County, testified January 20, 1820, concerning "our Declaration of Independence," that he was present when it was made, and "likewise heard Colonel Polk have two warm disputes with two men of the county, who said the measures were rash and unnecessary. He was applauded and they silenced. * * * The courts likewise acted independently. I myself heard a dispute take place on the bench, and an acting magistrate was actually taken and sent to prison by an order of the Chairman."

13. Isaac Alexander, October 8, 1830, testified that he "was present in Charlotte on the 19th and 20th days of May, 1775, when a regular deputation from all the Captain's companies * * * met to consult and take measures for the peace and tranquility of the citizens of said county * * * who after due consultation, declared themselves absolved from their allegiance to the King of Great Britain, and drew up a Declaration of their Independence, which was unanimously adopted; and employed Capt. James Jack to carry copies thereof to Congress."

14. Samuel Wilson, of Mecklenburg County, in 1830, testified that he was present when "in May, 1775, a committee or delegation from the different militia companies in this county met in Charlotte, and after consulting together, they publicly declared their independence of Great Britain."

15. John Davidson, October 5, 1830, testified "relative to the Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence" that he "was a member of that Convention"; that he and John McKnitt Alexander were the delegates from his company; that "a motion was made to declare ourselves independent of the Crown of Great Britain, which was carried by a large majority. * * * James Jack was appointed to take it to the American Congress."

16. Rev. Humphrey Hunter, in his autobiography written in 1828, testifies specifically as to the Declaration of Independence of May 20 and the details of the meeting in accord with the foregoing testimony, and says that he was present and was twenty years of age, and he testifies as to the Davie copy being the record of the proceedings. The only thing in opposition to the correctness of the testimony of Hunter and the other witnesses is the unsupported surmise that they might have been talking about the Resolves of May 31 and have gotten the dates and the facts wrong. This same mistake having (by hypothesis) been made by a dozen persons has been aptly described as "a marvelous involuntary error."

17. In the Raleigh Register, April 30, 1819, Dr. Joseph McKnitt Alexander published a detailed account of the proceedings of the convention of May 20, which he certified to as being a copy of the records left by his father John McKnitt Alexander, who had written this account from memory after the destruction by fire of the original papers in 1800. There is no reason to question the statements that John McKnitt Alexander left such a record and that the paper signed by F. McKnitt Alexander was a genuine copy of that record, and this direct testimony of John McKnitt Alexander who had kept the original records for twenty-five years is unimpeachable corroborative evidence. The only thing against it is that surmise as to the "marvelous involuntary error" that John McKnitt Alexander had confused the dates and facts, though why one person (to say nothing of a dozen) should mistake May 31 for May 20 has never been explained. The genuineness of the papers produced by Joseph McKnitt Alexander has been questioned but is accepted by Hoyt in his recent book attacking the authenticity of the Declaration. The copy of the Declaration as given by Joseph McKnitt Alexander is the same as the Davie copy found in Governor Davie's papers in 1820 and which is mentioned in the notes left by John McKnitt Alexander. This statement resulted in the discovery of the Davie papers which confirmed the genuineness of the statement in that the Davie copy made in 1800 was found to be the same in substance as the other copy furnished in the Alexander memory record.

18. The testimony of Governor Josiah Martin in his official papers is a contemporary record that is final with regard to the Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence. Here surmises are of no avail. The authenticity of the documents is undisputed, and it is the privilege of every one to examine them and perceive their meaning. June 25, 1775, Governor Martin addressed his Council at Fort Johnston and referred to "the late most treasonable publication of a Committee in the County of Mecklenburg explicitly renouncing obedience to his Majesty's government and all lawful authority whatsoever." June 30, Governor Martin in a letter to the Earl of Dartmouth, said: "The Resolves of the Committee of Mecklenburg which your Lordship will find in the enclosed newspaper, surpass all the horrid and treasonable publications that the inflammatory spirits of this Continent have yet produced, and your Lordship may depend its Authors and Abettors will not escape my due notice whenever my hands are sufficiently strengthened to attempt the recovery of the lost authority of Government."

This is the contemporary record left by Governor Martin, and the only suspicion against it is that it referred to the Resolves of May 31. When Governor Martin made the above statements, he had before him the Resolves of the general committees of Wilmington of June 20 in which he was described as "an enemy to the happiness of this colony in particular and to the freedom, rights, and privileges of America in general." Is it likely that he would have passed over that personal thrust and have described the dispassionate Mecklenburg Resolves of May 31 as "most treasonable." It is not likely, and the denunciatory words apply with more exactness to the Declaration than to the Resolves, though plainly there are references to both. The Resolves did not "explicitly renounce obedience" but state the dissolving as having been already accomplished, while the Declaration says explicitly "we hereby dissolve the political bonds" * * * "and absolve ourselves from all allegiance."

Why did Governor Martin June 25 refer to the "late publication?" The Resolves were published in the Charleston Gazette of June 13, in the New Bern Gazette of June 16, and in the Cape Fear Mercury of June 23 (?) and doubtless Martin had all these papers, as his connection with New Bern was as friendly as with Wilmington and that with Charleston much more so. Then why did he choose the Cape Fear Mercury as best expressing the "most treasonable" publication? There could be no reason except that the Cape Fear Mercury had more treason in it than the other papers. Also, the only excuse for saying that the Cape Fear Mercury was June 23 instead of June 30 is that if it were the latter, it would indicate that it did contain more treason and hence would account for the difference of Martin's temper June 23 and June 30. These are indications that the Mercury contained some reference to the Declaration in addition to the Resolves; but from any standpoint, the Martin documents afford irresistible contemporary evidence of Mecklenburg's "most treasonable" action in May of 1775, and in connection with the other equally reliable evidence, points definitely to the Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence of May 20.

* * * * * * *

For full details of the documents cited in the preceding paragraphs, reference may be had to the publications previously mentioned (and to Moore's Defense of the Declaration, 1908,) which give biographies of the witnesses with their certificates and letters in full, with others in corroboration. All of the testimony taken together proves other details of the meetings not here mentioned; the purpose in this argument was to prove that the Resolves of May 31 were in themselves a declaration of independence, and that a more formal declaration was made May 20. The first part of the claim is proven by the document itself in its first resolution, and by the comment on that resolution by Force and others. The second claim has in its support the positive statements of men who were present, and contemporary documents of unquestioned authenticity. That there were two meetings in May of 1775, and that the two existing documents are both authentic, are facts proven beyond possibility of controversion. The positive evidence is not hypothetical. Every item is authentic and undisputed. The negative surmises can not shake them. They are clear, strong, definite, detailed, specific. They demonstrate every claim conclusively, and leave no palliation possible for slurs on the monument that stands in Charlotte commemorative of "this brilliant star in our history." All who reverence history should glory in it. It is not narrow. It is American, and as the Mecklenburg patriots showed their broadness of spirit by "not standing at ease until the whole were prepared to advance in line, but boldly and fearlessly marched out to the front," so every true citizen of the nation for which that example was set, should not try to increase "the clouds of error," but should turn from prejudice and face the truth, and as a true American take pride in the manifestation of that fierce spirit of freedom that could not be held and true to the prophecy of Mecklenburg has realized the ambition of a great and free people. The case is complete, and "this brilliant star" shall continue to shine undimmed by the hazy theories of those unable or unwilling to accept the truth.

MR. SALLEY'S REPLY.

The reader is requested to examine the evidence quoted or cited in both of the foregoing papers before accepting the conclusions of either of the writers. Selected quotations from Hawks, Swain, Force, Bancroft, or any one else, should not be accepted as evidence unless the whole article from which a quotation has been taken is read.

The truth-seeking reader will discover a wide difference between the import of the statements of the "seven witnesses of most unexceptional character", and that ascribed to them by Dr. Hawks and Mr. Craven. He will find that a little quotation taken from Mr. Force is turned to account to show that Mr. Force believed in the alleged declaration of May 20th. All of Mr. Force's writings on the subject show that he held only the resolutions of the 31st authentic. Bancroft held the same views. McCrady held the same views, and although Mr. Craven tries to turn a quotation from McCrady against the writer, the writer is satisfied that no impartial reader will agree that there is any inconsistency between what he has written and what McCrady wrote. There are witnesses who will corroborate the writer as to General McCrady's views.

On pages 235 and 236 there are some quotations from letters bearing on Bagge's reminiscences. These must not be misunderstood. Mr. Waldo G. Leland, who has been one of the writer's earnest collaborators on this subject, and to whom I am indebted for several very valuable points and authorities, agrees with me that only the resolutions of May 31st are authentic and that all the evidence is against the alleged declaration of May 20th, and he can not be quoted as favoring it. Mr. Craven could have found some equally apt quotations from the writer's own statements in reference to Miss Fries's paper. Bagge's reminiscences were not contemporaneous with 1775. They were written in 1783 and critical readers will appreciate the value which I have given them.

Mr. Craven says (205) that the resolutions of the 31st "are not now disputed." He has not carefully read the book by Dr. George W. Graham. He says (211) that so far as is known" it is "not denied" that "the Cape Fear Mercury sent by Governor Martin contained the resolutions of May 31." He has evidently not seen the communication of Dr. George W. Graham in The American Historical Review for January, 1908. Mr. Craven himself (245-246) tries to create the impression that Governor Martin referred to the alleged declaration of May 20th in some of his contemporaneous records. There is not a scintilla of evidence to show any such thing and Mr. Craven does not offer any.

He tries to make light (208) of the writer's distinction between the use of "committee" and "convention." The writer pointed out that those witnesses who naturally knew the most about affairs of 1775 always said committee but that the fabricated declaration contained the word convention. Critical readers will appreciate the differentiation.

He tries to show that the 31st resolutions are equally as inconsistent with the action of the Provincial Congress in August, 1775, and the proceedings of the county courts, as is with the alleged declaration. The critical reader can pass upon that matter with better judgment than can Mr. Craven.

He tries to create (212) the impression that the court records show that court was still held in the name of the crown after July 4, 1776. No court was held in October, 1776, showing that the national Declaration of Independence put an end to the "crown docket."

He insists that Mecklenburg County was divided into militia companies from its creation in 1762. That is not confirmed by Wells's Register for 1775, which contains the military establishment of North Carolina. If there was a full regiment in the county why was one organized under the 31st resolutions, and why were the companies directed to "provide themselves with proper Arms and Accoutrements?"

Mr. Craven takes a different view of the 31st resolutions from that held by any previous advocate of the alleged declaration. He claims that those resolutions constituted a declaration of independence and quotes an extract from them (211) to sustain his view. That extract must be construed with the whole document. Critical readers will observe the distinctions the writer has drawn.

He wants to know why Joseph McKnitt Alexander did not use the 31st resolutions in his fabrication if such it was. Because he did not have a copy; otherwise he would not have fabricated at all when Representative Davidson called for a copy of the traditional declaration. If he had ever had a copy we may be sure he would have dragged it into the controversy with the same claim Mr. Craven makes—that they were secondary to the declaration and an outgrowth thereof. An opinion that no critical observer not afflicted with Mecklenburgomania will ever accept.

Mr. Craven says (218): "Up to this time, no one had ever questioned the veracity of Francis Xavier Martin." Take a look at Note 2 on pages 32-33 of Southern Quakers and Slavery by Stephen B. Weeks, of North Carolina. In a private letter to the writer Dr. Weeks says: "When he did not pervert facts he was careless in the collection of facts and his work is worthless when unsupported." That is confirmed by the work itself. Attention is further invited to the account of Martin by Charles Gayarre, some time United States Senator from Louisiana, in Fernando de Lemos (246-249). It is there made evident that Martin was in his dotage when he told Dr. Hawks that he got that copy in Western North Carolina before 1800. Is it not probable that

Dr. Hawks asked him the leading question: "Before 1800"? The writer has shown where he got it. Murphey's correspondence with him is sufficient. Murphey had its prototype and shows that it came from Joseph McKnitt Alexander. Martin's copy contains no signers. Why does Mr. Craven add them to it in his work? Readers are asked not to take Mr. Craven's statement as to John Davidson (220) but to examine the State pamphlet the writer was discussing and see if the name is there given as a "signer."

Mr. Craven denies that Garden's account is the counterpart of Guilford's. Readers are asked to compare them. Mr. Craven states that Garden got his information from Dr. William Read. Garden nowhere says so. Dr. Read did not attend Dr. Ephraim Brevard "in his last illness in 1777", for Dr. Read joined Washington's army in the North in 1776 and served with it as Deputy Surgeon-General until 1780 when he was detached to the South with Gates's army, and Dr. Brevard had no last illness in 1777 for he was at the siege of Charles Town in 1780. Dr. Read told Garden an anecdote about General Lock of North Carolina and of course that makes him authority for the Mecklenburg story that Garden published. Dr. Read was not a "fellow-citizen of Charleston with Garden", but resided on his plantation in Georgetown District about seventy-five miles from Charleston.

As to the writer's part in showing up the fraud of Millington Miller the reader is invited to examine his paper in The State (Columbia) of July 30, 1905; Mr. Craven's of August 27, 1905, in the Charlotte Daily Observer; Professor Alexander Graham's paper in the same for October 4, 1905; the writer's pamphlet The True Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence published in October, 1905, and hundreds of criticisms from all over the United States and see whose work has counted for the most. And if any one has any curiosity to know the inside history of how Millington Miller was forced to "show-down" the writer is willing to display the private correspondence whereby that result was obtained and he has no fear that any one will agree for a moment that Mr. Craven's efforts, or those of the pompous committee from Charlotte that tried to ridicule a man of Worthington Ford's position in American historical literature, had much to do with bringing that event about. But that matter has nothing to do with this discussion, even if it does show the credulity of a Mecklenburg myth worshipper.

The writer has not the slightest fear that any impartial reader of recognized critical ability will find in his paper any "omissions, suppressions and misrepresentations." He is equally confident that crtical readers will find his own words not only misconstrued, misrepresented and garbled, but improperly quoted. The effort to make this writer reflect on the Presbyterians generally of North Carolina is a gross misrepresentation. The reader is asked to carefully compare Mr. Craven's excerpts from the writer's paper and his own comments on those excerpts with the paper itself.

The quotation from Disraeli (222) is apt—for a man lacking originality. It is cumulative evidence on what is apparent throughout Mr. Craven's paper: that memorized quotations constitute his chief source of originality. The use of "words, words, words" (203-204) is the second time he has availed himself of that identical argument in controversy with this writer. The injection of such personalities into a discussion of an historical question is unhistorical and inethical, but it has invariably been the favorite method of those who can not rebut the evidence and can not refute the arguments of those who have from time to time contradicted the authenticity of the alleged Declaration of Independence of May 20, 1775.

MR. CRAVEN'S REJOINDER.

"A little nonsense now and then is relished by the best of men," and I fully appreciate the concluding paragraph of the foregoing reply. I respectfully plead guilty to the charge of repetition in using the famous quotation, "words, words, words," with regard to certain frequent incursions into the rich field of North Carolina History. My only defense is my inability to find another quotation that is sufficiently accurate and appropriate. As to the further charge of "unhistorical and unethical" conduct in the use of personalities, I demur, and cite the fact that in my lengthy reply to Mr. Salley, his name is mentioned twice, and in his fifteen brief paragraphs replying to my reply my name is mentioned seventeen times.

In paragraph number two of the reply, a personal opinion is expressed as to the views of Force, Bancroft and McCrady, and the statement is made: "There are witnesses who will corroborate the writer as to General McCrady's views." As I gave the "views" themselves, the readers have as much right to opinions as any one else.

Dr. George W. Graham is brought forward to confound my argument, but it happens that Dr. Graham has carefully read all of the preceding discussion and endorses my position.

The "crown docket" is again brought into court with the claim that "the national Declaration of Independence put an end to the crown docket." In this point I have the authority with me, as can be seen by reference to the bottom of page 167 preceding, where Mr. A. S. Salley, Jr., says "and at their July, 1776, term, continued the 'crown docket' to the next term."

"It is there made evident that Martin was in his dotage

....." This was one of the few friends of the Declaration who had not been declared defective in memory, and in the last days it seems that even he is not to be spared. He told Dr. Hawks that he obtained the copy of the declaration "before 1800", and the baseless insinuation of "dotage" is of no consequence whatever. Furthermore, the unsupported and unsupportable statement "in a private letter" of Dr. Stephen B. Weeks (who is a near neighbor in my home town) is not sufficient to even raise a question as to the reliability of Francis Xavier Martin.

It is true that Dr. Ephraim Brevard died in 1781 and not in 1777 as stated. At the time of his death, General Gates had his headquarters in Charlotte, and Dr. William Read was with him. Dr. Read attended Dr. Brevard in his last illness at the home of John McKnitt Alexander and there secured the information given later to Alexander Garden.

The "committee from Charlotte" was not "pompous" and made no attempt to ridicule Worthington Ford. The committee's report was printed January 1 and Mr. Ford's twelve days later, and hence Mr. Ford ridiculed himself by claiming that he exposed the Miller forgery.

Regarding the reflections on the Presbyterians, this depends upon whether or not it would be considered a compliment to be called a "myth-worshiping idolator". The writer's animus is also shown by the coinage in the reply of the amorphous word "Mecklenburgomania." Instead of mania on his part there is simply a paretic condition of an otherwise able mind with regard to May 20, 1775, and incidentally to March 15, 1767. Concerning the real evidence as to facts on these dates he sticks to his contention: "I didn't see it; therefore it isn't so".

In conclusion, I hold these truths to be self-evident:

1. Personal opinions and surmises and hypotheses are not entitled to any consideration in this discussion.

2. The testimony of eye-witnesses is the strongest of all testimony, and there are seven for the Declaration of May 20 and none against.

3. Contemporary evidence is next strongest, and there is such evidence for the Declaration and none against.

4. Corroborative evidence is next in importance and there is an abundance of it for the Declaration; and corroborative evidence is not admissible without previous positive direct evidence of which there is none against the Declaration.

5. The Resolves of May 31, 1775, are undisputed and are their own argument as to whether or not they constitute a Declaration of Independence.

BIOGRAPHICAL AND GENEALOGICAL MEMORANDA.

COMPILED AND EDITED BY MRS. E. E. MOFFITT.

BRUCE CRAVEN.

A biographical sketch of Professor Bruce Craven appeared in the Booklet for October 1908 with his contribution entitled "The Significance of the Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence." Among his recent writings (besides various newspaper contributions) are the following: The Modern Schoolmaster, in Educational Foundations of New York for September; The Value of Words, in The Boston Journal of Education for November 12; Testing the Teacher's Efficiency, in Educational Foundations for December; Religious Education, in American Education, of Albany, for January; and Non-Religious Moral Training, in the New York School Journal for January.

ALEXANDER SAMUEL SALLEY, JR.

Alexander Samuel Salley, Jr., son of A. M. Salley, was born in Orangeburg County, S. C., June 16, 1871. He was prepared for college at Sheridan's Classical School of Orangeburg, S. C., and afterwards was graduated from the South Carolina Military Academy in 1892. He studied law and in 1889 was admitted to the bar. He is the author of History of Orangeburg County, S. C., 1704 to 1782; and compiled and edited Marriage Notices from the South Carolina Gazette and its Successors, 1732-1801; Marriage Notices from the South Carolina Gazette and Country Journal (1765-1775) and from the Charlestown Gazette (1778-1780). He has also edited the following: Register of St. Philip's Parish, Charlestown, S. C., 1720-1758; Journal of the General Assembly of South Carolina, Mar. 26, 1776-April 11, 1776; Journal of the Grand Council of South Carolina, 1671-1680; Journal of the Grand Council of South Carolina, April 11, 1692-Sept. 26, 1692; and Vols. 1-8, South Carolina Historical and Genealogical Magazine, 1900-1907. He is likewise a frequent contributor of historical, biographical, and bibliographical articles to various publications. He is now Secretary of the South Carolina Historical Commission.

NOTE.—The Edwards & Broughton Printing Company, Raleigh, N. C., has recently published "Defence of the Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence," by James H. Moore, of Macon, Ga. This scholarly work has been well received by historical critics, and the reviews of it given in leading northern and southern periodicals have been, with but few exceptions, favorable to the author's contention. We hope to secure from Mr. Moore an article, summarizing the evidence in favor of the Mecklenburg Declaration, to be published in the BOOKLET.

To the Readers of the North Carolina Booklet:

It is the intention of the "North Carolina Society Daughters of the Revolution" to give a detailed account of the unveiling of the Bronze Tablet which they caused to be erected in the State Capitol on Oct. 24, 1908. This will appear in a future number or in an extra issue of the BOOKLET.

This tablet represents the first patriotic effort that the Society has made. It commemorates the heroism of the women of the Edenton Tea Party of 1774, "who by their patriotism, zeal, and early protest against unjust taxation by British authority, helped to make this Republic and our Commonwealth possible."

Since the organization in 1896 of the North Carolina Branch of the "General Society Daughters of the Revolution," its endeavor has been to carry out the tenets of the Constitution, the objects of which are "to perpetuate the patriotic spirit of the men and women who achieved American Independence; to commemorate prominent events connected with the War of the Revolution; to collect, publish and preserve the rolls, records and historic documents relating to that period; and to encourage the study of the country's history."

The first four years of the life of the organization, was given principally to the reading of State history, endorsing patriotic movements in this State and other sister States, and the writing of sketches of the patriots through whom members became lineally eligible to membership.

The requirements were that these sketches should be historically correct, and embodying such traditions as would render them more interesting and acceptable. Many of the members complied with these requirements, and these sketches after being read and approved were deposited with our Librarian, in the archives of this Society.

While continuing in the work of perpetuating the deeds of our ancestors, a wider field was opened, that of erecting memorials, as object lessons to posterity. At a meeting of the Society in December 1900, Mrs. Spier Whitaker, then our wise patriotic and zealous Regent, suggested a memorial to the patriotic ladies of the "Edenton Tea Party of Oct. 25, 1774," as an object especially appropriate for a Woman's Society. This suggestion met with the most hearty approval of the members, and a resolution adopted to make this the first event for commemoration.

Pertinent to the above, our honored late Regent (1902), Mrs. Daniel Harvey Hill, made the following clear, concise and authoritative statement in a preface to the BOOKLET:

"These stout-hearted women are every way worthy of admiration. On Oct. 25, 1774, seven months before the defiant farmers of Mecklenburg had been aroused to the point of signing the Declaration of Independence, nearly twenty months before the declaration made by the gentlemen composing the vestry of St. Paul's Church, Edenton, nearly two years before Jefferson penned the immortal National Declaration, these daring women solemnly subscribed to a document affirming that they would use no article taxed by England. Their example fostered in the whole State a determination to die, or be free."

To accomplish this purpose, various schemes were devised for raising the required funds without calling on the public for contributions. It was then decided to publish in convenient form "Sketches of Great Events in North Carolina History" with the twofold object—the one to raise from the yearly subscriptions a fund for this memorial, and the other to place in the hands of the reading public interesting sketches relating to the past history of the State, Colonial and Revolutionary, and that the most painstaking and competent scholars and educators in the State be requested to write the articles.

The enterprise first took form in May, 1901, under the modest title of the "North Carolina Booklet" and continued as a monthly publication for four years, and was changed to a quarterly in 1905, containing three articles instead of one.

The work still continues as a quarterly, "supported by the cordial sympathy and cooperation of many of the best equipped scholars and writers of the State, who have so cheerfully contributed numerous articles, free of cost."

The tablet which now adorns the walls of the Rotunda represents over five hundred dollars, the profits of four years arising from the publication of the BOOKLET, and the profits of one entertainment given by the blind pupils of the State Institution who cheerfully aided with their talents in this patriotic undertaking.

There yet remains in bank a creditable fund, which stands as a nucleus to which subscriptions to the BOOKLET will be added with which to erect other memorials.

There were similar movements to that of the "Tea Party," which history has not recorded. Women in other counties of the State met to declare their determination to stand by principles resisting tyranny, and leading to Independence, which should be commemorated.

In order to do this a larger subscription list to the BOOKLET will become necessary. Therefore we appeal to the patriotic citizenship of the State, to aid the Daughters of the Revolution in a venture that has proved thus far successful.

The eighth volume is well advanced, and the outlook is encouraging. The Editors still continue to admit to its pages such articles of historical investigation as will aid the already awakened spirit of the people, viz, the claim of North Carolina to a high place in the history of the United States.

INFORMATION

Concerning the Patriotic Society

"Daughters of the Revolution"

The General Society was founded October 11, 1890,—and organized August 20, 1891,—under the name of "Daughters of the American Revolution"; was incorporated under the laws of the State of New York as an organization national in its work and purpose. Some of the members of this organization becoming dissatisfied with the terms of entrance, withdrew from it and, in 1891, formed under the slightly differing name "Daughters of the Revolution," eligibility to which from the moment of its existence has been lineal descent from an ancestor who rendered patriotic service during the War of Independence.

"The North Carolina Society"

a subdivision of the General Society, was organized in October, 1896, and has continued to promote the purposes of its institution and to observe the Constitution and By-Laws.

Membership and Qualifications

Any woman shall be eligible who is above the age of eighteen years, of good character, and a lineal descendant of an ancestor who (1) was a signer of the Declaration of Independence, a member of the Continental Congress, Legislature or General Court, of any of the Colonies or States; or (2) rendered civil, military or naval service under the authority of any of the thirteen Colonies, or of the Continental Congress; or (3) by service rendered during the War of the Revolution became liable to the penalty of treason against the government of Great Britain: Provided, that such ancestor always remained loyal to the cause of American Independence.

The chief work of the North Carolina Society for the past seven years has been the publication of the "North Carolina Booklet," a quarterly publication on great events in North Carolina history—Colonial and Revolutionary. $1.00 per year. It will continue to extend its work and to spread the knowledge of its History and Biography in other States.

This Society has its headquarters in Raleigh, N. C., Room 411, Carolina Trust Company Building, 232 Fayetteville Street.

Bronze Tablet Unveiled in State Capitol of North Carloina, October 24, 1908.

Vol. VIII APRIL, 1909 No. 4

The NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET

"Carolina! Carolina! Heaven's blessings attend her!
While we live we will cherish, protect and defend her."

Published by
THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY
DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION

The object of the BOOKLET is to aid in developing and preserving North Carolina History. The proceeds arising from its publication will be devoted to patriotic purposes. EDITORS.

ADVISORY BOARD OF THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET.

MRS. SPIER WHITAKER.
PROFESSOR D. H. HILL.
MR. W. J. PEELE.
PROFESSOR E. P. MOSES.
DR. KEMP P. BATTLE.
MR. MARSHALL DELANCEY HAYWOOD.
MR. R. D. W. CONNOR.
DR. E. W. SIKES.
DR. RICHARD DILLARD.
MR. JAMES SPRUNT.
JUDGE WALTER CLARK.

EDITORS:

MISS MARY HILLIARD HINTON, MRS. E E. MOFFITT.

OFFICERS OF THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION, 1906–1908.

REGENT:

MRS. E. E. MOFFITT.

VICE-REGENT:

MRS. WALTER CLARK.

HONORARY REGENT:

MRS. SPIER WHITAKER.

RECORDING SECRETARY:

MRS. LEIGH SKINNER.

CORRESPONDING SECRETARY:

MRS. PAUL H. LEE.

TREASURER:

MRS. FRANK SHERWOOD.

REGISTRAR:

MISS MARY HILLIARD HINTON.

GENEALOGIST:

MRS. HELEN DE BERNIERE WILLS.

FOUNDER OF THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY AND REGENT 1896-1902:
MRS. SPIER WHITAKER.

REGENT 1902:

MRS. D. H. HILL, SR.*

REGENT 1902-1906:

MRS. THOMAS K. BRUNER.

---

*Died December 12, 1904.

Unveiling of Memorial Tablet, State Capitol North Carolina, October 24, 1908.

THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET.

Vol. VIII APRIL, 1909 No. 4

THE UNVEILING AND DEDICATION OF THE EDENTON TEA PARTY MEMORIAL TABLET.

The autumn of 1908 will be recorded in the history of the Daughters of the Revolution as a notable one. Our President-General, Mrs. Adeline F. Fitz, has just cause to be proud of the achievements of her Daughters, and it is to be hoped that the brilliant beginning of her able administration will be followed by even greater efforts and larger attainments.

On October the seventeenth the New York Society laid the corner stone of the granite arch that is to mark the entrance to Stony Point Park, amid fitting ceremonies. That same month the Daughters of the Pennsylvania Society placed two bronze memorial tablets in Independence Hall, Philadelphia. The New Jersey Society suggested and aided extensively in erecting the monument to the "Tea Burners," unveiled October the fourth at Greenwich, New Jersey, while the Long Island Society contributed six thousand of the twenty-five thousand dollars expended on the beautiful column to the memory of the Prison Ship martyrs, November the fourteenth in Fort Greene Park, Brooklyn. The Massachusetts Society remembered her heroic Paul Revere in furnishing a room to bear his name. Last, but by no means least with us, the Daughters of North Carolina, was the placing in the rotunda of our capitol on Saturday, October the twenty-fourth, the handsome oval bronze tablet "to the memory of the fifty-one ladies of Edenton" who on October twenty-fifth, 1774, signed the resolves that had been adopted by the Provincial Congress recently held at New Bern.

This had been a day long anticipated by the Daughters of the Revolution in this State. More than seven years have passed since the idea was first contemplated of undertaking this definite patriotic work. The result has been satisfactory, for we worked cautiously, fully realizing history requires careful dealing, substantiating every statement with well authenticated facts.

This is the most representative monument ever placed in North Carolina, for the funds were raised by dimes, quarters and dollars—coming literally "from Murphy to Manteo"—"from Carolina to California." It is also the only one erected by women to the memory of heroic women in the State.

As much care was bestowed on the design of the tablet itself as has been required for the raising of the necessary funds. To Dr. Dillard and Mr. John J. Blair we are indebted for the original suggestions. Mr. R. T. Haines Halsey, of New York, showed great interest in the work, shipping a rare piece of his Colonial silver to Gorham's works in Providence, R. I., from which the tea pot in the center of the tablet was drawn. The cut of the lady's hand emptying the tea caddy was taken from the cover of the pamphlet concerning the Edenton Tea Party by Dr. Dillard, and presented to the North Carolina Historical Exhibit at the Jamestown Exposition for distribution, and was the work of Miss May Beverly Dixon.

One thousand invitations were issued for this event. The exact date of the anniversary falling on Sunday caused the selection of the 24th. Out-of-town guests from our sister society, the D. A. R., as well as members from our own order, honored us with their presence.

The day dawned bright and clear after a night of heavy rainfall, seemingly an auspicious omen. A large and representative audience filled the floor and galleries of the Hall of Representatives. The managers were: Mrs. Hubert Haywood, Miss Martha Helen Haywood, Miss Mary Hilliard Hinton, assisted by Colonel Bennehan Cameron, representing the Society of the Cincinnati, and Mr. Marshall DeLancey Haywood, representing the Sons of the Revolution. Thirteen pages were chosen, representing different Daughters of the Revolution, and the Revolutionary ancestors upon whose services eligibility in the Society was based. Each manager and page wore a badge of buff and blue—the Society's colors. Mrs. Moffitt, the State Regent, presided, announcing each subject in order. The music was furnished by the band of the Blind Institution and the High School chorus.

After the exercises the audience descended to the rotunda below, where the thirteen little children (typifying the thirteen original States) unveiled the tablet, each pulling a tiny ribbon. These also were descendants of Revolutionary pariots.

Two photographs were taken in the rotunda—one before and one after the flag had been drawn from the tablet. Around and on the monument in the golden autumn sunshine, forming a pretty pyramid of unveilers, pages, Daughters and guests, an effective group was formed and the photographer a third time used his camera successfully.

That afternoon from four to six the halls and music room of the Yarborough Hotel were graciously tendered the Daughters of the Revolution for a reception. To this anniversary of the Edenton Tea Party informal invitations were extended to about one hundred persons—the members of the patriotic organizations, the officers of the Woman's Club and historians—who had so generously given their time and labor in our cause.

MARY HILLIARD HINTON.

1774—1908

Programme

of the

Unveiling and Dedication of the Tablet in Memory of the Fifty-one Signers

of the

Edenton Tea Party Resolves

in the Capitol, Raleigh, North Carolina

Erected by the

North Carolina Society

of the

Daughters of the Revolution

October the twenty-fourth

Nineteen Hundred and Eight

Eleven-thirty a. m.

Pages

Descendants of Revolutionary Patriots

VAN DALEN STRONACH
FLEMING BATES SHERWOOD
BRANDON BRUNER
EUGENIA GRAHAM CLARK
EVELYN HYMAN JACKSON
JEAN THACKSTON
PAULINE HILL
BELLE MAYO CAMERON
BESSIE CAIN HINTON
EMILY BROWNING ADICKES
BETSY JOHN HAYWOOD
ANNIE CAROLINE WOOD
REBECCA BENNEHAN WOOD
NELLY BATTLE LEWIS
MARY BRYAN HOLLISTER
BESSIE HOLLISTER

Tablet to be unveiled by thirteen descendants of Revolutionary Patriots representing the Thirteen Colonies

KATHARINE HAYWOOD BAKER
JOHN BENBURY HAYWOOD
HARDY MURFREE RAY
BANKS DANIEL WITHERS
WILLIAM ISAAC PROCTOR
W. N. HARRELL SMITH, JR.
JONATHAN WORTH DANIELS
SAMUEL SPENCER JACKSON
ANNIE MOORE PARKER
LUCY HAWKINS HIGGS
ELIZABETH MURRAY CROSS
RANDOLPH HILL
GENE GRAY HECK

Managers

MRS. HUBERT HAYWOOD
MISS MARTHA HELEN HAYWOOD
MISS MARY HILLIARD HINTON
COLONEL BENNEHAN CAMERON
Representing the Society of the Cincinnati.
MR. MARSHALL DELANCEY HAYWOOD
Representing the Sons of the Revolution.

PROGRAMME.

Music—Star-Spangled Banner.

Prayer—Rev. Robert Brent Drane, D.D.,
Rector of St. Paul's Church, Edenton, North Carolina.

Introductory Address—Mrs. Patrick Matthew,
Regent Penelope Barker Chapter, D. R.

Music—Carolina, by High School Chorus.

Presentation of Tablet—Mrs. E. E. Moffitt, Regent North Carolina Society Daughters of the Revolution.

Address of Acceptance—Hon. Francis D. Winston, Lieutenant-Governor of North Carolina.

Address—Hon. Walter Clark,
Chief Justice Supreme Court of North Carolina.

Benediction—Dr. Benjamin F. Dixon.

Music—America, by High School Chorus.

Unveiling of Tablet in Rotunda of the Capitol.

Music.

PAGES

REPRESENTING MEMBERS OF N. C. D. R. DESCENDANTS OF REVOLUTIONARY PATRIOTS.

(Compiled by the Regent and the Genealogist.)

ADICKES, EMILY BROWNING. Raleigh, N. C.

Daughter of Henning F. Adickes and wife, Emily Browning (Clawson) Adickes. Representing Mrs. H. F. Adickes, member of N. C. D. R. Lineal descendant of Maj. Robert Crawford a soldier of the Revolution of Waxhaw, S. C.; under Sumter at Battle of Hanging Rock, S. C. Equipped a whole company and served during the whole of the Revolutionary War.

BRUNER, BRANDON. Raleigh, N. C.

Son of Thomas Kincaid Bruner and wife, Belle (Boyden) Bruner. Representing Mrs. Thomas K. Bruner, member of the N. C. D. R. Lineal descendant of Col. James Martin (brother of Governor Alexander Martin), appointed Colonel of Guilford County, April 22, 1776. Commanded at Battle of Guilford Court-house—"the most important to the cause of America in the whole South."

CLARK, EUGENIA GRAHAM. Raleigh, N. C.

Daughter of Judge Walter Clark and wife, Susan Washington (Graham) Clark. Representing Mrs. Walter Clark, member of the N. C. D. R. Lineal descendant of Gen. Joseph Graham, of Lincoln County, N. C.; Adjutant and afterward Major of the 4th Regiment of the N. C. Continental Line. May 1778, Major-General of 5th Division of N. C. Militia. Commanded in fifteen engagements in the Revolutionary War.

HINTON, BESSIE CAIN. Raleigh, N. C.

Daughter of Charles Hinton and wife, Bessie Cain Hinton. Representing Miss Mary Hilliard Hinton (her aunt), a member of the N. C. D. R. Descendant of Col. John Hinton (Patriot ancestor), delegate from Wake County to Provincial Congress held at Hillsboro, August 1775. Colonel of Minute Men of Wake County; member of Provincial Congress at Halifax April 4, 1776; served at Battle of Moore's Creek Bridge. Died 1784. Also descendant of Col. Jonas Johnson, Patriot of Edgecombe County, N. C.

HOLLISTER, BESSIE HOOVER. New Bern, N. C.

Daughter of Charles Slover Hollister and wife, Mary (Bryan) Hollister. Representing Mrs. Charles Hollister, member of N. C. D. R. Lineal descendant of Gen. William Bryan, Lieutenant-Colonel of Minute Men, Craven County, N. C., 1775; member of Provincial Congress at Halifax April 4, 1776; served as General in the Revolution.

HOLLISTER, MARY BRYAN. New Bern, N. C.

Daughter of Charles Slover Hollister and wife, Mary (Bryan) Hollister. Representing Mrs. Charles Hollister, member of the N. C. D. R. Lineal descendant of Gen. William Bryan, Lieutenant-Colonel of Minute Men, of New Bern District, 1775; member of Provincial Congress at Halifax, April 4, 1776; served as General in the Revolution.

HAYWOOD (BETSY JOHN), ELIZA EAGLES. Raleigh, N. C.

Daughter of Dr. Hubert Haywood and wife, Emily Ryan (Benbury) Haywood. Representing Mrs. Hubert Haywood, member of the N. C. D. R. Lineal descendant of Col. William Haywood, appointed on Committee of Safety, Halifax District, 1775; Provincial Congress at Halifax April 4, 1776; member of Constitutional Convention, Halifax, April 13, 1776. Also descendant of Gen. Thomas Benbury, Brig.-Gen. William Skinner and Col. John Pugh Williams.

HILL, PAULINE, Raleigh, N. C.

Daughter of Daniel Harvey Hill and wife, Pauline (White) Hill. Representing Mrs. D. H. Hill (her deceased grandmother) and former Regent of the N. C. D. R. Lineal descendant of William Hill, Colonel of South Carolina Militia, Hill's Iron Works, York District, S. C.; participated in battle of Hanging Rock, S. C., August 6, 1780. Also descendant of Gen. Joseph Graham, of Lincoln County, who served in fifteen engagements in the Revolutionary War.

LEWIS, CORNELIA BATTLE, Raleigh, N. C.

Daughter of Dr. Richard Henry Lewis and wife, Mary Long Gordon, of Virginia. Representing the Secretary of the "Edenton Tea Party of 1774." Lineal descendant of Winifred Wiggans Hoskins, of Edenton, N. C., the wife of Richard Hoskins, a brave and zealous Patriot who served in the Revolution until its close.

JACKSON, EVELYN HYMAN, Raleigh, N. C.

Daughter of Herbert Worth Jackson and wife, Annie Hyman (Philips) Jackson. Representing Mrs. E. E. Moffitt (her grandmother), member of the N. C. D. R. Lineal descendant of Col. Archibald Murphey, Major and Lieutenant-Colonel N. C. Militia, member of Committee of Safety, 1776, Orange County, N. C. Also descendant of Col. William Burt, of Nash County, and Judge Samuel Spencer, of Anson County, N. C., (Revolutionary Patriots).

PICKELL, VIRGINIA BOLLING HOLLADAY, Raleigh.

Daughter of J. M. Pickell and wife, Julia Bolling (Holladay). Representing her grandmother, Mrs. A. Q. Holladay (deceased), former Vice-Regent of N. C. D. R. Lineal descendant of Bollings, Holladays, Lewises, etc., of Virginia, also of Col. Richard Randolph, of "Curles," on the James, Virginia.

SHERWOOD, FLEMING BATES, Raleigh, N. C.

Son of Francis Webber Sherwood and wife, Mary Priscilla (Bates) Sherwood. Representing Mrs. F. W. Sherwood, member of the N. C. D. R. Lineal descendant of Maj. James Moore, of Pennsylvania. Was first Captain 7th Co., 4th Battalion, under Col. Anthony Wayne (1776); participated in the battles of Brandywine, Trenton, Princeton, etc. Was promoted Major 1777. Fought at Valley Forge, Yorktown, serving through the whole war.

STRONACH, VAN DALEN, Raleigh, N. C.

Son of Alexander Barron Stronach and wife, Mary Augustine (Cooke) Stronach. Representing Mrs. A. B. Stronach, member of the N. C. D. R. Lineal descendant of Capt. Richard Donaldson Cooke, Captain in the 9th Regiment N. C. Continental Line from November 28, 1776, to January, 1778.

THACKSTON, JEAN, Raleigh, N. C.

Daughter of John W. Thackston and wife, Annie (Beckwith) Thackston. Representing Mrs. J. W. Thackston, member of N. C. D. R. Lineal descendant of Sergt. John Beckwith of the Connecticut Continental Line (1776); Lieutenant, 1777; Captain, 1778.

WOOD, ANNIE CAROLINE, Edenton, N. C.

Daughter of John Wood and wife, Bessie Martin Wood. Representing Miss Sophie Wood, member of the N. C. D. R. Lineal descendant of Gen. Isaac Gregory, of Pasquotank County, member of Committee of Safety, 1776; member of Constitutional Convention at Halifax, November 12, 1776; Colonel of 2d Regiment, afterwards promoted to General.

WOOD, REBECCA BENNEHAN, Edenton, N. C.

Daughter of Frank Wood and wife, Rebecca Bennehan (Collins) Wood. Representing Mrs. W. D. Pruden (her aunt), member of the N. C. D. R. Lineal descendant of Charles Moore, Secretary to Military Organizations of Perquimans County, N. C.; member of Provinical Congress at Halifax, N. C., April 4, 1776.

UNVEILERS.

BAKER, KATHERINE BOYLAN HAYWOOD. Born March 24, 1901.

Daughter of Benjamin Whiteley Baker and wife, Katherine Boylan (Haywood) Baker. Representing Martha Helen Haywood (her aunt), member of N. C. D. R. Lineal descendant of Col. William Haywood, member of Committee of Safety of Halifax County, N. C., 1775; of Provincial Congress at Halifax, April, 1776, also November, 1776, which formed the Constitution.

CAMERON, BELLE MAYO. Born 1900.

Daughter of Bennehan Cameron and wife, Sallie (Mayo) Cameron. Representing Mrs. Annie (Shepherd) Graham, member of the N. C. D. R., descendant of Capt. John Daves, of the Second North Carolina Continentals. Active at Battle of Stony Point, New York, etc.

CROSS, ELIZABETH MURRAY. Born July 3, 1901. Raleigh, N. C.

Daughter of John William Cross and wife, Carrie (Murray) Cross. Representing Mrs. John W. Cross, member of the N. C. D. R. Lineal descendant of Capt. Richard Donaldson Cooke, Captain in 9th Regiment N. C., Continental Line from November 28, 1776 to January, 1778. Also surgeon in the army.

DANIELS, JONATHAN WORTH. Born April 26, 1902.

Son of Josephus Daniels and wife, Adelaide Worth (Bagley). Representing Mrs. Adelaide Bagley, member of N. C. D. R. Descendant of Col. Archibald Murphey (Patriot ancestor), Maj. and Lieut. Col. N. C. Militia; member of Committee of Safety for Orange County, N. C.

HECK, GENE GRAY. Born July 24, 1897. Richmond.

Daughter of George Callendine Heck and wife, Eugene (Gray). Representing Mrs. Mary Louise (Heck) Pace, member of the N. C. D. R. Descendant of Johan Yost Heck, born in Berks County, Penn., 1754, served in Pennsylvania Rifles 1776, fought at Long Island, White Plains and Brandywine. Also descendant of Mrs. Kerenhappuch Turner, the heroine at Guilford Court-house, N. C.

HAYWOOD, JOHN BENBURY. Born December 12, 1895. Raleigh, N. C.

Son of Dr. Hubert Haywood and wife, Emily Ryan (Benbury) Haywood. Representing Mrs. Hubert Haywood, member of the N. C. D. R. Lineal descendant of Gen. Thomas Benbury, member of Provincial Congress, New Bern, Aug. 25, 1774 and 1776, Committee of Safety of Edenton District. Delegate to Congress at Halifax Nov. 12, 1776. Also descendant of Col. Wm. Haywood of Edgecombe, Brig.-Gen. William Skinner and Capt. Jacob Turner of 3d Regiment.

HIGGS, LUCY HAWKINS. Born October 3, 1896. Raleigh, N. C.

Daughter of Sherwood Higgs and wife, Lucy (Hawkins) Higgs. Representing Mrs. Sherwood Higgs, member of the N. C. D. R. Lineal descendant of Col. Philemon Hawkins, of Bute (afterwards divided into Warren and Franklin counties in 1799). Member of Provincial Congress at Halifax April 4, 1776; member of Constitutional Convention, Halifax County, N. C., November 12, 1776.

HILL, RANDOLPH. Born August 21, 1903. Raleigh, N. C.

Daughter of Daniel Harvey Hill and wife, Pauline (White) Hill. Representing Mrs. D. H. Hill (deceased). Lineal descendant of William Hill (1740-1816), of Hills Iron Works, York District, S. C., Colonel of S. C. Militia. In battle of Hanging Rock, S. C., Aug. 6, 1780. Also descendant of Gen. Joseph Graham, of Lincoln County.

JACKSON, SAMUEL SPENCER. Born January 26, 1902.

Son of Herbert Worth Jackson and wife, Annie Hyman (Philips). Representing Mrs. Elvira E. Moffitt, a member of the N. C. D. R. Descendant of Judge Samuel Spencer, of Anson County, N. C. (born 1738, died 1794). Member of the Provincial Council of Safety 1775, Provincial Congress, New Bern, 1774. Also descendant of Col. Archibald Murphey (1742-1817), of Orange County, N. C., Major and afterward Lieutenant-Colonel of N. C. Militia.

PARKER, ANNIE MOORE. Born May 10, 1905.

Daughter of Bartholomew Moore Parker and wife, Elise (Stamps). Representing Mrs. Annie Moore Parker, member of N. C. D. R., descendant of Nathan Boddie, of Edgecombe County; member of Provincial Congress at Halifax April 4, 1776.

PROCTOR, WILLIAM ISAAC. Born March 12, 1895.

Son of Ivan Mariott Proctor and wife, Lucy (Biggs) Proctor. Representing Mrs. Ivan M. Proctor, member of N. C. D. R. Lineal descendant of Elisha Battle, of Edgecombe; member of Assembly 1771; Provincial Congress, Halifax, April 4, 1776, and delegate to Constitutional Convention at Halifax, N. C., November 12, 1776.

RAY, HARDY MURFREE. Born July 22, 1900.

Son of John E. Ray and wife, Finie Carter Ray. Representing Mrs. John E. Ray, member of N. C. D. R. Descendant of Lieut.-Col. Hardy Murfree, of Hertford County, N. C., who served in 2d Regiment N. C. Continental Troops. Prominent at Stony Point, N. Y., and founder of the town of Murfreesboro, Tenn.

SMITH, WILLIAM NATHAN HARRELL. Born February 10, 1898. Raleigh, N. C.

Son of Edward Chambers Smith and wife, Annie Badger (Faison) Smith. Representing Mrs. Ed. Chambers Smith, member of N. C. D. R. Lineal descendant of Col. Richard Cogdell, of Craven County, N. C.; member of Provincial Congress, New Bern, N. C., Aug. 25, 1774; member of Committee of Safety for New Bern District 1775.

WITHERS, WILLIAM BANKS. Born October 2, 1901.

Son of William Alphonso Withers and wife, Elizabeth Witherspoon Daniel. Representing Mrs. W. A. Withers (deceased), member of N. C. D. R. Descendant of Rev. John Witherspoon, "The Signer" from New Jersey.

DR. DRANE'S PRAYER

AT THE DEDICATION OF THE EDENTON TEA PARTY TABLET.

Dr. Robert Brent Drane, of Edenton, pronounced the dedicatory prayer at the dedication and unveiling of the Edenton Tea Party Tablet in the State Capitol Saturday. His prayer was as follows:

O God, whose days are without end and whose mercies can not be numbered, we humbly and heartily thank Thee that, although Thou hast made our days as it were a span long and our age is even as nothing in respect to Thee, yet to us Thou hast given an inward honor of falling into naught and hast promised, through Thy Son, an endless life and a glorious immortality. Thou hast taught us that Thou requirest the past: it is because Thou dost promise a future. We confess that we are too often content to live in a sordid present; that Thy people of this commonwealth have done amiss in neglecting the history of this land to which our forefathers came as strangers and pilgrims with charters of civil and religious liberty, and with the high purpose of acknowledging Thee alone as Lord and Master.

We praise Thee, Lord God, that Thou hast not forsaken us; that Thou hast put it into the hearts of an ever increasing number of Thy people to learn and to publish to the world the noble deeds of the fathers. Inspire us more and more with a zeal according to knowledge in their behalf, and we pray Thee, before whose eyes all history is open, to reward all seekers after truth and give us grace to profit by their labors.

We invoke Thy special blessing upon Thy Daughters who, this day, are blazoning to North Carolina, and to the world the patriotism of those Edenton women who were brave in troublous times, and self-denying in the great cause of American Independence.

O, Thou, who didst publish in all the world, wheresoever the Gospel is preached, the good deed of that woman who anointed the Saviour's feet, grant that the memorial of those women whom we now commemorate by this tablet, may be more enduring than brass; that our people may accord to them the high praise, "They did what they could and did it well," and may we all be moved to go and do likewise, as Thy providence may direct.

That these memories of the past may enrich our present and make us do better service of our country and of our country's God; and that at last we may be gathered into the company of the great good, Thy martyrs and saints of all ages and all lands, we pray, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

PENELOPE BARKER

ADDRESS BY MRS. PATRICK MATTHEW AT THE UNVEILING OF THE EDENTON TEA PARTY TABLET.

Madame Regent of the North Carolina Society and Daughters of the Revolution, Ladies and Gentlemen:

An exquisite compliment was tendered me with the invitation as Regent of Penelope Barker Chapter to participate in the ceremonies attending the unveiling of a memorial commemorative of one of the most important political and patriotic events connected with the Revolutionary period.

Through the untiring efforts of the ladies of the Raleigh Chapter, inspired by State pride and supported by their love of historical perpetuation, to-day the Old North State will receive a priceless gift, and the walls of our Capitol be decorated with an ever-enduring tablet of bronze, a silent teacher of the greatness of our women more than a century ago and to point to each succeeding generation that in extremity of need to "go thou and do likewise."

It is with great pride I tell you that among the members of the Penelope Barker Daughters, eight are descendants of the signers of old St. Paul's and with (I do not think there is an exception) all are connected with the signers of the Tea-party Constitution.

"My heart swells with gladness whenever I name them."

It is also my privilege to dwell upon a few instances in the life of one of America's greatest patriotic lights, a leader and teacher of loyal womanhood, wife, mother, and with these elements of Christian love and obedience she became a jewel among her sex, a womanly woman of strength and vigor,—blessed be the memory of Penelope Barker.

PENELOPE BARKER.

June 17, 1728. October 15, 1794.

When the Georges ruled all England,
And England ruled the seas,
She thought to weight her treasury
With tax from the colonies.

No home rule did she give to them,
In Parliament no seat,
She never thought, perhaps,
From England they'd retreat.

The time soon came, the men to war
Marched forth to win the siege.
We shall be free from king and crown!
From haughty, lordly liege.

The women said, "God bless you!
Where'er you fight and roam,
We will bear our burdens,
With our children here at home."

In the Province of Carolina,
In Edenton the town,
There lived Penelope Barker,
A woman of renown.

Of Samuel and Elizabeth Paget
She was one of daughters three,
And to add to the family circle,
Three brothers also had she.

In seventeen hundred and twenty-eight,
The summer montn of June,
The seventeenth day, Penelope
Raised her first infant tune.

Elizabeth, her sister, was Oldest of the three Daughters of said parents,
Of the Paget family tree.

Penelope married Craven
In her youthful age;
He died leaving her no issue
To inscribe on the record page.

Elizabeth Paget married
Mr. Hodgson, the same
Whom Penelope afterwards
Took his suit and name.

Two children blessed this union,
She was not a mother before;
Thomas died in Halifax,
November 20th, 1774.

Together these two children
Under the chancel of St. Paul's
Lie waiting to join their mother
When the Heavenly Father calls.

Mr. Hodgson she survived.
Left a widow, and alone,
She married Thomas Barker,
And graced his stately home.

Thomas Barker was a lawyer
Of repute and ability,
And a grand woman did he wed
When he married Penelope.

Nathaniel, Thomas, Penelope,
Were the infants born to them;
But soon the Shepherd took them
To His own holy realm.

Her home was on Broad street,
To the southeast corner of Queen,
Extending through to Court,
Thence south'ard to the Green.

How far south I can not say,
Yet this I know quite well—
On the spot where's now the Woodard House
Is where she once did dwell.

Her house was built of brick and wood,
And bears this early date,
On record in the structure,
Seventeen hundred forty-eight.

Long years of stern oppression
By kings across the sea
Wore out the strength of sire and son,
They would fight and thus be free.

Mrs. Barker called a meeting
To abandon drinking tea;
The picture of the party
Is here for all to see.

In the house of Elizabeth King
This political body met,
Of ladies numbering fifty-one,
An independent set.

They drew a constitution
  Worthy of a judge;
They'd drink no tea, they'd give it up!
  Without a pang or grudge.

October 25th, 1774,
  Was the night without a murmur.
They did their names inscribe,
  As has been said before.

They told the men of valor
  That they were women true;
They'd see the Revolution
  To victory fought through.

Mrs. Barker was the leader
  Of the Revolution band
Of women, which antedated
  Old Boston's noble stand.

The men to arms! The guns were fired!
  The British entered Edenton;
They found no quarter and no men,
  Only women's frowns.

They sought for booty far and wide
  For cattle and for steed,
Anything to satisfy
  England's tyrant's greed.

They boldly took her horses
  And to her coach did hitch,
But Penelope espied them
  And, as mad as any witch,

She snatched a keen-edged blade
  And to the stables ran,
And with a slash she cut
  The traces like a man.

Her coach was white,
  Emblazoned with arms,
In which the fair Penelope
  Had graced with many charms.

The soldiers were but human,
They could not her resist;
So, we conclude, her horses
Her acceptance they did insist.

But like the fragrant flowers,
All things sweet must fade;
She died leaving a record
Of glory she had made.

The fifteenth of October,
Seventeen hundred ninety-four,
She passed away to her reward
For the noble life she bore.

* * * * * * *

For authority of these records,
Beyond doubt they are true,

* * * * * * *

Two Daughters of the Revolution
Searched the Paget Bible through.
"Old Time shall end our story,
But no time, if we end well,
Will end our glory."

* * * * * * *

By courtesy of Miss Margaret Bond, Descendant of the same
Paget family from whom Penelope,
Though times changed her name.

Edenton, N. C., October 25, 1907.

PRESENTATION OF TABLET.

ADDRESS BY MRS. E. E. MOFFITT, REGENT OF NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION.

Friends and Citizens:

We have met together to-day to commemorate an event that took place one hundred and thirty-four years ago, October 25, 1774. It was the time when the Colonies were suffering from oppressive taxation and bound by such stringent laws that endurance ceased to be a virtue, that the people arose in their might and power determined to throw off the British yoke. Even the women of the time exercised such influence as they possessed to give weight to the cause. Many instances of their daring and heroism have been recorded or handed down by tradition. Of one especial incident we have undoubted authority, which took place in Edenton, North Carolina, when fifty-one of those high-metaled dames of that historic town met together on October 25, 1774, to endorse the resolutions that had been passed by the Provincial Congress the previous August, (Colonial Records, Vol. IX, p. 1041,) declaring against the unjust taxation forced upon them by England.

This Congress which met at New Bern, N. C., was the first assemblage independent of royal authority. "It was not a conflict of arms or force, but it was the first act of that great drama in which battles and blood formed only subordinate parts" (Wheeler). These fifty-one heroic women of the Province met to testify their "sincere adherence to such resolves as appeared to affect the peace and happiness of their country for the public good and subscribing to a paper as 'a witness of their fixed intention and determination to buy no more tea or wear any more British cloth' until the tax was removed from these necessities." This daring and heroic stand, so interesting and even so fascinating, the wonder is that it has not held a place on the page of every Revolutionary history. But has nót this been the case in America that the lives of the generality of women are not deemed important enough to trace even in the histories of their distinguished sons? But it is not yet too late to blazon the patriotism of these ladies beside that of the heroes of the Revolution, and with this end in view the North Carolina Society, Daughters of the Revolution, have bent their efforts for several years past to raise sufficient funds wherewith to erect a memorial tablet in their honor. This bronze tablet which will be unveiled to-day, and presented to the State of North Carolina, recites the legend of the Edenton Tea Party. The inscription as it stands on the imperishable bronze reads thus:

ERECTED BY THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY OF THE
DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION
TO
THE FIFTY-ONE LADIES OF EDENTON, WHO, BY THEIR PATRIOTISM, ZEAL AND EARLY PROTEST AGAINST BRITISH AUTHORITY
ASSISTED OUR FOREFATHERS IN THE MAKING OF THIS REPUBLIC AND OUR COMMONWEALTH

The authorities proving the incident to be true beyond doubt have been verified by a London paper, the Morning Chronicle and London Advertiser of January 16th, 1775, in the British Museum, and the American Archives, 4th series, Vol. 1, 891.

It may be admissible to digress from my subject for a few moments to give a short account of the beginnings of the patriotic organizations which led to the establishment of the North Carolina Society. It will be recalled by many who are here to-day that the idea of forming patriotic societies was conceived during the great Centennial of American Independence at Philadelphia in 1876 and held in a city so full of historic memories of the struggle for liberty. The eyes of the nation were opened to the great strides made in a century and the possibilities for greater progress. The need of organizations for the preservation of relics was most apparent, and from the inception of this idea has grown The Sons of the American Revolution, Sons of the Revolution, Daughters of the American Revolution, and Daughters of the Revolution, which to-day are carrying out the aims of their respective constitutions. The general Society was founded October 11, 1890, and organized August 20, 1891, under the name "Daughters of the American Revolution," and was incorporated under the laws of the State of New York as an organization national in its work and purpose. Some of the members becoming dissatisfied with a mistake made regarding the terms of entrance, withdrew from it, and in 1891 formed under the slightly differing name "Daughters of the Revolution," eligibility to which from the moment of its existence has been lineal descent from an ancestor who rendered patriotic service during the War of Independence. Though the mistake made was adjusted in 1905, these organizations have not yet united, but continue their patriotic work with the utmost unanimity of feeling, still pursuing and still achieving the objects that lie nearest and that call for their help and influence. The headquarters of the General Society, Daughters of the Revolution, is in New York, and has branches in many States.

The objects of the Society, as stated in the Constitution, are "to perpetuate the patriotic spirit of the men and women who achieved American Independence; to commemorate prominent events connected with the War of the Revolution; to collect, publish and preserve the rolls, records and historic documents relating to that period; to encourage the study of the country's history and to promote sentiments of friendship and common interest among the members of the Society."

The North Carolina Branch was organized in Raleigh, October 19, 1896, the anniversary of the surrender of Cornwallis; and a constitution and by-laws adopted on April 6, 1897, its declaration upon honor being that "if admitted to membership in this Society, I will endeavor to promote the purpose of its institution and observe the constitution and by-laws."

Mrs. Spier Whitaker, a lineal descendant of William Hooper, a signer of the National Declaration of Independence, was most fittingly chosen as Regent, and she with her co-workers steadily labored with unabating interest to promote the objects stated in the constitution, especially to commemorate the revolutionary events connected with North Carolina. The first four or five years were given over to the study and reading of State history; by sketches by the members of the ancestors in right of whose services they derived their eligibility; memorializing Congress in behalf of the Nash and Davidson monuments; also for the government ownership of Fort Ticonderoga; petitioning the State Legislature to erect a fire-proof building as a Hall of History in which to deposit and preserve the State Library and other priceless records now continually in danger of destruction by fire; the offering yearly a medal for the best article on North Carolina history by a student of the public schools. These and other matters germane to the Society claimed its attention, trusting to a prosperous future to bring to pass these ideals.

At the December meeting in 1900 an article from the pen of Dr. Richard Dillard was read concerning the "Edenton Tea Party of October 25, 1774," and our Regent, Mrs. Whitaker, suggested as an object peculiarly appropriate to an association of women that this Society erect some worthy memorial to these "too much ignored ladies of the historic Tea Party." Surely what event in our history was more worthy of commemoration than this heroic act of women which took place seven months before that of Mecklenburg; nearly twenty months before that of St. Paul's Vestry in Edenton, and nearly two years before the immortal National Declaration?

This suggestion, supported by such vital facts, met with enthusiastic approval by the Society. The ways and means for creating a fund for this purpose were discussed and a conclusion arrived at to publish "important events in our State history," and publish these monographs under the name and title of the "North Carolina Booklet" at $1.00 the year. The idea of publishing these monographs, which originated with Miss Martha Haywood, met with unanimous approval, and she, with Mrs. Hubert Haywood, (so nearly related to the early settlers of Edenton and conversant with its history,) consented to undertake the management of the BOOKLET, the Regent and members of the Society standing as sponsors for them in this patriotic movement. The Society furnished the necessary equipment of stationery and postage and other expenses necessary, and each member lent a willing hand in securing subscriptions. The editors met with most flattering encouragement from the best historians in the State, who generously responded to their request in furnishing sketches on important events which took place in North Carolina before and during the Revolutionary War. To-day the BOOKLET has a fine collection of as many as eighty-five sketches printed on its pages, treating of many different phases of our State's history.

After two years of arduous labor these editors retired from the management, but not until they had placed the BOOKLET on a good basis. They turned into the treasury $217.00, the profits of two years work, giving their services entirely without remuneration, and placed this in bank as a nucleus for the memorial fund. Their resignation was regretfully granted by the whole Society, who felt a deep sense of gratitude for the work they had carried on so successfully. The Society then elected Mrs. E. E. Moffitt and Miss Mary Hilliard Hinton as editors, who have continued the work under the same conditions and have labored assiduously to keep it up to the standard achieved by the former editors, and to-day it is yet spreading its history and biography in this and other States. Though the subscription list is not as satisfactory as one could wish, yet it justifies its continuance, and while our contributors continue in the generous mood that has characterized them through the seven and a half years of its existence, we will be encouraged to still achieve and still pursue.

To-day we have the proud privilege of presenting to the State of North Carolina the profits of the first four years realized from the publication of the NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET, at a cost of four hundred and fifty dollars; in the form of a bronze tablet of exquisite workmanship, which will ornament the rotunda of our beautiful Capitol building.

'Tis to the writers of articles on State history we owe the greatest debt of gratitude, for it is through them that the BOOKLET has commanded the attention it has received. These writers have culled from ponderous volumes, rare documents and other authentic sources, and put in convenient and readable form much history not easily available to the general public. All of which was done to aid the Society in its endeavor to inspire greater State pride.

To our advertisers we also owe a debt of gratitude, for through their combined help the rough places have been made smoother. Our past Regents, Mrs. Whitaker, Mrs. D. H. Hill, deceased, of blessed memory, and Mrs. Thomas K. Bruner, whose names are inscribed in the publication, have been important factors in the success of the BOOKLET and other important undertakings of the Society.

Voicing the sentiments of our organization, the administration of these ladies was entirely and happily satisfactory, besides the honor reflected on it by its founder, Mrs. Whitaker, who so largely inherited the patriotism, daring and zeal of her lineal ancestor, Hon. Wm. Hooper, "the signer," and to her successor, Mrs. Daniel Harvey Hill, a lineal descendant of Gen. Joseph Graham, the famous Revolutionary soldier of brave old Mecklenburg. Mrs. Hill's demise was a sad stroke to our organization and mourned by us all; truly can it be said of her that "homeward serenely she walked with God," leaving a benediction sensibly felt by us all to this day. This vacancy was then filled by Mrs. T. K. Bruner by the unanimous vote of the members; earnest and faithful to her duty, this with her eloquence won our esteem and applause. Mrs. Bruner inherited naturally great patriotism from her lineal ancestor, Col. James Martin, distinguished at Guilford Court-house. Mrs. Bruner resigned in 1906 on account of feeble health, to the sincere regret of her co-workers, both here and by the General Society, who had learned to appreciate her talents.

The field for historic research is broad and widening each day, and the great search for the truth in history is now world-wide. It will be the endeavor of the editors of the BOOKLET to receive for its columns only such articles that can be substantiated by a wise advisory board.

To-day the unveiled tablet will bear silent testimony to the combined effort of writers, advertisers, subscribers, and a concert, given by the boys of the Blind Institution, who so cheerfully aided with their talents (under the supervision of Mrs. John E. Ray, a zealous member of our Society,) in raising funds for its erection. There is still in the treasury a substantial surplus to be devoted to such other patriotic purpose as may best commend itself and that may bear witness to North Carolina's part in the great strife for independence, and to memoralize the deeds of men and women whose lives should be held up as fit subjects for emulation by coming generations. Momentous problems await this nation. The strides of science and the passing of the dark ages of strife demand the thought of strong men, of strong minds, and true hearts.

And while endeavoring to rescue from the past great events, the questions of the present must not be ignored.

Shall we not lend our energies and influence to the Great Peace and Arbitrament Movement that is endeavoring to induce the nations to war no more? Looking forward to that glad day when "He shall beat their swords into plowshares and their spears into pruning hooks, nation shall not lift sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more."

ADDRESS OF ACCEPTANCE

BY LIEUTENANT-GOVERNOR FRANCIS D. WINSTON AT THE UNVEILING OF THE EDENTON TEA-PARTY TABLET.

In the absence of the Governor, in the name of the people of North Carolina, I accept your tablet.

In assuming the duties of his position, one of the able presidents of the North Carolina Literary and Historical Association, delivered an interesting and stirring address on the subject, "A Plea for a Larger State Pride."

You have opened the way for stimulating a larger State pride in placing here a permanent memorial of one of our most pointed Revolutionary events.

The Daughters of the Revolution are most happy in the striking incident they have selected, to mark their first contribution to the tablets that will adorn these walls.

Heretofore, on the very spot in that historic old town, where your Revolutionary sisters passed those bold resolves, so momentous in the cause of liberty, patriotic citizens have set up a bronze "tea kettle," properly inscribed.

In a corner of a brick store not a hundred yards distant a marble tablet records the fact that Joseph Hewes, a signer of the Declaration of Independence, was for many years a merchant there. In any direction one may look in Edenton the eye will fall upon some spot memorable in Colonial times.

The county of Bertie, unusually rich in historic tradition and Revolutionary and Colonial facts, takes marked interest in the occasion. The illustrious lady who presided over the Edenton Tea Party was not native and to the manner born in the old precinct, yet she did the next best thing a woman can do who is not born there, and that is to marry a son of the county. Penelope Eelsback first married John Hodgson, a leading attorney of Bertie County. Upon his death she married James Craven, a descendant of the Earl of Craven, one of the Lords Proprietors, who at the May term, 1744, of Bertie Court of Pleas and Quarter Sessions produced "to this court a license from His Excellency, the Governor, licensing and empowering him to practice as an attorney and plead the law in any court of judicature in the Province." His death occurring, this patriotic lady again looked to Bertie County for a helpmeet and defender, and married Thomas Barker, of near old St. John's, Bertie Precinct, a distinguished lawyer, a student of the Middle Temple, London, and one of the four Commissioners appointed by the General Assembly at New Bern in 1746 "to revise and print the several Acts of Assembly in force in this Province." With this matrimonial training it is not surprising that Penelope Barker should lead her sisters in drafting those resolutions so directly antagonistic to royal authority. Theirs was not the frantic heroism of the Crusader, nor the blind zeal of the Maid of Orleans responding to the whisper of her voices; but they were calmly adding to the mighty volume of protest that ended in free America. Their deed must not pass away. Their names must not wither.

This tablet at this central point will give larger evidence of their patriotism and daring.

I do not need to recite the important and daring part taken by our women in the Revolutionary drama.

I can only urge you and those whose purposes and plans are alike patriotic to put forth greater efforts to mark these pivotal points in our State life.

Of late we have erected many monuments in different sections of our State in memory of our mighty dead and of a dear and imperishable cause. But our good State has so many historic places, that a thousand monuments and tablets scarce would mark them all.

I repeat again that the work of properly perpetuating these glories devolves on your honorable Society and others of like character; and under your sympathetic and wise guiding the people of North Carolina and the world will come not only to know who we are, but will come to know why we are who we are.

In May last it was my privilege to attend in pilgrimage with the Diocese of East Carolina, a memorial celebration of the First Christian Baptism on our shores.

The meeting was held on Roanoke Island at old Fort Raleigh, where the landing of the English in 1585 occurred.

The patriotic Society—the Roanoke Colony Association—which owns this historic site, has erected a suitable memorial and has set up markers around the boundaries of the fort.

There, too, it is the purpose of the Bishop and clergy of that Diocese to erect a cross to commemorate the first baptism had there.

Permit me to assign you a duty in connection with the first landing on our shores. Our people have not impressed the nation with the importance of this first landing of the Anglo-Saxon in America. The celebration of the three hundredth anniversary of the landing at Jamestown was fittingly and successfully had last year; the event then celebrated was no more significant than these landings on Roanoke Island.

Raleigh's colony was the first planting of the English race in America. It came for that purpose. The dream of Sir Humphrey Gilbert, stepbrother of Sir Walter Raleigh, was a commercial and an agricultural state. Others had come before, but not to plant a race.

The Norsemen had come across frozen seas with the daring and endurance of demigods. They sought only adventure and conquest. The Spaniard had come, but only for love of gold. Cortez had conquered Mexico and Pizarro Peru.

The Spanish flag waved and the Spanish cross glistened on the peaks of the Andes and the shores of the Pacific, but nowhere in the New World, until Raleigh sent his colony to Roanoke Island, was heard the cry of an infant child of pure Caucasian blood, proclaiming the birth of the white race on the Western Hemisphere.

The Norsemen and the Spaniards came with sword and cannon, with cross and crucifix, to conquer and plunder. Soldiers and sailors, priests and friars, adventurers and plunderers, pirates of the sea and robbers of the land, forsaking wives, children and home, they sought in the New World new fields for lust, avarice and conquest. They left their women behind and took to wife the savage women of America. Behold the result to-day in the hybrid races of Mexico, and of Central and South America! Spanish fathers! Indian mothers! Hybrid children! Homes of lust and tyranny! Immeasurable inequalities between father, mother and children!

Raleigh knew better; scholar, soldier, orator, statesman and philosopher, he knew that the English race, with its splendid civilization, could be transplanted to America by transplanting the English home. He knew that civilization everywhere is built upon the home and that every home is what the mother makes it.

He filled his ships with women as well as men; he sent out colonies, not pirates; he planted in America, not English forts, but the English race. The governor of the colony set the example of taking his wife and family, among them a grown daughter, Eleanor, a young wife and expectant mother. Here was life in all its gentleness and fullness. What need for guns and cannon here! When the infant cry of Virginia Dare was heard on Roanoke Island, it sounded around the world, and called across the seas all the millions who since have come to build the American nation. It was a new cry in a new world; a mightier sound than the clash of sword, or the roar of cannon; a sweeter call than the vesper bell of hooded priest with his vows of celibacy.

That baby cry sounded the death-knell of Spanish power in the universe and the final overthrow everywhere of kingcraft, priestcraft, and lustcraft. It told anew the old story of life; how every life, not only of the individual human being, but also of races, nations and civilizations, must begin with and be dependent on a little child; a little child born in lawful wedlock, a pledge of holy love between man and woman, equally matched and equally sharing the joys and responsibilities of life.

This was the lesson of Raleigh's colonies; the lesson that the Spaniard never learned in all his heroic efforts to conquer and possess the New World. In Spanish conquest and colonization no part was played by women and children. It was a jungle struggle for the mastery between human animals.

In English conquest and colonization, women and children went hand in hand with men. Wherever the English race has gone, to Roanoke Island, to Lucknow, to Gettysburg, a little child has led them; led them in affection, in memory, in inspiration to deeds of daring and fortitude. Among all the little children of our race, none stands out more pathetic, more dramatic, more significant of mighty events than the child of Raleigh's colony, the first Anglo-Saxon born in America, little Virginia Dare, native of North Carolina.

I urge your Society to arrange for placing here a suitable tablet to commemorate her birth.

And I will go further and impose on you a greater duty in a wider field. The outside world knows but little of this landing on North Carolina shores. The vast importance of it can not be over-estimated. It was a scene worthy of the poet's pen, and the artist's brush.

At your next meeting I urge that you begin a movement for giving the birth of Virginia Dare its proper world-wide significance. I shall not go into particulars. In this movement you should enlist your sister societies of the nation. As the event was of national importance, so should its commemoration receive national encouragement and support.

A picture of her christening should hang in our nation's capitol, with mother and babe and minister of God as the central figures, and around them grouped the little colony, standing on the shore of the island; to the east the deep blue ocean stretching far away, on its ever restless bosom an endless procession of ships bringing races and nations from the old world to new life, liberty, freedom; to the west endless multitudes of Anglo-Saxons peopling the continent and making indeed a new world; and underneath this inscription,

"And a little child shall lead them."

CHIEF JUSTICE CLARK'S ADDRESS

AT THE UNVEILING OF THE TABLET TO THE LADIES OF THE EDENTON TEA PARTY IN THE STATE CAPITOL.

Mrs. Regent and N. C. Daughters of the Revolution, Ladies and Gentlemen:

After the two admirable speeches we have had from the ladies, it is perilous for a mere man to attempt to follow.

Beautifully located upon Edenton Bay, where the noble Chowan River and the Albemarle come together, the historic city of Edenton is no less famous for the patriotism, intelligence and culture of her people. And it has always been so. When the great struggle for the right of a free people to govern themselves, in their own way, was beginning, liberty had no more ardent supporters upon the continent than in Edenton. The British newspapers of that day universally declared that Great Britain could manage the men but for the independent spirit of the rebel women. And among the high-spirited independent ladies of America, none are entitled to precedence over the fifty-one ladies of Edenton who, on the 25th of October, 1774, enacted the patriotic scene which we have met to commemorate.

Among the men of Edenton were Joseph Hewes, the signer of the Declaration of Independence, and Governor Samuel Johnston, one of the first Governors of the State under the Republic, and many another whose name deserves preservation at the hands of posterity, but none more deserve it than these fifty-one ladies to whose memory we this day unveil this tablet.

Lord Byron said that fame depended less upon what a man does than upon his historian's style. There is this much truth in the sarcasm, that it is not sufficient to do great deeds, but they must be sufficiently and properly recorded. There was of a surety "many brave men before Agamemnon," but we know not who they were, nor what they did. The pen of Homer makes Agamemnon, king of men, the wise Nestor, the crafty Ulysses, the swift-footed Achilles, rash Hector, railing Thersites, venerable Priam, and many another essentially better known to us than most of the men whom we meet on our streets. The characters of his women, too, stand out as clear and individual as those drawn by Shakespeare. Who does not recall Andromache, her tender parting from Hector, and Cassandra, and that fair face,

> "Which launched a thousand ships
> And sacked the topmost towers of Troy."

But for the blind old bard, these would, as it were, have never lived for us. They would have gone down to dusty death unhonored and unknown.

North Carolina has known how to make history grandly. She has been careless to record it. Years before the Boston people, disguising themselves as Indians, threw the tea into the harbor, the people of Wilmington, in broad daylight, defied a British war vessel, refused to let the stamps be landed, and made the stamp officer take an oath not to exercise his office. Every history has pictures and an entertaining account of the Boston transaction, but what is ever said in a Northern history about our Wilmington patriots?

North Carolina at Halifax, April 12, 1776, was the first State to instruct its delegates in the Continental Congress to vote for independence. Only after the lapse of ninety-four years, in 1868, our Legislature bethought itself to put the date on our State flag. And to this day most of the histories give Virginia that credit, though she did not move instructions for independence till May 5, 1776, nearly a month later than this State.

The first victory in the Revolution won by the patriots was won at Moore's Creek, N. C., February 27, 1776, and solely by North Carolina troops. But so little care did we take of the fame of our gallant soldiers, that in recent years when a North Carolina Senator in Congress referred to Moore's Creek, Senator Lodge, of Massachusetts, an exceedingly well-informed man, and himself an historian, denied the fact and said that he had never heard of such a battle. Yet it was an important victory and had a decided effect upon the result of the great struggle.

And there was the immortal Declaration of Independence at Charlotte, more than a year before that at Philadelphia. We allowed more than fifty years to pass before we moved to vindicate our claims. Fortunately, many of the participants and witnesses were still alive and could substantiate the facts. Though the General Assembly put that on our flag in 1861, not till 1889, after one hundred and fourteen years had passed, did the State think to fix it in the minds of all by engraving the date upon our Great Seal. In these matters North Carolina has moved slowly indeed.

One would have thought, however, that the gallantry of the men of the State would have made them more mindful to put on record the patriotic event which we have met to commemorate. On 25th October, 1774, one hundred and thirty-four years ago to-morrow, fifty-one patriotic ladies of Edenton met and adopted resolutions to abstain from using not only tea on which the stamp tax was laid, but any British goods until the unjust and odious tax was repealed. It was a bold act, a brave act. It was treason, for it defied a law of Parliament. It was even more dangerous, for it assailed the profits of the British manufacturers for whose profits the Colonies were governed. It was an early use of the power of boycott, though that word was then unknown.

But a grateful State and people made no record of the event, though it attracted prompt attention in London. We owe to the files of the London newspapers the recovery of the resolutions and the names of the fair signers. In one only of these, the Morning Chronicle and London Advertiser, of 16 January, 1775, are the names of the fair and patriotic signers set out, though the incident itself is given and commented on in several of the London papers of that date. The names published are: Abigail Charlton, Mary Blount, F. Johnstone, Elizabeth Creacy, Margaret Cathcart, Elizabeth Patterson, Anne Johnstone, Jane Wellwood, Margaret Pearson, Mary Woolard, Penelope Dawson, Sarah Beasley, Jean Blair, Susannah Vail, Grace Clayton, Elizabeth Vail, Frances Hall, Anne Anderson, Mary Jones, Sarah Matthews, Anne Hall, Anne Haughton, Rebecca Bondfield, Elizabeth Beasley, Sarah Littlejohn, Mary Creacy, Penelope Barker, Ruth Benbury, Elizabeth P. Ormond, Sarah Howcott, M. Payne, Sarah Hoskins, Elizabeth Johnston, Mary Littledale, Mary Bonner, Sarah Valentine, Lydia Bonner, Elizabeth Crickett, Sarah Howe, Elizabeth Green, Lydia Bennett, Mary Ramsey, Marion Wells, Teresia Cunningham, Anne Horniblow, Elizabeth Roberts, Mary Hunter.

The number of signers is given in the paper as fifty-one, but the above list has only forty-seven names; four of the fifty-one given were duplicated to make the number. Dr. Richard Dillard in his article on the Edenton Tea Party in that most valuable publication, the NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET, for August, 1901, supplies from tradition three of the omitted names, Elizabeth King, Isabella Johnston, Winifred Wiggins Hoskins.

Isabella Johnston was the sister of Governor Samuel Johnston, and was affianced to Joseph Hewes, a signer of the American Declaration of Independence. She died before marriage and he followed her broken-hearted to the grave. These fifty-one ladies constituted probably very nearly the entire female society of Edenton of that day, and their descendants are to be found scattered now throughout North Carolina and in many other States.

The house in which this historic event occurred passed through the Civil War, and was still standing as late as 1875 and was pointed out to visitors. It is a great misfortune that some patriotic society or the town itself did not think to buy the building and preserve it.

Some sixty-six years later, two-thirds of a century after the event, about 1830, W. T. Muse, a North Carolina officer in the United States Navy, found, by chance, a copy of the engraving of the memorable scene, in the Island of Minorca, while cruising in the Mediterranean. An oil painting made therefrom is in our State Library.

Proud as we are of the event itself, and proud as we are of this commemoration of it, there is this humiliation that the men of the State were not gallant enough to erect this memorial more than a century ago. The ladies, seeing that the memorial was more than a century overdue, were well justified in taking this step themselves. We owe the inception of this movement, of which this day is the successful culmination, to those two patriotic and public spirited ladies, Mrs. Dr. Hubert Haywood and Miss Martha Helen Haywood, the first editors of the BOOKLET. They have reflected added honors upon the distinguished families to which they belong. When they laid the burden down by resignation, it was taken up by the present distinguished Regent of the Society, Mrs. E. E. Moffitt, and her patriotic associate, Miss Mary Hilliard Hinton, and others, and carried on to the successful completion of the work.

To the ladies of this Society, all of historic lineage and worthy of their lineage, North Carolina owes the placing of this bronze tablet in the rotunda of our capitol in perpetual memorial of this brave and fearless act of the noble women of Edenton in 1774.

In the rotunda are four niches for busts and eight spaces for bronze plaques. This plaque to the ladies of Edenton is not inappropriately the first to be placed. The State Historical Commission will next year place, with appropriate ceremonies, a marble bust of William A. Graham in one of the niches. In the course of time, as I understand it, the commission will place in the other three niches busts of distinguished sons of the State. But seven spaces for bronze plaques remain unfilled. Is it not an appropriate time and place to suggest that the Cape Fear section, always patriotic, might well bestir itself to fill two spaces with bronze plaques, respectively to commemorate the destruction of the stamps at Wilmington in 1765, and the victory at Moore's Creek in 1776? Charlotte and Mecklenburg should certainly place a bronze tablet in memory of her immortal declaration. And Halifax might well follow with a tablet to the memory of the resolutions of 12 April, 1776. This would leave three spaces for other events deserving commemoration—one might commemorate the landing at Roanoke Island.

The Daughters of the Revolution have led the way with this tablet. As long as this Capitol shall stand on its foundations, as long as this tablet of bronze shall abide, there will be honor to the women of Edenton in 1774 who did this deed and to the women of North Carolina in 1908 who knew how to fitly commemorate it.

The patriotism that appreciates and records brave deeds falls short only of the patriotism that performs them and needs only opportunity to imitate and equal them.

THE ANNIVERSARY TEA.

By Mary Hilliard Hinton.

The afternoon of October 24th from four to six the halls and music room of the Yarborough were graciously tendered the Daughters of the Revolution by Mr. Howell Cobb for a tea. To this celebration of the one hundred and thirty-fourth anniversary of the Edenton Tea Party informal invitations were extended to about one hundred persons, which included the members of the following patriotic organizations: The Colonial Dames, Society of the Cincinnati, Sons of the Revolution, the officers of the Woman's Club and the Daughters of the Confederacy; also the historians who had so generously given their time and labor in our cause.

The music room was tastefully dressed with cut flowers, there being a predominance of yellow blossoms. On the large table at one end of the room the center-piece was of superb yellow chrysanthemums, around which were grouped silver candelabra and cut glass dishes filled with bonbons, etc. At the head was a handsome silver service, where Mrs. Helen DeBerniere Wills poured the tea. Around the room were placed treasures bearing on this event from the Hall of History that Colonel Olds had loaned for the occasion, chief among them being the very quaint little replica of the Edenton Tea Party House. It was in the original house, the home of Mrs. Elizabeth King, which faced the village green that the famous gathering was held on that autumn day in 1774. This unique design was a gift from Dr. Dillard, of Edenton, to the North Carolina Historical Exhibit at Jamestown Exposition, where it was exhibited and later was presented by him to the Hall of History at Raleigh. Pictures of the Cupola House, "Hayes," St. Paul's Churchyard, the Court-house and the Burying Ground at "Hayes" were among the relics.

Some Who Were Present at the Unveiling, October 24, 1908.

A most attractive feature of the tea was the secretary. Miss Betsey John Haywood* officiated in that capacity, representing Mrs. Winifred Hoskins, secretary of the tea party. In the spacious hall she sat at a table and invited the guests as they filed into the music room to register. The book and a pen used will be preserved among the annals of the Society. She was becomingly attired in a Colonial gown of peach-blow silk, embroidered satin, heelless slippers to match, and a collar of rare old lace. Her coiffeur was arranged in puffs, powdered (the style being copied from a very old minature of her ancestress) through which was stuck an exquisitely carved tortoise shell comb owned by Winifred Hoskins.

The guests were received in the hall by Miss Mary Hilliard Hinton, who presented them to the secretary. After registering Mrs. Cross introduced them to the receiving line which was composed of Mrs. E. E. Moffitt, Regent of the North

*Miss Betsy John Haywood's picture appears in this number of the BOOKLET.

Carolina Society Daughters of the Revolution and Second Vice-president General; Mrs. Patrick Matthew and Mrs. William D. Pruden, of Edenton, Regent and Vice-regent of the Penelope Chapter D. R.; Mrs. J. E. Erwin, of Morganton; Mrs. Julian Wood, of Edenton; Mrs. Lindsay Patterson, of Winston-Salem, Vice President-General Daughters of the American Revolution; Mrs. W. O. Shannon, of Henderson, Regent Whitmell Blount Chapter D. A. R.; Mrs. J. Allison Hodges, of Richmond, and Mrs. A. B. Andrews, Chairman of Raleigh Circle of Colonial Dames. The Daughters of the Revolution who assisted in receiving were: Mesdames W. H. Pace, Mary B. Sherwood, Hubert Haywood, John Ray, Adelaide Bagley, Ivan Proctor, H. F. Adickes, Miss Grace Bates.

Some of the pages who officiated at the unveiling exercises in the morning aided in serving the light, dainty refreshments. Those present were: Misses Eugenia Clark, Evelyn Jackson and Jean Thackston, who are members of the Junior Daughters of the Revolution; Misses Mary and Bessie Hollister, Browning Adickes, Gene Gray Heck, Julia Pickell, Pearl Heck, Lucy Haywood, Ruth Ray and others.

The moments sped rapidly by in pleasant conversation and drinking the cup of tea so heroically renounced by the daring fifty-one signers.

Before the hour of departure arrived our Regent called on some of the eloquent guests for a few words of greeting. Dr. D. H. Hill spoke delightfully of the dames of the long ago and the dames of to-day. Colonel Benehan Cameron, Mrs. Patrick Matthew, Mrs. Lindsay Patterson, Mr. Clarence H. Poe, Mr. F. M. Harper, Colonel Fred A. Olds each were called upon for brief remarks. To the toast to Dr. Dillard, whose efforts revived this fading historic event—the Edenton Tea Party—and whose absence was so keenly felt, Dr. Drane, beloved rector of the Colonial church of St.

ELIZA EAGLES ("BETSY JOHN") HAYWOOD, PERSONATING THE SECRETARY OF THE EDENTON TEA PARTY OF 1774.

Paul's, Edenton, and chaplain of the North Carolina Society of the Sons of the Revolution, responded most charmingly.

The dear little maids who received the cards at the door of the reception room won all hearts—Catherine Haywood Baker and Elizabeth Cross.

Adieux came all too quickly, and it is hoped other similar purposes may gather together from various parts of our State the men and women who are giving their valuable time for the preservation of her noble history.

The Daughters are deeply grateful to Mrs. Pace for bringing this entertainment to such a successful finish by her untiring efforts.

CAROLINA.

BY BETTIE FRESHWATER POOL,
Author of "The Eyrie and Other Southern Stories."

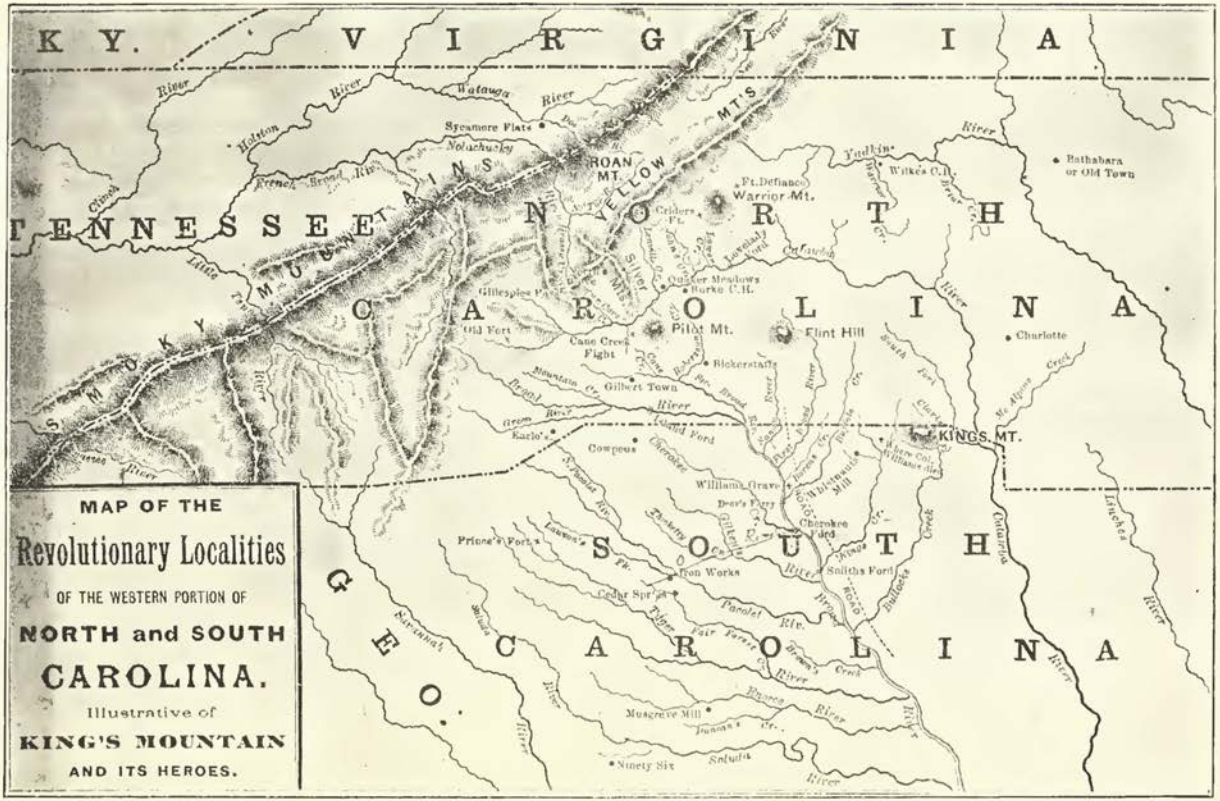
I love thee, Carolina!
Broad thy rivers, bright and clear;
Majestic are thy mountains;
Dense thy forests, dark and drear.
Grows the pine tree, tall and stately;
Weeps the willow, drooping low;
Blooms the eglantine and jasmine;
Nods the daisy, white as snow.

CHORUS:

Let me live in Carolina
'Till life's toil and strife are past!
Let me sleep in Carolina
When my sun shall set at last!
Where the mocking bird is singing;
Where my heart is fondly clinging;
I would sleep when life is o'er,
Sweetly on the old home shore.

I love thee, Carolina!
Peace and plenty there abide.
How bountiful thy harvest
Gather'd in at autumntide.
Fair thy fields where grows the cotton,
Light and fleecy, soft and white;
And the golden wheat doth ripple,
Like a sea of amber light.

I love thee, Carolina!
Land of story and of song;
Of patriot and hero—
How their deeds to mem'ry throng!
Great in peace, and great in battle!
Heart of fire to love or hate!
Brightest star of all the Union,
Is the glorious Old North State!



K Y.
V I R G I N I A TENNESSEE
MOUNTAINS
ROAN MT.
YELLOW MTS
Watauga River
Sycamore Flats
Nolachucky
Holston
French Broad Rivers
Ft. Defiance
Warrior Mt.
Wilkes C.H.
Yadkin
Bathabara or Old Town
Gillespies
Old Fort
Cane Creek Fight
Pilot Mt.
Flint Hill
Charlotte
Gilbert Town
Bickerstaffs
KINGS MT.
Cowpens
Williams Grave
Cherokee Ford
Prince's Fort
Iron Works
Smiths Ford
Cedar Spring
Pacolet Riv.
Musgrove Mill
Ninety Six Saluda
GEO.
C A R O L I N A
S O U T H
NORTH MAP OF THE Revolutionary Localities
OF THE WESTERN PORTION OF NORTH and SOUTH
CAROLINA.
Illustrative of
KING'S MOUNTAIN
AND ITS HEROES.

THE BATTLE OF KINGS MOUNTAIN.

BY WILLIAM K. BOYD.

The Revolution in North Carolina has three distinct stages. First of these was a period of patriotic agitation which culminated in the instruction for independence in April, 1776, and the formation of a State Constitution in the following November. Then came years of reaction, when security from attack and division within the patriot party produced apathy and indifference toward the fortune of other colonies. Finally danger of British invasion in 1780, accompanied as it was by the rising of the loyalists, aroused new interest in the struggle for independence, and the British campaign in North Carolina proved to be the prelude to Yorktown. In this last phase of the war belongs the battle of Kings Mountain. In all the long conflict with the mother country no blow was struck more suddenly or effectively, and few had more important consequences. To appreciate its dramatic character as well as results the course of the Revolution in the South must be borne in mind.

The first attempt at Southern invasion in 1776 had failed. When Clinton and Cornwallis approached the coast of North Carolina in May of that year they learned of the defeat of the Royalists at Moore's Creek and found a military organization ready to resist invasion. They therefore diverted the expedition further south and laid seige to Charleston; there also fortune was against them, and in a few weeks they returned to New York. For two years the Southern colonies were practically unmolested. Then, in 1778, the British again undertook invasion. The movement was coincident with a crisis in the war. The attack by way of Canada had culminated in Burgoyne's defeat at Saratoga, and the only result of the invasion of the middle colonies was the capture of New York. Washington was still at bay, and expediency suggested a campaign far removed from his leadership. Political affairs also embarrassed the English government. Opposition to the political methods of George III caused sympathy for the colonies, and in June, 1778, a commission arrived in Philadelphia offering all the claims of the colonists except independence. These liberal terms were not accepted and during the remaining years of the war England had to reckon with the French, whose alliance with the United States had been concluded the preceding February. A commercial problem was now involved; the American products in greatest demand in European markets were from the South, especially those from the Carolinas and Georgia; indeed Southern products upheld American credit abroad. The French alliance made the control of this source of supplies more important than ever. Finally, a large proportion of the people in the Carolinas and Georgia were loyalists—the exact per cent will never be known. As the British, after the rejection of compromise, treated the patriots as traitors and conducted the war as a conflict against rebels, the cooperation of the loyalist element was necessary.

For these reasons an expedition was sent against Georgia in 1778. Soon Savannah was captured, Augusta taken, and in December, 1779, Charleston, S. C., was besieged. After a brave defense the city surrendered in May, 1780. An elaborate campaign was now planned, nothing less than a northward invasion, which would cut off the South from the other colonies and so limit Washington's resources. The leadership of the movement was given to Lord Cornwallis, and Sir Henry Clinton, the commander-in-chief, returned North. Cornwallis readily advanced to Camden, where he established his headquarters, and sent advance divisions of his army to Augusta, Ga., and Ninety-six, S. C. Many conditions favored him; the early leaders of the Revolution in South Carolina were dead or in prison, and the offer of parole as military prisoners made to the people was widely accepted; some were willing for the revival of British administration in the interest of trade; others, believing that the Continental Congress had neglected the interests of the South, were apathetic. While these conditions favored the British, one fatal policy turned the scale against them; that was the decision to subdue one part of the people with the assistance of the rest, to make the war a civil conflict. To this end all who had taken parole were restored to their rights and duties as citizens and all who should fail in their allegiance to his Majesty were denounced as rebels. In order to enforce these demands and organize the people, as well as to collect supplies for invasion, Col. Patrick Ferguson was sent into upper South Carolina.

This officer, the central figure in the battle of Kings Mountain, was one of the most brilliant men in the British army. His defeat and tragic death have robbed him of the place in popular knowledge which he deserves. For his age and rank few men have won greater distinction. Born in 1744, he entered the army at the age of fifteen; at twenty-four he had reached the rank of captain and had seen service on the continent and in the West Indies. The possibility of war in America turned his energy to two aims: one, to invent a breach-loading, rapid-fire rifle which would enable the British soldier to be a match for the riflemen of the American frontier; the other, to collect a select band of men, instructed in the use of his rifle and the methods of frontier warfare. In 1777 he was assigned to the American service and with his chosen band of American volunteers, about 300 in number, he participated in the battles of Brandywine and Monmouth, made several predatory expeditions into New Jersey and New York, and in 1779 joined Cornwallis in the seige of Charleston.

His services as advance agent of the British army were eminently successful. His message to the people was one of conciliation. "We come not to make war on women and children, but to relieve their distresses." He had rare powers of persuasion. "He would sit for hours and converse with the country people on the state of public affairs and point out to them from his view the ruinous effects of disloyalty to the crown. This condescension on his part was regarded as wonderful in a king's officer, and very naturally went very far to secure the respect and obedience of all who came within the sphere of his almost magic influence." Ferguson was also an organizer of ability. Loyalists were soon formed into companies, and in the Ninety-six district seven battallions of about 4,000 men were soon organized, largely through his activity. Civil as well as military authority was conferred upon him, and as the people between the Saluda and the Broad rivers had never recognized the South Carolina State government, a good opportunity was open for the revival of the British administration.

While success attended the efforts of Cornwallis and Ferguson the revolutionary cause in North Carolina was disorganized. The State's entire quota in the Continental line had been captured and imprisoned at Charleston and the militia paroled. The Tories were active once again. No less than sixty-two officers were commissioned by Ferguson from the counties of Anson, Chatham, Cumberland, Orange, and Randolph. The notorious David Fanning was gathering his band of outliers. A new patriot army had to be organized. Its basis was a new draft of 4,000 militia, ordered by the Assembly of 1780, commanded by Richard Caswell, and reinforcements from the Continental army who arrived in North Carolina about the time of the surrender of Charleston. While Cheraw was chosen as the place of mobilization, Gen. Griffith Rutherford organized nearly eight hundred men at Mallard's Creek, near Charlotte. A detachment under Col. Francis Locke defeated the loyalists at Ramsour's Mill on June 20; another under William L. Davidson inflicted defeat at Colson's Mill on the Pee Dee a month later, while William R. Davie, cooperating with Sumter, won another victory at Hanging Rock on August 5. The hope of effective resistance aroused by these minor victories vanished with the disastrous defeat of Gates at Camden on August 15. Cornwallis gradually approached the State; by September 8 he reached the Waxhaws; by the last of the month he was in Charlotte, where, on October 3, Governor Martin, once again on North Carolina soil, issued a proclamation calling all loyal men to unite with the army.

At this crisis, while Davie and Davidson were collecting militia in the neighborhood of Charlotte, the blow which checked the British invasion was made at King's Mountain. It was largely the work of mountaineers from the western slope of the Blue Ridge. In 1771 a migration to that region from the western counties began. Soon a form of self government, the first ever worked out by native born Americans, was established in the valley of the Watauga, and in 1776 representatives from Washington District, Watauga Settlement, were admitted to the Provincial Congress at Halifax, and later Washington, Greene, and Sullivan counties were created, under the sovereignty of North Carolina.[1] To the resistance to British invasion Watauga had already contributed over two hundred men under Maj. Charles Robertson and Col. Isaac Shelby who crossed the hills in July, and, cooperating with Col. Charles McDowell, made the Cherokee Ford of Broad River their headquarters. From that place expeditions were sent out against the loyalists at Thickety Fort, some twenty miles distant, Cedar Springs on the Pacolet, and Musgrove's Mill on the Enoree. But after the rout of the regular army at Camden, these militia and mountaineer recruits dispersed to their homes. They were followed by Ferguson as far as Gilbert Town, about three miles from Rutherfordton. The people of the country, believing that the struggle for independence was ended, flocked to the British standard and took the oath of allegiance. Detachments of Ferguson's troops engaged in skirmishes with the retiring patriots as far west as Old Fort.

[1] See Early Relations of North Carolina and the West, BOOKLET, January, 1908.

The retreat of McDowell and Shelby, however, was temporary. It was their aim to renew the fight after the crops were gathered. This decision was hastened by a well authenticated threat of Ferguson. Through a paroled patriot he sent a message to the mountain men "that if they did not desist from their opposition to the British arms he would march his army over the mountains, hang their leaders, and lay their country waste with fire and sword." This was repeated to Shelby, Lieutenant-Colonel of Sullivan County. Perhaps with it came news of the loyalist expeditions between Gilbert Town and the mountains. Shortly after he rode from his home to Jonesboro, county seat of Washington County, and visited John Sevier, the county lieutenant. Both concluded that the time to assume the offensive had come. Sevier agreed to rouse the men of Washington County and those troops of McDowell who had taken refuge there, while Shelby undertook to enlist the cooperation of the neighboring Virginia settlements on the Holston as well as secure aid from his own county. Sycamore Shoals was chosen as the rendezvous, and there on September 25 came Sevier and Shelby with 240 men each, 160 of McDowell's scattered troops, and Col. William Campbell, of Washington County, Virginia, with 400 Virginians, who had been persuaded by correspondence with Shelby to aid the North Carolinians rather than march eastward and join the defense of Virginia.

The arrangements for the campaign were in keeping with that sense of individualism which characterized the early days of Watauga. Besides a few beeves which were slaughtered in the early part of the march, the only food was corn meal mixed with maple sugar, which each man carried in his wallet. The arms consisted of rifles, tomahawks, and hunting knives. There was no commander-in-chief; and during the battle fighting was by individuals rather than groups. Funds were provided by money from the land sales in the office of John Adair, the entry taker of Sullivan County. "I have no authority by law to make any disposition of this money," he said. "It belongs to the treasury of North Carolina and I dare not appropriate a cent of it to any purpose; but if the country is overrun by the British our liberty is gone. Let the money go, too. Take it. If the enemy by its use is driven from the country, I can trust that country to justify and vindicate my conduct." Nearly $13,000 was thus secured; it was later refunded by the State of North Carolina. Finally, after an address by Rev. Samuel Doak, pioneer minister of Watauga, which tradition says closed by invoking the sword of the Lord and of Gideon, the group of military bands took up their march in search of Ferguson on September 26.

The route lay across Roan Mountain. On the summit two members of the expedition were missed. Suspecting desertion the leaders turned from the more northerly route to the Toe River, thence up Grassy Creek through Gillespie's Gap, into the north branch of the Catawba. Here, on September 29, they were joined by Col. Charles McDowell, and the next day at Quaker Meadows, the McDowell home, by 350 men from Wilkes and Surry counties under Col. Benjamin Cleveland and Maj. Joseph Winston. On Sunday, October 1, they passed Pilot Mountain and camped just south of that famous beacon for travelers. On Monday, because of the rain, they remained in camp and in the evening the officers gathered to choose some common authority, for absence of one head had fostered rivalry and disorder; moreover, it was believed that Ferguson was in the neighborhood of Gilbert Town, and common leadership in the hour of battle seemed especially desirable. Col. Charles McDowell was the ranking officer, but his leadership was not acceptable, and there was rivalry among the other North Carolina leaders. Shelby, therefore, suggested that a request be sent to General Gates, at Hillsborough, for a commander and that until such one should arrive, Colonel Campbell, a Virginian, assume the leadership of the expedition. This was accepted, and McDowell volunteered to act as messenger to Gates, the leadership of his men being assumed by his brother, Maj. Joseph McDowell, of Quaker Meadows.

On October 4 the little army reached Gilbert Town to find that Ferguson had fallen back. Indeed Ferguson does not seem to have given the mountaineers much consideration; his message was probably an idle taunt rather than a sincere threat. To him a more important patriot force was a small band under Capt. Elijah Clarke, of Georgia, which hovered around the Georgia-Carolina frontier. On September 27 he left Gilbert Town and went south in search of Clarke. Three days later, while at Broad River, the two deserters from the mountain army came to his camp and told of the enemy's approach.

Before this new and unexpected danger there were two alternatives: one to join Cornwallis at Charlotte, the other to remain in the borderland and meet the enemy if he approached. In making a decision three points had to be considered: the expediency of preventing a union of Clarke and the mountain army, the recall of many troops that had been given furloughs, and the desire to prevent a reversion from the loyalist cause among the people at large. These problems, as well as his own daring spirit, led Ferguson to hold his ground and meet the enemy. He therefore sent a message to Cornwallis for aid and issued the following statement to the people:

DENARD'S FORD, BROAD RIVER,
TRYON COUNTY, October 1, 1780.

GENTLEMEN:—Unless you wish to be eat up by an inundation of barbarians, who have begun by murdering an unarmed son before his aged father, and afterward lopped off his arms, and who by their shocking cruelties and irregularities, give the best proof of their cowardice and want of discipline; I say if you wish to be pinioned, robbed, and murdered, and see your wives and daughters, in four days, abused by the dregs of mankind—in short, if you wish or deserve to live, and bear the name of men, grasp your arms in a moment and run to camp.

The Backwater Water men have crossed the mountains; McDowell, Hampton, Shelby, and Cleveland are at their head, so that you know what you have to depend upon. If you choose to be degraded forever and ever by a set of mongrels, say so at once, and let your women turn their backs upon you and look out for real men to protect them.

PAT. FERGUSON,
Major 71st Regiment.

This message to Cornwallis was delayed because the carrier was pursued by some patriots, reached Cornwallis the day after the battle, and consequently no reinforcements ever reached Ferguson. Disappointed at lack of support and believing that Sumter and Clarke had joined the mountaineers, Ferguson decided to fall back toward Charlotte. On October 6 he reached the southern extremity of King's Mountain. This is a ridge about sixteen miles in length, running from a point in North Carolina southwest into York County, South Carolina. The spur now reached by Ferguson is in York County, about one and one-half miles from the North Carolina line, and about six miles from the highest elevation of the mountain. It is about six hundred yards in length and rises from a base of two hundred and fifty yards to a top from sixty to two hundred and twenty wide, offering a commanding view of the surrounding country. On this summit Ferguson camped; his intention evidently was to await reinforcements and to let the enemy find him if he could. This decision, judged by European standards of warfare, was a wise one; the shrubbery and underbrush on the sides of the mountain made an assault en masse difficult, while Ferguson's troops, well trained in the use of the bayonet, could repulse those who might reach the summit. On the other hand, the mountaineers were skilled marksmen, and the top of the mountain was "so narrow that a man standing on it may be shot from either side." The patriots also fought individually, not collectively. These facts, with alternate charges on either side of the mountain, gave them an immense advantage.

*There is no other evidence than this of violence being perpetrated by the mountain army. The first paragraph was probably intended by Ferguson to appeal to the fear of the people.

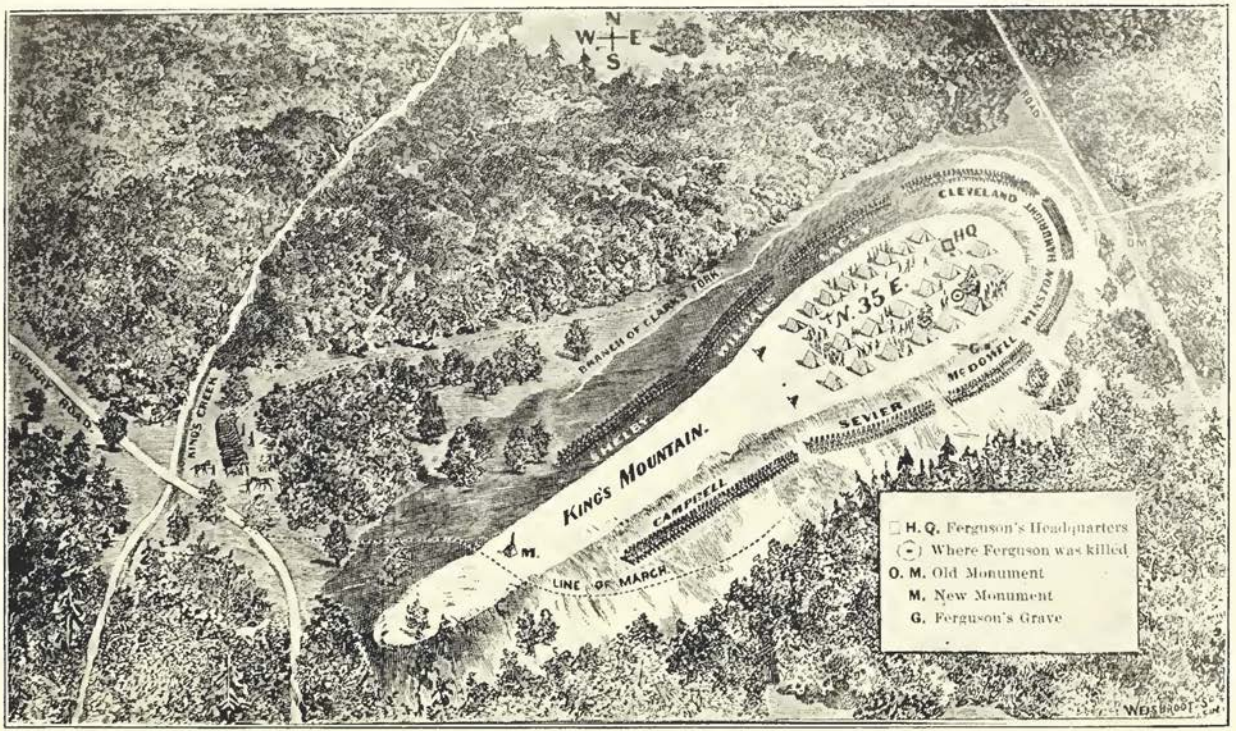
In the meantime Campbell and his men, believing that Ferguson had retired to Ninety-six, had started south in pursuit. On the evening of October 5 they reached the ford of Green River. As some were discouraged and many exhausted, a band of 700 picked men, well mounted, was chosen to continue the pursuit. The next morning news was brought by Col. Edward Lacey of Ferguson's relative position and that a body of North and South Carolina militia was moving southward from Cherry Mountain and might be met at Cowpens.* By a hurried march a junction of the two forces was accomplished. A council was held, Campbell was again chosen leader, and two hundred and ten recruits were added from the militia. A few footmen probably increased the entire number to 993 men. Then, on the night of the 6th, the march in the direction of King's Mountain was begun. Rain and darkness caused the guides to lose their way, and by morning the army had advanced not more than five miles. The rain continued until noon; but by straining every nerve King's Mountain was reached about three in the afternoon, October 7.

*There was dissension among these militia about joining the mountain army. See McCrady, South Carolina in the Revolution, pp. 764–775.



Battlefield of Kings Mountain.

Leaving the horses one mile from the base, a plan of attack in keeping with the methods of frontier warfare was adopted, viz: to surround the mountain and make alternate charges and retreats, fighting individually, each man for himself. Accordingly troops were arranged as follows: On the north side were stationed Shelby with Lacey's and Williams's militia; on the south Campbell, Sevier and Joseph McDowell, while Cleveland and Winston, with South Carolina militia under Hambright, were across the N. E. part of the hill. So quickly were these plans effected that Ferguson knew nothing of them until the fire of the attacking party was heard. The loyalists were then quickly arranged into two battle lines along the height, one to resist attack by volleys of musketry, the other to charge the enemy under the leadership of Ferguson. The patriot attack was led by Campbell's men, who ascended the most difficult part of the ridge, creeping from tree to tree and making targets of Ferguson's troops. They received the volleys from the firing line and when near the summit a bayonet charge. Before this counter attack they retreated down the mountain. But before Ferguson could regain the summit Shelby's men had ascended the opposite side of the mountain; they, in turn, retreated before a bayonet charge. When Ferguson had once more regained the summit, not only Campbell had returned to the fight but the right and left wings of the patriot army were in action. The engagement thus became general. Among the loyalists Ferguson was the commanding spirit. Riding along the ridge, making his presence known by a silver whistle, he led charge after charge against the mountain men, who simply continued the tactics with which the battle was begun. Finally, while leading an attack on Sevier's men, Ferguson fell, pierced by half a dozen bullets. Capt. Abraham DePeyster, of New York, attempted to take the place of the fallen leader. In vain, for white flags were displayed at different points and DePeyster himself soon despaired and raised the symbol of surrender. Unfortunately not all the mountaineers seem to have understood the meaning of the signal and continued their fire. Campbell deserves most credit for ending the needless slaughter; he rushed among the troops exclaiming, "Cease firing; for God's sake, cease firing!"

Thus after an hour's engagement the loyalists were thoroughly defeated. The battle had important results. It was the first decisive check to the British invasion of the Carolinas, for Cornwallis, hearing of Ferguson's defeat, concluded that the patriot army numbered several thousand and therefore fell back from Charlotte to Winnsboro, S. C. Equally important was the time thus gained by the patriots in which to rally the militia and secure aid from the Continental army for resistance to invasion. The moral effect also should not be overlooked, well summarized by Bancroft: "The victory at Kings Mountain, which in the spirit of the American soldier was like the rising at Concord, in its effects like the success at Bennington, changed the aspects of the war. It fired the patriots of the two Carolinas with fresh zeal. It encouraged the fragments of the defeated and scattered American army to seek each other and organize themselves anew. It quickened the North Carolina Legislature to earnest efforts. It encouraged Virginia to devote her resources to the country south of her border."

The story of Kings Mountain does not end with the victory. The spontaneous and individualistic character of the campaign have given rise to several controversies. Of these claims for honors and leadership among the patriots stand foremost, and this controversial spirit still survives. The services of Col. William Campbell were the earliest subject of dissension. The Legislature of Virginia voted him a sword in recognition of his part in the Kings Mountain campaign, and the North Carolina Assembly conferred a similar honor on Shelby and Sevier. None were immediately delivered; but after the death of Campbell Virginia presented a handsome sword, in commemoration of his services, to W. M. C. Preston, his grandson. This was in 1810. Shelby and Sevier then began a correspondence whose aim was to secure the swords promised but never presented by North Carolina. Comparisons of their own services with those of Campbell were made, as well as the claim that at the end of the battle Campbell was about one mile from the firing line. These questions were also discussed in the newspapers of Tennessee in 1812. Later Shelby's letters were published by Sevier's son after his father's death. They called forth a reply by W. M. C. Preston in 1822, and the next year Shelby's famous pamphlet of 1823 appeared. The general trend of the evidence seems to indicate that Shelby and Sevier were the promoters of the campaign and that Campbell, who opened the attack at Kings Mountain, left his horse in the rear with a servant, who was thus mistaken for Campbell.

A singular coincidence is a similar controversy among the loyalists. The descendants of Abraham DePeyster claim that to Ferguson does not belong the chief honor of defense, that he was killed early in the conflict, and that the command was then taken by DePeyster. While some evidence has been brought forward in support of this claim, the majority of the accounts of the battle are to the contrary and support the general view that the fall of Ferguson was almost immediately followed by tokens of surrender.

The relative importance of the McDowells in the campaign is another question full of controversy. Says one historian:

"To the brothers Charles and Joseph McDowell, of Quaker Meadows, and to their no less gallant cousin, Joseph McDowell, of Pleasant Garden, Burke County, N. C., are due more credit and honour for the victory at King's Mountain than any other leaders who participated in that decisive and wonderful battle." However, their names were not placed on the battle monument at King's Mountain.

Another problem of the battle is that of numbers. The patriot force can be estimated with some degree of certainty; it numbered about 993 men, as before stated. Not so Ferguson's command. It consisted of 100 Provincial Rangers, picked men from New York and New Jersey, and recruits from the Carolinas. The exact number is unknown. Tarleton fixes the Rangers at 100, the militia at 1,000; the diary of Allaire, the principal loyalist account of the battle, and the American official report also make the total number 1,100. Yet there is evidence that Ferguson's full strength was not in the battle; that a foraging party was sent out that morning; that it did not return until evening, when it had a skirmish with the patriots, and killed Col. James Williams. If this be true the numbers on both sides actually engaged were very nearly equal.

The losses are far more indefinite, for the official report of the patriots and private accounts differ; but a fair estimate is 300 killed and wounded and 600 prisoners for the loyalists. The losses of the patriots were insignificant; according to the official report 28 killed and 62 wounded; but these returns, tabulated by regiments, do not include Shelby's command.

By far the most delicate problem of the campaign was the treatment of the prisoners. Civil war is the most severe of all wars. During the battle kinsmen and neighbors were arraigned against one another and in some instances brother fought brother. Resentment and enmity naturally continued after the battle was ended. The march of the patriots homeward was begun the day after battle. On October 11 Colonel Campbell was constrained to issue the following order: "I must request the officers of all ranks in the army to endeavor to restrain the disorderly manner of slaughtering and disturbing the prisoners. If it can not be prevented by moderate measures, such effectual punishment shall be executed upon delinquents as will put a stop to it." However, there was another incentive to vengeance besides the cruelty and hatred of the conqueror, viz: the character of some of the captives. According to a statement submitted to Colonel Campbell, some were robbers, house burners, murderers and parole breakers. Moreover, news came of the atrocities committed by Tarleton's Legion. A desire arose to retaliate against British policy, to punish wrongdoers, and to warn loyalists everywhere. Therefore, while the army was encamped at Bickerstaff's, about nine miles from Rutherfordton, Colonel Campbell, on the advice of other leaders, ordered a court-martial to sit immediately, composed of field officers and captains, who were ordered to inquire into the complaints which had been made. For this hasty action a precedent was found in a North Carolina law which authorized two magistrates to summon a jury, conduct a trial, and even impose capital penalties. As most of the officers were magistrates at home, the tribunal hastily organized, had something of the character of a civil as well as military court. According to Shelby "thirty-six men were tried and found guilty of breaking open houses, killing the men, turning the women and children out of doors, and burning the houses." Naturally the rules of evidence which protect the prisoner were not strictly observed. The number condemned is variously reported, ranging from thirty to forty. Fortunately all were not executed; after nine had been hanged, the sense of mercy was aroused, and either by Campbell's orders or a reconsideration by the court, the sentence of the remaining prisoners was rescinded. Circumstances helped to bring a kinder fate to most of the captives. Many were paroled, as many as 100 on the second day after the battle. The mountain men were anxious to reach their homes as quickly as possible, and the hasty march and the wet weather helped many to escape. As there was no prison at hand, the Moravian village of Bethabara was chosen as a place to house and keep the captives until orders should be received from the proper authorities. There they were led by Campbell to await orders from the American army. Gates ordered them to be taken to the Lead Mines in Montgomery County, Virginia. But the commanding officer there objected, as the loyalists were strong in the neighborhood. Governor Jefferson, of Virginia, was then consulted; he referred the matter to the Continental Congress, and Congress referred the care of the prisoners to the States from which they came. This was impractical and Gates finally ordered them to be transferred to Salisbury, N. C., for imprisonment. In the meantime conditions at Bethabara favored the prisoners. The Moravians were friendly and the civil authorities, under guise of binding over to court, took 187 from the camp. Others enlisted in the patriot militia; some faithfully, others as a means to get back to the British lines. So when the prisoners arrived at Salisbury the original number of 600 had been reduced in various ways to 60.

The sources of the material for the study of the battle are of course responsible for these controversies. The patriot leaders drew up an official report shortly after the conflict but private accounts written by them differ from it in many details. The official report, some nonofficial descriptions, and the diary of Anthony Allaire, the principal loyalist source, are given in Draper's Kings Mountain and Its Heroes. But a large number of manuscripts in possession of the Tennessee Historical Society and the Gates collection in the New York Historical Society remain unpublished.

Bibliography. Draper, Kings Mountain and Its Heroes is by far the most important study of the battle and its problems. Roosevelt's Winning of the West contains a well written and critical chapter on the subject. McCready, South Carolina in the Revolution; DePeyster, The Affair at Kings Mountain (Magazine of American History, vol. 5), and Schenck's North Carolina, 1780-81, are of interest and value. From these references to magazine articles and pamphlets are easily traced. See also Bailey, Sketch of the Life and Career of Col. James D. Williams (Cowpens, S. C.)

SCHOOLS AND EDUCATION IN COLONIAL TIMES.*

BY CHARLES LEE SMITH.

During the colonial period but few schools were established in North Carolina. Compared with New England there is a marked difference in this respect, and historians, without considering all the facts in the case, have unduly criticised this colony for want of zeal in educational matters.

It should be remembered that New England was peopled by colonies, and the establishment of schools was coeval with the settlements. The people were forced by circumstances to live together. This strengthened the bonds of union between them and tended to unite them in all objects relating to the common welfare. Then, too, the people of each community were generally of the same religious faith, and their preachers were at the same time the teachers of their schools.

In North Carolina conditions were radically different. This province was occupied by individual families, and although the first permanent settlement was made about 1660 there was no town until Bath was located in 1704. The population was chiefly confined to the territory north of Albemarle Sound, west of the Chowan River, and the territory between the two sounds, Albemarle and Currituck. The people were scattered sparsely here and there along the shores of the sounds and on the banks of the water courses. As late as 1709 the Rev. William Gordon, writing to the secretary of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, referring to the settlement on the Pamlico River, has this to say of the only town in the province: "Here is no church, though they have begun to build a town called Bath.

* For a fuller account of the colonial schools, see the writer's History of Education in North Carolina. Bureau of Education: Washington, 1888.

It consists of about twelve houses, being the only town in the whole province. They have a small collection of books for a library, which were carried over by the Reverend Doctor Bray, and some land is laid out for a glebe." [1] About this time Beaufort was laid out for a town, and a little later New Bern was settled by the Swiss. The settlers represented many nationalities and religious sects: "Scotch Presbyterians, Dutch Lutherans, French Calvinists, Irish Catholics, English Chuchmen, Quakers and Dissenters." Scattered settlements and religious dissensions not only made impossible the village schools of New England but prevented any comprehensive social educational development.

During the proprietary period schools were neglected, the government making no provision for their maintenance. But it must not be understood that the inhabitants were in dense ignorance and wholly devoid of educational facilities for, as Vass shows, "there were many highly educated citizens scattered throughout the province who lived with considerable style and refinement." [2]

The first public library in North Carolina was established at Bath. It was the gift of Doctor Bray, who was appointed commissary by the Bishop of London in 1692.[3] The earliest account of teachers is the report of John Blair, who came as a missionary in 1704. He states that the settlers had built small churches in three precincts and had appointed a lay reader in each, who was supplied by him with books from the library.[4] We infer that these lay readers were schoolmasters from a statement by John Brickell, who visited the various settlements in the early part of the eighteenth century and published in Dublin in 1737 the Natural History of North Carolina, with an Account of the Trade, Manners and

[1] N. C, Colonial Records, Vol. I, p. 715.
[2] Vass's Eastern North Carolina, p. 21.
[3] N. C. Colonial Records, Vol. I, p. 571 et seq.
[4] N. C. Colonial Records, Vol. I, p. 601.

Customs of the Christian and Indian Inhabitants. Noting the scarcity of clergymen he adds that "the want of these Protestant clergy is generally supplied by some schoolmasters who read the Liturgy, and then a sermon out of Dr. Tillotson or some good, practical divine every Sunday. These are the most numerous and are dispersed through the whole province." [5]

About 1705 Charles Griffin came from some part of the West Indies to Pasquotank and opened a school which was patronized by all classes. Rev. William Gordon, who came from England as a missionary in 1708, in a letter to the secretary of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, written in 1709, alludes to the fact that the Quakers in Pasquotank were sending their children to the school of a lay reader of the church named Griffin.[6] About this time Rev. Mr. Gordon established a church in Chowan Precinct, at the head of Albemarle Sound, in the settlement which afterwards became Edenton. Rev. James Adams having settled in Pasquotank, the school in that settlement was transferred to him. Mr. Griffin was now, at the instance of Mr. Gordon, elected lay reader of the church and clerk of the Chowan vestry. He opened a school in that parish, text-books for the pupils being furnished by the rector.[7] In a letter dated "Chowan, in North Carolina, July 25, 1712," the Rev. G. Rainsford, a missionary of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, tells of conferences with Thomas Hoyle, King of the Chowan Indians, who was inclined to embrace Christianity "and proposes to send his son to school to Sarum to have him taught to read and write by way of foundation in order to a farther proficiency for the reception of Christianity," and adds: "There's one Mr. Washburn who keeps a school at Sarum, on the frontiers of Virginia, between the two governments and neighboring upon two Indian towns who, I find by him, highly deserves encouragement, and could heartily wish the Society would take it into consideration and be pleased to allow him a salary for the good services he has done and may do for the future. * * * The man upon a small income would teach the Indian children gratis (whose parents are willing to send them could they but pay for their schooling) as he would those of our English families had he but a fixed dependency for so doing, and what advantage would this be to private families in particular and the whole colony in general is easy to determine." [8]

[5] Brickell's North Carolina, p. 35.
[6] N. C. Colonial Records, Vol. I, p. 714.
[7] N. C. Colonial Records, Vol. I, pp. 684, 712, 714.

A careful examination of the records of the colony while under proprietary government shows but one instance in which help was afforded to literature. This was an act[9] for the preservation of the library given by Doctor Bray, to which reference has been made. This act provided that a librarian should be appointed, that catalogues should be prepared, and that, under certain conditions, books might be taken from the library, fines to be paid if not returned within a specified time. The only author in the colony during this period, so far as is known, was the Surveyor-General Lawson, who wrote a history of the colony which was first published in 1709.

The above account represents the state of education under the rule of the Lords Proprietors. While the school advantages of the masses were limited, the governors, judges, councilors, lawyers and clergy, who were educated in England, furnish evidence from their letters and other documents that there was no deficiency of learning among the higher classes. Such men as Gale, Moseley and Swann were fit associates for the most intelligent men in any of the English provinces of their day. Libraries at Bath and Edenton contained many valuable books, showing that those who read them had cultivated minds.

[8] N. C. Colonial Records, Vol. I, p. 859.
[9] Laws of North Carolina, Davis's Revisal (New Bern, 1752), p. 203.

At the date of the transfer of authority from the Lords Proprietors to the Crown the population numbered about thirty thousand, and during the first twenty years of royal rule the educational condition of the masses was but little changed. Families of means maintained tutors, while some sent their sons to Harvard and other colleges in the Northern colonies. The early governors of the province had little desire to promote popular education, but Gabriel Johnson, appointed in 1734, was an exception to the rule. He was the first to recommend that the Assembly make provision for schools, but his efforts were without avail.

The first legislative enactment for the promotion of schools was the bill to erect a schoolhouse in Edenton, passed by the General Assembly which met in New Bern April 8-20, 1745.[10] The first act to establish a free school was passed in 1749,[11] but the first school really established by the government was the one located at New Bern in 1764. The New Bern school was incorporated in 1766, being the first incorporated academy in the province. It was provided that the master should be a communicant of the Established Church of England, and that "a duty of one penny per gallon on all rum or spirituous liquors imported into the river Neuse" should be collected from the importers for seven years after the passage of the act, this fund to be used for the education of ten poor children and to enable the master to keep an assistant.[12] Prior to the Revolution this school was under the control of the Established Church, and for that reason it was not favorably regarded by dissenters, many of them preferring to send their sons to the Presbyterian schools of the [10] N. C. Colonial Records, Vol. IV, pp. 783, 788, 790.

[11] N. C. Colonial Records, Vol. IV, p. 977.
[12] Davis's Sec. Revisal (New Bern, 1773), p. 359.

Piedmont section. In 1770 the Edenton Academy, under the control of the Established Church, was incorporated.

During the colonial period two noteworthy bequests were made for schools: that of James Winwright, in 1744, to establish a free school in Beaufort, and that of James Innis who, by his will made in 1754 and duly proved before Governor Dobbs in 1759, made provision for a free school for the benefit of the youth of the province.[13] From this last bequest the Innis Academy, of Wilmington, had its origin. This school was incorporated in 1759 with Samuel Ashe, A. McLain, William Hill and others as trustees.

Of the thirty thousand Germans who left their country in the early part of the eighteenth century to find homes in America eighteen thousand are said to have eventually settled in North Carolina. Baron DeGraffenried with his Swiss and Palatines settled in New Bern. Later German immigration settled principally in the Piedmont section.

In 1751 the religious sect known as the Unitas Fratrum, commonly called Moravians, purchased one hundred thousand acres of land in Western Carolina, and in 1753 began their settlement, which from that time to this has been noted as one of the most moral, prosperous and intelligent communities in the commonwealth. Salem, their principal town, was laid out in 1765.

These Germans, as a class, were men of fair education and refinement, especially the Moravians. The latter, even before homes for all had been provided, erected a church and schoolhouse. One of the most noted of these early Moravian immigrants was John Jacob Fries, who came in 1754. He was a native of Denmark, where, previous to his coming to America, he had officiated as an assistant minister and was widely known as an accomplished scholar. He was one of the pioneer teachers of North Carolina, in which vocation he continued until his death in 1793.

[13] Coon's Public Education in North Carolina, Vol. I, pp. 1-7.

No marked educational advancement became manifest until the arrival of the Scotch-Irish who began to settle in the Cape Fear region, in large numbers, in the second quarter of the eighteenth century. This immigration continued till the Revolution, the newcomers bringing with them in great measure the same spirit that prompted the establishing of Icolumkill and Lindisfarne. From their arrival dates the impulse for the establishment of schools throughout the colony. For the most part they were disciples of John Knox, and about 1745 the New York and Pennsylvania Synods of the Presbyterian Church began to send missionaries to this colony.

It is to the Presbyterian Church that North Carolina owes the establishment of her first classical schools, and it is to that denomination and Princeton College that the higher education in this State owes its first impulse. The Presbyterian missionaries, usually graduates of Princeton, became both pastors and teachers. They gathered the scattered families of their faith into churches, and by the side of the church was planted a school.

During the second half of the eighteenth century the following, who were graduated at Princeton before 1776, were influential in the educational development of North Carolina: Hugh McAden, Alexander Martin, Alexander McWhorter, Samuel Spencer, Joseph Alexander, David Caldwell, John Close, Waightstill Avery, Ephraim Brevard, Adlai Osborne, Thomas Reese, Isaac Alexander, James Templeton, Andrew King, Stephen Bloomer Balch, James Hall, David Witherspoon, John Ewing Calhoun and Thomas B. Craighead. In 1776 Nathaniel Macon was a student at Princeton, but owing to the war he abandoned a college course that he might actively serve his country.

In 1760 Crowfield Academy was opened in Mecklenburg

County, about two miles from where Davidson College now stands. It is probable this was the first classical school in the province. About this time the Rev. James Tate, a Presbyterian minister from Ireland, established a classical school at Wilmington. Other well-known Presbyterian schools of this period were Rev. Henry Patillo's school in Orange County and Clio's Nursery, taught by Rev. James Hall, D.D., in Iredell County.

The most illustrious name in the educational history of the province is that of Rev. David Caldwell, D.D. In 1766 or 1767 he established a classical school in Guilford County, at that time the northeastern part of Rowan County, about three miles from where Greensboro now stands. It soon became one of the most noted schools in the South, and for many years "Dr. Caldwell's log cabin served North Carolina as an academy, a college and a theological seminary."

The most noted school for higher education in North Carolina during the colonial period was Queen's College, also known as Queen's Museum, located at Charlotte, and its history is interesting as a bold and vigorous effort for the promotion of learning under the most discouraging circumstances. The beginnings of this institution are found in the classical school established in 1767 by the Rev. Joseph Alexander and a Mr. Benedict at the Sugar Creek Presbyterian Church near Charlotte. The community in which this school was located was noted for its intelligence. The school flourished, and to meet the demands of a growing and prosperous community it was decided to enlarge its scope. Queen's College became the successor of Alexander's school. An act entitled "An act for founding, establishing and endowing of Queen's College, in the town of Charlotte, in Mecklenburg County" was passed by the Assembly which met in New Bern on December 5, 1770. It was twice chartered by the Legislature and twice repealed by royal proclamation. The royal government as a rule favored no institutions not under the control of the Church of England, but notwithstanding royal disfavor Queen's College continued to flourish. It is probable the name was changed to Liberty Hall Academy in 1775, as the trustees did not care to continue the royal name where British authority had refused a charter. The coveted recognition came at last, but it was under the blessings of liberty and not by the King's favor. In the first year of American independence the Legislature of North Carolina, as the representative of the sovereign authority of a free State, granted a charter to Liberty Hall Academy.

SOME NORTH CAROLINA HEROINES OF THE REVOLUTION.

BY RICHARD DILLARD, M.D.

Honore de Balzac wisely remarks that "every man should dissect at least one woman." She stands in direct antithesis to man, and how little even yet does he understand the delicacy of her tissues, the quality and temper of her nerve ganglia, the gentleness and generosity of her impulses, the beauty and strength and depth of her devotion; her voice is as the sweetest lute, her place her home; her shrine is the heart of man.

We all admire the character of Deborah who led the Israelitish hosts to battle, and her song of victory and thanksgiving still remains one of the most beautiful specimens of ancient Hebrew poetry. At break of dawn Mary Magdalene sought the sepulcher, and it was her commission to announce the glad tidings of the resurrection; her joyful cry, "He is risen! He is risen"! has come rolling down the ages, and woman is still bringing us messages of joy and peace and hope. We love to read of the devotion of Ruth to Naomi, and how Rizpah watched and guarded the bodies of her dead kinsmen for six long months under the skies of Palestine, "from the beginning of the barley harvest until water dropped upon them out of heaven"; and there was Artemissia, too, who, dazed by grief and in the anguish of despair, ate the heart of her dead husband that his love might be buried forever in her. All history and every age resounds with her deeds of heroism, her prowess, her beauty and her virtues.

The honor belongs to woman for the discovery of the arts of drawing and painting, for when Debrinades, the Sycionian, was taking leave of her lover, about to start for war, with the aid of a candle and a piece of charcoal she sketched his profile upon the wall of her father's house; this she afterwards perfected to comfort her in his absence, and it became the first picture. Then there are Iphigenia, Irene of Constantinople, Semiramis the wonderful, Zenobia the beautiful, Joan d'Arc the heroic, Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, the benefactress of mankind, and Angustura the maid of Saragossa, immortalized by Byron in Childe Harold who, snatching a crucifix from a priest and a sword from the hand of her dying lover, rallied the wavering Spanish legions and led them on to victory. These, all these, shall live as long as noble deeds and human records last! So much by way of introduction, let us now shift the scene to the women of the American Revolution, and particularly to those of our own State.

Beginning at the barren sand dunes of Currituck listen to my story of "Betsey Dowdy's Ride."

The bright lightwood fire from Joe Dowdy's cottage gleamed far out across the marshes in the chill December air, the cold north wind moaned like a wraith under the low built eaves, and the surf thundered ponderously along Currituck beach. It was an unfriendly night, and Joe Dowdy sat with his pipe in the chimney corner looking vacantly into the fire, now and then kicking it with his coarse boots and sending meteoric showers of dancing, gleeful sparks pell-mell up the chimney.

Betsey Dowdy and her mother sat silently carding wool for their winter clothes. The furniture of the room was entirely incongruous with the surroundings, and was evidently treasure trove from the sea; the easy chair in which Joe Dowdy was sitting had evidently been plundered from the grand salon of some ship, which unhappy fate had driven upon the inhospitable beach.

Joe Dowdy was a wrecker, and lived principally upon his salvage from the sea, and a rough, jolly fellow he was, broad-shouldered and ruddy-cheeked—the most daring of all who dwelt along the coast.

His only daughter, Betsey, was of his same heroic mould. In her isolated home she had but little contact with the outside world, but was passionately fond of books and greedily devoured every one which chance threw into her hands, most of which were of a romantic character. No wonder then that she early developed and cherished the idea that she was the child of Fate, and destined to perform some great heroic deed. Already, during a storm, had she plucked a tiny life from the fury of the downpouring seas.

There was a sharp knock at the door, and without ceremony in stalked old Sam Jarvis, long-haired and bearded like a saint, he had come from the mainland in his canoe to fetch the news, and Betsey listened eager-eyed to his story, as he told in detail of Colonel Howe's badly equipped, poorly drilled troops; of Captain Benbury's delay in sending forward supplies, and of Captain Vail's company composed of those fine dressed fellows from Edenton, whom he did not believe would fight at all; that a battle was imminent at Great Bridge, and if Dunmore were successful he would immediately invade Eastern North Carolina; their homes would be destroyed, their goodly lands laid waste, and they would be nothing but British slaves again. And then the conversation turned to old Nick Lindsay, the infamous Tory of the neighborhood, for everybody was indignant at the way he made fun of the Patriot army and carried news to the British commander on the sly; and besides, he lived on the mainland very near the highway, and kept a pack of dogs just to annoy everybody who passed, and when Betsey heard all that her cheeks burned and she hated him in her heart.

And her father agreed with Sam Jarvis that the situation was very desperate, and unless something was done immediately, all would be lost; and they both said, too, that Gen.

William Skinner, of Yeopim, was the man of the hour, and if only he could be communicated with at once the invasion might be checked, but he lived over fifty miles away, and that would be impossible on such a night, either by land or by water. Betsey finally went off to bed—but not to sleep, for something urged her to go to General Skinner that night; she felt that the supreme moment of her destiny had arrived; so after thoroughly maturing her plans she crept to the door; all was still and silent in the house; she raised her only window, and in a moment more had saddled her pony and was galloping off down the beach to a ford across Currituck Sound to the mainland.

Good St. Agnes protect such a child, on such a mission, on such a night! Now Betsey knew it would be high tide about 12 o'clock, and it was her object to reach the ford before the water was too deep to cross. It was a full half-hour of suspense and anxiety as she swept all unheeded by fishermen's huts, sand dunes and across the heath to her goal. She halted at the water's edge; she had miscalculated; the tide was at half-flood and rising rapidly! A girlish dread came over her; a moment's hesitation, but 'twas no time to waver, down she rode into the water up to her pony's knees. The night hung like a darksome pall over horse and rider; she spurs her pony and he plunges forward, now up to his haunches, now the saddle skirts drag in the water—he swims—she shivers, leans forward, and firmly grasps his mane. Now Betsey knew the sagacity of these wiry little banker ponies; it was a natural instinct in them to swim, so she gave him loose reins, and as he was bearing her bravely she lifted her eyes above and thought how the children of Israel had passed through the Red Sea, and her purpose and her faith forsook her not, for she knew that the Lord of Hosts was with her. The pony reels and flounders; but no, he is in the shoal water of the other side. A few moments more they stood upon the mainland, dripping and cold. Another difficulty now beset her way, another dragon was to be passed. Old Nick Lindsay, the Tory, lived but two miles further up the road, and she dreaded that he might interrupt her in some way and thwart her purpose, for he was always on the watch to see what the Patriots were doing; so just before she reached his gate she made a dash with her pony—just then over the fence bolted the whole pack of curs after her—old Nick threw open his door and hailed. Speed Betsey, speed, like Roderick's henchmen to Lanric Mead! Speed Betsey, speed! Down the road they went, rider and horse and dogs. You would have thought John Gilpin was repeating his famous turnpike ride that very night. Old Nick discharged his musket, and the lead showered all over them, but she sped on, and it was not until a turn in the road had been reached a mile further on did she hear old Nick harking back his dogs, for she had beaten the race. She and her pony were now dry, and warm and comfortable. All during the night she would halt and listen, sometimes she would seem to hear the booming of a cannon afar off, but she swerved not in her purpose. The air was crisp and clear, and the frozen road fairly resounded beneath her pony's hoofs as she galloped past houses dark and gray and silent, through cornfields white with frost, and dismal woodland, through endless swamps and over long bridges, and sometimes she heard strange noises and thought she saw figures crouching in the road to seize her; but when she reached the county of John Harvey she gave a sigh of relief, for she knew he had inspired the whole neighborhood with patriotism. Many a time she came to a fork in the road and knew not which one to take, but she gave her pony the reins and let him decide, and he was always right for Fate was guiding them. Day was now beginning to dawn in the east, the morning star grew pale, and when the sun arose she was crossing the float bridge at Phelps's Point, now called Hertford. She fell into a pleasant reverie as she thought how General Skinner would thank her and welcome her to his house, and then she fancied just how the old warrior would look in his gaudy uniform with gold epaulets upon his broad shoulders and of the comfort and the warmth, and she leant over, and tenderly caressing her pony said, "Go on—go on, my pet, we'll be there soon." Another hour brought her to General Skinner's headquarters. Her message was delivered, immediate relief was promised—seven hours of hunger, fatigue, suspense—more than fifty miles had been bravely covered. Her mission was ended, and Betsey Dowdy's fame soon rang through the land.

All along the route as she returned home the next day she heard guns and saw bonfires, and flags waving, and her heart sank at first, for she thought the British invasion was surely at hand; but the people were rejoicing, the battle of Great Bridge had been fought and won, and Dunmore was rapidly evacuating Norfolk.

For many a day the people along the road, which Betsey Dowdy traversed, talked about the wild-mad horseback rider who sped by their houses like the Erl King after midnight. Old Nick Lindsay the Tory died suddenly that very night, and as for Tom Bob Ansell he declared to his dying day "'Twan't no horseman at all, only Old Nick's spirit a-flying away with them durned Britishers."

And this is the story of Betsey Dowdy, and how she carried the news to General Skinner, and that was how they brought the good news from Ghent to Aix: "The news which alone could save Aix from her fate."

The daring exploit of Mrs. Mary Slocumb is dear to the heart of every North Carolinian. She dreamed one night that she saw the Patriot army defeated, and the mangled body of her husband lying uner a certain tree upon the battle-field; the scene was so vivid that she determined to go to her husband that night at all hazard; so, leaving her only child in the care of a slave, she rode all that night and a part of the next day, but when she arrived upon the field of battle the British had been defeated, and her husband wounded in a charge, but not seriously. All that day she nursed the dying and the wounded, and returned home in safety. Mrs. Slocumb and her gallant husband lie buried beneath modest slabs on their old plantation, but in the summer of 1907 a splendid monument was unveiled to her and other heroic women of the Revolution, near the very spot where she nursed and cared for the wounded patriots.

It is a handsome base of blue granite surmounted by a statue of a beautiful heroic woman, in Italian marble, the inscriptions on the different sides of the monument are as follows: "This monument was erected by the Moore's Creek Monumental Association in the year 1907." "Most honored of the names recorded by this historic association is that of Mary Slocumb, wife of Lieut. Slocumb, riding alone at night sixty-five miles to succor the wounded on this battlefield. Her heroism and self-sacrifice place her high on the pages of history, and should awaken in successive generations true patriotism and love of country." "To the honored memory of the heroic women of the lower Cape Fear during the American Revolution—1775-1781." "Unswerving in devotion, self-sacrificing in loyalty to the cause of their country, their works do follow them, and their children rise up and call them blessed."

The name of Flora MacDonald must not be omitted from the list of North Carolina heroines of the Revolution. Foote tersely remarks that "Massachusetts had her Lady Arabella, Virginia her Pocahontas and North Carolina her Flora MacDonald." Had Flora MacDonald espoused the cause of the Patriots, as she should have consistently done, instead of aiding the British cause, she would have written her name higher than any woman in our history; but to use her own words, after she returned to Scotland, referring to the failure of the two great enterprises of her life, she said: "I have hazarded my life for the House of Stuart, and for the House of Hanover, and I do not see that I am a great gainer by either." It is to the British historian therefore that she must look for the glorification of her name.

A complete roster of the Revolutionary heroines of North Carolina is beyond the scope of this short sketch, and the reader must be content with the bare mention of many of the most prominent names, such as Mrs. Robin Wilson, the heroine of Steel Creek, Rachel Caldwell, Elizabeth Steele, Margaret Caruthers, Ann Fergus, Sarah Logan, Margaret McBride and Mrs. Willie Jones.

The Virginian points with pride to the stone which marks the site of the Colonial Capitol at Williamsburg, upon which is inscribed the resolution of Jefferson and others declaring they would drink no more tea, or use any stuffs of British manufacture. Both the men and women of Boston signed similar resolves, but the "Edenton Tea Party"—where will you find its parallel? Published and discussed in the English newspapers, cartooned by the most famous caricaturists of the day, ridiculed by the Tories as "Edenton Female Artillery"; I have said it once and I say it again, we can not eulogize too highly the action of those brave women, and particularly Penelope Barker, one of the most unique and interesting figures which masqueraded in our past. A maker of history, herself a great political character, she inaugurated and led a movement which takes a prominent place along with those acts of unselfishness, self-denial and patriotism which led up to the American Revolution.

Very few people know that the first martyr of the Revolution was on account of tea. After those patriotic outbursts at Boston on account of the "Tea tax" there were a few who defied public opinion. Among them was a man named Theophilus Lillie and his associate, one Richardson, who continued to import and sell tea. This came near producing a riot, and Richardson was attacked by boys in the street, pelting him with dirt and stones. He discharged his old musket into the crowd, killing a lad named Snyder. Young Snyder's death produced a profound impression all over the country, and he was at once proclaimed the first martyr to the cause of liberty. His funeral was the largest ever seen in Boston. Upon his coffin was the inscription "Innocence itself is not safe," and was borne by six of his fellows, followed by a procession of five hundred school children and fifteen hundred citizens. All this is by the way.

A public-spirited and patriotic citizen of Edenton, Mr. Frank Wood, has marked with an appropriate memorial (a huge bronze teapot surmounting a Revolutionary cannon), the site of that "Edenton Tea Party, Oct. 25, 1774"; a monument to those fifty-one women who helped to make our commonwealth possible. There it stands a perpetual inspiration to noble deeds and virtuous actions, and thither, as to a fountain, future generations repairing from its brazen urn shall draw light and liberty, for "To the souls of fire I, Pallas Athene, give more fire, and to those who are manful I give a might more than man's."

BIOGRAPHICAL AND GENEALOGICAL MEMORANDA.

COMPILED AND EDITED BY MRS. E. E. MOFFITT.

MISS BETTIE FRESHWATER POOL.

Miss Bettie Freshwater Pool, who wrote the poem "Carolina," which appears in this issue of the BOOKLET, was born at the Pool homestead in Pasquotank County, near Elizabeth City, and was the ninth child of George D. and Elizabeth (Fletcher) Pool. This old Colonial home had been in that family for generations and was a beautiful place. "The building of spacious dimensions" was surrounded by extensive grounds shaded by a variety of magnificent trees.

The Pools were for many years among the most prominent citizens of Pasquotank and have given many brilliant and useful sons and daughters to North Carolina. They came from England early in the eighteenth century and settled in that county. Patrick Pool in 1760 took up a large grant of land from his kinsman, John, Earl of Granville, which was situated in both Virginia and this State. He was the great-great-grandfather of the subject of this sketch.

Miss Pool at the early age of eight surprised her father by her remarkable verses, which she repeated as she sat on his knee. Her vivid imagination revealed itself in the composition of stories and rhymes before she could even read or write. Her unusual gift, displayed by reciting these, won for her the name of "The story teller" among youthful companions.

A severe accident when a child rendered her an invalid for twenty years, during which time she was unable to attend school; hence she is almost entirely self-educated. Stories were written to while away the tedious hours. These appeared later in a little volume entitled "The Eyrie and Other Southern Stories." They are well written and full of interest.

Besides this work Miss Pool has written and published "Under Brazilian Skies," a love story of the tropics. Several songs, among them "My Love is All Around Thee," "The Banks of the Old Pasquotank" and "Carolina," have been composed by her and set to music.

During the last session of the General Assembly a bill was introduced to adopt this as a State song. It was read by one of the members in the Senate amid hearty applause, and the poem was recorded in the journal of the Senate. It has been pronounced by some to be superior to the other two State songs. We publish the entire poem in this issue.

Sketch of Prof. W. K. Boyd, author of "Battle of Kings Mountain," in this number of the BOOKLET, appeared in Vol. VII, No. 3, January, 1908.

Sketch of Dr. Richard Dillard, author of "Some North Carolina Heroines of the Revolution," in this number of the BOOKLET, appeared in Vol. VI, No. 2, October, 1906.

CHARLES LEE SMITH.

For the following sketch of the writer of the article on Schools and Education in Colonial Times, which appears in this issue, we are indebted to Who's Who in America.

Charles Lee Smith, son of Louis Turner Smith, M.D., and Nannie Green Smith, neé Howell, was born at Wilton, Granville County, N. C., August 29, 1865; graduated from Wake Forest College, 1884; teacher in Raleigh Male Academy and associate editor of Biblical Recorder, 1884-1885; graduate student at Johns Hopkins University (Ph.D., 1889) and in Germany, 1885-89; at Johns Hopkins, was successively University Scholar, Fellow in History and Politics, instructor in History, and lecturer on Sociology; while a member of the faculty of Johns Hopkins (1888-1891), was also secretary of the Baltimore Charity Organization Society (1889-91) and secretary of the National Conference of Charities and Correction (1889-90); married, October 24, 1889, to Sallie Lindsay Jones, High Point, N. C.; professor of History and Political Science in William Jewell College, 1891-1905; Gay Lecturer in Southern Baptist Theological Seminary, 1901; president of Mercer University, 1905-1906; in 1906, Wake Forest College conferred on him the honorary degree of LL.D.; since 1906, he has been a member of the Edwards & Broughton Printing Company, Raleigh, N. C.

Dr. Smith is a contributor to leading periodicals and the author of The History of Education in North Carolina, The Money Question, etc. Governor Kitchin recently appointed him a member of the Library Commission of North Carolina, which was created by Act of the last Legislature.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

Volume VIII

PAGE.

John Harvey 3-42
By Mr. R. D. W. Connor.

Military Organizations of North Carolina During the American Revolution 43-55
By Clyde L. King, A.M.

A Sermon by Reverend George Micklejohn..... 57-78
Edited by Mr. R. D. W. Connor.

Biographical and Genealogical Memoranda: R. D. W. Connor, Clyde L. King, Marshall DeLancey Haywood..... 79-83
By Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

Abstracts of Wills: Gambell, Gough, Flovell, Glaister, Gourley, Gordin, Haywood, Horn..... 84-85
By Mrs. Helen DeB. Wells.

Illustration: Harvey Coat of Arms.
Convention of 1835..... 89-110
By Associate Justice Henry G. Connor.

The Life and Services of Brigadier-General Jethro Sumner.....111-140
By Kemp P. Battle, LL.D.

The Significance of the Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence 141-148
By Prof. Bruce Craven.

Biographical and Genealogical Memoranda: Judge Henry Groves Connor, Kemp Plummer Battle, LL.D., Bruce Craven.....149-151
By Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

Information Concerning the Patriotic Society D. R..... 152
The Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence.....155-202
By Mr. A. S. Salley, Jr.

The Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence..... 203-248
By Prof. Bruce Craven.

Mr. Salley's Reply.....249-253

Mr. Craven's Rejoinder.....254-256

Biographical and Genealogical Memoranda: Bruce Craven, Alexander Samuel Salley, Jr., and Patriotic Objects.....257-261
By Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

Information Concerning the Patriotic Society D. R..... 262
Illustration: Photographic Fac-simile of the Contemporary Moravian Church Record, 1775.

Ceremonies Attending Unveiling of Tablet, Oct. 24, 1908.....265-297

Carolina 298

Battle Kings Mountain 299-315
By W. K. Boyd.

Schools in Colonial Times.....316-324
By Charles Lee Smith.

Some North Carolina Heroines of the Revolution.....325-333
By Richard Dillard.

Biographical and Genealogical Memoranda: Bettie Freshwater Pool, William K. Boyd, Charles Lee Smith, Richard Dillard....334-336

Information Concerning Patriotic Society D. R.

INFORMATION

Concerning the Patriotic Society

"Daughters of the Revolution"

The General Society was founded October 11, 1890,—and organized August 20, 1891,—under the name of "Daughters of the American Revolution"; was incorporated under the laws of the State of New York as an organization national in its work and purpose. Some of the members of this organization becoming dissatisfied with the terms of entrance, withdrew from it and, in 1891, formed under the slightly differing name "Daughters of the Revolution," eligibility to which from the moment of its existence has been lineal descent from an ancestor who rendered patriotic service during the War of Independence.

"The North Carolina Society"

a subdivision of the General Society, was organized in October, 1896, and has continued to promote the purposes of its institution and to observe the Constitution and By-Laws.

Membership and Qualifications

Any woman shall be eligible who is above the age of eighteen years, of good character, and a lineal descendant of an ancestor who (1) was a signer of the Declaration of Independence, a member of the Continental Congress, Legislature or General Court, of any of the Colonies or States; or (2) rendered civil, military or naval service under the authority of any of the thirteen Colonies, or of the Continental Congress; or (3) by service rendered during the War of the Revolution became liable to the penalty of treason against the government of Great Britain: Provided, that such ancestor always remained loyal to the cause of American Independence.

The chief work of the North Carolina Society for the past seven years has been the publication of the "North Carolina Booklet," a quarterly publication on great events in North Carolina history—Colonial and Revolutionary. $1.00 per year. It will continue to extend its work and to spread the knowledge of its History and Biography in other States.

This Society has its headquarters in Raleigh, N. C., Room 411, Carolina Trust Company Building, 232 Fayetteville Street.

Vol. IX JULY, 1909 No. 1

The North Carolina Booklet

"Carolina! Carolina! Heaven's blessings attend her!
While we live we will cherish, protect and defend her."

Published by
THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY
DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION

The object of the Booklet is to aid in developing and preserving North Carolina History. The proceeds arising from its publication will be devoted to patriotic purposes. Editors.

ADVISORY BOARD OF THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET.

Mrs. Spier Whitaker.
Professor D. H. Hill.
Mr. W. J. Peele.
Professor E. P. Moses.
Dr. Kemp P. Battle.
Mr. Marshall DeLancey Haywood.
Mr. R. D. W. Connor.
Dr. E. W. Sikes.
Dr. Richard Dillard.
Mr. James Sprunt.
Judge Walter Clark.

EDITORS:
Miss Mary Hilliard Hinton, Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

OFFICERS OF THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION, 1906–1908.

REGENT:
Mrs. E. E. MOFFITT.

VICE-REGENT:
Mrs. WALTER CLARK.

HONORARY REGENT:
Mrs. SPIER WHITAKER.

RECORDING SECRETARY:
Mrs. LEIGH SKINNER.

CORRESPONDING SECRETARY:
Mrs. PAUL H. LEE.

TREASURER:
Mrs. FRANK SHERWOOD.

REGISTRAR:
Miss MARY HILLIARD HINTON.

GENEALOGIST:
Mrs. HELEN De BERNIERE WILLS.

Founder of the North Carolina Society and Regent 1896-1902:
Mrs. SPIER WHITAKER.

REGENT 1902:
Mrs. D. H. HILL, Sr.*

REGENT 1902-1906:
Mrs. THOMAS K. BRUNER.

---

*Died December 12, 1904.

North Carolina State Library
Raleigh

THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET.

Vol. IX JULY, 1909 No. 1

INDIANS, SLAVES AND TORIES: OUR 18TH CENTURY LEGISLATION REGARDING THEM.

By Clarence H. Poe,

Editor of The Progressive Farmer, and author of "A Southerner in Europe," and "Cotton: Its Cultivation, Marketing, Manufacture, Etc."

I have been very much interested recently in a bulky, leather-bound volume of 700 thick and yellowed pages, with old-fashioned f-like s's, an equally old-fashioned style of capitalization, and besprinkled here and there with typographical ornaments that have since gone out of use, its title page reading as follows:

"Laws of the State of North Carolina,
Published according to Act of Assembly, by James Iredell,
now one of the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States.
Edenton;
Printed by Hodge & Willis, printers to the State of North Carolina,
M, DCC, XCI."

This book, giving in full the more important "Acts of the Assembly" of North Carolina from 1714 to 1791, has, I repeat, interested me greatly, and it is, perhaps, not unnatural to assume that it would be of interest to other North Carolinians. And while there are other copies of the book extant, the number is so very small as to make it practically out of the question for five Booklet readers in a hundred to learn directly from it the nature of our eighteenth century statutes. A summary of its more notable features therefore may be not wholly without merit.

The book, as I have suggested, does not give in full all the laws passed from 1714 to 1791; this, of course, would be impossible in a work of 700 pages. The careful threshing of Judge Iredell eliminated nearly all the laws obsolete in 1791 or repealed before that time, and all the private Acts of the Assembly. Of these acts only the titles are given, followed by the word "obsolete" or "private" or the date of repeal. It is to this manner of sifting that the elimination of many of the laws of the 1714-1715 Assembly is due, or as the book has it:

"Laws of North Carolina. Anno Regni Georgii I, Regis Magnæ Brittanniæ, Franciæ and Hiberniæ, Secundo. At a General Biennial Assembly, held at the house of Captain Richard Sanderson, at Little River, begun the 17th day of November, 1714, and continued by several adjournments, until the 19th day of January, 1715."

Among the acts marked "obsolete" we note the first, "An Act Concerning Marriages"; the fourth, "An Act Prohibiting Strangers Trading with the Indians" and the sixth, "An Act Exempting New-comers from Paying Levies for One Year." Chapter 7, "An Act for the Better Observing the Lord's Day, Called Sunday, the 30th of January, the 29th of May, and the 22d of September; and also for the Suppressing Prophaneness, Immorality and Divers Other Vicious and Enormous Sins," was repealed in 1741, and only the title is here given; this is also true of chapter 8, "An Act for Establishing the Church, and Appointing Select Vestries." It is also interesting to note that the ninth act was one "for Liberty of Conscience" and for accepting the affirmation of Quakers, and that the tenth, "An Act Relating to the Biennial and other Assemblies; and regulating Elections and Members," was "repealed by His Majesty's order."

But of course we can not go through the book in this haphazard fashion, noting on page after page the things that most impress us. Instead let us take up some of the subjects most likely to interest the reader. For my part I have searched out with especial zest all the legislation bearing on those three extinct classes of our population—slaves, Indians and Tories—and it is of the legislation affecting these that the editors of the Booklet have kindly asked me to write. It will, perhaps, be just as well to consider first the statutes regarding slaves and slavery.

I.—Legislation Regarding Slaves and Servants.

The first statute regarding servants and slaves that I have noticed is chapter 24 of the Acts of the Assembly of 1741, which met at Edenton. The first section of this act declares that "no person whatsoever, being a Christian or of Christion parentage * * * imported or brought into this Province, shall be deemed a servant for any term of years" unless by indenture or agreement. This is followed by other regulations regarding "Christian servants." If disobedient or unruly, they might be carried before a justice of the peace and sentenced to not more than 21 lashes; if they ran away and were recaptured, they were to serve double the time so lost. This law also provided that if any person should "presume to whip a Christian servant naked," without an order from a magistrate, such person should forfeit 40 shillings, proclamation money, to the party injured. Servants might carry complaints to magistrates who might bind masters or mistresses "to answer complaint at the next county court." If any master discharged a servant while sick, before the servant's term of service expired, the county court was to levy on the master for enough to enable the church wardens of the parish to care for the sick servant until death or recovery. If he recovered, the servant was free. Free persons, for minor offenses, were punished by fine, servants by whipping, not exceeding 39 lashes. Free persons trading with slaves were fined "treble the value traded for," or if unable to pay this, themselves sold as servants. Any free person brought over as a slave could recover twice his value and compel his abductor to return him to his own country.

Runaway slaves, acknowledging no owner, were committed to jail and advertised for two months; then, if the owner did not appear, hired out by the authorities. An iron collar was put about the necks of all slaves so sold.

Masters could designate one slave on each plantation to carry a gun. No other slave was permitted to carry any kind of weapon. Only slaves wearing liveries were permitted to leave the plantations without passes. No slave was allowed, "on any pretense whatsoever to raise any horses, cattle or hogs." Runaway slaves could be outlawed.

Negroes, mulattoes or Indians, giving false testimony in courts, were severely punished:

"Every such offender * * * shall have one ear nailed to the pillory, and there stand for the space of one hour, and the said ear to be cut off, and thereafter the other ear nailed in like manner, and cut off at the expiration of one other hour."

The offender might also be sentenced to "thirty-nine lashes, well laid on, on his or her bare back, at the common whipping post."

No slave could be set free except for meritorious service, "judged and allowed by the county court." Any "negro, mulatto or Indian slave, otherwise set free" could be taken up and sold by the Church wardens, and the money applied to the use of the parish. (Speaking of Indian slaves, it would be interesting to know how many of this class there were.)

During the Revolutionary War it was asserted that Tories liberated slaves and turned them loose for the purpose of disturbing the peace, so that in this period emancipation was made more difficult than before. No one could free slaves except for meritorious service and by express permission of the county court. Slaves otherwise emancipated were turned over to the sheriff and sold to the highest bidder, the person delivering them to the sheriff getting one-fifth of the selling price. The 1777 statute says that "the evil and pernicious practice of freeing slaves in this State ought at this critical and alarming time to be guarded against by every friend and well-wisher to his country."

The Assembly of 1779 went even further, since many negroes were "going at large to the terror of the good people of the State," and directed that all slaves liberated before the passage of the act of 1777 could be taken up and sold in the same manner as those liberated after its passage. This law—which, by the way, seems to me to savor strongly of the ex post facto principle—has this interesting proviso: "Provided, that nothing herein contained shall deprive of liberty any slave, who having been liberated, and not sold by order of any court, has enlisted into the service of this or the United States previous to the passing of this act." It may surprise some readers to learn of negroes fighting in the Revolution, but there are records of pensions paid black Revolutionary soldiers yet to be seen in the State Treasury Department.

The General Assembly of 1753, which met at New Bern, amended the law of 1741 so as to prohibit any slave carrying a gun unless the master gave bond for the slave's good behavior, and even then no slave could carry a gun after the housing of the corn crop, and not more than one slave on each plantation in crop season. Slaves discovered hunting with dogs could be whipped, not exceeding thirty lashes.

The Assembly of 1774 passed an important statute setting forth the penalty for killing slaves. For the first offense, the guilty man or woman was to suffer one year's imprisonment; for the second offense, the death penalty was prescribed. This act did not apply in the case of outlawed or rebellious slaves or slaves "dying under moderate correction."*

A peculiar statute is that of 1777 making it unlawful for any slave in Halifax, Northampton, Bute, Granville, Edgecombe or Wake, to grow any tobacco for his own use. The next session of the Assembly, which first met at New Bern and then at Halifax, passed a rigorous law against slave stealers. The death penalty was prescribed for all such criminals and for all persons carrying free negroes out of the State for the purpose of selling them into slavery.

Chapter 5 of the Laws of 1786 recites that "the importation of slaves into this State is productive of evil consequences, and highly impolitic"; it, therefore, imposes the following import duties on all slaves brought into the State whether by land or water:

Negroes under 7 and over 40 years of age, 50 shillings; between 7 and 12, or between 30 and 40, 5 pounds; between 12 and 30 years, 10 pounds. Slaves imported directly from Africa, whatever their age, were subject to a tax of five pounds each. The sixth section of this chapter also provides that "every person who shall introduce into this State any slave or slaves" from any of the free States should "enter

*It is interesting to observe, by the way, that this Assembly of 1774 is the last whose acts are introduced by Latin references to George III. Its acts begin: "Anno Regni Georgii III, Regis Magnæ Britanniæ, Franciæ, and Hiberniæ, Decimo Quarto. At an Assembly begun and held at New Bern the 20th day of March in the fourteenth year of the reign of our Sovereign Lord George the Third, by the grace of God of Great Britain, France and Ireland, King, Defender of the Faith, etc., and in the year of our Lord," etc.

How very differently reads the introduction to the very next section of this book: "A Declaration of Rights. At a Congress of Representatives of the Freemen of the State of North Carolina, assembled at Halifax the 17th day of December, in the year of our Lord One Thousand Seven Hundred and Seventy-six, for the purpose of establishing a constitution or form of government for the said State."

into bond with sufficient surety in the sum of fifty pounds, current money, for each slave, for the removing of such slave or slaves" to the State from whence they were brought, within three months thereafter.

It is also set forth in chapter 17 of the Acts of 1786 that "many persons by cruel treatment of their slaves, cause them to commit crimes for which many of the said slaves are executed, whereby a very burdensome debt is unjustly imposed on the good citizens of the State; for remedy whereof" all former laws providing for reimbursing masters of executed slaves at the public expense were repealed.

The next year (1787) an act was passed making it unlawful for any negro or mulatto to "entertain any slave in his or her house during the Sabbath or in the night between sunset and sunrise" on penalty of 20 shillings for the first offense and 40 for each subsequent offense.

In 1788 it was found necessary to enact a more stringent law against trading with slaves. All free persons trading with any slave without written permission from the master specifying the articles in question, were to be fined ten pounds for each offense. Slaves selling articles without permission were to be reported to the justice of the peace and given not over thirty-nine lashes.

II.—Legislation Affecting the Indians.

Let us next take up the laws regarding the Indians. Many of these, of course, were obsolete when Judge Iredell made his collection of laws, and are, therefore, excluded from the book. It is very creditable to our ancestors that the first Indian law of special note, that on page 119 (Laws of 1748), is "An act for ascertaining the bounds of a certain tract of land formerly laid out by treaty to the use of the Tuskarora Indians, so long as they or any of them shall occupy and live upon the same; and to prevent any person or persons taking up lands, or settling within the said bounds, by pretense of any purchase or purchases made, or that shall be made from the said Indians"—"it being but just," as the preamble says, "that the ancient inhabitants of this province shall have and enjoy a quiet and convenient dwelling place in this their native country."

But the next law regarding Indians, passed in 1760, is of very different tenor. It was adopted near the end of the great French and Indian War, and is of sufficient importance to justify the republication in full of the two most striking sections:

"13. And for the greater encouragement of such persons as shall enlist voluntarily to serve the said companies, and other inhabitants of this province who shall undertake any expedition against the Cherokees and other Indians in alliance with the French; be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, that each of the said Indians who shall be taken a captive during the present war by any person as aforesaid, shall, and is hereby declared to be a slave, and the absolute right and property of who shall be the captor of such Indians. * * * And if any person or persons, inhabitant or inhabitants of this province not in actual pay, shall kill an enemy Indian or Indians, he or they shall have and receive ten pounds for each and every Indian he or they shall so kill, and any person or persons who shall be in the actual pay of this province, shall have and receive five pounds for every enemy Indian or Indians he or they shall so kill, to be paid out of the Treasury, any law, usage, or custom to the contrary notwithstanding.

"14. Provided, always, that any person claiming the said reward, before he be allowed or paid the same, shall produce to the Assembly the scalp of every Indian so killed, and make oath or otherwise prove that he was the person who killed, or was present at the killing, of the Indian whose scalp shall be so produced. * * * And as a further encouragement, shall also have and keep to his or their own use or uses all plunder taken out of the possession of any enemy Indian or Indians, or within twenty miles of any of the Cherokee towns, or any Indian town at war with any of his Majesty's subjects."

Two thousand pounds was appropriated for the purchase of Indian scalps in the manner indicated in this statute.

In 1778 it appeared that "divers avaricious and ill-disposed persons" had been defrauding and abusing the Cherokees and stirring up much bad feeling, and a law was passed making it unlawful to trade with this tribe of Indians without license, or to trespass on their grounds. The penalty for violation was a fine of 500 pounds; failing to pay this, says the law, the offender "shall stand in the pillory two hours, and receive thirty-nine lashes upon his bare back, and shall stand committed to the gaol of the district until such sums shall be completely discharged and paid."

The first law passed at the session of 1786, held at Fayetteville, was one providing defense against Indians for the citizens of Davidson County, "frequent acts of hostility rendering it necessary that some measures be taken for their protection." A company of 201 men was to be raised and to stay in service two years, unless sooner disbanded by the Legislature. I think, however, that this Davidson County was in what is now Tennessee, as the Davidson County now existing was not formed until 1822.

III.—How the Tories Were Treated.

And now let us consider some of the Revolutionary and post-Revolutionary laws regarding Tories. Immediately after framing the Constitution, the Halifax Congress of 1776 adopted an ordinance requiring all citizens to take the oath of allegiance to the State, the "whereas" being as follows:

"Whereas, divers persons within this State have been in actual arms against the liberties of the United States of America, or have adhered to the King and Parliament of Great Britain against the same, * * * with design to weaken and obstruct the necessary efforts of the said States against the wrongs and hostilities of the said King and Parliament of Great Britain; and it being hoped that such persons are now become sensible of the wickedness and folly of endeavoring to subject their country to misery and slavery, and are penitent for the same—" free pardon and protection were to be granted all persons taking oath to bear true allegiance to the State and to "do no act willingly whereby the independence of the said State may be destroyed or injured."

All persons refusing or neglecting to take this oath within ninety days from that date "shall be and are hereby declared incapable of bringing any suit or action, real, personal or mixed, before any court, judge or magistrate within this State; or being sued, plead or make defense; or of prosecuting any indictment; or of purchasing or transferring any lands, tenements, or hereditaments, the same shall be and are hereby declared to be forfeited to this State, being first found by inquest of a jury."

Nor was the General Assembly which met at New Bern in April, 1777, in a mood to deal lightly with those who stood in the way of American independence. The anti-Tory laws were almost Draconian in their severity. "Every inhabitant of the State owes and shall pay allegiance to the State of North Carolina." The second section continues, redundant words and phrases omitted:

"And if any person residing within this State * * * shall take commission from the King of Great Britain: or knowingly and willingly aid or assist any enemies at open war against this State, or against the United States of America, by joining their armies, or by enlisting or procuring or persuading others to enlist for that purpose, or by furnishing such enemies with arms, ammunition, provision, or any other article for their aid or comfort, * * * he shall be adjudged guilty of high treason, and shall suffer death without the benefit of clergy, and his or her estate shall be forfeited to the State. Provided, that the judge may appropriate so much of the traitor's estate as may appear sufficient for the support of his or her family."

By the third section of the act, imprisonment during the war and confiscation of half his property is prescribed as the punishment for any person who "shall convey intelligence to the enemies of this State, or speak publicly against our public defense, or excite the people against the government of this State, or persuade them to return to a dependence on the Crown of Great Britain, or maliciously discourage the people from enlisting into the service of the State, or dispose the people to favor the enemy, or endeavor to prevent the measures carrying on in support of freedom."

All late officers of the King, and all persons who had "traded immediately to Great Britain or Ireland" were to give up North Carolina citizenship or abjure allegiance to England. Failing to depart they could be shipped at their own expense to Europe or the West Indies, not to return on pain of death.

When the Assembly met again in November of the same year, the ardor of the members had in no wise cooled. They divided the counties into districts, in each of which a magistrate was to administer the oath of allegiance to "all free male persons above 16 years of age," who had resided for one week or longer in that district. Names of persons refusing to take the oath were to be listed, and they were to be dealt with in the manner noted in the last paragraph regarding officers and traders refusing to take the oath.

A few weeks later the Assembly of 1777 took another step forward and declared the forfeiture to the State of all property belonging to any person who had left the State or "attached himself to or aided or abetted the enemies of the United States," unless such person should appear before the 1778 Assembly and be by it restored to citizenship. That Assembly, which met in New Bern, proceeded to put into effect the act of its predecessors and appointed commissioners to sell the confiscated property. The second chapter of the 1779 legislation names a number of those whose estates were confiscated in accordance with this act, among the names being William Tryon, Josiah Martin, Sir Nathaniel Duckinfield, Edmund Fanning, Thomas MacKnight, and many others.

Very naturally these confisaction laws excited the greed and strengthened the audacity of the baser sort of Whigs, and it is not surprising to find the 1780 Assembly acknowledging that "many acts of violence and barbarity have been lately committed under pretense of seizing the property of disaffected persons, these unwarrantable depredations being carried so far as to deprive some poor persons of house and kitchen utensils and wearing apparel, and many persons have unlawfully seized upon and carried away negro slaves, and other valuable effects [for] their own use, and slaves * * * conveyed to distant parts, or publicly sold in violation of law and justice." To remedy this, the Assembly again directed that while the property of all persons who had then or should thereafter join the Royalists, should be confiscated, only the sheriff or confiscation commissioner should take possession of property by virtue of this act; others seizing property should repay the owners three-fold.

The sixth section of the act also recites that evil-disposed persons, under pretense of distressing Royalists, had been plundering South Carolinians indiscriminately. The sheriff was directed to seize all such property, returning that belonging to American sympathizers, and selling all belonging to Tories. The seventh section, curiously enough, exempted from taxation for that year all refugees from Georgia.

This Hillsboro Assembly of 1780 also suspended the sale of confiscated property, the reason assigned being that the nearness of the British army (and the consequent gloomy outlook for independence) caused the property to sell at much less than its true value. The sales were revived next year.

* * *

Peace came at last, however, and the Assembly of 1783, recognizing the fact that "it is the policy of all wise States, on the termination of civil wars, to grant an act of pardon and oblivion for past offenses," directed that "all manner of treasons, misprision of treasons, felony or misdemeanor committed or done since July 4, 1776, by any person or persons whatsoever, be pardoned, released, and put in total oblivion." Only officers in the King's army, Tories then out of the State, persons who had committed capital crimes, and those especially offensive Tories singled out by name—Peter Mallette, David Fanning and Samuel Andrews—were excepted from the provisions of this act. Both by the letter of its statute and the spirit of its people, North Carolina resolved to forget the bitterness (but not the heroic deeds) of a struggle in which, as in all great wars by men of our blood, the main body in each side had fought "for the right as God gave them to see the right."

With that same broad spirit of tolerance, therefore, which caused our people in the first chapter of our book to provide "for liberty of Conscience," we leave them in this last quotation, forgetting and forgiving (even so early as 1783) those with whom they had differed in "the late unpleasantness" and setting to work, all together, for the upbuilding of the State. Thus North Carolina entered upon a long period of healthy and untroubled development, while defeated England, with a like tolerance, came to find pride in the heroism of the men she had once faced in deadly conflict, Lord Tennyson speaking both for and to the nation when he wrote:

"O thou that sendest out the man,
To rule by land or sea,
Strong mother of a lion-line,
Be proud of those strong sons of thine,
Who wrenched their rights from thee!"

THOMAS PERSON. *

By Stephen B. Weeks.

The Person family represents one unit in that great English voelkerwanderung which began from the older American colonies almost before they were themselves out of swaddling clothes and has gained more and more force as newer settlements grew in strength until it has over-run and conquered the American continent for the men of Anglo-Saxon blood. Virginia had been planted little more than a generation when hardy pioneers pushed out from her settled centers and in the wilderness of Carolina carved out new homes for themselves, redeeming them from the wilderness and the savage. These frontiersmen in their turn sent others to the new and fertile lands of the old Southwest and old Northwest, and these have again sent out conquering hosts to the shores of the calm Pacific and to the naked plains and savage mountains of the arid mid-region. Thus it follows that the real F. F. V.'s are found as often in the far West, in the old Southwest or in Carolina as in Virginia herself.

The Person family was one of those which thus left Virginia with that great migration that swept over her southern border for a hundred years after the first settling of North Carolina. It had been settled in Brunswick County, Va., and had for its neighbors the Mangums, who were soon to follow it to North Carolina. I find in the Quaker records of southeastern Virginia a John Persons, the son of John Persons (who spelled his name Passons), marrying Mary Patridg on the tenth of the first month, 1691/2. I have no records to prove my supposition, but it is possible that these two Quakers, father and son, were the immediate ancestors of that William Person who was the head of the family at the time of its coming into Halifax County, N. C., about 1740. William Person (born 1700, died November 11, 1778) took up land in Halifax, but seems to have soon passed on into what is now Granville, for on its organization as a separate county, in 1746, he became its first sheriff, an office which he filled for a number of years. He was often a justice of the peace, a county commissioner, a vestryman, and in general a man of prominence and a leader in his county. He married Ann ———, and his son, Thomas Person, commonly known as General Person, and whose name in his own day was indifferently written and pronounced Person, Persons, Parson, Parsons, and Passons, was born January 19, 1733, probably in Brunswick County, Va. He grew up in Granville County, N. C., and there his life was spent. He began life as a surveyor for Lord Granville, was noted for the accuracy of his surveys and the faithfulness of his work generally, and as his work made him acquainted with the best lands, he thus accumulated a handsome estate. In 1788 he listed for taxation 82,358 acres, lying in Halifax, Warren, Franklin, Orange, Caswell, Guilford, Rockingham, Anson, and Wake counties, N. C., and in Davidson, Sumner and Greene counties, Tenn. (State Rec., Vol. XXVI, 1275).

*Reprinted by permission of Chas. L. VanNoppen, publisher, from the seventh volume of the Biographical History of North Carolina.

Raleigh

The first definite record of his appearance in public life is on July 6, 1756, when he was recommended as a justice of the peace for Granville (Col. Rec., Vol. V, 592). In 1762 he was sheriff of that county (ibid., VI, 895). His appearance in the Assembly was at the October session, 1764, as the representative of Granville, and he won even in this his first service sufficient recognition to give him a place on the committee to settle the public accounts (VI, 1222). He was not again in the Assembly so far as I have been able to learn until November session, 1768, and October session, 1769, when he again served on the Committee on Public Accounts and on that of Privileges and Elections. It was during this last session that his connection with the Regulators began to have its influence on his fortunes.

The "Regulation" was one of a series of efforts made by the people of North Carolina at various times to secure a redress of grievances. It began as early as 1759 with the Enfield riots, which were directed against the land officers of Lord Granville. A little later extortion began to grow up among the county officers in various sections of the province. Because of the lavish expenditure of Tryon's government, provincial taxes were high, and, being levied on the poll, bore unduly on the poor and thinly settled communities of the middle section. In 1765 discontent became acute, and was manifest as far east as Pasquotank. It broke into violence in the present counties of Granville, Orange, Alamance, Guilford, Rockingham, Surry, Chatham, Randolph, Rowan, Davidson, Anson, Cabarrus, Mecklenburg and Iredell. The discontented element called themselves "Regulators." Under the leadership of Husband, Howell, Hunter, Butler and others they published numerous addresses on the condition of affairs. The organization gained headway. Its purpose was to "regulate" the grievances of which they complained; these were excessive taxes, dishonest sheriffs and extortionate fees. Their agreement, or articles of association, show that their purpose was peaceful in character and that they were willing to pay legal taxes and legal fees. They petitioned the government often for redress. This was often promised but never granted. This failure to receive the redress asked no doubt irritated many and led them to commit indefensible acts of license and violence. A rupture was narrowly averted in 1768, and in September, 1770, occurred the riots in Hillsboro when Fanning, John Williams, Thomas Hart and others were beaten, property destroyed and the court insulted and broken up.

In the Assembly of 1769 John Ashe, of New Hanover, had reported that Thomas Person, the member for Granville, was frequently charged with perjury (Col. Rec., VIII, 118). He was tried at December session, 1770, after the Hillsboro riots, for perjury and extorting illegal fees, and there came before the Assembly to prosecute that same Richard Henderson whose court had been insulted and broken up. The committee of investigation, through John Campbell, its chairman, reported that "there is not any one of the charges or allegations * * * in any manner supported," but that they were exhibited "through malice and envy, with design to injure the character and reputation of the said Thomas Person," and it was ordered that this report be published in the newspaper of the day (VIII, 448, 449, 461). Henderson, the prosecutor, was thereupon mulcted in the costs (VIII, 467), which he failed to pay (IX, 717, 718). Tryon claimed that the resolution to put the costs on Henderson was clapped up by Person's friends; at any rate, that resolution was repealed at the next session (IX, 196).

In an anonymous letter printed in the Colonial Records (VIII, 643 et seq.) it is said that Person was expelled from this session of Assembly:

"After this the General Assembly of the province was called, and an election ensued, at which Herman Husband and Thomas Parsons were chosen by the country party as members of the house; their enemy, Fanning, was also chosen. When the house met their first step was to expel Husband and Parsons from their seats; Husband they sent to jail; Parsons, home. They then passed a Riot Act, the substance of which was that any person or persons being guilty of any riot, either before or after the publication of this act, within the jurisdiction of any court within this province, shall and may be indicted, and when so indicted shall appear and stand trial before the expiration of sixty days; and in case he, she, or they do not appear, noticed or not noticed, within the term aforesaid, they shall and are hereby declared to be outlawed, and shall suffer death without benefit of clergy, etc., and his lands, goods and chattels confiscated and sold at the end of eight days."

This letter was no doubt the work of Rednap Howell, one of the Regulation leaders, as it is from "a gentleman in North Carolina to his friend in New Jersey," and Howell came from that State to North Carolina. The statements made in other parts of the letter seem to be essentially correct, but I confess that I am unable to reconcile this expulsion of Person with the favorable report which was made in his behalf to this same Aisembly, and with his appearance again as a member of the same Assembly at its session in November, 1771.

But the Assembly of 1770-71 did pass a Riot Act which anticipated some of the essential features of the "five intolerable acts" of the British Parliament of 1774. It was so brutal, so tyrannical and subversive of all liberty of the subject that it was condemned even by the English Government as "irreconcilable with the principles of the constitution, full of danger in its operation and unfit for any part of the British Empire." But in the meantime this act, more commonly known as the Johnston Act, from its author, was put into execution against the Regulators, and goaded them to further resistance. Tryon collected an army from the eastern counties, although in many sections the spirit of resistance was almost as pronounced as in the Regulation country. On May 16, 1771, with his army of 1100 men, organized, trained and armed, Tryon came up with some 2000 Regulators at Alamance Creek, now in Alamance County. The Regulators were unorganized, without officers, untrained and in part unarmed. There was much parleying, the Regulators even to the last petitioning for redress. Tryon forced a battle, defeated the Regulators, took some prisoners, and with more than Jeffreys' bloodthirstiness hanged James Few on the field. Six others were hanged a month later, after having received the form of a legal trial.

Person's service to the Regulation was evidently in the council, not in the field, for he was not present at the Alamance battle, and it does not clearly appear in what form his service was rendered beyond that he was a member of their committee to whom the people were to give in their claims for overcharges which the officers guilty of extortion, under the pressure of popular indignation, had agreed to refund. The committee was to have met for this purpose on May 3, 1771, but it is probable that events were then moving too fast for peaceful methods (Col. Rec. VIII, 521, 535; Caruthers' "Caldwell," 143). But it is certain that Tryon recognized Person as a leader in this movement and did him the immortal honor to include him in the list of those excepted from the benefit of pardon. Tryon's exceptions included the four leaders who had been outlawed, Husband, Howell, Hunter and Butler, the prisoners, the young men who blew up Waddell's ammunition train, and sixteen others mentioned by name, of whom Person is the last (Col. Rec., VIII, 618).

How Person escaped trial and further punishment for treason and how he secured his release do not clearly appear, although tradition says it was through the personal friendship between him and Edmund Fanning (ex rel. Peter M. Wilson). Tradition says also that by permission of his jailer Person made an all night ride to his home at Goshen to see or destroy certain incriminating papers there, and returned to jail before the break of day. It is said that Tryon's troops visited his home looking for plunder as well as papers, but found nothing, and this failure may have forced his release (Col. Rec., VIII, xxvii).

It is usually said that the Regulators were Tories in the Revolution. It is certain that few of them were enthusiastic supporters of the Whig principles of 1776. But it is hardly reasonable to expect this much of them. They were mostly simple, honest, ignorant men who had grown restless under official oppression; they had been defeated and forced to take an oath to the king by the very men who in 1776 sought to make them break the oath taken in 1771. In that struggle the Regulators for the most part maintained a sullen neutrality. Unlike their sympathizers of that day, Caldwell and Person, they were unable to see that the principles of 1776 were but those of 1771 writ large; that official oppression was the same, whether exercised by petty despots at their doors or by high lords and Parliament over sea; and that the Johnston Act of 1770 was but the prototype of the five intolerable acts of the British Parliament of 1774, which set all America aflame.

But the Regulators were not allowed to go their way in peace. Numerous efforts were made to win them to the cause of independence, and to these efforts Person lent his influence. The Hillsboro Convention of 1775 appointed him member of a committee to confer with such of the inhabitants of the province "who entertain any religious or political scruples with respect to associating in the common cause of America, to remove any ill impressions that have been made upon them by the artful devices of the enemies of America, and to induce them, by argument and persuasion, heartily to unite with us for the protection of the constitutional rights and privileges thereof" (X, 169).

Again, the Council of Safety, on August 3, 1776, resolved that General Person and Mr. Joseph John Williams "do each of them agree with a proper person for the purpose of instructing the inhabitants of Anson County and other the western parts of this colony in their duty to Almighty God, and for explaining to them the justice and necessity of the measures pursued by the United States of America" (X, 693).

But that the Provincial Convention of 1775 knew little of the character of the Regulators in particular, or of human nature in general, is shown by their making Richard Caswell, Maurice Moore and Henry Pattillo members of this committee to win them to the American cause. Nothing shows more clearly the greatness of Thomas Person than his participation in the Regulation and his subsequent part in the Revolution. Other Regulators, by reason of narrowness of vision, or from personal spite, or from littleness, might hang back or even join the Tory interests, to which they were invited and urged by the successor of the brutal Tryon, but not Person. As Colonel Saunders has well said, the most ardent friend of the Regulation might be willing to stake the reputation of the cause on the character of Thomas Person, Church of England man though he was, friend of education, wealthy if not aristocratic, patriot and democrat of democrats.

Person was again in the Assembly in November, 1771, in January and December, 1773, March, 1774, and April, 1775. Although he was a commissioner on public buildings in Hillsboro district in 1771, he seems nevertheless to have suffered somewhat from his participation in the popular uprising; but as time passed on and efforts were made by Martin to quiet the feelings of the Regulators, Person comes more and more into prominence, and by sheer weight of character made himself a necessity to the colony.

As the struggle with Great Britain drew on he became one of the foremost advocates of separation. On February 12, 1776, he writes to his father of the "advocates of liberty" (X, 450); on the 14th, his friend, Penn, a neighbor, citizen of the same county, possibly a sympathizer with the Regulators, now in the Continental Congress, perhaps in great measure through his influence, surveys the situation and writes: "Matters are drawing to a crisis. They seem determined to persevere and are forming alliances against us. Must we not do something of the like nature? * * * The consequence of making alliances is perhaps a total separation from Britain" (X, 456). This letter was received, perhaps, about March

1st. On the 3d the Provincial Council, of which Person was a member, ordered the next session of the Provincial Congress to be held at Halifax on April 2d. The delegates met on April 4th; on the 8th, Harnett, Allen Jones, Burke, Abner Nash, John Kinchen, Person and Thomas Jones were appointed a committee to take into consideration "the usurpations and violences attempted and committed by the king and Parliament of Britain against America, and the further measures to be taken for frustrating the same and for the better defense of this province" (Col. Rec., X, xvii-xviii, 504); on the 12th, the committee brought in a resolution empowering the delegates from North Carolina in the Continental Congress "to concur with the delegates of the other colonies in declaring independency, and forming foreign alliances."

And thus on April 12, 1776, North Carolina became the first of the colonies to make a formal proposal for a declaration of independence.

Was not this proposal as much or more the work of Thomas Person than of any other man? Perhaps we shall never find evidence that will settle this point beyond dispute, but no student of our history will dare claim that such an honor could belong by right of work done to any other man more than to Person or that any other citizen of our State was more worthy of this great and signal honor.

Person was a member of all the provincial conventions and congresses which took the place of the Assembly and of the governor from 1774 to 1776.

1. New Bern, August 25-27, 1774 (C. R., IX, 1042).
2. New Bern, April 3-7, 1775 (C. R., IX, 1179).
3. Hillsboro, August 20 to September 10, 1775 (X, 164.)
4. Halifax, April 4 to May 14, 1776 (X, 499).
5. Halifax, November 12 to December 23, 1776 (X, 914).

He served on their important committees and in the last was on the committees which drafted the Bill of Rights and the Constitution. So satisfactory was the latter to the people of North Carolina that it remained in force for fifty-nine years without change; of the Declaration of Rights it is sufficient to say that of its twelve clauses for the protection of individual rights eleven were embodied in the first ten amendments to the Constitution of the United States (Col. Rec., X, xxiii, xxv).

He had been chosen a member of the Provincial Council, September 9, 1775 (X, 214). This body was the executive head of the State and had Samuel Johnston as a member. Johnston and Allen Jones represented the more conservative element. They favored a strong government, a sort of representative Republicanism, modeled on Great Britain. The more progressive or radical wing, led by Willie Jones and Person, favored a simpler government and one more directly responsible to the people. The Provincial Council under the influence of the conservatives was slow, while the mass of the congress was with the radicals. As a result for the Provincial Council was substituted a Council of Safety, Person still a member (X, 581), with no practical change in its functions further than in name; but with the radical Willie Jones as the representative of the congress, instead of the conservative Johnston who was not a member.

On April 22, 1776, Person was elected brigadier general of the militia of Hillsboro district (X, 530) and was succeeded in this office in 1777 by John Butler. This was not the time when to be a militia general meant ease and quiet. It meant work, the raising of troops for active service, drilling, collecting supplies and actual fighting in suppression of Tory marauders. It was no sinecure, but Person was never, so far as I know, in actual battle. His service to the State, like that to the Regulators, was in the cabinet, not on the field.

He was made by the last Provincial Congress a justice of the peace for Granville (XXIII, 993) and a member of the Council of State (X, 1013), his fellow-councilors being William Dry, William Haywood, Edward Starkey, Joseph Leech and Thomas Eaton. He was nominated for the same office in 1781, but failed of election (XVII, 810, 894), and again in 1789, but at the latter period asked to have his name withdrawn (XXI, 389, 390, 704). In May, 1782, he was nominated for the Continental Congress but failed of election (XVI, 90; XIX, 57); on May 11, 1784, he was elected to the Continental Congress, but it was a time when there was more expense and labor in being a member of the congress than money and honor. Person never took his seat and his name nowhere appears in the list of North Carolina Congressmen (XVII, 79, 139, 143; XIX, 583).

In January, 1787, he was elected along with William Green and Matthew Locke chief commissioner for receiving the certificates of the Board of Commissioners of Army Accounts (XVIII, 451, 459). It was their duty to receive and correct the proceedings of the commissioners appointed to settle the accounts of the North Carolina troops in the Continental Line (XX, 630; XXI, 551) and thus bring to a final settlement the accounts of North Carolina with the United States. It was a delicate duty and one requiring the highest degree of honesty. Many frauds had been committed in the preparation of these accounts. These were discovered and were followed by a long investigation, the trial and punishment of the guilty parties (State Rec., XVII and XVIII, passim; McRee's "Iredell," II, 155-6).

One of Person's most important services to the State was as a leader of the anti-Federal party in the convention of 1788; but before proceeding to discuss that convention, which was called to consider the Federal constitution, it is necessary to review briefly the alignment of political parties. From 1776 there were two clearly defined parties in the State. They were a unit as to resistance to the aggressions of Great Britain, but in domestic matters the lines of party cleavage were sharply defined. One party we may call the Conservative; it was strongest in the east; was led by Johnston, Iredell, Hooper, Maclaine. It was aristocratic and wealthy, stood for the slaveholding, commercial and mercantile interests; it preferred a strong central government and was slow to advocate democracy. The other party we may call Radical. It was stronger in the north and west. It was nearer the soil and the people. Its leaders were Willie Jones, Person, the Bloodworths, Spencer, Locke, Sharpe, Rutherford, and others. They were ultra-democratic, even radical in their tendencies and ardent advocates from the first of an extremely democratic government. The struggle began in the first Halifax congress, April, 1776, or earlier, and was won by the Radicals as is shown by the substitution of the Council of Safety for the Provincial Council. The question of the new constitution also developed differences and the April congress deferred its adoption to a later congress to be elected for that particular purpose out of deference to the wishes of the minority. Johnston stood as a candidate for this congress from Chowan County and was defeated (McRee's "Iredell," I, 238, 281) and this left him sulking in his tent. He refused to serve as treasurer and Iredell bitterly resented his defeat by writing his "Creed of a Rioter" (McRee, I, 335-336); Iredell later resigned as attorney-general and Hooper left the Continental Congress. But the Radicals were liberal and patient and kept many of the Conservatives in office as the price of their support (cf. Dodd's "Macon," 30; and Saunders, Pref. Notes, Col. Rec., X).

In 1780-81, as the tide of war surged into North Carolina and went against her, the Conservatives grew in numbers and power; after the war ended they championed the Tory interests and continued to grow. Johnston was their perennial candidate for governor, but Caswell was agreed on as a sort of compromise. When the time for considering the Federal constitution drew near each exerted itself to the utmost to win control of the convention. The Radicals, whom we may now call Anti-Federalists and who became the nucleus of the first Republican party, demanded: (1) A free and absolutely independent state, for a few years at least; (2) a genuinely democratic administration; (3) a general improvement in educational advantages for the people. In accord with the last of these demands the State actually entered on a plan of public improvements which anticipated that urged in the State thirty years later by Murphey and in the Union fifty years later by Clay (Dodd, 14-90).

The Anti-Federalists won control of the convention. It met in Hillsboro, July 21, 1788. Person was a member from Granville; on his motion Samuel Johnston was made president (XXII, 6). He was himself a member of the committee on elections (XXII, 7). It is evident from the journals that he took a leading part in the business, but he does not seem to have been a frequent speaker. The first trial of strength came on August 1, when the convention considered the report of the Committee of the Whole House on a proposed Bill of Rights and certain amendments. The preamble to the report of the Committee of the Whole reads:

"Resolved, That a Declaration of Rights, asserting and securing from encroachment the great principles of civil and religious liberty, and the unalienable rights of the people, together with amendments to the most ambiguous and exceptionable parts of the said constitution of government, ought to be laid before Congress and the convention of states that shall be called for the purpose of amending the said constitution, for their consideration, previous to the ratification of the constitution aforesaid, on the part of the State of North Carolina." (XXII, 16.)

Iredell moved that all of this report be stricken out, that the constitution be adopted and that certain amendments be then proposed. This motion brought out the strength of the respective parties: For the motion, 84; against, 184; on August 2d, the report of the Committee of the Whole was again taken up and concurred with: yeas, 184; nays, 84.

After the Report of the Committee of the Whole was adopted Willie Jones moved:

"Whereas, this convention has thought proper neither to ratify nor reject the constitution proposed for the government of the United States; and as Congress will proceed to act under the said constitution, ten states having ratified the same, and probably lay an impost on goods imported into the said ratifying states:

"RESOLVED, That it be recommended to the legislature of this State that whenever Congress shall pass a law for collecting an impost in the states aforesaid, this State enact a law for collecting a similar impost on goods imported into this State, and appropriate the money arising therefrom to the use of Congress." (XXII, 31.)

This resolution, passed by 143 yeas to 44 nays, the Federal leaders voting in the negative, shows as clearly as words can show that the desire of Jones, Person and other Anti-Federalists was for a Federal government of limited powers and that their purpose was not to establish an independent republic as has been recently claimed by Professor Dodd (see his "Macon," p. 54), but to protect the interests of the states against the centralizing tendency which was even then clearly visible in the new constitution to those who had eyes to see. Davie reports that both Person and Jones were holding out the doctrine of opposition for four or five years at least. Jones feared the Federal judiciary and Person the Federal power to tax (McRee, II, 178, 239).

It was thus that North Carolina declined to either ratify or reject the Federal Constitution by a decided majority of 100 votes. Whether it was the wiser policy to adopt first and then ask for amendments or wait till the amendments were adopted, a child can tell. As to which of these parties could read the book of the future aright is equally easy of discernment.

Many public men in the State desired that a second Federal convention be called to revise the new constitution in the light of the criticisms upon it, and Person, along with Johnston, Iredell, Tim Bloodworth, Jos. McDowell, Sr., Dupre, Locke, Alfred Moore, Spencer and Allen Jones were chosen by the Assembly on November 24, 1788, to attend such a convention of the whole United States "should one be called" (XX, 538, 544; XXI, 94, 100). Their desire was for a constitution more in accord with the will of the Radicals and that a constitution acceptable to Bloodworth and Person would have been decentralized there can be no doubt.

The constitutional convention held in Fayetteville in November, 1789, was a small affair. The government of the United States had been organized under the constitution and was working well. The Anti-Federalists had received assurances that the substance of the amendments proposed by them would be incorporated into the constitution; eleven states had accepted the instrument and North Carolina and Rhode Island alone remained out. The convention met November 16, 1789. Willie Jones failed to be returned by his county. Johnston was again made president and Person was again on the committee on elections. The convention went into a Committee of the Whole to consider the constitution and sat three days. The Anti-Federalists moved that its report be rejected and that certain amendments be proposed. These forbade interference with the election of senators and representatives, dealt with the levying of direct taxes, the redemption of paper money by the states and the introduction of foreign troops. But the amendments were defeated by 187 nays to 82 yeas, Spencer, Caldwell, Bloodworth, Person and others voting yea (XXII, 45, 46). The convention then proceeded to adopt the constitution, 195 yeas to 77 nays. Person, true to his convictions and game to the last, voted nay (XXII, 48, 49).

On November 24, 1789, when the Federal constitution had been formally adopted, the Assembly proceeded to elect senators to Congress. Person was nominated by the house of commons, but the Federalists were in power and such radicals as Person and Bloodworth went down before Johnston and Hawkins (XXI, 253, 614). When his party again came into power in 1794-95 Person's race had been run, but he had the pleasure of seeing his radical comrades Alexander Martin and Timothy Bloodworth succeed Johnston and Hawkins.

But, after all, Thomas Person's most important and valuable service to North Carolina was not as an Anti-Federalist member of the conventions of 1788 and 1789, nor as a military man, nor as a philanthropist, but as a member of the General Assembly. There he was always active, generally a radical, always an argus-eyed guardian of the rights of the people, an advocate, ardent, insistent and constant of the interests of the masses, and consequently hated and always feared by the representatives of the aristocratic, conservative interests.

Person represented Granville County in the Assembly in the house of commons almost continuously from 1764 to 1785; he was defeated in 1786; was in the senate in 1787; again in the house in 1788, 1790, 1793, and 1794. (It is believed that the Thomas Person in the house in 1795 and 1797 was his nephew). In all, he represented his county some thirty years, a length of service which in itself is a most eloquent proof of his usefulness and of the appreciation of his people. It does not require a long or an extended examination of the legislative journals to show his prominence and usefulness. He served on the most important committees: public accounts, military matters, privileges and elections, propositions and grievances, finance, defence, depredations of Tories, location of capital, affairs of North Carolina Line, manufacture of iron, raising regular troops and regulating commissary department, on bill of attainder, paper money, debts due to and from the public, Indian affairs, land grants, on vesting power in Continental Congress to levy duties, claims and depreciation, trial of impeachments, revenue, proposed revision of the constitution, Virginia boundary, confiscated property, etc. He was usually chairman of his committee and presented many reports to the house; in 1784 he was chairman of the whole; never seeking the honors of the house, he was an active working member, bringing in many bills, serving on many special committees, presenting many petitions and memorials from sections of the State remote from his own. It is evident, too, that he was a fighter. No form of what he thought injustice, illegality or graft could escape his quick eye or pass without a protest. Thus in 1782, on petition of O'Bryan, Duncan and Pittman, who were being held as military deserters by Sumner, he recommended that they be discharged from the Continental army (XVI, 137). In 1783 he voted against the seating of his political friend, Bloodworth, as it seemed to him illegal (XIX, 292). In 1784 he protested against the cession of Tennessee to the Federal Government (XIX, 714), and had his protests been heeded the troubles coming from the abortive state of Franklin would have been avoided. He was particularly vigorous in protest against whatever savored of injustice or class legislation. Thus in 1785 he protested against the salt tax and the uniform tax on lands because they placed undue burdens on the poor, and against the confiscation act because it was illegal, unjust and ex post facto (XVII, 409, 410, 419, 421).

There is plenty of evidence also that Person was a man of strong feeling and made personal enemies. Thus Maclaine writes bitterly of his political methods, which were never to produce "his budget till he is pretty certain he has sufficient strength to support it" (XXI, 504); and when the constitution question was uppermost Thomas Iredell runs to his brother with a tale that Person had said in substance that Washington was a damned rascal and traitor to his country, for putting his hand to such an infamous paper as the new constitution (McRee, II, 224, 225).

The feeling of the conservative and aristocratic party toward him may be seen in a letter of Johnston to Burke, dated June 26, 1777:

"The few good men, or men of understanding and business, who had inclination or intend to be either of the legislature or executive departments, are by no means sufficient to counterbalance the fools and knaves who by their low arts have worked themselves into the good graces of the populace. When I tell you that I saw with indignation such men as G—th R—d, T—s P—s—n [Griffith Rutherford and Thomas Person], and your colleague Penn, with a few others of the same stamp, principal leaders in both houses, you will not expect that anything good or great should proceed from the counsels of men of such narrow, contracted principles, supported by the most contemptible abilities." XI, 504.)

Even Caswell, with whom he had fought many battles and whose personal ambitions he had so often advanced, was not always true. He writes to Hawkins, September 29, 1786:

"I can not say it gives me great pain to hear my old friend, the general, was disappointed in the late election for Granville, or that he is much mortified at being left out, as I flatter myself his country will derive advantage from his absence from the legislature, which his jealousy prevented when present, and kept her from. However, he may yet succeed in his favorite scheme of appointing a new governor for the next year, as his pernicious opinions and false suggestions are gone forth and he very likely will still have effrontery sufficient to endeavor to support them when the governor, conscious of the rectitude of his own conduct, and his friends, careless about the matter, may take no pains to contravene his attempt. (XVIII, 751.)

From these extracts it is not hard to see that Person was not one to fawn on those in power or to ask favors of the great. It is also evident that his political life had in it much of storm and stress and that he was a man who delighted in the joy of battle. He was a man of wealth, but not penurious. During the war his property was at the service of the State. We find the State in 1781 repaying him for a loan of salt (XVII, 971, 974) and between June, 1781, and April 25, 1782, he loaned Governor Burke $50,000 "to be replaced or paid by warrant which I did not issue" (XVI, 299). He assisted in securing the charter for the University of North Carolina in 1789 and was a member of its first board of trustees, 1789-95. But this was not all. While the University had been chartered no support had been provided for it by the State. An effort was being made to open its doors to students, but the trustees and faculty had no money. Its fortunes were at the lowest ebb. The trustees could or would do nothing in their private capacity, when Person came forward, and on April 20, 1796, gave the infant institution £500, and in April, 1797, £25 more. This sum, aggregating $1050 in our money, was paid in silver dollars at a time when hard money was almost unattainable. The gift, for the time and section, a very large one, perhaps saved the institution and started it on a career of usefulness. Person Hall, known after 1837 as "the old chapel" and used in more recent years as a chemical laboratory, was named in his honor, and until the reopening of the University in 1875 all its diplomas were dated from Aula Personica. A street in Raleigh, another in Fayetteville, and Person County, erected in 1791, recall his name and fame.

General Person married his cousin. Tradition says her name was Johanna Philpot, of Granville (b. September 15, 1739). She died insane and without issue. He had two sisters, Martha, who married Major Thomas Taylor, of Franklin County, and Mary Ann (b. May 6, 1736), who married Major George Little, a son of Chief Justice Little, and a Revolutionary patriot of Hertford County. General Person adopted his nephew, William Person Little, who was a son of this marriage, educated him at Sprig's College, near Williamsboro, in Granville County, gave him much of his property, and it is in his honor that Littleton is named. He also had a brother, William Person (b. November 30, 1734), and a brother, Benjamin (b. February 13, 1737).

Person's family seat was at Goshen in Granville County. The sycamore trees planted by him are still standing, but in a decayed condition. He died in Franklin County, at the home of his sister, Mrs. Taylor, on November 16, 1800, (not 1799, as Wheeler says) while on his way from Raleigh to Goshen, and is buried at Personton on Hub Quarter Creek in Warren County.

The Raleigh Register for Tuesday, November 25, 1800, has a notice of his death and character. It is reproduced here, for it shows the esteem of his own generation.

"Died. At the house of Major Taylor, in Franklin County, on Sunday, the 16th inst., Thomas Person, of Warren, in the sixty-seventh year of his age.

"This gentleman was long a member of the General Assembly of North Carolina, as well before as since the Revolution, and at all times conducted himself in such a manner as to manifest a proper and steady regard, not only to the interests of his immediate constituents, but likewise to the welfare and happiness of the people of the State at large.

"He was a member of the first convention and of all the subsequent conventions had in this State. * * *

"He died as he lived, a firm believer and fixed Republican; and although he left no children, * * * he has raised up for himself a name which will neither be forgotten nor cease to be respected. * * *"

Archibald Henderson, a younger contemporary, congressman, and great lawyer, pronounced Person one of nature's noblemen, and Colonel William L. Saunders, a Democrat after Person's own heart, says of him: "Wherever devoted, intelligent, efficient patriotism was required, Person was promptly put on duty. * * * And to-day North Carolina bears in her bosom the bones of no purer patriot than those of Thomas Person" (Col. Rec., VIII, xxx).

Sources: Private information from representatives of the Person family for use in my "Life of Mangum"; the Colonial and State Records, passim, where Person's public life is fully portrayed, with many useful suggestions as to the complexion of political parties in that day from Saunders' "Prefatory Notes" and Dodd's "Life of Macon."

SKETCH OF FLORA McDONALD.

By Mrs. S. G. Ayer.

Flora McDonald was the daughter of Ranald, who was the son of Angus, youngest son of Milton. She was born in Milton in island of Uist, Argyleshire, Scotland, in 1726. I have never yet learned the exact date. Her earlier years were spent in her native Uist, where she could hear the roar of Corrievrecken, and see the mountains of Currada and Skye rise in solemn grandeur toward heaven; or at her brother's home at Corrodale, where she had a commanding view of Loch Boisdale and Loch Skipport, which separate Uist from the main land and the Isle of Skye. Midst scenes of grandeur and sublimity, the earlier years of Flora passed away; but, her father having died, in a few years after Flora's mother married Hugh McDonald of Armadale, in the Isle of Skye.

Skye seems to have been more favored with schools and seminaries than other portions of the Highlands at that time and Flora having the advantage of the ancient institutions was at an early age quite well educated and was deeply imbued with a veneration for the system of clanship, and loyalty to the house of Stuart.

In her teens she was sent to Edinburgh to complete her studies and to acquire the grace and polish suited to her station in life. That she succeeded most admirably may be gathered from the way in which Dr. Johnson in his "Tour of the Hebrides" speaks of her, as a "woman of middle stature, soft features, gentle manners and elegant presence." Mr. James Banks in his "Life and Character of Flora McDonald" also says, "years ago I heard Malcomb McKay, who had been in early life a Cornet in the British Army, remark, that he had seen the Queen of England and many of her attendants, but for grace and dignity Flora McDonald excelled all the women he ever beheld and that it was worth a day's ride to see her graceful manner of sitting or rising from a chair, that there was a perfection of ease and grace in that simple act that could be felt but not described." This sounds extravagant to a nineteenth century woman though we are all ready to admit Flora a most extraordinary woman.

Flora McDonald was related to the Clanranald branch of the family of that name, and was consequently descended from a family of heroes, whose deeds of valor had afforded themes for the immortal Ossian and whose prowess nearly prevented the removal of the Scottish capital from Dunstaffanage (Flora was imprisoned here) the palace of the ancient kings of Scotland, whence the chair of Scone was brought to crown the royal Bruce, and now forms an appendage to the regalia of Britain.

Perhaps I have said enough of the lineage, personal appearance and general characteristics of Flora McDonald. Sir Walter Scott speaks beautifully of her in "Waverly." Her loyalty to the House of Stuart is represented as the ruling passion of her life. Those who have read Waverly remember Flora McIvor. When Prince Charlie landed in Scotland and raised the royal standard on the hills of Moidart and called the chiefs of McDonald, Lochiel and Glengarry to uphold that banner, the young and enthusiastic Flora in her Highland home was heard to exclaim:

"Yes. Up with that banner.
Let forest winds fan her.
It has waved o'er the Stuarts ten ages and more;
In sport we'll attend her,
In battle defend her,
With hearts and with hands like our fathers before."

Ah! but when that banner was trailed in the dust at Culloden, and her prince seeking an asylum and a hiding place in the glens and mountains, over which his ancestors had so long exercised control, when he was persecuted and hunted like a wild animal, hemmed in by the Duke of Cumberland, (victor of Culloden) as by a wall of fire on the little Island of Uist, sentinels stationed at every possible place of escape, patrols were at every ferry and at every pass, even a fleet of British cruisers had surrounded the island, false friends had deserted him, and the timid ones shrunk away in despair, a price was set upon his head, his enemies believed his destruction certain, men of iron nerve quailed and were unable to effect his escape. Now a woman comes to do what brave men dare not, she releases Prince Charles Edward from his island prison.

> Oh, woman, in our hours of ease
> Uncertain, coy and hard to please;
> When pain and anguish rack the brow,
> A ministering angel thou.

And truly "a ministering angel" was Flora McDonald to the poor, despairing Prince. When she was asked by Captain Neal and Lady Clanranald to help the Prince to escape she said that the McDonald (her step father's), McLeod and Campbell militia commanded every pass, the Prince was known to be on the island, a price of thirty thousand pounds was on his head, Loch Skipport and Loch Boisdale were covered with English sails cruising about towards France so that a sparrow could not go beyond their lines without their knowledge. But with her ready wit she devised a plan. She was shown the Prince in a miserable "shieling" on the estate of her brother at Corrodale. She was so overcome, to see her Prince, his clothes in tatters, half famished, preparing his frugal meal, that she knelt before him declaring her readiness to die in the attempt to save him. The Prince raised her from her kneeling posture and assured her "he would always retain a deep sense of so conspicuous a service." On the same day she returned to Milton to make arrangements to take the Prince from Uist to Skye. The next day, June 21, 1746, as she was trying to cross over to Ormaclade, the seat of Clanranald, she was taken prisoner, having failed to provide herself with a passport. On being arrested she refused to answer any questions, and demanded to be taken to the officer in command. This she was denied and was committed to prison for the night. In the morning she was taken before the Commander, who proved to be no less a person than her stepfather, Hugh McDonald of Armadale, to whose house in Skye she expressed a strong desire to go, that she might avoid unpleasant and annoying encounters with the soldiers on the island of Uist. Her request seemed so natural, that he readily consented to give her a passport for herself and Neill McEachin McDonald who acted as her servant. (He was the father of Marshal McDonald, Duke of Tarentum, one of Napoleon's ablest generals). Another passport was also obtained for "Betty Burke," an Irish girl whom she had met on the island, and wished to carry to help her mother spin flax and to keep them company while the master of the house was absent. So unsuspecting was her father that he even wrote to his wife giving reasons for sending Flora from the island and recommending Betty Burke for spinning, and giving leave to hire and employ her till his return. After getting the passport Flora sent a message to the Prince telling him that all was well, asking him to meet her at Rasimish in Benbicula. In the meantime she went to Lady Clanranald's and told her her scheme. Lady Clanranald complimented her and supplied the necessary dress to disguise the Prince as an Irish servant girl. The dress consisted of "a flowered linen gown, sprigged with blue, a light quilted garment, a cap and apron, and a mantle of dun colored camlet, made after the Irish fashion with a hood." She hired a six-oared boat to take them across to Skye, telling the men when and where to meet her. With Lady Clanranald and her servant boy McNeill she went to meet the Prince who had gone by her directions to the wilds of Benbicula. They found him preparing his own dinner which was of the humblest fare. "At dinner Flora occupied a seat on the Prince's right hand and Lady Clanranald on his left." After dinner much to the Prince's astonishment Flora told him he was to go with her as her servant girl and showed him the disguise she had procured for him. The Prince appreciated the ingenuity of the plan and, to the merriment of the ladies, was soon transformed into a rather awkward maid. Scarcely was this done when a messenger came to announce that Captain Furgison had quartered at Ormaclade, making it positively necessary that Lady Clanranald should hasten back that any suspicion might be averted. She took an affectionate farewell of the Prince and left her brave kinswoman alone and comparatively unaided to work out the escape of their dearly loved Prince. It must have been most trying, indeed, to one so young, but she seemed equal to the emergency. When Captain O'Neill, who had up to this time been the inseparable companion of the Prince, refused now to be separated from him, she stood firm and told him if he did go all was indeed lost as she had passports for only three. Both O'Neil and the Prince were obliged to yield and took a most affectionate leave, embracing each other. That evening when they reached the seashore, wet and weary, imagine their distress at not finding the boat which they expected. They were obliged to pass the night on the rock anxiously waiting, but as it did not come they ventured to kindle a fire to dry their dripping clothes and warm themselves. No sooner had they begun to feel somewhat comfortable than "four wherries filled with armed men were seen approaching," this obliged them to put out the fire and look for shelter among "the bonnie blooming heather." Fortunately they did not land or make any search, but, in a short time, the wherries tacked and passed within gunshot of the place where they were concealed. All of the next day they were obliged to seek shelter, these three, among the mountains of that "rock-girt sea," but in the evening their boat came, and immediately set sail for Skye. The evening was "calm, clear and serene" and a gentle favorable breeze rippled over the water, but soon the sky began to lower, the wind rose, the billows rolled mountain high and threatened to engulf their little boat. The even temper of the Prince seems not to have been ruffled by any reverse of fortune; it is related of him that "he was superior to the elements, and to cheer and animate the sailors he narrated incidents of naval valor, and sung songs of the British Isle." Flora feeling that her watchful care was not then necessary to her Prince, closed her eyes and restored tired nature, and prepared for the next day's trials. While she slept the Prince kept watch that she might rest undisturbed. Judge of their anxiety, when day dawned, no land was in sight, and not having a compass they could not tell where they were, or which way to steer. "There is a Divinity that shapes our ends rough hew them as we may." The seamen steered at random, and in a short time were cheered by seeing the headlands of Skye, in the dim distance. What must have been their feeling! When at Waterwish they were fired upon by McLeod's militia. As the bullets fell thickly around them, the Prince tried to persuade Flora to get in the bottom of the boat. She refused to do so but insisted that he should do so. Seeing that she was determined, the matter was compromised by both taking shelter in the bottom of the boat until they had gone beyond danger. About the middle of the next day the boat entered a little creek near Moydhstat in Skye, the seat of Sir Alex. McDonald who was at that time with the Duke of Cumberland at Fort Augustus making plans for the capture of the fugitive Prince, who was on his way to Lady Margaret McDonald's, Sir Alexander's wife; she being a strong Jacobite was anxious for the Prince to escape. She was a daughter of the celebrated Susana, Countess of Alinton, whom Dr. Johnson has immortalized as a beauty and a wit and to whom Allan Ramsey dedicated his pastoral, says: "When Flora reached the castle with the Prince she was surprised to find Captain McLeod quartered there fully empowered to examine and arrest all suspected persons. She intuitively discovered that he suspected her, so instead of avoiding a meeting with him she sought his society and by her easy, pleasant manners so won him that he escorted her to dinner and paid her much attention." As soon as the "Mountain Dew" (I wish I could recollect the formula of this famous drink; Mrs. Furgison gave it to me but with other papers was lost in the fire) was brought on Lady McDonald and Flora retired leaving the gentleman to their "cup." They went immediately to the private apartments of Lady McDonald where the Prince was waiting for them. While they were discussing means for his escape, Captain McLeod knocked at the door. Flora sent the maid "Betty Burke" to open the door, which she did and slowly retired from sight. This little ruse disarmed the Captain of any suspicion he may have entertained, and apologizing for the intrusion returned to the hall. Lady McDonald called to their counsel her husband's factor, Alex. McDonald of Kingsboro (afterwards Flora's father-in-law). He asked that the Prince might pass the night with him, at his home fourteen miles away. To this they readily consented. While Kingsboro (Alex. McD.) was getting the Prince away, Flora took leave of her mother publicly and her manner was so self-possessed that all of Captain McLeod's suspicion was allayed. They walked from Moydhstat to Kingsboro in the pouring rain. The mountain streams were full to overflowing and the Prince came near betraying himself by the awkward way in which he managed his skirts, but after a good many narrow escapes they reached the hospitable mansion of Kingsboro about midnight. The lady of the house was very much alarmed. She feared that Flora had been imprudent in letting the boat which brought them to Skye return to Uist, nor were her fears long in being realized. The men on their arrival at Uist told their suspicions and royal troops set out immediately in purusit. The Prince at a late hour retired and enjoyed the first refreshing sleep he had had for months past. In the morning the lady asked for a lock of his hair as a memento that he had passed a night under her roof; the Prince consented and Flora at his request cut a lock which she divided between Mrs. McDonald and herself. On another occasion the Prince came near being discovered but Flora's self-possession and ready wit saved him. Turning towards him she commanded "Betty Burke" to put on the kettle, "Betty" went to do as bidden and so escaped again, but Flora was afraid to venture to hide him again in her mother's house so determined to put off female attire and disguise him as a farmer. This she did and he made his escape into the country of the Laird of Raasay, who was then outlawed, and in his mountain home bid defiance to the troops of Hanover. The McLeods of Raasay met Flora, the Prince and Neill McEachin at Portree and carried them into their own territory, not only at the risk of their lives, but knowing that their daring act would operate as an excuse for the confiscation of their entire estates. On July 1, 1746, the Prince bade Flora "a tender and affecting farewell, ardently thanked her for her protection during the past ten days, and for having enabled him to escape from the wall of fire by which she had found him environed, and which he could never have passed without her aid and intrepidity. In affecting tones he told her that he yet hoped to meet her at the Court of St. James, when he would be able to reward her heroic devotion to her unfortunate Prince Charles Edward. History tells us though he was denied this privilege he never mentioned her name except in the highest terms of respect.

The Prince escaped from Raasay to France and Flora returned to her brother's home in Uist. Soon after reaching there she was called to appear before McLeod at Tallisker, and answer to the charge of helping the Prince to escape. Her friends entreated her to hide herself for awhile, but she refused to do so and started unprotected and alone to answer the summons. On her way to Tallisker she was met and arrested, not being allowed to take leave of her friends, was carried on board the sloop "Furnace," Captain Furgison commanding. Three weeks later under an escort of soldiers she was allowed to bid her mother adieu, and was much hurt to learn from her that her stepfather was implicated in her offense, and that the people generally believed that he knew when he gave his daughter the passport for "Betty Burke" it was intended for the Prince. Flora bravely denied this charge on her stepfather, saying that she only was to blame. At her earnest request Kate McDonald was allowed to go with her as her maid. She was again taken on board the Furnace, but was soon considered a state prisoner of so much importance that she was exchanged to a vessel commanded by Commodore Smith, who was kind-hearted and very much sympathized with his fair captive in her distress. By his position and influence he was enabled to have her temporarily transferred as a prisoner to Dunstaffage Castle. In September, she was again put on shipboard and carried to Leith Roads, where she was tossed in one of England's naval palaces until some time in November. During this time her name had become famous, as the lass who helped Prince Charles Edward to evade his foes and hundreds came from Edinburgh to see and talk with its Scottish heroine. Among the number were Bishop Forbes, Lady Bruce, Lady Cochran and Lady Clarke, the latter of whom was so eager to do her honor that she was "willing to wipe her shoes." On the 27th of November, having been kept in captivity in Scotland four months, she was placed on board the "Royal Sovereign" and taken to London to await her trial on charge of treason. Government discovering that the people so deeply sympathized with her, that it was thought best not to put her in a common prison or in the tower, but determined to place her in the care of friends, who would be responsible for her appearance, and yet allow government an oversight and knowledge of her correspondence and actions. "In this mitigated imprisonment Flora remained a State prisoner in London about twelve months" until in 1747 an act of indemnity was passed, which set her free, and permitted her to return to her "native Highland home." It is said that during her long imprisonment, she was ever cheerful, her address easy, elegant and winning, while "a subdued and modest gravity deepened the interest excited by her simple, artless character." Upon one occasion, Frederick, Prince of Wales, demanded of her how she dared to aid a rebel against his father's throne? With great simplicity she replied that she would have done the same for him had she found him in like distress. The answer conquered his resentment and made him a lifelong friend.

After her liberation she was a guest of Lady Primrose, and crowds of the nobility came to pay respects to the heroine. Her picture was painted for Commodore Smith and copies were soon scattered throughout the kingdom. One of these copies I have often seen and handled, it being the property of the old lady before referred to—Mrs. Cathrine Furgison; since her death copies have been made from it (she most positively refused to have any copies made during her life) and I now have one of my own which I prize highly.

Flora soon tired of the attentions shown her in London and longed for the quiet of her own home and the mother's love which she knew was waiting her there. In after life Neill McDonald (the same for whom she got the passport as her servant) was accustomed to say that he went to London to be hanged, but, instead was honored by being sent home with Flora McDonald in a coach and four.

In 1750 in the thirtieth year of her age she was married to Alexander McDonald of Kingsboro, son of Kingsboro who had helped in the Prince's escape. We learn from Boswell that Flora's husband "was completely the figure of a gallant highlander, exhibiting the graceful mien, and manly looks, which our popular Scotch songs have justly attributed to that character. He had his tartan plaid thrown around him, a large blue bonnet with a knot of black ribbon like a cockade, a brown short coat, a tartan waistcoat with gold buttons, and gold button holes, a bluish philibeg and tartan hose. He had jet black hair tied behind, and was a large stately man, with a steady sensible countenance." Soon after her marriage her husband's father died and they moved to the Kingsboro estate, the home where she had found one night's rest for the Prince, and here they entertained Dr. Johnson and his friend Boswell. Writing to Mrs. Thrale, Dr. Johnson says: "Flora told me she felt honored by my visit, and I am sure whatever regard she bestowed on me, was liberally repaid. If thou likest her opinion thou wilt praise her virtues." He slept in the same room and on the same bed which the Prince had occupied on that memorable night in 1746. In the morning he (Johnson) left a strip of paper with these words written with a pencil: "Quantatum cedat virtutibus aurum." Boswell translated it: "With virtue weighed, what worthless trash is gold." Kingsboro's estate was in an embarrassed condition, which during his father's lifetime had suffered in consequence of his exertions in the cause of the Prince, having lost his position as Factor in the management of his chief's estate. As is the custom in the "old country" Flora had a marriage contract which gave her all of her maiden property beyond her husband's control; Sir Walter Scott had this document in his possession at the time of his death. She sacrificed her rights hoping to help her husband to repair his losses, and he thinking to better do so decided to try his fortune in the "New World." Accordingly in 1774, they sailed from Cambleton, Kintire, for Wilmington, North Carolina, on board the ship "Baliol."

The fame of Flora had crossed the water in advance of the heroine and when she arrived at Wilmington a ball was given in her honor, which she attended and "took much pleasure in the attention paid her eldest daughter, Anne, who was just then blushing into young womanhood, and bore a striking resemblance to her mother."

When she came to Cross Creek her old neighbors and kinsfolk who had preceded her a few years gave her a truly Highland welcome. "The strains of Pibroch and the martial airs of her native land greeted her on her approach to the capital of the Scotch settlement. "In this village she remained some time, visiting and receiving visits from friends, while her husband went to the western part of Cumberland, looking for land." One day she went to Mrs. Rutherford's, after Mrs. McAustin, (she occupied the house at that time known as the Stuart place just north of the Presbyterian church) and while there she saw a picture of "Anne of Jura" assisting the Prince to escape. Looking at it she said to her hostess: "Turn it to the wa, turn it to the wa, never let it see the light again, it is na true. Anne of Jura was na there and did na help the bonnie Prince." She lived on Cameron's Hill in Cumberland for a short while, and attended "preaching" at Longstreet and Barbecue, two Presbyterian churches. The minister at that time was Rev. Mr. McLeod.

Her daughter Anne married Alex. McLeod of Glendale, Moore County, in 1775. He afterwards distinguished himself in European wars and rose to the rank of Major-General in the British service. She died in Stein, Scotland. In the year 1775-76, Governor Martin, of North Carolina, determined to raise a body of men from among the Scotch Highlanders to be sent to Boston and mustered into the "Royal Highland Emigrant Regiment" to help General Gage to break down all opposition there. He accordingly selected Flora's husband and granted him the commission of Brigadier-General. In order to assemble the Scotch, balls were given in different parts of the settlement. Flora attended some, accompanied by her daughter Anne (now Mrs. McLeod) and a younger daughter Fanny. "Upon these occasions Anne and Fanny reigned supreme and bore off all the honors of the ball." January, 1776, "Kingsboro" McDonald bought a piece of land from Caleb Tuchstone on the borders of Richmond and Montgomery counties, and named it "Killiegray." Here two of Flora's children died and were buried. The road runs near the graves, which now are enclosed by a plain rail fence, by the present owner, a Mr. McLeod. I visited the spot during the winter of 1886 and was impressed by the surroundings. They did not befit the last resting place of Flora's children—simply a rail fence (true in good condition and probably the best Mr. McLeod could afford) around them, all overgrown with brush and weeds; not even the name or date could be deciphered on the decayed headboard. I felt had I the means how I should love to put some mark there by which future generations might know whose dust lay there, if it were nothing more than this. "These are the children of Flora McDonald, the Flora whom all admirers of feminine courage love to honor, she who risked life, fortune and that which every woman holds most sacred, reputation, to save her Prince, the unfortunate Charles Edward." These words inscribed on a marble slab would cost so little and yet would be sufficient to tell to all who read it, whose graves they were. In the field a short distance from the graves the remnant of what seemed to have been a neat four-roomed cottage, my friend told me it had been the home of Flora. I did not see any of the family, they having gone to attend "the meeting" so the neighbors told us. In this I was disappointed hoping to have gathered some information from them in regard to the date of the children's death, their names, etc. I hoped too to get the date of the transfer of the property from the McDonalds to the McLeods, having been told that the present owner was a descendant of the McLeod who bought the property from the McDonalds, and, ah! flattering hope whispered perhaps they treasured the old deeds and I might see them too.

"When the royal banner was unfurled at Cross Creek in 1776, and the loyalist army marched towards Brunswick, under the command of Brigadier-General Donald McDonald, an officer sent by General Gage, who ranked Kingsboro (Flora's husband,) she, with the true devotion of a wife, followed her husband, and encamped one night on the brow of Haymount, near the site of the U. S. Arsenal. In the morning when the army took up its line of march, midst banners streaming in the breeze and martial music floating on the air, Flora embraced her husband, and tears dimmed her eyes as she breathed a fervent prayer for his safe and speedy return to their new home at Killiegray. In company with Malcom McKay (then sixteen years of age) she retraced her steps home, and spent the first night with McKay's mother at Longstreet." After the defeat of the loyalists at Moore's Creek, and the capture of her husband Flora's health seems to have broken. Her husband was kept a prisoner in Halifax, N. C., jail and she was not allowed to visit him at all, so at his earnest request she decided to return to their home in Scotland. She remained a year or two at Killiegray, making frequent visits to Cross Creek where a hearty welcome always awaited her. After many difficulties with the Whig scouts, she succeeded in getting a pass from Captain Ingram (a Whig) in 1779. This enabled her to reach Fayetteville, N. C., and Wilmington, N. C., from which place she made her way to Charleston, S. C. From there she sailed to her native land. "On the passage the vessel was attacked by a French cruiser; during the engagement Flora refused to go below, and remained on deck urging the men to deeds of daring. Her arm was broken in the fight, and she was accustomed to say she had fought for the House of Stuart and for the House of Hanover, but had been worsted each time." Her three sons, Charles, James and John, were in the British army, and Ranald and Sandy were in the naval service of England. Fanny was the only child with her and she seems to have been too young to give her mother the sympathy and comfort she so much needed at this trying time.

Two letters written by Flora McDonald, one in 1780, the other in 1782, were published in the "Jacobite Memoirs," and have since been republished, I think, in Blackwell's Magazine, some time during the forties of the last century.

After peace was restored, her husband was liberated and returned from North Carolina to Skye, where he lived with his family till his death and was buried in Kingsboro burying ground. On the 5th of March, 1790, Flora died and was buried in the church yard of Kilmuir in Skye "within a square piece of brick wall, which encloses the tombs of the McDonalds of Kingsboro," at the age of seventy (70) years. It is said that at least four thousand persons attended the funeral. "A great number of pipers assembled and simultaneously played the usual lament for departed greatness.

Three hundred gallons of the purest 'mountain dew' was served out to the assembled multitude."

Her son, Colonel McDonald, provided a marble slab with a suitable inscription, but it was broken when being carried to the cemetery and every piece of it has been taken away by tourists, anxious to possess some relic of the heroic woman.

Up to seventy years ago there was not even a simple marble stone to mark her grave.

In 1898 one of the Scottish towns, (I do not remember which) elected to have a monument to Flora McDonald. It was a woman in Highland dress. When the statue was brought to the city, the woman was barefoot and the people were so indignant that they refused to accept it. The last accounts it still had not been unveiled.

Flora, by request, when buried was wrapped in the sheet on which the Prince slept when at Kingsboro that memorable night in 1746. It had twice passed through Wilmington and Fayetteville, N. C., as she never allowed it out of her possession.

BIOGRAPHICAL AND GENEALOGICAL MEMORANDA.

COMPILED AND EDITED BY MRS. E. E. MOFFITT.

CLARENCE H. POE.

The following sketch of Mr. Clarence Hamilton Poe, of Raleigh, N. C., the author of the article on "Indians, Slaves and Tories: our early Legislation regarding them," is revised from the 1908-09 edition of "Who's Who in America":

"Clarence Hamilton Poe; journalist; author; born in Chatham County, North Carolina, January 10, 1881; son of William B. and Susan (Dismukes) Poe; educated in the public schools, and at home (his mother having been a teacher) till 16 years of age when he began newspaper work. Editor-in-chief of the Progressive Farmer since 1899; he is now president of the Agricultural Publishing Company; secretary-treasurer of the Mutual Publishing Company; president of the Southern Farm Gazette Company; secretary-treasurer State Literary and Historical Association; chairman of the N. C. State Anti-Saloon League; acting chairman N. C. Child Labor Committee. Baptist. Democrat, unmarried. Author: (in collaboration) "Cotton; Its Cultivation, Marketing and Manufacture," published by Doubleday, Page & Co., 1906, "A Southerner in Europe," Mutual Publishing Co., 1908. Contributor to World's Work, Review of Reviews, North American Review, Atlantic Monthly, and other magazines."

Mr. Poe has two marked qualities that hardly ever fail to make a man worth much to himself and his country: first, he is a persistent and systematic worker; second, he has the analytical faculty which enables him to see the real significance of things and to grasp the essentials. He thinks easily and rapidly, and his energy enables him to carry his thoughts into execution. No man is doing more to advance the interests of the South than he, especially in the line of Agriculture. Endowed with tremendous industry, genuine patriotism, and lofty ideals, in time to come he will be widely known as one of the rebuilders of the South. He has so enlarged his activities that his editorial range stretches from Maryland to Texas. His two papers, the Progressive Farmer, of Raleigh, N. C., and the Southern Farm Gazette, of Starkville, Mississippi, have a combined circulation of about 70,000, weekly, and these lists are increasing at a great rate.

He is not only a remarkable editor but a man of fine business capacity. He is a man of unusual talent and has to his credit many successful magazine articles. He is devoted to the history of North Carolina and serves as Secretary and Treasurer of the State Literary and Historical Association, the purpose of which is "the collection, preservation, production and dissemination of our State literature and history; the encouragement of public and school libraries; the inculcation of a literary spirit among our people; and the engendering of an intelligent, healthy State pride in the rising generation."

Mr. Poe is a man of versatile talents, methodical and painstaking, and withal an excellent citizen. Reared on a farm in the country he sees the need of educating the masses in the best modes of agriculture. He has inherited the patriotism of a patriotic father who was a Confederate soldier and served his country faithfully. He has inherited those traits from an ambitious mother that have made him progressive and painstaking in whatever he undertakes.

That he merits the confidence of his fellow-citizens is attested by the numerous places of honor and trust that he fills.

STEPHEN B. WEEKS.

Stephen Beauregard Weeks, the author of the article on General Thomas Person, belongs to the new school of historical writers who came to the front at the close of the last century. It is composed of the younger men who have been trained in the science of historical investigation. To-day Dr. Weeks stands among the foremost of North Carolina historians.

The Weeks family was of Devonshire, England, and appeared in North Carolina in 1727, when Thomas Weeks settled in Pasquotank County, N. C. The subject of this sketch is of the fifth generation. Dr. Weeks's mother was Mary Louise Mullen (formerly Moullin), of Huguenot ancestry from Virginia. He was left an orphan at the age of three years and was reared by an aunt, Mrs. Robertson Jackson, of Pasquotank County, who taught him habits of industry, economy and sobriety. He attended the country school and prepared for entering the T. J. Horner School at Henderson at the age of fifteen years. From Dr. Horner he received his first real intellectual impulse.

In the year 1886 he entered the University of North Carolina, where he took the degre of A.B. During two years of post-graduate work there in English language, literature, German and Latin he took A.M. in 1887 and Ph.D. in 1888. The three following years, 1888-91, were spent as honorary Hopkins scholar at Johns Hopkins University in the study of history, political science and political economy, and by what he called "invincible attraction" he turned to history and has made that his life work.

In June, 1888, he was united in marriage with Miss Mary Lee Martin, daughter of the Reverend Joseph B. Martin, of the North Carolina Methodist Conference. Mrs. Weeks died in 1891, leaving two children.

Dr. Weeks's second marriage was with Miss Sallie Mangum Leach in June, 1893. She is granddaughter of Honorable Wiley P. Mangum, who was Representative and Senator from North Carolina in the Congress of the United States, and from 1842-1845 President of the United States Senate. His career was highly distinguished and altogether honorable to the State.

Dr. Weeks has held many important positions. He was Professor of History at Trinity College; established the Trinity College Historical Society at Durham, N. C.; was Fellow by Courtesy in Johns Hopkins University; and has spent much time in original investigations along historical lines. He was appointed by the Philanthropic Society of the University of North Carolina to edit its register of members. This gave him acquaintance with the great men of the University, and he branched out from this into his life work. He has the most complete collection of books on North Carolina history, and the largest collection of autographs, pamphlets, and original letters bearing on our State history from the Lords Proprietors to the present time. He is an untiring collector of everything pertaining to North Carolina. He has contributed to the public many monographs on historical matters based on undoubted facts. In July, 1894, Dr. Weeks accepted a position with the United States Bureau of Education, which opened to him a broader field for his chosen profession. He was one of the organizers of the Southern History Association, which has issued ten volumes of high historical value.

In the fall of 1899, his health requiring a change of climate, he obtained a transfer to the Indian service of the National Government, and was stationed at Sante Fé, New Mexico, as principal teacher in an Indian school. Later he served as Superintendent of the San Carlos Agency School in that Reservation. Though far removed from his native State, his interest has not abated, but he was diligent in the use of his spare time in giving the service of his pen for the forward advancement of history.

In 1902 the degree of LL.D. was conferred on him by Wake Forest College.

After a few years in the far West, his health becoming restored, he returned to North Carolina. He resides at Trinity, in Randolph County, and is engaged in the preparation of an Index to the Census Records for 1790, an Index to the Colonial and State Records of North Carolina, a Bibliography of North Carolina, a History of Education in the Southern States during the Civil War, and other matters of history. Dr. Weeks's service to North Carolina is invaluable—and while yet in the prime of life no one can foresee what this active student of our history may yet search out and spread before his fellows.

Facts for the above were obtained from T. M. Pittman's sketch of Dr. Weeks in the Biographical History of North Carolina, Vol. VII.

MRS. S. G. AYER.

Mrs. S. G. Ayer, daughter of Captain Charles Betts Cook and Mary Langdon O'Hanlon, his wife, was born in Fayetteville, N. C., just as the war cloud burst on the fair Southland. The first recorded act of her childhood was knitting a pair of socks for a Confederate soldier at the early age of four and a half years. James Gee, who fought with General Marion in South Carolina, was her great-grandfather. Mary Gee, his wife, by her wit and coolness, saved the lives of two patriots during the Revolution. Mrs. Ayer served as chairman for Cumberland County in 1907, an appointment bestowed by the Jamestown Historical Committee of North Carolina. She rendered most efficient aid and collected many valuable and interesting relics for the North Carolina historical exhibit at the Jamestown Exposition. She married in 1883 Samuel Gee Ayer. She is President of the Liberty Point Monument Association, Fayetteville, N. C. She inherits the spirit of her heroic Revolutionary ancestors.

ABSTRACTS OF WILLS PREVIOUS TO 1760.

FROM SECRETARY OF STATE'S OFFICE.

Will of Peter Shrouck, July 15, 1750, July 10, 1751; brothers Michael and George Capehart; brother John Capehart; father George Capehart, Executor. Test: Edy Citer, John Cricket (Bertie).

Will of Stephen Stevens, Currituck, Apr. 20, 1748, Oct. Court, 1748. Son Michael O'Neal, daughter Thomazin Taylor, Sarah Fanshaw, son John Stevens, daughter Mary Stevens, all my children. Thomas and John Stevens, Executors. Test: Thomas Taylor, Gilbert Portwood, James Mercer.

Will of William Stevens, Beaufort, Feb. 22, 1750, March Court, 1750. Sons James and William, John Barrow and wife Penelope, Executors. Test: Ezekiel Dickenson, Salathiel Mixon.

Will of Joseph Sanderson, Currituck, January 13, 1743. Oct. Court, 1746. Wife Julia, sons Rowland and Thomas, sons Samuel, William, Joshua, Benjamin and Joseph. John Lurry (Leary?) Executor. Test: John Woodhouse, William Bagley, Samuel Jarvis.

Will of James Shirley, Cape Fear, Feb. 10th, 1837-8. Son Desminiere, daughters Susannah and Ann. Wife Ann, Exrx. Test: Dan Campbell, Armand D'Rossett, M.D., Roger Rolfe.

Will of Charles Stevenson, Northampton, July 4th, 1748. Nov. Court, 1751. Sons Benjamin, William, George and Jesse, wife Mary, daughters Elizabeth, Martha, Susannah and Olive. Test: John Dawson, Abram Hood, Edward Streeter.

Will of John Sharee, Craven Co., Oct. 25th, 1730. Dec. Court, 1730. John Thomas, Thomas Blake, Thomas Flybas, Mehitable Rutledge, also my Exrs. Test: Jacob Hover, R. Atkins.

Will of Robert Shearer, Bertie, Oct. 22, 1727. Sons Robert, Arthur, John and William, wife Elizabeth, daughters Prudence and Susannah. Wife, John Dew and Arthur Williams, Exrs. Test: Henry Gray, Joseph Boon.

Will of Daniel Shine, Craven, March 9th, 1757. August Court, 1757. Sons John, Thomas and William, daughter Elizabeth Vaughn. Son James, Tamer Shine and John Oliver, Exrs. Test: Furnifold Green, Charles Williamson, Charles Shine Wolf.

Will of Thomas Smithson, Pasquotank, Nov. 2d, 1742. Jan. Court, 1743. Son Joshua, daughter Marian, sons Joseph and John, daughter Dorcas, daughters Mary Murden and Tamer Morris. Wife Ann and son John, Exrs. Test: Richard Pritchard, Edmund Jackson.

Will of William Sitgreaves, Beaufort, July 5th, 1741, March Court, 1742. Stephen Ford and my aunt Mary Lingard, of Philadelphia, Exrs. Test: Michael Paquinet, Michel Paquinet, Mary Paquinet.

Mrs. Helen DeB. Wills,
Genalogical Department.

Edwards & Broughton Printing Co., Raleigh, N. C.

INFORMATION

Concerning the Patriotic Society

"Daughters of the Revolution"

The General Society was founded October 11, 1890,—and organized August 20, 1891,—under the name of "Daughters of the American Revolution"; was incorporated under the laws of the State of New York as an organization national in its work and purpose. Some of the members of this organization becoming dissatisfied with the terms of entrance, withdrew from it and, in 1891, formed under the slightly differing name "Daughters of the Revolution," eligibility to which from the moment of its existence has been lineal descent from an ancestor who rendered patriotic service during the War of Independence.

"The North Carolina Society"

a subdivision of the General Society, was organized in October, 1896, and has continued to promote the purposes of its institution and to observe the Constitution and By-Laws.

Membership and Qualifications

Any woman shall be eligible who is above the age of eighteen years, of good character, and a lineal descendant of an ancestor who (1) was a signer of the Declaration of Independence, a member of the Continental Congress, Legislature or General Court, of any of the Colonies or States; or (2) rendered civil, military or naval service under the authority of any of the thirteen Colonies, or of the Continental Congress; or (3) by service rendered during the War of the Revolution became liable to the penalty of treason against the government of Great Britain: Provided, that such ancestor always remained loyal to the cause of American Independence.

The chief work of the North Carolina Society for the past eight years has been the publication of the "North Carolina Booklet," a quarterly publication on great events in North Carolina history—Colonial and Revolutionary. $1.00 per year. It will continue to extend its work and to spread the knowledge of its History and Biography in other States.

This Society has its headquarters in Raleigh, N. C., Room 411, Carolina Trust Company Building, 232 Fayetteville Street.

Some Booklets for Sale

Vol. I

"Greene's Retreat," Prof. Daniel Harvey Hill.

Vol. II

"Our Own Pirates," Capt. S. A. Ashe.

"Indian Massacre and Tuscarora War," Judge Walter Clark.

"Moravian Settlement in North Carolina," Rev. J. E. Clewell.

"Whigs and Tories," Prof. W. C. Allen.

"The Revolutionary Congresses," Mr. T. M. Pittman.

"Raleigh and the Old Town of Bloomsbury."

"Historic Homes—Bath, Buncomb Hall, Hayes," Rodman, Blount, Dillard.

"County of Clarendon," Prof. John S. Bassett.

"Signal and Secret Service," Dr. Charles E. Taylor.

"Last Days of the War," Dr. Henry T. Bahnson.

Vol. III

"Trial of James Glasgow," Kemp P. Battle, LL.D.

"Volunteer State Tennessee as a Seceder," Miss Susie Gentry.

"Historic Hillsboro," Mr. Francis Nash.

"Colony of Transylvania," Judge Walter Clark.

"Social Conditions in Colonial North Carolina," Col. Alexander Q. Holladay, LL.D.

"Battle of Moore's Creek Bridge, 1776," Prof. M. C. S. Noble.

"North Carolina and Georgia Boundary," Daniel Goodloe.

Vol. IV

"Battle Ramseur's Mill, 1780," Major Wm. A. Graham.

"Quaker Meadows," Judge A. C. Avery.

"Convention of 1788," Judge Henry Groves Connor.

"North Carolina Signers of Declaration of Independence, John Penn and Joseph Hewes," by T. M. Pittman and E. Walter Sikes.

"Expedition to Cartagena, 1740," Judge Walter Clark.

"Rutherford's Expedition Against the Indians," Capt. S. A. Ashe.

"Changes in Carolina Coast Since 1585," Prof. Collier Cobb.

"Highland Scotch Settlement in N. C.," Judge James C. McRae.

"The Scotch-Irish Settlement," Rev. A. J. McKelway.

"Battle of Guilford Court-house and German Palatines in North Carolina," Major J. M. Morehead, Judge O. H. Allen.

"Genesis of Wake County," Mr. Marshall DeLancey Haywood.

Vol. V.—(Quarterly).

No. 1.

"St. Paul's Church, Edenton, N. C., and its Associations," Richard Dillard, M.D.

"N. C. Signers of the National Declaration of Independence, Part II, William Hooper," Mrs. Spier Whitaker.

No. 2.

"History of the Capitol," Colonel Charles Earl Johnson.

"Some Notes on Colonial North Carolina, 1700-1750," Colonel J. Bryan Grimes.

"North Carolina's Poets," Rev. Hight C. Moore.

No. 3.

"Cornelius Harnett," Mr. R. D. W. Connor.

"Celebration of the Anniversary of May 20, 1775," Major W. A. Graham.

"Edward Moseley," by Prof. D. H. Hill.

No. 4.

"Governor Thomas Pollok," Mrs. John W. Hinsdale.

"Battle of Cowan's Ford," Major W. A. Graham.

"First Settlers in North Carolina Not Religious Refugees," Rt. Rev. Joseph Blount Cheshire, D.D.

Vol. VI—(Quarterly.)

No. 1.

"The Indian Tribes of Eastern North Carolina," Richard Dillard, M.D.

"History Involved in the Names of Counties and Towns in North Carolina," Kemp P. Battle, LL.D.

"A Colonial Admiral of the Cape Fear" (Admiral Sir Thomas Frankland), Hon. James Sprunt.

"Biographical Sketches: Introduction; Maj. Graham Daves." By Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

October, No. 2.

"The Borough Towns of North Carolina," Francis Nash.

"Governor Thomas Burke," J. G. de Roulhac Hamilton, Ph.D.

"Colonial and Revolutionary Relics in the Hall of History," Col. Fred. A. Olds.

"The North Carolina Society Daughters of the Revolution and its Objects."

"Biographical Sketches: Dr. Richard Dillard, Francis Nash, J. G. de R. Hamilton and Col. Fred A. Olds," Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

January, No. 3.

"State Library Building and Department of Archives and Records," R. D. W. Connor.

"The Battle of Rockfish Creek, 1781," James Owen Carr.

"Governor Jesse Frankklin," J. T. Alderman.

"North Carolina's Historical Exhibit at Jamestown," Mrs. Lindsay Patterson, Miss Mary Hilliard Hinton.

"Biographical Sketches: Mrs. S. B. Kenneday, R. D. W. Connor, James Owen Carr and Prof. J. T. Alderman," Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

April, No. 4.

"Lock's Fundamental Constitution," Junius Davis.

"The White Pictures," W. J. Peele.

"North Carolina's Attitude Toward the Revolution," Robert Strong.

Biographical Sketches: Richard Benbury Creecy, the D. R. Society and Its Objects, Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

Genealogical Sketches: Abstracts of Wills; Scolley, Sprott and Hunter, Mrs. Helen de B. Wells.

Vol. VII. (Quarterly.)

July, No. 1.

" North Carolina in the French and Indian War," Col. A. M. Waddell.

" Locke's Fundamental Constitutions," Mr. Junius Davis.

" Industrial Life in Colonial Carolina," Mr. Thomas M. Pittman.

Address: "Our Dearest Neighbor—The Old North State," Hon. James Alston Cabell.

Biographical Sketches: Col. A. M. Waddell, Junius Davis, Thomas M. Pittman, by Mrs. E. E. Moffitt; Hon. Jas. Alston Cabell, by Mary Hilliard Hinton.

Abstracts of Wills. Mrs. Helen DeB. Wills.

October, No. 2.

" Ode to North Carolina," Pattie Williams Gee.

" The Finances of the North Carolina Colonists," Dr. Charles Lee Raper.

" Joseph Gales, Editor," Mr. Willis G. Briggs.

" Our First Constitution, 1776," Dr. E. W. Sikes.

" North Carolina's Historical Exhibit at Jamestown Exposition," Mary Hilliard Hinton.

Biographical Sketches: Dr. Kemp P. Battle, Dr. Charles Lee Raper, Willis Grandy Briggs, Pattie Williams Gee. By Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

January, No. 3.

" General Robert Howe," Hon. John D. Bellamy.

" Early Relations of North Carolina and the West," Dr. William K. Boyd.

" Incidents of the Early and Permanent Settlement of the Cape Fear," Mr. W. B. McKoy.

Biographical Sketches: John Dillard Bellamy, William K. Boyd, William B. McKoy. By Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

April, No. 4.

" St. James's Churchyard " (Poem), Mrs. L. C. Markham.

"The Expedition Against the Row Galley 'General Arnold'—A Side Light on Colonial Edenton," Rev. Robt. B. Drane, D.D.

" The Quakers of Perquimans," Miss Julia S. White.

" Fayetteville Independent Light Infantry," Judge James C. MacRae.

Biographical Sketches: Mrs. L. C. Markham, Rev. R. B. Drane, Miss Julia S. White, Judge James C. MacRae. By Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

Vol. VIII.—(Quarterly)

July, No. 1.

"John Harvey," Mr. R. D. W. Connor.

"Military Organizations of North Carolina During the American Revolution," Clyde L. King, A.M.

"A Sermon by Rev. George Micklejohn," edited by Mr. R. D. W. Connor.

Biographical and Genealogical Sketches: R. D. W. Connor, Clyde L. King, Marshall DeLancey Haywood, by Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

"Abstracts of Wills," Mrs. Helen DeB. Wells.

October, No. 2.

"Convention of 1835," Associate Justice Henry G. Connor.

"The Life and Services of Brigadier-General Jethro Sumner," Kemp P. Battle, LL.D.

"The Significance of the Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence," Prof. Bruce Craven.

"Biographical and Genealogical Sketches: Judge Henry G. Connor, Kemp P. Battle, LL.D., Prof. Bruce Craven," by Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

January, No. 3.

"The Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence," Mr. A. S. Salley, Jr.

"The Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence," Prof. Bruce Craven.

"Mr. Salley's Reply."

"Mr. Craven's Rejoinder."

"Biographical and Genealogical Sketches: Prof. Bruce Craven, Mr. Alexander, S. Salley, Jr.," by Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

"Patriotic Objects."

"Information Concerning the Patriotic Society D. R."

April, No. 4.

"Unveiling Ceremonies."

"Carolina," by Bettie Freshwater Pool.

"The Battle of King's Mountain," by William K. Boyd.

"Schools and Education in Colonial Times," by Charles Lee Smith.

"North Carolina Heroines of the Revolution," by Richard Dillard.

"Biographical and Genealogical Sketches: Bettie Freshwater Pool, William K. Boyd, Charles Lee Smith, Richard Dillard," by Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

North Carolina Education

(Formerly N. C. Educational at Durham, N. C.)

Is a wide-awake monthly devoted to every phase of education in North Carolina. If you are interested in any phase of it, then North Carolina Education should interest you.

One Dollar a Year is the Price

Edited by E. C. Brooks, Chair of Education in Trinity College, Durham, N. C., and W. F. Marshall, President Mutual Publishing Co., Raleigh, N. C.

Address, W. F. MARSHALL, Publisher, 108 W. Martin Street, Raleigh, N. C.

The North Carolina Booklet

A QUARTERLY PUBLICATION ISSUED UNDER
THE AUSPICES OF THE

"NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION"

THIS PUBLICATION treats of important events in North Carolina History, such as may throw light upon the political, social or religious life of the people of this State during the Colonial and Revolutionary periods, in the form of monographs written and contributed by as reliable and painstaking historians as our State can produce. The Ninth Volume begins in July, 1909.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION:

One Year, One Dollar; Single Copies, Thirty-five Cents.

Miss Mary Hilliard Hinton, Mrs. E. E. Moffitt, Editors, Raleigh, North Carolina.

Registered at Raleigh Post-office as second class matter.

Notice should be given if the subscription is to be discontinued. Otherwise it is assumed that a continuance of the subscription is desired.

Send all orders for back numbers to Mrs. E. E. MOFFITT, Raleigh, N. C.

All communications relating to subscriptions should be sent to

Miss Mary Hilliard Hinton,
Midway Plantation, Raleigh, N. C.

Genealogical Department

North Carolina Society

DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION

YOUR ANCESTRY CAN BE CAREFULLY TRACED

The Colonial and State Records of North Carolina, Pay-rolls of Revolutionary Soldiers filed in State Auditor's Office, County Records, Family Records, State Histories and Biographies will be diligently examined.

Fee for Such Researches, $7.00 to $10.00, according to Difficulty of Research (not less than $7.00 paid with order).

Write for particulars, enclosing stamp for reply, to

Mrs. Helen DeBernière Wills,
(Genealogist for N. C. D. R. and Raleigh Circle Colonial Dames.)
Raleigh, North Carolina.

COATS-OF-ARMS
PAINTED

Coats-of-Arms painted, decorated with helmet, lambrequin, etc., and enclosed in passe partout	$12.00
Same style and size, but unframed	10.00
A painted Coat-of-Arms, without helmet, lambrequin, etc., unframed	5.00
India Ink Drawing of Arms	5.00
Searches for Coats-of-Arms, including (if found) a small sketch of the arms	8.00
Arms burned on wood	5.00

Write for particulars, enclosing stamp.

Miss Mary Hilliard Hinton,
"Midway Plantation,"
Raleigh, North Carolina.

The Science of Accounts

SINGLE AND DOUBLE ENTRY
Book-keeping
A TEXT BOOK FOR PUBLIC SCHOOLS

The Graded School Edition. 65 pages, 25 lessons; cloth. Price, 65 cents. Will be ready August 1st.

The High School Edition. 130 pages, 50 lessons, and supplement; cloth bound. Price, $1.00, sent prepaid. This edition will be ready September 1st.

A 32-page Booklet with 10 Sample Lessons will be sent FREE to any subsriber to the N. C. BOOKLET who applies for it.

Address

GEORGE ALLEN, Raleigh, N. C.

Smith's Old Book Store

Raleigh, N. C. and Richmond, Va.

50,000 rare volumes in stock, 20-000 on North Carolina and Southern history. 25 years in business. All kinds of books and relics bought and sold.

IF YOU WILL SEND US A POSTAL

and mention the N. C. Booklet,
we will send you

THREE FREE SAMPLE COPIES OF THE PROGRESSIVE FARMER.

The Progressive Farmer should be read by every North Carolina man or woman who owns or operates a farm, and every farm owner should see that all his tenants read it

"In increased production and valuation of farm and stock, The Progressive Farmer has made me $100 to every $1 I have paid for it," says J. M. Parris, Jackson County, N. C.

THE PROGRESSIVE FARMER, RALEIGH, N. C.

THE NORTH CAROLINA HISTORICAL COMMISSION

ESTABLISHED BY CHAPTER 767, PUBLIC LAWS OF 1903

AMENDED BY CHAPTER 714, PUBLIC LAWS OF 1907.

MEMBERS

J. BRYAN GRIMES, Chairman.....RALEIGH, N. C.
W. J PEELE.....RALEIGH, N. C.
THOS. W. BLOUNT.....ROPER. N. C.
M. C. S. NOBLE.....CHAPEL HILL, N. C.
D. H. HILL.....RALEIGH, N. C.

SECRETARY.

R. D. W. CONNOR - - - - - - - - - RALEIGH, N. C.

PURPOSES.

1. "To have collected from the files of old newspapers, court records, church records, private collections, and elsewhere, historical data pertaining to the history of North Carolina and the territory included therein from the earliest times."

2. "To have such material properly edited, published by the State Printer as other State printing, and distributed under the direction of the Commission."

3. "To care for the proper marking and preservation of battlefields, houses and other places celebrated in the history of the State."

4. "To diffuse knowledge in reference to the history and resources of North Carolina."

5. "To encourage the study of North Carolina history in the schools of the State, and to stimulate and encourage historical investigation and research among the people of the State."—Section 2, Chapter 714, Public Laws of 1907.

The Secretary wishes to correspond with any person who is willing to assist the Commission, by gifts of loans or manuscripts, information of the whereabouts of such documents, or otherwise in carrying out the above purposes.

Address all Communications to the Secretary

The Atlantic Fire Insurance Company

Raleigh, North Carolina.

SOLICITS YOUR PATRONAGE

CASH CAPITAL $125,000

A HOME COMPANY, OWNED AND OPERATED BY HOME PEOPLE.

CHAS. E. JOHNSON, President.
J. G. BROWN, Vice-President.

H. W. JACKSON, Treasurer.
G. H. DORTCH, Secretary.

CAPITAL $100.000.00 SURPLUS $100.000.0

The

Commercial National Bank

RALEIGH, N. C.

The policy of this bank is to conduct its business along the most conservative lines; to restrict its operations to legitimate enterprises; to eliminate all speculative ventures.

OFFICERS

B. S. JERMAN, President. H. W. JACKSON, Cashier.
A. A. THOMPSON, Vice-President. E. B. CROW, Asst. Cashier.
J. J. THOMAS, Chairman of Board.

CITIZENS NATIONAL BANK,
RALEIGH, N. C.

Our customers are guaranteed every accommodation their business, balances and responsibility warrant.

THE OLDEST BANK—LARGEST BANK—AND ONLY NATIONAL BANK IN RALEIGH.

JOS. G. BROWN, President. HENRY E. LITCHFORD, Cashier

DIRECTORS:

JOSEPH G. BROWN. A. B. ANDREWS.
R. H. BATTLE. DR. A. B. HAWKINS.
DR. RICHARD H. LEWIS. WM. J. ANDREWS.
IVEN M. PROCTOR. JOHN C. DREWRY.
S. C. VANN.

THE KEYSTONE

A Southern Woman's Journal, Published Monthly by Southern Women. Now in its 7th year.

Official Organ for the Clubwomen and Daughters of the Confederacy in Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Florida and Mississippi.

SUBSCRIPTION, 50c. PER YEAR

North Carolina Booklet, $1.00 per year—The Keystone and the North Carolina Booklet for $1.10 per year.

Address

MISS MARY HILLIARD HINTON,
EDITOR N. C. BOOKLET,
Midway Plantation, Raleigh, N. C.

BOOKS AND MAGAZINES DURABLY AND BEAUTIFULLY BOUND

ARTISTIC PRINTING

EDWARDS & BROUGHTON PRINTING CO. RALEIGH, N. C.

LOWEST PRICES

Club Programs and Embossed Stationery

ESTIMATES ON APPLICATION

Circumstances Alter Cases

But Not our Cases. They are Always the same. Guaranteed whether Filled or Gold.

Jolly-Wynne Jewelry Co.

RALEIGH, - - - - NORTH CAROLINA.

Thomas H. Briggs & Sons

Raleigh, North Carolina

THE BIG

Hardware Men

PAINTS

MAJESTIC RANGES

Thomas A. Partin Co.

131 Fayetteville Street RALEIGH, N. C.

Dry Goods
Ladies' Furnishings and Novelties

Prompt attention given to local and mail orders.

Darnell & Thomas

118 Fayetteville St. Raleigh, N. C.

Pianos, Organs
Sheet Music ::

The Soul Stirring "DIXIE" a Specialty

J. R. FERRALL & CO.

Grocers

222 FAYETTEVILLE ST.

RALEIGH, N. C.

Raleigh Christian Advocate

Established 1858.

Organ of the North Carolina Conference, Methodist Episcopal Church, South.

Reaches weekly over 9,000 Subscribers.

King's Business College
(INCORPORATED)

CAPITAL STOCK
$30.000.

A personal investigation will convince any one that KING'S is absolutely the Largest, Best Equipped and Most Successful College of Business, Shorthand, Typewriting, Penmanship and English in the Carolinas, regardless of any claims the small fry are making. Strong, financial backing.

Reference: Every Bank and Leading Business Concern in Raleigh or Charlotte.
College Journal and Special Offers FREE.
We also teach Bookkeeping, Shorthand and Penmanship by mail.

Address King's Business College, Raleigh, N. C., or Charlotte, N. C.

"It's worth the difference"

WHARTON & TYREE

RALEIGH, N. C.

Workers in Artistic Photography

Negatives on file of most all N. C. Famous Men

North Carolina State Flags
State Flag Post Cards
State Flag Buttons, &c.

All sizes and prices of State Flags on hand, from the smallest 1-cent Muslin, to the largest Bunting.

Send for price-list.

PINCK. C. ENNISS,
RALEIGH. N. C.

CUT OUT THIS BLANK TO-DAY and mail it at once if you wish to get a copy of

"A Southerner in Europe"

BY CLARENCE H. POE

CLOTH BINDING, 75c. HEAVY PAPER, 40c.

Only a few of the cloth-bound copies are left, and not enough paper bound to last thirty days at the present rate of demand.

NORTH CAROLINA EDUCATION, RALEIGH: "A beautiful and handy little volume of 140 glowing pages, . . . thought-provoking, stimulating, inspiring. . . . It will slip easily into one's side pocket on the way to a railroad station and may be read on a journey of an hour or two. But if your journey be a shorter one, you had better not settle down to the reading of these fourteen absorbing chapters without first having the conductor take a vow that he will put you off at your destination. . . . So easily and appropriately is profitable discussion interwoven with entertaining discourse, that there is not a heavy line in the whole fourteen chapters."

DURHAM HERALD: "An exceptionally attractive little volume of 140 pages in which there is not a superfluous line nor an uninteresting fact—the volume of a thinker, of a philosopher whose impressions are learned in the examples of history."

WILMINGTON STAR, WILMINGTON: "A most delightful book—a book our readers will enjoy, and the price of a copy will be money well spent."

HON. WHITEHEAD KLUTTZ, SALISBURY, N. C.: "'A Southerner in Europe' is as quick and vital as most travel books are lifeless. I wish every Southerner could read it, and lay to heart its practical lessons for his time and his people."

MUTUAL PUBLISHING CO.,
Raleigh, N. C.

GENTLEMEN:—Please send me one copy of "A Southerner in Europe" in_____binding with bill.

Yours truly,

Name_____

Address_____

J. M. BROUGHTON T. B. MOSELEY

J. M. Broughton & Co.

Real Estate and Insurance

City and country property bought and sold on commission.
Rents collected and satisfaction guaranteed.
Oldest Real Estate concern in the city.

OFFICE: 12 West Martin St. RALEIGH, N. C.

LADIES

Why not carry a $1,000 Policy in the

Jefferson Standard Life Ins. Co.

for the benefit of your children? The Jefferson Standard is the strongest in the South.

Home Office, Raleigh, N. C.

The

News and Observer

RALEIGH, N. C.

Published at the Capital City

JOSEPHUS DANIELS
EDITOR

Growth of Circulation

1894,	1,800	subscribers	1901,	6,500
1895,	2,400	subscribers	1902,	7,054
1896,	3,100	subscribers	1903,	8,201
1897,	4,200	subscribers	1904,	9,111
1898,	4,880	subscribers	1905,	10,000
1899,	5,200	subscribers	1906,	11,000
1900,	5,700	subscribers	1907,	12,000

Very valuable. Please handle with Care

Vol. IX. OCTOBER, 1909. No. 2

The North Carolina Booklet

GREAT EVENTS IN NORTH CAROLINA HISTORY

PUBLISHED QUARTERLY
BY
THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY
DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION

CONTENTS

	Page
Gen. Joseph Graham, By Mrs. Walter Clark	61
State Rights in North Carolina Through Half a Century, By H. M. Wagstaff	79
The Nag's Head Picture of Theodosia Burr, By Bettie Freshwater Pool	98
Biographical and Genealogical Memoranda, By Mrs. E. E. Moffitt	105
Abstracts of Wills, By Mrs. H. DeB. Wills	107

SINGLE NUMBERS 35 CENTS $1.00 THE YEAR

ENTERED IN THE POST-OFFICE AT RALEIGH, N. C., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

The North Carolina Booklet.

Great Events in North Carolina History.

Volume IX of the BOOKLET will be issued quarterly by the North Carolina Society Daughters of the Revolution, beginning July, 1909. Each BOOKLET will contain three articles and will be published in July, October, January and April. Price $1.00 per year, 35 cents for single copy.

EDITORS:

MISS MARY HILLIARD HINTON. MRS. E. E. MOFFITT.

VOLUME IX.

General Joseph Graham.....Mrs. Walter Clark.
Indians, Slaves, and Tories: Our Early Legislation Regarding Them, Mr. Clarence H. Poe.
General Thomas Person.....Dr. Stephen B. Weeks.
History of Lincoln County.....Mr. Alfred Nixon.
History of States Rights in North Carolina Down to 1840, Professor H. M. Wagstaff.
George Durant .....Captain S. A. Ashe.
Historic Duels of North Carolina.....Mr. F. M. Harper.
The Early History of Medicine in North Carolina, Dr. Hubert Royster.
Der North Carolina Laud und Colonie Etablissement, Miss Adelaide Fries.
Our Colonial Historians: Hakluyt, Lawson, Brickle, Williamson, Right Reverend Joseph Blount Cheshire, D.D.

This list of subjects may be changed, as circumstances sometimes prevent the writers from keeping their engagements.

The histories of the separate counties will in future be a special feature of the BOOKLET. When necessary, an entire issue will be devoted to a paper on one county.

The BOOKLET will contain short biographical sketches of the writers who have contributed to this publication, by Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

The BOOKLET will print abstracts of wills prior to 1760, as sources of biography, history and genealogy, by Mrs. Helen DeB. Wills.

Parties who wish to renew their subscriptions to the BOOKLET for Vol. IX, are requested to give notice at once.

Many numbers of Volumes I to VIII for sale.

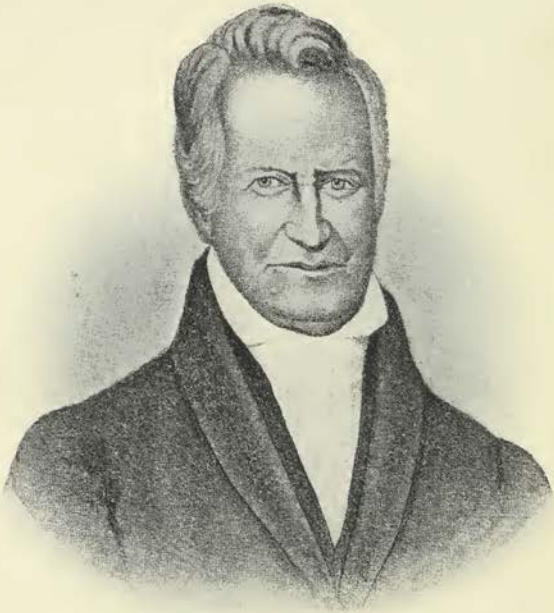
THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET,

Address

MISS MARY HILLIARD HINTON,

"MIDWAY PLANTATION,"

Raleigh, N. C.



Gen. Joseph Graham.

Vol. IX OCTOBER, 1909 No. 2

The North Carolina Booklet

"Carolina! Carolina! Heaven's blessings attend her!
While we live we will cherish, protect and defend her."

Published by
THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY
DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION

The object of the Booklet is to aid in developing and preserving North Carolina History. The proceeds arising from its publication will be devoted to patriotic purposes. Editors.

ADVISORY BOARD OF THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET.

Mrs. Spier Whitaker.
Dr. D. H. Hill.
Mr. W. J. Peele.
Dr. Kemp P. Battle.
Mr. Marshall DeLancey Haywood.
Mr. R. D. W. Connor.
Dr. E. W. Sikes.
Dr. Richard Dillard.
Mr. James Sprunt.
Judge Walter Clark.

EDITORS:
Miss Mary Hilliard Hinton, Mrs. E E Moffitt.

OFFICERS OF THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION, 1906–1908.

REGENT:
Mrs. E. E. MOFFITT.

VICE-REGENT:
Mrs. WALTER CLARK.

HONORARY REGENT:
Mrs. SPIER WHITAKER.

RECORDING SECRETARY:
Mrs. LEIGH SKINNER.

CORRESPONDING SECRETARY:
Mrs. PAUL H. LEE.

TREASURER:
Mrs. FRANK SHERWOOD.

REGISTRAR:
Miss MARY HILLIARD HINTON.

GENEALOGIST:
Mrs. HELEN De BERNIERE WILLS.

Founder of the North Carolina Society and Regent 1896-1902:
Mrs. SPIER WHITAKER.

REGENT 1902:
Mrs. D. H. HILL, Sr.*

REGENT 1902-1906:
Mrs. THOMAS K. BRUNER.

---

*Died December 12, 1904.

THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET.

Vol. IX OCTOBER, 1909 No. 2

GENERAL JOSEPH GRAHAM.

BY MRS. WALTER CLARK.

If, as Pope declares, "the proper study of mankind is man," where can be found more ennobling and inspiring subjects for this study than our Revolutionary patriots? Where can the youth of the present day find characters more worthy of emulation, or a greater stimulus to bravery, honor and loyalty than in the lives of those who, like the subject of this sketch, risked their all in defense of their country, gave her their best services in peace, and laid the foundation of our present liberty?

Joseph Graham was born in Berks County, Pennsylvania, October 13, 1759. His father, James Graham, was of Scotch-Irish descent, and came from near Carlingford Bay, County Down, on the eastern shore of Ireland. The tide of emigration was at its flood in 1729, and the years immediately following, as many as 6,000 coming in one year from Ireland alone. Many of these settled in Pennsylvania, and we can well understand how an adventurous youth of nineteen would be led to cast in his lot with them, to try his fortunes in this new world.

He was twice married, the first wife leaving six children. The second wife was a widow, Mrs. Mary McConnell Barber, who became the mother of five children, Joseph, the subject of this sketch, being the youngest. At the time of James Graham's death, in 1763, affairs had become very unsettled in Pennsylvania, political dissensions had arisen, and general dissatisfaction existed. The "Land of Brotherly Love" was proving an unpleasant abiding place. The climate, too, was severe, and the Indians still aggressive. All these causes combined to induce the sturdy Scotch-Irish to seek again to better their condition. From about the year 1745 there had been a tide of emigration from that section to the South, and reports of a milder climate and more fertile lands and the hope of better political conditions had led many to follow. Soon after James Graham's death a party of these emigrants came to the Carolinas, and the plucky little widow with her fatherless children accompanied them, and came to try her fortune in this Southern country, as her husband had done, leaving the Old World for the New, thirty years before. As we picture in our imagination this emigrant train, and follow it on its toilsome journey, as it winds its slow way along, over hills, through valleys, following the rough and often almost impassable trail, through Virginia and North Carolina to its ultimate destination in Lancaster County, S. C., we can form some idea of the feelings of Mary Graham as she left the old home and the old life behind and with five children, the oldest not more than fourteen years of age, journeyed many hundreds of miles to seek a home in a new and untried country. And the little Joseph, what impressions must have been made upon his childish mind, and how wild and strange it must all have seemed to the child, as the shadows lengthened and, weary with the long, rough journey of the day, they gathered around the camp-fire in the wilderness and prepared the evening meal, keeping a vigilant watch, both for the wild animals of the forest and the cruel savage whose blood-curdling war-whoop was the incarnation of all that was evil and horrible.

At last their destination was reached, but not to find a permanent abiding place, for in a few years Mary Graham removed to Mecklenburg County, N. C., and purchased a home about four miles from Charlotte. Here she rested at last, and continued to reside until her death.

Small of stature, modest and unassuming, she must yet have possessed many of the sterling traits which form the character of the ideal woman. Widowed and alone in a strange country, except for the few friends and perhaps relatives who had accompanied her in the removal to the South, she had soon succeeded in purchasing a home where she gathered her little flock around her, and with her indomitable spirit still unbroken, devoted herself to training them for lives of usefulness. She instilled in them habits of industry, endurance and self-control, with strict adherence to duty and a love and reverence for religion. She gave them the best education the times afforded, fortunately having the advantage of being near one of the best schools in the State, located at Charlotte and called Queen's College. The name was afterwards changed to Liberty Hall, as being more consonant with Revolutionary ideas. The diploma of John, the oldest son, at this college is still preserved, and is perhaps the only one now in existence. It is a worthy ambition to strive that the world may be better because we have lived in it, and nobly in her narrow sphere did Mary Graham fulfill this ambition. Her contribution to its betterment and progress was the lives of these children, and well was she rewarded for her loving care. Her daughters became women of fine character and honored heads of families. Each of her three sons served his country well, holding offices of trust and responsibility and enlisting under her banner in time of war. John, the oldest, studied medicine under Dr. Rush, of Philadelphia, and was a surgeon in the Revolutionary army, and George bore an active part in the Continental line, and participated in many engagements until debarred by a severe attack of illness. He was present at Charlotte, Cowan's Ford, Hanging Rock, etc. He was Sheriff of Mecklenburg County for many years, and afterwards Clerk of the Superior Court till forced by ill health to resign.

Joseph grew to manhood living on his mother's farm and attending school in Charlotte, where he "was distinguished among his fellow-students for talents, industry and a most manly and conciliatory deportment." "He took part in the manly sports of the day, was an expert swordsman, a man of much nerve and considerable surgical knowledge, which on many occasions he used for the benefit of those in need. He had also a practical knowledge of civil engineering and surveying. His interest in learning was great, and when grown to manhood he was ever ready to aid the boy of limited means in obtaining an education. He took great delight in reading history, especially, which he perused always with a geography and dictionary at hand, saying that 'every reader should know just what the writer said and where he was.'"

While still a youth he was eye-witness to a momentous event which marked an epoch in his life. He was a youth of thoughtful habits and alert mind, and took a keen, active interest in the political situation, which became more and more alarming as events succeeded each other. Two or more meetings of indignation and protest had been held during the spring of that year in the county of Mecklenburg, but it was not until the 20th of May, 1775, after news of the battle of Lexington was received, that affairs reached a climax. On the 19th of May a committee, composed of two men from each militia company in the county, met in the court-house at Charlotte, and after a session lasting far into the early hours of the 20th formally renounced allegiance to the British Crown.

Resolutions were passed declaring:

"That we, the citizens of Mecklenburg County, do hereby dissolve the political bonds which have connected us with the mother country, and absolve ourselves from all allegiance to the British Crown; abjuring all political connection with a nation that has wantonly trampled on our rights and liberties, and inhumanly shed the innocent blood of Americans at Lexington." These resolves were six in number, one declaring that "The Crown of Great Britain can not be considered hereafter as holding any rights or privileges or immunities among us," etc., all breathing a spirit of defiance and determination to be free and independent. This was the first absolute declaration of independence in America, and all honor to the brave men who dared to throw down the gauntlet in the struggle for freedom!

Joseph Graham was present, an intensely interested spectator, and the event made so deep and ineffaceable an impression that he was able many years later to write a full and detailed account of the transaction at the request of his friend J. Seawell Jones, who was then preparing a history of the State. It was through the instrumentality of Joseph Graham, about the year 1816, that this great historic event was rescued from oblivion. Among the papers of an aged German neighbor, whose will he was requested to write, he found an old contemporary newspaper, the Cape Fear Mercury, containing the proclamation of the royal Governor, Martin, August 8, 1775, denouncing "a set of resolutions purporting to be a Declaration of Independence by Mecklenburg County." This discovery of Joseph Graham was the only copy of Governor Martin's proclamation then known to exist, and to Joseph Graham alone belongs the honor of rescuing from oblivion this long past occurrence.

On May 20, 1835, a notable celebration was held in Charlotte, and a newspaper account says, "General Graham gave an interesting historical sketch in response to the sentiment 'Our honored guest.'" In 1832 at the close of Joseph Graham's personal recapitulation of his military services, made under oath when applying for a pension, he states: "Was present in Charlotte on the 20th day of May, 1775, when the committee of the county of Mecklenburg made their celebrated Declaration of Independence of the British crown, upwards of a year before the Congress of the United States did at Philadelphia." Is it surprising that those who believe in the truth and honor of Joseph Graham, who was eye-witness to what he describes, should believe also in the Declaration of Independence of May 20, 1775? Like other claims made by North Carolina to precedence in things military and historic, many years had elapsed before this was formally set up. But does any true North Carolinian believe the less in "First at Bethel, Farthest at Gettysburg, Last at Appomattox" because years had elapsed, many of the participants had passed into the Great Beyond, and crops of waving grain had covered the erstwhile battle-fields, for many an autumn before the claim was formally made. It has been said that "North Carolina has been too busy making history to write it," and it seems that these sons of Mecklenburg resumed their daily avocations when once they had boldly made their "Resolves" and dispatched them by a trusted messenger to the representatives in Philadelphia who, blind, it would seem, to their true value and deeming them premature, gave them scant recognition. But soon the time came to prove these words by deeds, and then right nobly did they come up to the mark.

Before appending the interesting enumeration of Joseph Graham's services given by R. H. Morrison it may not be amiss to say a word as to the military regulations of that day. Among the N. C. troops much of the service was largely voluntary. Their term of enlistment and mode of support were unique, and differed greatly from that of soldiers of the line to-day. Though enrolled for a certain term of months, the agreement was that when not in active service they should return to their homes, ready for an instant response to the call to arms. Thus it was with Joseph Graham and his fellow-patriots, and thus were his military services performed. Modestly retiring to his farm and occupations there when his services were no longer needed in the field, he bravely went forth again at the call of duty, on more than one occasion when enfeebled by recent severe illness, or partial recovery from dangerous wounds, or, as at the battle of Charlotte Cross Roads, when by the terms of enlistment his services could not legally be required, he rallied around him his friends and neighbors, and when their homes and loved ones were threatened by a hostile invasion led them in the resistance which they made so bravely and persistently as to earn for that section the soubriquet of "Hornets' Nest," as they, a little handful of determined men, annoyed, harassed and delayed the British army on its march through the State. Again at Cowan's Ford he had scarcely recovered from almost fatal wounds, when he raised a company of cavalry and took a prominent part in this engagement.

Dr. Morrison says:

"He enlisted in the Continental army in May, 1778, at the age of eighteen years. He joined the 4th Regiment of North Carolina regular troops under Col. Archld. Lytle, acting as an officer in Captain Gooden's company. They were ordered to rendezvous in Maryland, but just at this time occurred the battle of Monmouth; the British retreated to New York, and the services of these troops were not needed, so they returned to their homes on furlough. He was again called into service on November 5, 1778, in the command of General Rutherford, was with the troops under General Lincoln in the trying and painful struggles against General Prevost, and took part in the battle of Stono, June 20, 1779. During this campaign he acted as quartermaster. In July, 1779, he had a severe and dangerous attack of fever, and after an illness of two months was compelled to accept a temporary discharge.

"While at his home he received intelligence of the surrender of Charleston and the defeat of Colonel Buford at the Waxhaw, and feeling that his services were needed he at once rejoined the army, and was appointed adjutant of the regiment from Mecklenburg, which was engaged in opposing the British troops under Lord Rawdon.

"When it was understood that the British were marching to Charlotte he was commanded by General Davidson to repair to that place, take command of the American force which should collect there, and join Colonel Davie, which he immediately did. The British army entered Charlotte on the 26th of September, 1780. Joseph Graham was assigned to the command of those troops which sustained the retreat of General Davie, and harassed and opposed Tarleton's cavalry and a regiment of infantry for four miles on the road leading to Salisbury. Finding his numbers inadequate to oppose their progress he withdrew his men and, forming again on an adjacent farm, made another gallant but ineffectual attack on the advancing enemy. Again at Sugar Creek another bold stand was made, on a hill just above the stream, but all in vain as reinforcements joined the already far superior British forces, and the Americans were compelled to retreat. Col. Francis Locke, of Rowan County, was killed just beyond this point, and Joseph Graham soon after was cut down and severely wounded. He received nine wounds, six with the saber, and three with lead. Four of these were deep saber cuts over his head, one in the side, and three balls were afterwards removed from his body; a large stock buckle, which broke the violence of the stroke on his neck, alone saved his life. Being much exhausted with loss of blood he was left for dead on the field, but afterwards, reviving during the night, crawled with infinite difficulty and suffering to the house of Mrs. Susannah Alexander, where he received every attention, and when somewhat improved was taken to the hospital.

"Thus, at the age of twenty-one, we see this gallant officer leading a band of as brave men as ever faced a foe to guard the ground first consecrated by the Declaration of American Independence, and when the foot of tyranny was treading it, and resistance proved unsuccessful, leaving his blood as the best memorial of a righteous cause and of true heroism in its defense.

"Thus, while the whole country was in distress, its property pillaged, its houses forsaken and its defenseless inhabitants flying from the shock of arms, a few noble sons of Mecklenburg compelled Lord Cornwallis to designate Charlotte as the Hornets' Nest of America.

"As soon as his wounds were healed he again entered the service of his country. Having raised a company of fifty-five men in two weeks, he was placed in command by General Davidson. It showed not only his energy of purpose but his great influence, that in this difficult and hazardous period of defeat and depression he could accomplish this. This company was composed of mounted riflemen, armed also with swords and pistols. They furnished their own horses and equipments, and entered the field with every prospect of hard fighting and little compensation.

"At this time the plan of opposing Lord Cornwallis in crossing the Catawba River was arranged by General Greene, and its execution assigned to General Davidson. Feints of passing were made at different places but the real attempt was made at Cowan's Ford. The company commanded by Joseph Graham was the first to commence the attack on the British as they advanced through the river, but in spite of such brave opposition they as bravely advanced, gained the opposite bank, and returned a galling fire upon the Americans. Two of Graham's men were killed. General Davidson had fallen at the beginning of the action as he was standing sword in hand cheering on his handful of brave men, so valiantly opposing the advance of the enemy. The North Carolina troops under General Pickens continued to pursue the British as they advanced toward Virginia. Joseph Graham with his company and some troops from Rowan County surprised and captured a guard at Hart's Mill, one and a half miles from Hillsborough, where the British army then lay, and the same day joined Colonel Lee's forces. The next day they were in an engagement with Colonel Pyles in command of 350 Tories on their way to join Tarleton. Shortly after Graham's company took part in the battle of Clapp's Mill, on the Alamance, and within a few days also in that of Whitsell's Mill, under the command of Colonel Washington.

"During the summer of 1781 but little military service was performed in North Carolina, as the British had retired to Wilmington. In September General Rutherford, who had been a prisoner, was released and immediately gave orders to Joseph Graham, in whose military prowess and great influence he had unbounded confidence, to raise a troop of cavalry in Mecklenburg County. The legion being raised, Robert Smith was appointed colonel and Joseph Graham major, and at once set out for Wilmington, the present headquarters of the British. South of Fayetteville an attack was made near McFall's Mill on a body of Tories who were signally defeated and dispersed, though headed by four colonels opposed to the youthful major. Next a band of Tories on Mr. Alfred Moore's plantation opposite to Wilmington was surprised and defeated. On the next day he with his troops made a resolute attack on the British garrison near the same place, and soon afterwards commanded the party which defeated the celebrated Colonel Gainey near Lake Waccamaw.

"This campaign closed Joseph Graham's services in the Revolutionary War, as it was soon terminated by the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown.

"He had commanded in fifteen engagements, with a degree of courage, wisdom, calmness and success surpassed perhaps by no officer of the same rank. Hundreds who served under him have delighted in testifying to the upright, faithful, prudent and undaunted manner in which he performed the duties of his trying and responsible station. Never was he known to shrink from any toil however painful, or quail before any danger, however threatening, or stand back from any privations or sacrifices which might serve his country. To secure her liberties he spent many toilsome days and sleepless nights; for her he endured much sickness, fatigue and suffering without a murmur; for her his body was covered with wounds; to her welfare he consecrated his time and treasure and influence during a long, unblemished life."

At the close of the Revolutionary War Joseph Graham returned to life on the farm with his mother, and resided there until his marriage, in 1787, to Isabella, daughter of John Davidson, one of the signers of the Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence. She also was of Scotch-Irish lineage, her ancestors settling first in Pennsylvania, and then removing to North Carolina in 1740. They came first to Rowan County and afterwards to Mecklenburg, where the old homestead is still in the hands of descendants. After Joseph Graham's marriage he removed to what was then known as the Red House, near the Catawba River, and lived there for four years. He then engaged in the manufacture of iron with his brother and father-in-law in Lincoln County, where Vesuvius Furnace was erected, and his residence built near by. This was the family homestead where his children were reared. It was located near the main line of road, and he had many visitors, men of letters with whom he delighted to converse, and others. The situation was very attractive at the head of three terraces, and approached through an avenue of cedars.

His marriage was most fortunate. His wife possessed not only great beauty of person but loveliness of character, and was a devoted wife and mother. Her true kindness of heart was shown in the motherly care and consideration she gave to the orphaned son of Gen. Wm. Lee Davidson, who married her sister, and fell at the battle of Cowan's Ford. The characteristics which had made Joseph Graham the stay and comfort of the brave little mother as years advanced upon her, made him now the excellent husband and father. Tradition says that when her useful life was nearly spent, and she became too feeble to walk, he would lift her in his strong arms and tenderly place her out on the old-fashioned "settle" (as the wooden bench or lounge of that day was called) under the shade of the trees where she loved to lie during the long summer days.

Joseph Graham's wife died in 1807, leaving a large family of children: Mary, who afterwards became the wife of Rev. R. H. Morrison, D.D., and William, only three years old, being the youngest. To them especially he was both father and mother, and showed the greatest tenderness and care. When he left home to command the brigade against the Creek Indians little William rode with him on his horse as far as a certain rock which is still pointed out. Here the motherless child bade him adieu and gave him up to the uncertain fortunes of war. This war was unexpectedly ended, however, and the father's absence was not long protracted. This was in 1814. The Creek Indians in Alabama had become so aggressive that more troops were needed, and President Madison made a requisition on the Governors of North and South Carolina each for a regiment. These formed a brigade to the command of which Joseph Graham was appointed by Governor Hawkins, with the rank of brigadier-general. By exasperating delays of the War Department in furnishing supplies this brigade did not reach the seat of war until the battle of Horse Shoe had forced the Indians into submission, and after this there were only a few skirmishes and the final surrender of these hostile Indians. This was his last military service. He served several terms as major-general of the State militia. At that period these officers were elected by the Legislature for a term of three years. Joseph Graham led an active life, interested in all public questions, always a patriot, with the welfare of his country at heart in peace as in war. He was Sheriff of Mecklenburg County after the war and several times a member of the Court of Common Pleas and Quarter Sessions, which was composed of five members elected by the justices of the peace. He was a member of the first convention of the State to consider the proposed Constitution of the United States, which met at Hillsboro July 21, 1778. In November of that year we find him a member of the State Senate which met at Fayetteville. This was the last Legislature in which the members wore their hats, the Speaker alone being uncovered, and they laying aside their hats only while addressing the Chair. He served several terms in the Legislature and was much interested in all bills in favor of internal improvements and general education. He voted for the establishment of the State University in 1788-9, and was made a member of the first board of trustees of this great State institution, as he had been of the first academy established in Lincoln County. At the request of a mass-meeting of the citizens of Morganton he presented a memorial urging the establishment of a military academy in the State and proposing a plan therefor which was favorably received and complimentary resolutions passed, but no final action taken.

His contributions to literature were mainly on military matters, many of them written at the request of Judge Murphey. The correspondence between them, which is reproduced in "Joseph Graham and his Revolutionary papers," is full of interest. Judge Murphey, about the year 1820, decided to write a history of North Carolina, and with that intention, corresponded with those he thought competent to furnish information. His first intention seems to have been to cover only the Revolutionary period, and to correct mistakes concerning North Carolina troops. But on Joseph Graham's suggestion that he make it a complete history of the State he changed his plan. He had collected much material for this purpose, but died before completing the work. Murphey wrote him: "I have been kindly aided by a few of the officers and soldiers of the North Carolina line, but by none so liberally as yourself." In 1827 Joseph Graham writes a correction of various misstatements which had found a place in history regarding North Carolina troops. Major W. A. Graham says: "The fact that the troops which gained such distinction under the command of General Pickens were from North Carolina, and mainly from Mecklenburg and the adjoining counties in North Carolina, had until recently like the Mecklenburg declaration escaped the attention of our best informed writers. For the preservation of this and other interesting events in our Revolutionary history we are indebted entirely to the careful pen of General Graham."

If the testimony of Joseph Graham is to be accepted on all these points of history which he was requested to settle, mainly from his own personal knowledge and recollection after the lapse of many years, and if his decision was received as the ultimatum by Judge Murphey and other students of history of acumen and discrimination where dates, figures and numbers of troops engaged were in question, then why should the testimony of the same witness be discredited when the Mecklenburg Declaration of the 20th of May is the point in question? Why should it be imagined he would "mix" the dates of the 20th and 31st of May more than those of the days on which the battles of King's Mountain, Pyle's Massacre or Moore's Creek occurred? Why one "style" of reckoning for them and another for the 20th of May just before? Is it credible that he could not discriminate between two separate and distinct events of such different tenor, occurring on such different dates as the 20th and 31st of May?

Joseph Graham's writings comprise, first, a chronology of military events beginning with the battle of Ramseur's Mill, 20th June 1780 (as he was too young to have participated in any campaign previous to that time); second, Hanging Rock; third, expedition against the Tories in the forks of the Yadkin; fourth, affair at Colson's Mill; fifth, engagement at Rocky Mount; sixth, engagement at Charlotte Cross Roads and events preceding and following; seventh, McIntyre's farm; eighth, Royal Governor Martin's proclamation; ninth, retreat of Cornwallis to Winnsboro; tenth, Cowan's Ford; eleventh, Shallow Ford; twelfth, Hart's Mill; thirteenth, Pyle's massacre; fourteenth, Dickey's farm; fifteenth, Clapp's Mill; sixteenth, Whitsell's Mill; seventeenth, closing scenes of the Revolution in North Carolina. Many of these were accompanied by maps drawn by himself from personal observations made at the time, as in the battle of Cowan's Ford and others; or by careful measurements under the supervision and direction of actors in the scene, as in that of King's Mountain, from which he was absent on account of severe and almost fatal wounds recently received. Like the Confederate veteran of to-day his greatest joy was in recalling the deeds of the past, and this literary work was to him a great pleasure.

In the year 1834, as age advanced upon him, he gave up to his two sons the business of manufacturing iron in which he had been engaged for many years, and which had proved very lucrative, and built a residence on an adjacent farm about a mile distant. His daughters were by this time all married, and he resided here with his unmarried son James, who for several years represented this district in Congress until his death, November 10, 1836. This place is now the family homestead of Maj. W. A. Graham, and called "Forest Home." The original house was burned some years ago and has been replaced by a modern and commodious structure. Joseph Graham is buried in the cemetery of Machpelah Church, which he and others of the family like Abraham of old "purchased for a possession of a burying place" soon after his removal to Lincoln County.

In closing I can give no better summary of his character than that made by one who had known him long and intimately, Rev. Robert Hall Morrison, D.D., himself a man of most exalted character. In the obituary printed immediately after Joseph Graham's death he thus describes him:

"His intercourse with others was marked by great dignity of deportment, delicacy of feeling, cheerfulness of spirit, and equability of temper. Men of learning and high standing have often expressed much gratification of his company and surprise at the extent and accuracy of his knowledge. In the circle of private friendship his excellencies were strikingly displayed. He was far—very far—removed from all those feelings of selfishness, vanity, suspicion or envy which unfit men for the duties and joys of social life. His eye was always open to the virtues of his friends; his heart was always ready to reciprocate their kindness, to sympathize with their sorrows and overlook their infirmities. His hand, his time, his counsel and his influence were all at the command of those who shared his confidence and deserved his affection.

"But there was another circle nearer to his heart in which he was still better prepared to shine and in which true excellency displayed is a brighter and surer evidence of worth. Justice could not be done to his character without being known in the family circle. As a husband, a father and a master those alone who were the objects of his attachment, forbearance and tenderness could duly appreciate his conduct and demeanor.

"His life was a bright pattern of those virtues which are essential to the purity and peace of society. He possessed a lofty and delicate sense of personal honor and virtuous feeling. His presence was always a rebuke to the arts and abominations of evil speaking, profanity and defamation. If he could not speak well of his fellow-men he was wise and firm enough to say nothing. He regarded the reputation of others as a sacred treasure, and would never stoop to meddle with the private history or detract from the good name of those around him. He felt that the sources of his enjoyment and the causes of his elevation were not to be found in the calamities of his fellow-men, and hence his lips were closed to the tales of slander and his bosom a stranger to the wiles of calumny. Did all men act on the principle which governed him in this respect a hideous train of evils which mar the purity and disturb the peace of society would cease to exist.

"But General Graham did not believe when he had served his country, his family and his friends, his work on earth was finished. With an unwavering conviction of the truth and importance of religion, he professed to serve God and to seek for salvation by faith in Christ. For a long period of time he was a member of the Presbyterian church, and for ten or twelve years previous to his death he was a Ruling Elder of Unity under the pastoral care of Rev. Mr. Adams. He cherished a most profound respect for the ordinances and duties of Christianity, and attended with deep interest and uniform punctuality upon the means of grace. He delighted much in reading the word of God and in hearkening to the instructions of ministers of the gospel, for whom he always manifested the greatest regard. In selecting his library he proved how high an estimate he placed upon Christian instruction, and in his most unreserved intercourse with pious friends his deep and pervading concern for true and undefiled religion was apparent. No circumstances would deter him from manifesting the most decided contempt for the groveling spirit of infidelity and irreligion.

"By a life of temperance and regular exercise, with the blessing of God, he enjoyed remarkable health and vigor of constitution. On the 13th of October, 1836, he made the following minute in his day-book, 'This day I am seventy-seven years of age and in good health, Dei Gratia.'

"As the disease which terminated his life was apoplexy, its paralyzing stroke was sudden and unexpected. He rode from Lincolnton on the 10th of November, and on the evening of the 12th closed his eyes upon the cares and trials of a long, useful and honorable life."*

* It gives me pleasure to acknowledge here the invaluable assistance I have found, in the preparation of this sketch, in "The Life and Revolutionary Papers of Gen. Joseph Graham," by Maj. W. A. Graham; and also in the excellent obituary by the Rev. R. H. Morrison, D. D.

STATE RIGHTS IN NORTH CAROLINA THROUGH HALF A CENTURY.

BY H. M. WAGSTAFF.

North Carolina emerged from the Revolution with two distinct factions in her Whig party, factions that had been held in partial harmony during the war by the necessity of presenting a solid front to the British and Tories. One of these factions was led by Willie Jones, and may be known as the popular, democratic, or radical party. It had sought to enthrone democracy in the State Constitution in 1776. It emphasized State individualism and stressed the principle of decentralization in the relation of the States to the government of the Confederacy. The other faction was directed by Samuel Johnston, and showed a tendency toward class government in State politics. It was duly appreciative of the benefits arising from common action between the States and desired proper deference from the States to the authority of the Confederate government. With the pressure of war and Toryism removed, these factions became separate parties, animated by strongly opposed sentiments.

The first issue of large interest between them was the treatment to be accorded the defeated Loyalists, this, by its nature, leading to the larger question of the amount of authority the Congress of the loosely-jointed Confederacy was to be allowed to exercise. Congress's peace treaty with England had provided for the rights of return to Loyalists and the restitution of their confiscated property. Jones and his followers held that Congress had exceeded its authority in incurring such an obligation and on this account it need not be respected.

On the other hand the party under Johnston was sufficiently imbued with ideas of international honor to demand the execution of the treaty. The party was now in the minority, however, despite the fact that in its ranks were found Johnston, James Iredell, Alexander Maclaine, Wm. R. Davie and Wm. Hooper, the men most state prominent during the Revolution. All these deprecated the tendency to individualize the State and place its interests paramount to those of the Confederacy. It was this party, therefore, that in 1786 eagerly supported the movement to reform the Articles of Confederation. A demand was growing strong throughout the Confederacy for a closer union of the states as a means of ending the confusion into which the whole country was falling.

But in North Carolina the movement for creating a more effective union gathered force slowly. Despite the chaos in finance, in justice, in interstate commercial relations, and a general failure to realize the blessings that independence had seemed to promise, the majority party in North Carolina by no means despaired of the state or showed signs of a loss of faith in independent state democracy. State politics absorbed all its interests. Delegates were chosen to Congress but their seats for the most part remained vacant,[1] the State being totally unrepresented a number of times between 1783 and 1786.

Nevertheless, despite the indifference manifested by the majority party in North Carolina and other of her sister states, the American Confederation was now on the eve of a radical political change, a change the more significant in that it was not generally demanded by the thirteen independent sovereignties affected. The action which proved to be the first step in the reorganization of the Confederation was the call by Virginia of a trade convention to meet at [1] Chairman of Congress to Governor Caswell. N. C. Colonial Records, XVIII, 515, 659, et seq.

Annapolis in September, 1786. Though public opinion in North Carolina appeared indifferent Governor Richard Caswell, standing midway in state politics between the radicals and conservatives, appointed five delegates to represent the state at Annapolis. Only one of the number, Hugh Williamson, made an effort to attend, he reaching the Maryland capital on the day the convention adjourned. But before adjournment the body had recommended to Congress the call of a constitutional convention for the purpose of amending the Articles of Confederation in the interest of more perfect union. Congress, already convinced of the imperfections of the Constitution and its own impotency, acted upon the suggestion within the same month.

The North Carolina General Assembly responded to the call by the appointment of a delegation of five, consisting of Governor Caswell, Willie Jones, Alexander Martin, Richard Dobbs Spaight and Wm. R. Davie. It was understood[2] that three of these, Caswell, Jones and Martin, were state rights men. Davie and Spaight were avowedly favorable to the idea of greatly strengthening the Federal government.[3] The preamble to the act[4] of appointment, however, embodied the sentiment of the conservatives and seems to have been due to their exertions. It was perhaps as much on this account as for his lack of sympathy with the whole movement that Jones at once declined to serve. The Governor, so empowered by the act, filled the vacancy by the appointment of Hugh Williamson, and also named William Blount in his own stead. Both these classed as advocates of stronger union, hence the political complexion of the delegation was entirely changed. Only one radical, ex-Governor Martin, remained in the delegation.

[2] McRee's Life of James Iredell, II, 151. Iredell to Mrs. Iredell, Sept. 30, 1786.

[3] Ibid., II, 168. Spaight to Iredell.

[4] Public Acts of N. C., 1786, 412.

The delegation as completed was in full attendance upon the Philadelphia convention soon after its organization in May, 1787. Martin showed himself pliable. Practical harmony prevailed among them and the delegation bore its proportionate part in making the great instrument of government that was produced. The views of the North Carolina delegates as to the nature of the government in process of formation are clearly indicated in their attitude upon the various compromises that were found necessary between conflicting interests in the convention. In advocating the choice of senators by the state Legislatures Mr. Davie said that the government forming was partly federal, partly national: "It ought in some respects to operate upon the States, in others upon the people." [6] Alexander Martin said: "United America must have one general interest to be a nation, at the same time preserving the particular interests of the States." [7] The delegation stoutly supported the southern demand that at least three-fifths of the slaves should be counted in apportioning representatives to the states, Davie saying, in the debate, that "If the Eastern States mean to exclude them altogether then the business (of confederation) is at an end." [8] As to the continuation of the slave trade the delegation was lukewarm, but finally voted with South Carolina and Georgia, apparently from a fear that those states would reject the Constitution if the trade was abolished at once.

When the Constitution was completed only three members signed for North Carolina, Davie and Martin having re-

[5] N. C. State Records, XX, 637, 683.

[6] Madison Papers, Supplementary to Elliot's Debates on the Federal Constitution, V, 265.

[7] N. C. Records, XX, 753. Martin to Governor Caswell. With Martin, however, the political pendulum had swung so far away from particularism that events were soon to prove he had lost the confidence of his party.

[8] Madison Papers, Sup. Elliot's Debates, V, 303.

turned home near the end of the convention to meet business engagements. Both, however, would very probably have signed had they been present.

The great struggle in North Carolina, as in a number of the other states, was yet to come over the question of ratification. Apparently the trend of public opinion in the latter part of 1787 was toward a sanction of the new Constitution. This was due to the effective campaign carried on by Johnston's party followers, now calling themselves federal men, or federalists. The party was determined to win a majority in the General Assembly, to elect their party chief as Governor, and call a state convention to pass upon the Constitution. The program was carried out. The new Legislature on joint ballot was able to elect Johnston and call a state convention to meet at Hillsboro in July of the following year (1788).

But the battle was not yet half won. Early in 1788 Jones, aided by such able lieutenants as Timothy Bloodworth, David Caldwell, Judge Samuel Spencer and Maj. Joseph McDonnell, of King's Mountain fame, began to marshal the forces of the opposition. North Carolina has probably produced no abler party strategist than Jones. The party cue was given by him at Halifax.[9] The federal judiciary, he said, would play havoc with the authority of the state's courts; the poor were to be ruined by money collections and federal taxation; there was no provision for freedom of conscience, the states were to be absorbed by the central government. These ideas and others of like tenor were potent arguments to the average North Carolinian against surrendering his dearly-bought liberties to an untried form of government. The anti-federalist propaganda rapidly began to have effect. The State judiciary was practically unanimous[10] in its opposition to the Constitution. Party lines were closely drawn in the election of delegates to Hillsboro. On account of his compliant attitude at Philadelphia, Alexander Martin was now rejected by his former constituents for a seat in the convention. The eastern counties, where most of the federalist leaders resided, were closely contested, the Cape Fear country was generally favorable, and the western country decidedly opposed to the Constitution. The elections were very exciting in many places in the east, but took place generally without fraud or violence, scoring a heavy victory for the antis or state rights party.

[9] McRee, II, 217. Davie to Iredell, outlining Jones's position. Davie was neighbor to Jones at Halifax.

So clear a verdict from the voters at first decided the antifederal leaders to reject the Constitution absolutely and finally. But before the Hillsboro convention met, July 21, 1788, ten states, among them influential Virginia, had ratified. This had a certain weight with the opponents of the Constitution in North Carolina. Jones, therefore, announced[11] his purpose of procuring rejection in order to give weight to the amendments which the states generally were preparing as they ratified. This program was altered slightly toward the end of the convention under pressure from the strong array of federalist leaders who found seats in the convention. But the utmost concession the antifederal majority would make was non-adoption instead of direct rejection. To the final resolution,[12] referring the question to a possible later convention, was appended a declaration of rights and a list of twenty-six amendments[13] to be laid before Congress at its first session. The first of these guaranteed the reserved rights of the states; the remainder were for the most part restrictions upon the federal executive [10] Ibid., II, 183. Maclaine to Iredell.

[11] McRee, II, 230. Davie to Iredell, July 9, 1788.

[12] Elliot's Debates, IV, 242.

[13] Elliot's Debates, IV, 244.

and judiciary and an enlargement of the powers of Congress at the expense of the other two branches. The decisive vote showed the opponents of adoption an even hundred in the majority. The convention adjourned sine die on August 4.

But the example of the other states began at once to work like leaven. News of New York's ratification came immediately after the adjournment at Hillsboro. This left only Rhode Island and North Carolina without the federal pale. Public opinion grew uncertain. The federalist leaders renewed their activity, determined to secure a majority in the new Assembly that would meet in November. Governor Johnston also aroused the friends of the Constitution everywhere to prepare petitions[14] to lay before the Assembly for a new convention.

The swing of the political pendulum was now toward federalism. Jones exerted all his powers to stay its momentum, but the opposition made large gains everywhere except in his own district. When the Assembly met, its membership was found to be almost evenly divided between the parties. The petitions came in in large numbers. It was evident that public opinion now demanded that the Constitution should be considered anew. North Carolina, completely out of relation with the other states, evidently felt lonely. Moreover, she feared trade discrimination by the new-formed Union. A convention bill was, therefore, prepared and passed; but the anti-federalists were strong enough to fix its date of meeting six months later than that upon which the first Congress of the new Union was to convene.

When the first Congress met, in April, 1789, there was some disposition manifested to treat North Carolina and Rhode Island as actual foreign States. Impost and tonnage bills introduced early in the session contained proposals to lay discriminatory duties upon their trade with the Union. Hugh Williamson, accredited agent of North Carolina to the government of the Union, memorialized Congress against such a course and urged forbearance.[15] Only a little time, he said, was needed to bring his state into the Union. The proposed hostile clauses, however, were never pressed, the attitude of the Union toward the states outside being one of courteous invitation. Some of the states already in perhaps felt as did the fox in the fable: having lost their own tails they wished others to dispense with brushy adornment. Already southern public men had begun to recognize a "southern interest" as opposed to northern interests and now devoutly wished for the accession of North Carolina as a means of preserving the balance of power.[16]

[14] These petitions are in manuscript in the N. C. Archives, office of Secretary of State, Raleigh.

The second North Carolina convention called to consider the federal Constitution met November 16, 1789, and five days later passed an ordinance of ratification by a majority of 118 votes. The journal[17] of the six days session contains the bare outline of the proceedings, hence it is impossible to determine the spirit of the debates unless extant correspondence of federalists be accepted. Governor Johnston wrote that the opposition was "still violent and virulent," and Davie upon the first day was doubtful whether ratification could be effected.[18] But Davie had signally failed to correctly estimate the rapidity with which sentiment for union had ripened since the adjournment at Hillsboro, now more than a year past. Moreover, the position the federalist leaders themselves had taken in defense of the Constitution had labeled them as thorough State rights men provided they had the state once inside the Union. Their speeches in the [15] Williamson to Congress. Ms. State Archives.

[16] Pierce Butler, of S. C., to James Iredell. McRee, II, 263.

[17] Journal of the Fayetteville Convention, 1789, in N. C. State Records, XXII, 36-53.

[18] McRee, II, 271. Davie to Iredell.

Hillsboro convention, the propaganda they had industriously circulated after the convention, and their general attitude toward union conclusively shows that they regarded the Constitution as a mere federal compact and the general government as but the agents of the states creating it. With this view held persistently before the anti-federalists, enough of them bowed their heads to enable the state to give sanction to the Constitution.

Whatever form of government the logic of subsequent events may have shown the Constitution to have created, no one could become familiar with the spirit prevalent in both parties in North Carolina in 1789 without reaching the conclusion that adoption there was based on a belief that it created a governmental compact with powers given superior to the old Articles of Confederation only for the purpose of efficient administration. Though North Carolina entered the Union only after hesitancy and mature deliberation, yet her subsequent history conclusively proved her loyalty to it as long as its government represented her original interpretation of the Constitution.

Ratification in North Carolina had been effected during a surface reaction from the tendencies toward state individualism represented by Willie Jones. It was inevitable that a moderate reaction in the opposite direction should now occur. Adjustment to the new order of things could not be without certain jars and friction between federal and state authority. The anti-federalists soon formed themselves into the Republican party and assumed the role of critic. When excitement arose in the last months of 1790 over Alexander Hamilton's scheme for federal assumption of state debts, the popular branch of the North Carolina General Assembly, much opposed to assumption, refused[19] by a vote of 55 to 26 to take the oath to support the [19] Journal of the House. N. C. State Records, XXI, 1021.

Constitution prescribed by Congress for such state officers as governors, members of legislatures and others. A second incident concerned the adjustment of the federal judiciary. A writ of certiorari was issued from the federal district court of North Carolina by direction of three of the United States Supreme Court Judges (Blair, Rutledge and Wilson), directed to the Court of Equity in North Carolina, for bringing up an equity case.[20] The state judges denied the Supreme Court's authority in the case and refused obedience to the writ. The General Assembly at once passed a vote of thanks to the judges for their defiance. The case was allowed to rest by the federal authorities and with the early reform of the judiciary was thrown out.

The General Assembly passed strong resolutions[21] against the assumption and funding measures of Hamilton and peremtorily instructed the state's senators, Samuel Johnston and Benjamin Hawkins, to oppose any excise or direct tax by the federal government. It so happened that North Carolina's delegation to Congress, arriving late, was found to hold the balance of power relative to these measures. Hence the assumption program was laid aside for the time. Later it was brought forward and yoked with the question of a site for the federal capital, the well-known compromise resulting.

The federal excise laws of 1791, from which the assumptionists purposed to derive the funds to carry out their measures, occasioned great ferment in all the frontier regions of the United States. The greatest storm center was western Pennsylvania, the trouble there culminating in 1794 in the "Whiskey Rebellion." In western North Carolina, if resistance to the excise laws was less organized, it was none the less effective; federal collectors were powerless and discreetly remained out of the excited localities.[22] The spirit of resistance spread also to the eastern counties[23] and the ferment did not abate until the excise laws were amended.

[20] Dallas, U. S. Supreme Court Reports, II, 412.
[21] N. C. State Records, XXI, 1054.

A general discontent with the measures Congress had deemed necessary for adjustment of the new regime now developed in North Carolina. The first political victim of the reaction was Samuel Johnston, who, regarded as the most uncompromising advocate of strong national powers, failed to secure reelection to the United States senate when his term expired in March, 1792. Alexander Martin, again in the confidence of the Republican party, was chosen as Johnston's successor. In the congressional elections of 1793 this party was successful in every district save one, the Scotch district in the Cape Fear region. With Johnston retired to private life the remaining federalist leaders now quietly supported the same state rights principles as the Republican party. James Iredell, whom Washington had appointed to the Supreme Court bench, set them the example in his dissenting opinion in the case of Chisholm v. Georgia.

This famous case sharply brought the states to consider anew the question of just what powers they had given up to the federal government. The issue involved, the right of suit of a state by a citizen of another state, was decided affirmatively, only one justice, James Iredell, dissenting. In his cogently reasoned opinion[24] Iredell argued that the individual states were successors to the sovereignty wrenched from the British crown. Upon this premise he built up his theory of divided and delegated sovereignty, holding that every state in the Union, in every instance where its sovereignty had not been delegated to the United States, was as completely sovereign as were the United States in respect to the powers conferred upon them by the federal compact. A state, therefore, remaining sovereign, could not be sued. Georgia acted upon Iredell's theory and defied the federal authority. The judgment remained unenforced until the eleventh amendment to the Constitution, ratified in 1798, removed such questions from the cognizance of the court, thus sanctioning Iredell's view.

[22] McRee, II, 330, 335. Davie to Iredell, Aug. 2, 1791.

[23] Johnston to Iredell, April 15, 1791.

[24] Dallas, U. S. Supreme Court Reports, II, 419-480.

The Republican party throughout the country had received Iredell's argument as an exposition of its own theory of a definite line of demarcation between the rights reserved by the states and those delegated to the federal government. The opinion is the more interesting in this connection because of Iredell's influence upon the ratification of the Constitution by North Carolina. His interpretation of the Constitution in the Chisholm v. Georgia case was in the same state rights spirit with which he had defended it in 1788-89.

The Alien and Sedition acts, passed by Congress in June and July, 1798, gave the Republicans their next opportunity to raise the state rights issue. Virginia and Kentucky protested vigorously in legislative resolutions characterizing the acts as a usurpation of power on the part of the federal government and therefore void. Wm. R. Davie, a federalist with mild state rights proclivities, was Governor of North Carolina at the date of reception of the Virginia and Kentucky resolutions. His zeal for the safety of the Union caused him to take the ground that at this juncture the Union's existence was in more danger than the rights of the states.[25] He therefore threw all his influence against any legislative cooperation with Virginia and Kentucky. Feeling ran high throughout the state. In a sharp party fight in the lower branch of the state legislature Davie's followers were successful in preventing action.[26] But the attitude of North [25] McRee, II. Davie to Iredell, June 17, 1799.

[26] Journal of the N. C. House of Commons, 1798, p. 78.

Carolina toward the "doctrine of 1798" was one of friendliness. Her non-action was due to disinclination on the part of the state administration to encourage dissension at a time of such high party feeling.

The federalist party in North Carolina practically expended the last of its strength in the presidential election of 1800. General apprehension for the safety of the Union aroused by the Jay treaty, the Alien and Sedition Acts, and the "Resolutions of '98" enabled them to carry four electoral districts, but after this election the party became disorganized and had no leaders of note. The Republican party now had practically uncontested control of the state with indications predicting a long tenure of power. Nathaniel Macon, a worthy disciple of Willie Jones and with even more ultra-democratic principles than his preceptor, became the party chief. His position in national politics as speaker of the House of Representatives from 1801 to 1806 did not lessen his interest in state party affairs. Through the decade of national humiliation at the hands of England and France he held the state in firm support of the Republican administration. When the New England federalists met at Hartford in 1814 and threatened to secede as a protest against the war with England, North Carolina republicanism, mindful of its cardinal doctrine, state rights, conceded their right to speak. But the concession was coupled with the demand that they should speak through their legislatures and at a time when all were not endangered by a public enemy; in short, that "they should speak like Americans." [27]

From 1815 to 1820 North Carolina, in common with the rest of the Union, enjoyed a period of political quiet. The Union, now that it had stood the test of a foreign war, became a fixture in the political conceptions of the people. Sentiment, as well as political wisdom and experience, was beginning to form a bulwark for its protection.[28]

[27] Raleigh Register, Dec. 8, 1814, and Jan. 27, 1815. This paper was the official organ of the Republican party in N. C.

The period of calm was soon broken, however, by the development of a serious political contest between the North and the South over slavery extension. The issue was joined over the admission of Missouri as a slave state, ending in the well-known Missouri Compromise. Though the North Carolina legislature gave no official utterance to the state's sentiment upon the question, the newspapers earnestly thrashed the matter over and thus we are able to learn the general state of public opinion. The Raleigh Register, official mouthpiece of the Republican state organization, decidedly opposed as unconstitutional any restrictions upon Missouri.[29] The Minerva, claiming no party affiliations but representing the known sentiment of certain detached groups,[30] and undoubtedly a respectable minority, assumed a very different attitude. It said, January 28, 1820: "We doubt whether it be possible to answer Mr. King's speech of the last session against granting to this new State (Missouri) the privilege of holding our fellow-men in bondage. Yet our Northern brethren will generously remember that it is not always possible for the most honest to be just." A month later the same paper asserted the constitutionality of restriction,[31] and added: "It is equally certain that true policy forbids the extension, as it submits to the toleration of slavery." Two weeks later the Minerva declared an open and definite [28] 17 Nile's Register, 31, has a very interesting account at this date of a fervent prayer for the preservation of the Union, uttered by a North Carolina Revolutionary patriot upon his death bed.

[29] Raleigh Register, March 3, 1820, et seq.

[30] These groups were the Quaker counties—Guilford, Randolph, and Chatham; the Moravian center at Salem, and much of the mountain country.

[31] Minerva, Feb. 11, 1820.

hostility to slavery extension and began to advocate[32] some form of gradual emancipation in the states.

Such sentiment, however, was unorganized and ineffectual and by no means represented the controlling forces within the state. Nathaniel Macon, now in the United States senate, represented as always the state rights republicanism of the eastern North Carolina slaveholder. He opposed to the end the whole plan of the compromise on the ground that it would mean an admission on the part of the South that Congress could set metes and bounds to slavery.

During the tariff and nullification controversy of 1828-33 North Carolina pursued the course she felt best fitted to secure a repeal of the obnoxious tariff and at the same time preserve her original attitude toward state rights, without endorsing the radical activity of South Carolina. Just after the tariff bill of 1827 so nearly became a law, Governor Iredell, anticipating that the protectionists would again bring forward their measure at the next session of Congress, recommended[33] to the North Carolina General Assembly to put on record some form of protest. Accordingly at this time a resolution[34] was passed which declared that any increase of import duties by Congress was inexpedient and unwise. That this simple resolution might the more effectively gain the ear of Congress a preamble was attached which admitted the constitutionality of such duties but declared nevertheless that "interest, either pecuniary or political, is the great point of union from the smallest association up to the Confederacy of American States: that whenever a system is adopted by the general government which does not equally conserve the interests of all the states, then the right rests with any state or States to question whether the benefits of the Union are not more than counterbalanced by its evils." This had the ring of Hartford convention doctrine, but was unavailing, Congress passing the "tariff of abominations" one month later.

[32] Ibid., Feb. 25, 1820.

[33] Message, Nov. 29, 1827, Executive Letter-book. Governor Iredell was the son of Judge James Iredell, of the U. S. Supreme Court. The father had died in 1799.

[34] Journal of N. C. Gen. Assy., 1827-28, p. 101.

A storm of protest was raised at once throughout the South. But with Adams's defeat by Jackson in November, 1828, the belief became current in North Carolina that the tariff would be repealed almost immediately.[35] Events drifted, however, and nothing was done. The Hayne-Webster debate occurred in January, 1830, and intensified interest in the strained situation. Though not yet quite ready for action, the course South Carolina would pursue was a foregone conclusion. The question before the Union, therefore, was how far that state would be supported by the other southern states.

For North Carolina this question was answered directly by the people on Independence Day, 1830. Fourth of July celebrations were held in nearly every county in the state and were made the occasion of a plebiscite on the South Carolina doctrine. At Asheboro the following theme inspired the orator of the day and evoked the applause of the people: "The union of the States—united we stand, divided we fall! He who wantonly engenders a feeling of hostility between the States instead of soothing it to harmony is a traitor to his country. Let no such man be trusted." At Hillsboro: "State Rights and Federal Powers—if the line of demarcation between them, as drawn by the framers of the Constitution, be preserved unobscured by the refinements of construction, our Union will stand throughout time as the proud monument of a free people to govern themselves." At Fayetteville: "Our Sister State—South Carolina. We esteem her worth but deprecate her example. We therefore hold her in union a friend, in disunion an enemy to our political institutions." [36] Speaker vied with speaker everywhere in expression of dissent from South Carolina's doctrine of nullification, though at the same time care was taken to soundly rap the tariff. Calhoun's reasoning might be without a flaw, but just now the blessings of union seemed dearer to North Carolina than statesmen's logic.

[35] This view was expressed by the newspapers, and in Governor Owen's message to Assembly, Nov. 19, 1829. Ms. Letter-book.

When the annual Assembly met in November it was expected to register officially the will of the people upon the subject of nullification. Accordingly resolutions[37] in the following form were introduced by Jonathan Worth, a Quaker member, and, after heated debate and slight amendment, passed the lower branch by a vote of 87 to 27: "Resolved, by the General Assembly of North Carolina: That although the Tariff Laws as they now exist are in the opinion of this Legislature unwise, unequal in their operation, and oppressive to the Southern States, yet this Legislature does not recognize as constitutional the right of an individual state to nullify a law of the United States." The twenty-seven members who opposed this resolution were extreme state rights men and were actuated by a fear that the repudiation of nullification might mean the first successful assault upon particularism. They therefore preferred to make no concession, even as to the questionable doctrine of nullification. The senate agreed with the house minority and refused to commit itself. The larger freehold qualifications required for membership in the senate made this branch of the legislature less responsive than the house to popular sentiment, therefore, more representative of the old particularism of the east. The senate favored resolutions which emphasized the reserved rights of the states and condemned the tariff as a usurpation of power by the Federal government.[38] But it was not prepared to antagonize the popular branch and public sentiment further than to remain silent.

[36] These toasts are chosen as typical of a great many reported by the press throughout the State. See Raleigh Register and Carolina Watchman of July 12, 1830.

[37] House Journal, Dec. 31, 1830, p. 257.

The famous Nullification Ordinance of South Carolina, the result of a state convention in 1832, brought the controversy to a crisis. The North Carolina legislature was in session when the ordinance was received. The senate could no longer stay the tide of dissent. The pressure for anti-nullification resolutions was too strong to be resisted. Some attempt was made by the senate to link the tariff with the question of internal improvements and make the two together a cause for requesting all the states to meet in a federal convention for the purpose of giving an authoritative interpretation of all the constitutional questions in dispute. This plan failed, however, and the two houses then came to an agreement and passed anti-nullification resolutions.[39] These resolutions contained both the declaration that the tariff was unconstitutional and that nullification was revolutionary and subversive of the Constitution. They were thus a compromise between the senate and the house, between the old state rights dogma and the new sentiment.

But the repudiation of the doctrine of nullification by North Carolina can in no sense be interpreted as a repudiation of the doctrine of state rights as held at the time of the formation of the Union. Numerous mass-meetings in the counties attest the people's endorsement of the legislature's final action, but only one has been discovered by the writer in which the sentiment was expressed that the United States constituted one great political society and the government thereof essentially a national government.[40] On the other hand, there was abundant evidence in mass-meetings, in the press, in the correspondence of public men, and in the Legislature which shows a spirit anxious to find a way to repudiate nullification and at the same time save the original state rights doctrine. A letter to a party friend from the aged Nathaniel Macon, now in voluntary political retirement, probably expresses as accurately as could be done the attitude of the thinking public. He said: "I have never believed a State could nullify and stay in the Union, but have always believed that a State might secede when she pleased, provided she would pay her proportion of the national debt; and this right I have considered the best safeguard to public liberty and public justice that could be required."[41] It was in consistency with this theory and under its impulsion that North Carolina left the Union in 1861.

[38] The Senate favored the "Sawyer Resolutions." These were of a strong state rights tone. See N. C. House Journal, 1830, 175.

[39] N. C. Senate Journal, 1832-33, 99; and House Journal, 1832-33, 224-225.

---

[40] Such resolutions were passed in the town of Wilmington, which, strange to say, was later the strongest secession center in the State. For resolutions see Raleigh Register, Jan. 4, 1833.

[41] Dodd. Life of Nathaniel Macon, 385. Macon to Samuel P. Carson, Feb. 9, 1833.

THE NAG'S HEAD PICTURE OF THEODOSIA BURR.*

BY BETTIE FRESHWATER POOL.

The sand dunes of North Carolina have long been famous as the scene of marine tragedies. The bleaching ribs of some of the stateliest craft that ever plowed the deep bear testimony to the ravages of old ocean. The English merchantman, the Portuguese galleon, the Dutch brigantine, the Spanish treasure ship, the French corvette, the Norwegian barque, representatives of every maritime nation on the globe, are scattered over the beach, from Hatteras to Cape Fear, their grisly skeletons protruding from the sands like antediluvian monsters in some geological bed.

This narrow strip of sand winding like a yellow ribbon between the inland sounds and the sea, presents a curious study to the geologist. For years it has been gradually sinking, and at the same time becoming narrower, until now its average width is not more than a mile, and the libertine waters of the great sea not seldom rush across the frail barrier to embrace those of the Albemarle.

The slender divide has not always been able to withstand the matchless flood, which has, in times of unusual commotion, literally cut a pathway through the yielding sands. These form inlets, of which Oregon, Hatteras and New are the most important. Through the first Burnside's fleet of warships defiled on its way to the bombardment of Roanoke Island. The channels are constantly changing, and skillful pilots are required to guide vessels safely over the bar.

*This article from "The Eyrie and Other Southern Stories," by Bettie Freshwater Pool, is published by permission of the author.

Supposed Portrait of Theodosia Burr Alston.

The ornithologist may here find much to interest him, and the conchologist revel in a paradise of shells. But the nautilus, pale and pearly, and the delicate blush of the sea conch, have small influence on the rude nature of the native "banker." Isolated from the world on his barren waste of shifting sand the "banker" of a hundred years ago was almost a barbarian. His savage instincts not only made him consider all flotsam and jetsam his lawful property, but induced him to use every means to lure vessels ashore for the purposes of plunder. And when a wreck occurred, the wreckers held high carnival. The sparse population turned out en masse, and with demoniac yells, murdered without remorse the hapless victims who escaped the raging surf. Nag's Head, a favorite summer resort along the coast, was named from a habit the "bankers" had of hobbling a horse, suspending a lantern from its neck and walking it up and down the beach on stormy nights, impressing the mariner with the belief that a vessel was riding safely at anchor. Through this device many a good ship has gone down and much valuable booty secured to the land pirates.

The "bankers" of to-day are different beings from their ancestors of a century ago. Fellowship with enlightened people has had a humanizing influence, and they are now good and useful citizens. The North Carolina coast is provided with three first-class lighthouses—Hatteras, Whale's Head, and Body's Island. Body's Island is no longer an island, Nag's Head Inlet, which formed its northern boundary, having been completely closed up by the encroaching sands.

The dunes, for most part barren of vegetation, have in some places a stunted growth of forest trees, and in others large marshes covered with a rank growth of coarse grass, on which herds of wild cattle and "banks ponies" graze.

In the winter of 1812 there drifted ashore at Kitty Hawk, a few miles below Nag's Head, a small pilot boat with all sails set and the rudder lashed. There was no sign of violence or bloodshed; the boat was in perfect condition, but entirely deserted. The small table in the cabin had been spread for some repast, which remained undisturbed. There were several handsome silk dresses, a case of wax flowers with a glass covering, a nautilus shell beautifully carved, and hanging on the wall of the cabin was the portrait of a young and beautiful woman. This picture was an oil painting on polished mahogany, twenty inches in length and enclosed in a frame richly gilded. The face was patrician and refined: the expression of the dark eyes proud and haughty; the hair dark auburn, curling and abundant. A white bodice, cut low in the neck and richly adorned with lace, revealed a glimpse of the drooping shoulders, and the snowy bust, unconfined by corset.

Those who boarded the boat possessed themselves of everything of value on board. The picture, wax flowers, nautilus shell and silk dresses fell into the possession of an illiterate banker woman, who attached no especial value to them.

This picture, which has since attracted so much attention, hung on the wall of a rude cabin among the North Carolina hills for fifty-seven years. In the year 1869 it fell into the possession of the late Dr. William G. Pool, a prominent North Carolina physician. Dr. Pool was a man of marked individuality. He had the tastes of an antiquarian, was literary, cultured, and noted for his remarkable conversational gifts. While summering at Nag's Head, he was called upon to visit professionally the old banker woman referred to above. He was successful in his treatment of the case, and knowing the circumstances of his patient, would accept no payment for his services. In her gratitude for his kindness, the old woman insisted upon his accepting, "as a gift," the portrait hanging on the wall of her cabin. When questioned concerning its history, she related the facts above mentioned. This she did with apparent reluctance, possibly suppressing many interesting details that might have thrown more light upon the subject. Her husband had been one of the wreckers who boarded the pilot boat, and the picture and other articles referred to had been his share of the spoils. Her story was that the wreckers supposed the boat to have been boarded by pirates and that passengers and crew had been made to "walk the plank." The picture and its strange history became a subject of much interest and conjecture to Dr. Pool. Artists pronounced it a masterpiece, and the unmistakable portrait of some woman of patrician birth.

Chancing one day to pick up an old magazine in which appeared a picture of Aaron Burr, Dr. Pool was forcibly struck by the strong resemblance between it and the portrait in question. Like a flash it occurred to him that this might be a likeness of Theodosia, the ill-fated daughter of Aaron Burr. Eagerly he compared dates and facts until he became thoroughly convinced that he had found a clue to that mysterious disappearance, which is one of the most awful tragedies of history. A brief account of this discovery was published in the New York Sun, and immediately letters innumerable were received by him asking for more particulars.

Photographs of the portrait were sent to the numerous members of the Burr and Edwards families, and almost without exception the likeness was pronounced to be that of Theodosia Burr. Charles Burr Todd, the author, and Mrs. Stella Drake Knappin, descendants respectively of the Burr and Edwards families, visited Dr. Pool's residence on Pasquotank River for the purpose of examining the portrait. They were both convinced that it was a likeness of Theodosia Burr.

The wife of Colonel Wheeler, of Washington, D. C., who is a daughter of Sully, the famous portrait painter, and is herself an artist, compared a photo of the Nag's Head picture with a likeness of Theodosia Burr in her possession. She at once perceived that both features and expression were identical.

There was probably no woman in America at the time of Theodosia Burr's death more universally known and admired than she. Her high social rank, her beauty, her genius, her accomplishments, as well as her heroic devotion to her father in the dark days of his disgrace and banishment, had made her a prominent figure and had won for her the admiration of thousands.

When Aaron Burr, upon his return from exile, sent for his daughter to visit him in New York, she decided to make the voyage by sea. Her health had been almost completely wrecked by grief over her father's disgrace, and the recent death of her only child, Aaron Burr Alston. It was thought that a sea voyage might prove beneficial. She accordingly set sail from Georgetown, S. C., in the Patriot, a small pilot boat, December 30, 1812. Days and weeks passed, but Aaron Burr waited in vain for the arrival of his daughter. Months and years rolled away and still no tidings came. The Patriot and all on board had completely vanished from the face of the earth, and the mystery of its disappearance remained unsolved for more than half a century.

Governor Alston did not long survive the loss of his beloved wife, and Aaron Burr, in speaking, years afterwards of his daughter's mysterious fate, said that this event had separated him from the human race.

Let us now compare dates and facts: A pilot boat drifts ashore during the winter of 1812 at Kitty Hawk, a few miles below Nag's Head. There were silk dresses in the cabin and other indications that some lady of wealth and refinement has been on board. There is a portrait on the wall of the cabin that has been pronounced by artists and members of her family to be a likeness of Theodosia Burr.

The Patriot was lost during the winter of 1812. On the voyage from Georgetown, S. C., to New York it would pass the North Carolina coast. The sea at this time was infested by pirates. A band of these bold buccaneers may have boarded the little vessel and compelled passengers and crew to "walk the plank." Becoming alarmed at the appearance of some government cruiser, they may, from motives of prudence, have abandoned their prize.

This theory is not mere conjecture. Years ago two criminals executed in Norfolk, Va., are reported as having testified that they had belonged to a piratical crew who boarded the Patriot and compelled every soul on board to "walk the plank." The same confession was made years subsequently by a mendicant dying in a Michigan almshouse. This man said he would never forget the beautiful face of Theodosia Burr as it sank beneath the waves, nor how eloquently she pleaded for her life, promising the pirates pardon and a liberal reward if they would spare her. But they were relentless, and she went to her doom with so dauntless and calm a spirit that even the most hardened pirates were touched.

I can not vouch for the truth of these confessions which have appeared from time to time in print. I only introduce them as collateral evidence in support of the banker woman's story. The Patriot was supposed to have been wrecked off the coast of Hatteras during a terrific storm which occurred soon after it set sail. This, however, was mere conjecture which has never been substantiated by the slightest proof.

It is not improbable that the Patriot during a night of storm was lured ashore by the decoy light at Nag's Head, and that passengers and crew fell into the hands of the land pirates in waiting, who possessed themselves of the boat and everything of value it contained. This also, of course, is mere conjecture, but the all-important fact remains that a pilot boat went ashore at Kitty Hawk during the winter of 1812, and that in the cabin of this boat was a portrait of Theodosia Burr.

BIOGRAPHICAL AND GENEALOGICAL MEMORANDA.

COMPILED AND EDITED BY MRS. E. E. MOFFITT.

MRS. WALTER CLARK.

The sketch of General Joseph Graham is written by his granddaughter, Mrs. Susan Graham Clark, who is the wife of Chief Justice Clark, one of the foremost historians of our State. She is the only daughter of the late Honorable William Alexander Graham, the learned lawyer and ripe scholar, who filled so many positions of honor and trust, notable among them being that of United States Senator in 1840, Governor in 1845, and Confederate States Senator in 1864. Mrs. Clark was born in Washington, D. C., while her father was Secretary of the Navy during the administration of President Fillmore. A suggestion made by Governor Graham to fit out an expedition to Japan resulted in one of the greatest events of the nineteenth century—the opening of the ports of that country to the world. Had he done nothing else, this alone would place him on the highest roll of fame.

Mrs. Clark received her primary education at the Misses Nash and Miss Kollock's School in Hillsboro, N. C., and afterwards at Mlle. Rostand's in New York City. She lived in Hillsboro, N. C., until her marriage in 1874, since which time she has resided in Raleigh, where she exerts a potent influence in her church and in other associations.

Mrs. Clark is Vice-Regent of the North Carolina Society of the Daughters of the Revolution, filling the place most acceptably, holding the meetings in the absence of the Regent, conducting and furthering with zest and conservatism such movements as are made for the preservation of our State history or the commemoration of important events.

Mrs. Clark has been repeatedly called to the office of Regent, the highest office within the gift of the Society, but a frail constitution forbade such active work as this position would entail. Mrs. Clark belongs to such organizations as the Associated Charities, the Civic Department of the Woman's Club, and the Rescue Circle of King's Daughters.

"True to the kindred points of Heaven and Home," Mrs. Clark's daily life is an exponent of her character. She claims as her jewels five sons and two daughters.

HENRY McGILFERT WAGSTAFF.

Author of "State Rights in North Carolina Through Half a Century."

Born at Olive Hill, Person County, North Carolina, January 27, 1876.

Attended the public schools; was prepared for college at Roxboro Academy and by private instruction. Entered the University of North Carolina in 1895, and graduated 1899.

Taught three years (1899-1902) in high schools of the State.

Entered Johns Hopkins University in 1903 for graduate work in History. In 1905-6 was fellow in History at the Hopkins and received PhD. degree in latter year. 1906-7 was Acting Professor of History in Allegheny College, Pennsylvania. 1907-9 was Associate Professor of History in University of North Carolina, and in 1909 became Professor of History in this institution.

Professor Wagstaff has always taken a lively interest in all history, but has made an especial study of the history of North Carolina from a love for his native State. His ability and industry in this line entitle him to be grouped with those historians of the past and present who have made and are making "God and their country's right their battle cry."

MISS BETTIE FRESHWATER POOL.

Author of Article on "Nags Head Picture" Biographical Sketch.

Biographical sketch may be found in No. 4 of Vol. VIII, page 334.

ABSTRACT OF WILLS PREVIOUS TO 1760.

FROM SECRETARY OF STATE'S OFFICE.

Will of Lawrence Arnold, Dec. 14, 1690. Son John, wife, Lawrence Godfrey.

Will of Richard Ashell; executed Sept. 15, 1695. Wife, daughter Mary, child in esse, all my children, Wm. Privett and Wm. Charlton. (Note—Chowan names.)

Will of Peter Avelin, March 14, 1710; probated Nov. 1, 1712. Sons Henry, Peter and John, daughter Anne.

Will of Abraham Adams; Dec. 18, 1734. Son James Adams, son Joseph, daughter Sarah, wife Anne.

Will of James Adams; Feb. 17, 1733; probated July, 1734. Son Abraham, son James, son Emanuel, son John, son Thomas, daughter Martha, daughter Rachel, daughter Mary, child of Rachel.

Will of Abraham Adams; March 27, 1734. Son Abraham, son Richard, son William, son Willoby, wife Barthia.

Will of John Battle of Bertie County; probated May Court, 1740; son William, son Jesse, daughters Priscilla and Sarah, brother William Battle, wife Sarah Battle, John Brown, brother to my wife.

Will of James Burns, Bertie County; January 8, 1733; probated March 31, 1735. Wife Elizabeth, son-in-law John Wynn, grandson George Augustus Wynn, son-in-law Culliner Sessoms, daughter Mary Wynn, daughter Elizabeth Early, grandson James Early, James Burke, William Burke, John Askew, goddaughter Martha Davis.

Will of William Boge; Dec. 20, 1720; probated April 11, 1721. Sons William and Josiah, wife Ellendor, daughter Elizabeth Hill, daughter Jane Boge, daughter Miriam Boge, daughter Rachel Boge, grandson William Hill, son Robert; Wm. Boge and Janet Hill, executors.

Will of John Bennett, of Currituck; Dec. 10, 1710. Sons Joseph and Benjamin, cousin Wm. Jones, of Northamptonshire, wife's grandfather Richard Nescut of South Pedecton in Somersetshire, adopted son Sampson Goddard, wife Mary executrix.

By Mrs. Helen deB. Wills,
Genealogist for N. C. Daughters of the Revolution.

INFORMATION

Concerning the Patriotic Society

"Daughters of the Revolution"

The General Society was founded October 11, 1890,—and organized August 20, 1891,—under the name of "Daughters of the American Revolution"; was incorporated under the laws of the State of New York as an organization national in its work and purpose. Some of the members of this organization becoming dissatisfied with the terms of entrance, withdrew from it and, in 1891, formed under the slightly differing name "Daughters of the Revolution," eligibility to which from the moment of its existence has been lineal descent from an ancestor who rendered patriotic service during the War of Independence.

"The North Carolina Society"

a subdivision of the General Society, was organized in October, 1896, and has continued to promote the purposes of its institution and to observe the Constitution and By-Laws.

Membership and Qualifications

Any woman shall be eligible who is above the age of eighteen years, of good character, and a lineal descendant of an ancestor who (1) was a signer of the Declaration of Independence, a member of the Continental Congress, Legislature or General Court, of any of the Colonies or States; or (2) rendered civil, military or naval service under the authority of any of the thirteen Colonies, or of the Continental Congress; or (3) by service rendered during the War of the Revolution became liable to the penalty of treason against the government of Great Britain: Provided, that such ancestor always remained loyal to the cause of American Independence.

The chief work of the North Carolina Society for the past eight years has been the publication of the "North Carolina Booklet," a quarterly publication on great events in North Carolina history—Colonial and Revolutionary. $1.00 per year. It will continue to extend its work and to spread the knowledge of its History and Biography in other States.

This Society has its headquarters in Raleigh, N. C., Room 411, Carolina Trust Company Building, 232 Fayetteville Street.

Some Booklets for Sale

Vol. I

"Greene's Retreat," Dr. Daniel Harvey Hill.

Vol. II

"Our Own Pirates," Capt. S. A. Ashe.

"Indian Massacre and Tuscarora War," Judge Walter Clark.

"Moravian Settlement in North Carolina," Rev. J. E. Clewell.

"Whigs and Tories," Prof. W. C. Allen.

"The Revolutionary Congresses," Mr. T. M. Pittman.

"Raleigh and the Old Town of Bloomsbury," Dr. K. P. Battle.

"Historic Homes—Bath, Buncomb Hall, Hayes," Rodman, Blount, Dillard.

"County of Clarendon," Prof. John S. Bassett.

"Signal and Secret Service," Dr. Charles E. Taylor.

"Last Days of the War," Dr. Henry T. Bahnson.

Vol. III

"Trial of James Glasgow," Kemp P. Battle, LL.D.

"Volunteer State Tennessee as a Seceder," Miss Susie Gentry.

"Historic Hillsboro," Mr. Francis Nash.

"Colony of Transylvania," Judge Walter Clark.

"Social Conditions in Colonial North Carolina," Col. Alexander Q. Holladay, LL.D.

"Battle of Moore's Creek Bridge, 1776," Prof. M. C. S. Noble.

"North Carolina and Georgia Boundary," Mr. Daniel Goodloe.

Vol. IV

"Battle Ramseur's Mill, 1780," Major Wm. A. Graham.

"Quaker Meadows," Judge A. C. Avery.

"Convention of 1788," Judge Henry Groves Connor.

"North Carolina Signers of Declaration of Independence, John Penn and Joseph Hewes," by Mr. T. M. Pittman and Dr. E. Walter Sikes.

"Expedition to Cartagena, 1740," Judge Walter Clark.

"Rutherford's Expedition Against the Indians," Capt. S. A. Ashe.

"Changes in Carolina Coast Since 1585," Prof. Collier Cobb.

"Highland Scotch Settlement in N. C.," Judge James C. McRae.

"The Scotch-Irish Settlement," Rev. A. J. McKelway.

"Battle of Guilford Court-house and German Palatines in North Carolina," Major J. M. Morehead, Judge O. H. Allen.

"Genesis of Wake County," Mr. Marshall DeLancey Haywood.

Vol. V.—(Quarterly).

No. 1.

"St. Paul's Church, Edenton, N. C., and its Associations," Richard Dillard, M.D.

"N. C. Signers of the National Declaration of Independence, Part II, William Hooper," Mrs. Spier Whitaker.

No. 2.

"History of the Capitol," Colonel Charles Earl Johnson.

"Some Notes on Colonial North Carolina, 1700-1750," Colonel J. Bryan Grimes.

"North Carolina's Poets," Rev. Hight C. Moore.

No. 3.

"Cornelius Harnett," Mr. R. D. W. Connor.

"Celebration of the Anniversary of May 20, 1775," Major W. A. Graham.

"Edward Moseley," by Dr. D. H. Hill.

No. 4.

"Governor Thomas Pollok," Mrs. John W. Hinsdale.

"Battle of Cowan's Ford," Major W. A. Graham.

"First Settlers in North Carolina Not Religious Refugees," Rt. Rev. Joseph Blount Cheshire, D.D.

Vol. VI—(Quarterly.)

No. 1.

"The Indian Tribes of Eastern North Carolina," Richard Dillard, M.D.

"History Involved in the Names of Counties and Towns in North Carolina," Kemp P. Battle, LL.D.

"A Colonial Admiral of the Cape Fear" (Admiral Sir Thomas Frankland), Hon. James Sprunt.

"Biographical Sketches: Introduction; Maj. Graham Daves." By Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

October, No. 2.

"The Borough Towns of North Carolina," Mr. Francis Nash.

"Governor Thomas Burke," J. G. de Roulhac Hamilton, Ph.D.

"Colonial and Revolutionary Relics in the Hall of History," Col. Fred. A. Olds.

"The North Carolina Society Daughters of the Revolution and its Objects."

"Biographical Sketches: Dr. Richard Dillard, Mr. Francis Nash, Dr. J. G. de R. Hamilton and Col. Fred A. Olds," Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

January, No. 3.

"State Library Building and Department of Archives and Records," Mr. R. D. W. Connor.

"The Battle of Rockfish Creek, 1781," Mr. James Owen Carr.

"Governor Jesse Franklin," Prof. J. T. Alderman.

"North Carolina's Historical Exhibit at Jamestown," Mrs. Lindsay Patterson, Miss Mary Hilliard Hinton.

"Biographical Sketches: Mrs. S. B. Kenneday, R. D. W. Connor, James Owen Carr and Prof. J. T. Alderman," Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

April, No. 4.

"Lock's Fundamental Constitution," Mr. Junius Davis.

"The White Pictures," Mr. W. J. Peele.

"North Carolina's Attitude Toward the Revolution," Mr. Robert Strong.

Biographical Sketches: Richard Benbury Creecy, the D. R. Society and Its Objects, Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

Genealogical Sketches: Abstracts of Wills; Scolley, Sprott and Hunter, Mrs. Helen de B. Wells.

Vol. VII. (Quarterly.)

July, No. 1.

" North Carolina in the French and Indian War," Col. A. M. Waddell.

" Locke's Fundamental Constitutions," Mr. Junius Davis.

" Industrial Life in Colonial Carolina," Mr. Thomas M. Pittman.

Address: "Our Dearest Neighbor—The Old North State," Hon. James Alston Cabell.

Biographical Sketches: Col. A. M. Waddell, Junius Davis, Thomas M. Pittman, by Mrs. E. E. Moffitt; Hon. Jas. Alston Cabell, by Mary Hilliard Hinton.

Abstracts of Wills. Mrs. Helen DeB. Wills.

October, No. 2.

"Ode to North Carolina," Miss Pattie Williams Gee.

" The Finances of the North Carolina Colonists," Dr. Charles Lee Raper.

" Joseph Gales, Editor," Mr. Willis G. Briggs.

" Our First Constitution, 1776," Dr. E. W. Sikes.

"North Carolina's Historical Exhibit at Jamestown Exposition," Miss Mary Hilliard Hinton.

Biographical Sketches: Dr. Kemp P. Battle, Dr. Charles Lee Raper, Willis Grandy Briggs, Pattie Williams Gee. By Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

January, No. 3.

" General Robert Howe," Hon. John D. Bellamy.

" Early Relations of North Carolina and the West," Dr. William K. Boyd.

" Incidents of the Early and Permanent Settlement of the Cape Fear," Mr. W. B. McKoy.

Biographical Sketches: John Dillard Bellamy, William K. Boyd, William B. McKoy. By Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

April, No. 4.

" St. James's Churchyard " (Poem), Mrs. L. C. Markham.

"The Expedition Against the Row Galley 'General Arnold'—A Side Light on Colonial Edenton," Rev. Robt. B. Drane, D.D.

" The Quakers of Perquimans," Miss Julia S. White.

" Fayetteville Independent Light Infantry," Judge James C. MacRae.

Biographical Sketches: Mrs. L. C. Markham, Rev. R. B. Drane, Miss Julia S. White, Judge James C. MacRae. By Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

Vol. VIII.—(Quarterly)

July, No. 1.

"John Harvey," Mr. R. D. W. Connor.

"Military Organizations of North Carolina During the American Revolution," Clyde L. King, A.M.

"A Sermon by Rev. George Micklejohn," edited by Mr. R. D. W. Connor.

Biographical and Genealogical Sketches: R. D. W. Connor, Clyde L. King, Marshall DeLancey Haywood, by Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

"Abstracts of Wills," Mrs. Helen DeB. Wells.

October, No 2.

"Convention of 1835," Associate Justice Henry G. Connor.

"The Life and Services of Brigadier-General Jethro Sumner," Kemp P. Battle, LL.D.

"The Significance of the Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence," Prof. Bruce Craven.

"Biographical and Genealogical Sketches: Judge Henry G. Connor, Kemp P. Battle, LL.D., Prof. Bruce Craven," by Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

January, No. 3.

"The Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence," Mr. A. S. Salley, Jr.

"The Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence," Prof. Bruce Craven.

"Mr. Salley's Reply."

"Mr. Craven's Rejoinder."

"Biographical and Genealogical Sketches: Prof. Bruce Craven, Mr. Alexander, S. Salley, Jr.," by Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

"Patriotic Objects."

"Information Concerning the Patriotic Society D. R."

April, No. 4.

"Unveiling Ceremonies."

"Carolina," by Miss Bettie Freshwater Pool.

"The Battle of King's Mountain," by Dr. William K. Boyd.

"Schools and Education in Colonial Times," by Dr. Charles Lee Smith.

"North Carolina Heroines of the Revolution," by Richard Dillard, M.D.

"Biographical and Genealogical Sketches: Bettie Freshwater Pool, William K. Boyd, Charles Lee Smith, Richard Dillard," by Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

The North Carolina Booklet

A QUARTERLY PUBLICATION ISSUED UNDER
THE AUSPICES OF THE

"NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION"

THIS PUBLICATION treats of important events in North Carolina History, such as may throw light upon the political, social or religious life of the people of this State during the Colonial and Revolutionary periods, in the form of monographs written and contributed by as reliable and painstaking historians as our State can produce. The Ninth Volume begins in July, 1909.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION:

One Year, One Dollar; Single Copies, Thirty-five Cents.

Miss Mary Hilliard Hinton, Mrs. E. E. Moffitt, Editors, Raleigh, North Carolina.

Registered at Raleigh Post-office as second-class matter.

Notice should be given if the subscription is to be discontinued Otherwise it is assumed that a continuance of the subscription is desired.

Send all orders for back numbers to Mrs. E. E. MOFFITT, Raleigh, N. C.

All communications relating to subscriptions should be sent to

Miss Mary Hilliard Hinton,
Midway Plantation, Raleigh, N. C.

Genealogical Department

North Carolina Society

DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION

YOUR ANCESTRY CAN BE CAREFULLY TRACED

The Colonial and State Records of North Carolina, Pay-rolls of Revolutionary Soldiers filed in State Auditor's Office, County Records, Family Records, State Histories and Biographies will be diligently examined.

Fee for Such Researches, $7.00 to $10.00, according to Difficulty of Research (not less than $7.00 paid with order).

Write for particulars, enclosing stamp for reply, to

MRS. HELEN DEBERNIÈRE WILLS,
(Genealogist for N. C. D. R. and Raleigh Circle Colonial Dames.)
RALEIGH, NORTH CAROLINA.

COATS-OF-ARMS
PAINTED

Coats-of-Arms painted, decorated with helmet, lambrequin, etc., and enclosed in passe partout	$12 00
Same style and size, but unframed	10.00
A painted Coat-of-Arms, without helmet lambrequin, etc., unframed	5.00
India Ink Drawing of Arms	5.00
Searches for Coats-of-Arms, including (if found) a small sketch of the arms	8.00
Arms burned on wood	5.00

Write for particulars, enclosing stamp.

MISS MARY HILLIARD HINTON,
"Midway Plantation,"
RALEIGH, NORTH CAROLINA.

The Science of Accounts

SINGLE AND DOUBLE ENTRY
Book-keeping
A TEXT BOOK FOR PUBLIC SCHOOLS

The Graded School Edition. 65 pages, 25 lessons; cloth. Price, 65 cents. Will be ready August 1st.

The High School Edition. 130 pages, 50 lessons, and supplement; cloth bound. Price, $1 00, sent prepaid. This edition will be ready September 1st.

A 32-page Booklet with 10 Sample Lessons will be sent FREE to any subscriber to the N. C. Booklet who applies for it.

Address

GEORGE ALLEN, Raleigh, N. C.

Smith's Old Book Store

Raleigh, N. C. and Richmond, Va.

50,000 rare volumes in stock. 20,000 on North Carolina and Southern history. 25 years in business. All kinds of books and relics bought and sold.

IF YOU WILL SEND US A POSTAL

and mention the N. C. Booklet,
we will send you

THREE FREE SAMPLE COPIES OF THE PROGRESSIVE FARMER.

The Progressive Farmer should be read by every North Carolina man or woman who owns or operates a farm, and every farm owner should see that all his tenants read it

"In increased production and valuation of farm and stock, The Progressive Farmer has made me $100 to every $1 I have paid for it."
says J. M. Parris, Jackson County, N. C.

THE PROGRESSIVE FARMER, RALEIGH, N. C.

North Carolina Education

(Formerly N. C. Educational at Durham, N. C.)

Is a wide-awake monthly devoted to every phase of education in North Carolina. If you are interested in any phase of it, then North Carolina Education should interest you.

One Dollar a Year is the Price

Edited by E. C. BROOKS, Chair of Education in Trinity College, Durham, N. C., and W. F. MARSHALL, President Mutual Publishing Co., Raleigh, N. C.

Address, W. F. MARSHALL, Publisher, 108 W. Martin Street, Raleigh, N. C.

THE NORTH CAROLINA HISTORICAL COMMISSION

ESTABLISHED BY CHAPTER 767, PUBLIC LAWS OF 1903

AMENDED BY CHAPTER 714, PUBLIC LAWS OF 1907.

MEMBERS

J. BRYAN GRIMES, Chairman.....RALEIGH, N. C.
W. J PEELE.....RALEIGH, N. C.
THOS. W. BLOUNT.....ROPER, N. C.
M. C. S. NOBLE.....CHAPEL HILL, N. C.
D. H. HILL.....RALEIGH, N. C.

SECRETARY.

R. D. W. CONNOR - - - - - - - - - RALEIGH, N. C.

PURPOSES.

1. "To have collected from the files of old newspapers, court records, church records, private collections, and elsewhere, historical data pertaining to the history of North Carolina and the territory included therein from the earliest times"

2. "To have such material properly edited, published by the State Printer as other State printing, and distributed under the direction of the Commission."

3 "To care for the proper marking and preservation of battlefields, houses and other places celebrated in the history of the State.'

4. "To diffuse knowledge in reference to the history and resources of North Carolina."

5. "To encourage the study of North Carolina history in the schools of the State, and to stimulate and encourage historical investigation and research among the people of the State." Section 2, Chapter 714, Public Laws of 1907.

The Secretary wishes to correspond with any person who is willing to assist the Commission, by gifts or loans or manuscripts, information of the whereabouts of such documents, or otherwise in carrying out the above purposes.

Address all Communications to the Secretary

The Atlantic Fire Insurance Company

Raleigh, North Carolina.

SOLICITS YOUR PATRONAGE

CASH CAPITAL $125,000

A HOME COMPANY, OWNED AND OPERATED BY HOME PEOPLE.

CHAS. E JOHNSON, President. H. W. JACKSON, Treasurer.
J. G. BROWN, Vice-President. G. H. DORTCH, Secretary.

CAPITAL $100.000.00 SURPLUS $100.000.0

The

Commercial National Bank

RALEIGH, N. C.

The policy of this bank is to conduct its business along the most conservative lines; to restrict its operations to legitimate enterprises; to eliminate all speculative ventures.

OFFICERS

. JERMAN, President. H. W. JACKSON, Cashier.
A. A. THOMPSON, Vice-President. E. B. CROW, Asst. Cashier.
J. J. THOMAS, Chairman of Board.

CITIZENS NATIONAL BANK,
RALEIGH, N. C.

Our customers are guaranteed every accommodation their business, balances and responsibility warrant.

THE OLDEST BANK—LARGEST BANK—AND ONLY NATIONAL BANK IN RALEIGH.

JOS. G. BROWN, President. HENRY E. LITCHFORD, Cashier

DIRECTORS:

JOSEPH G. BROWN. A. B. ANDREWS.
R. H. BATTLE. DR. A. B. HAWKINS.
DR RICHARD H. LEWIS. WM J ANDREWS.
IVEN M. PROCTOR. JOHN C. DREWRY.
S. C. VANN

THE KEYSTONE

A Southern Woman's Journal, Published Monthly by Southern Women. Now in its 7th year.

Official Organ for the Clubwomen and Daughters of the Confederacy in Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Florida and Mississippi.

SUBSCRIPTION, 50c. PER YEAR

North Carolina Booklet, $1.00 per year—The Keystone and the North Carolina Booklet for $1.10 per year.

Address

Miss MARY HILLIARD HINTON,
Editor N. C. Booklet,
Midway Plantation, Raleigh, N. C.

BOOKS AND MAGAZINES DURABLY AND BEAUTIFULLY BOUND

ARTISTIC PRINTING

LOWEST PRICES

Club Programs and Embossed Stationery
ESTIMATES ON APPLICATION

Circumstances Alter Cases

But Not our Cases. They are Always the same. Guaranteed whether Filled or Gold.

Jolly-Wynne Jewelry Co.

RALEIGH, - - - - NORTH CAROLINA.

Thomas H. Briggs & Sons

Raleigh, North Carolina

THE BIG

Hardware Men

PAINTS

MAJESTIC RANGES

Thomas A. Partin Co.

131 Fayetteville Street RALEIGH, N. C.

Dry Goods
Ladies' Furnishings and Novelties

Prompt attention given to local and mail orders.

Darnell & Thomas

118 Fayetteville St. Raleigh, N. C.

Pianos, Organs
Sheet Music ::

The Soul Stirring "DIXIE" a Specialty

J. R. FERRALL & CO.

Grocers

222 FAYETTEVILLE ST.

RALEIGH, N. C.

Raleigh Christian Advocate

Established 1858.

Organ of the North Carolina Conference, Methodist Episcopal Church, South.

Reaches weekly over 9,000 Subscribers.

King's Business College
(INCORPORATED)

CAPITAL STOCK
$30.000.

A personal investigation will convince anv one that KING'S is absolutely the Largest, Best Equipped and Most Successful College of Business, Shorthand, Typewriting, Penmanship and English in the Carolinas, regardless of any claims the sma l fry are making. Strong, financial backing.

Reference: Every Bank and Leading Business Concern in Raleigh or Charlotte.
College Journal and Special Offers FREE.
We also teach Bookkeeping, Shorthand and Penmanship by mail.

Address King's Business College, Raleigh, N. C., or Charlotte, N. C.

"It's worth the difference"

WHARTON & TYREE

RALEIGH, N. C.

Workers in Artistic Photography

Negatives on file of most all N. C. Famous Men

North Carolina State Flags
State Flag Post Cards
State Flag Buttons, &c.

All sizes and prices of State Flags on hand, from the smallest 1-cent Muslin, to the largest Bunting.

Send for price-list.

PINCK. C. ENNISS,
RALEIGH. N. C.

THE SECOND EDITION OF "A SOUTHERNER IN EUROPE"

By CLARENCE H. POE.

is now on the press—(the first edition having been quickly exhausted)—in larger type, handsomer binding and better paper than the first. Price: cloth $1.00; heavy paper 60 cents. Order to-day from

THE MUTUAL PUBLISHING CO., RALEIGH, N. C.

Chief Justice Walter Clark of North Carolina: "Mr. Poe's are the best travel letters I have ever seen from any European tourist."

Birmingham (Ala.) Age-Herald: "'A Southerner in Europe' is all right—not like the ordinary book of travels, but charming letters—different and pleasing."

Dr. Chas. R. Henderson, University of Chicago: "Mr. Poe certainly travels with his eyes open and knows how to interpret what he finds for the advantage of our country."

Columbia State, Columbia, S. C.: "A collection of charming letters of travel, full of interesting observations. . . . This volume will prove delightful to every class of readers."

President Geo. H. Denny, Washington and Lee University, Lexington, Va.: "Mr. Poe is to be congratulated upon 'A Southerner in Europe.' I have read it with genuine interest and satisfaction, and it will do a great deal of good."

President H. N. Snyder, Wofford College, Spartanburg, S. C.: "'A Southerner in Europe' has brought me much pleasure and profit both from the author's charm of manner and the freshness of his point of view."

Zach McGhee, author "The Dark Corner," Washington, D. C.: "Entertaining and inspiring, I wish every Southerner in our land could read it. Mr. Poe has drawn lessons no one else has drawn, and has presented them in truly charming style."

Dr. Edwin Mims, author of "The Life of Sidney Lanier": "Not the conventional book of travel, but the impression of an alert, open-minded, progressive Southerner with insight and discrimination, a constructive leader in the development of the South."

Presbyterian Standard, Charlotte, N. C.: "There are no dull places. The entertainment is pronounced throughout. If anybody, who would know more of the wide world, and love his country better, has never read this little book, let him sit down and order a copy at once."

Ex-Governor Charles B. Aycock of North Carolina: "I read the last chapter the other night, having for the first time found the opportunity to look into it. Having read the last chapter I turned back and took the book up from the beginning, and nearly completed it before laying it down. It is in every way most delightful and instructive."

Nashville Christian Advocate, Nashville, Tenn.: "The man who knows how to produce so sprightly a paper as he edits, and whose contributions on Southern industrial conditions are welcomed by the best magazines, naturally knows what to look for in Europe and how to tell the story when he has seen it. Mr. Poe has made a capital little book."

R. E. Borden, Strasburg, Va: "I'm just reveling with the greatest delight in reading 'A Southerner in Europe.' It is charmingly written and holds one's interest easily to the end. My only complaint is, it is entirely too brief, and I wish the author had toured every country of Europe, and part of Asia and Africa."

Jeffersonian Magazine, Atlanta, Ga.: "It was time for a new book of travels in Europe. All of the works of that kind that are on our bookshelves are out of date. What we wanted was a volume which would picture to us the condition of things now. Mr. Poe has supplied this demand. Without the waste of a page he has furnished a view of the European world which enables one to see the town and farm of to-day, and the manner of life, the diversity of work and the trend of things as they are at this very time."

J. M. BROUGHTON T. B. MOSELEY

J. M. Broughton & Co.

Real Estate and Insurance

City and country property bought and sold on commission.
Rents collected and satisfaction guaranteed.
Oldest Real Estate concern in the city.

OFFICE: 12 West Martin St. RALEIGH, N. C.

LADIES

Why not carry a $1,000 Policy in the

Jefferson Standard Life Ins. Co.

for the benefit of your children? The Jefferson Standard is the strongest in the South.

Home Office, Raleigh, N. C.

The

News and Observer

RALEIGH, N. C.

Published at the Capital City

JOSEPHUS DANIELS
EDITOR

Growth of Circulation

1894,	1,800 subscribers	1901,	6,500
1895,	2,400 subscribers	1902,	7,054
1896,	3,100 subscribers	1903,	8,201
1897,	4,200 subscribers	1904,	9,111
1898,	4,880 subscribers	1905,	10,000
1899,	5,200 subscribers	1906,	11,000
1900,	5,700 subscribers	1907,	12,000

THE J. G. BALL COMPANY

WHOLESALE
GROCERS

131 AND 133 SOUTH WILMINGTON STREET
RALEIGH, N. C.

SOLICIT THE TRADE OF MERCHANTS ONLY

TRY CAPUDINE

for COLDS and GRIPP

It relieves the feverishness and aching and restores normal conditions Take a dose as soon as you are exposed and feel the cold coming on and. it will generally prevent it. Taken afterwards will relieve the ailment.

SOLD AT ALL DRUG STORES

LET THE

Mechanics Savings Bank

TAKE CARE OF YOUR

SAVINGS

WE PAY FOUR PER CENT INTEREST ON DEPOSITS

DOBBIN-FERRALL COMPANY

123-125 FAYETTEVILLE STREET
RALEIGH, N. C.

North Carolina's Largest and Leading Retail Dry Goods Establishment

Greatest attention is given to Ready-to-wear Garments for Ladies and Misses. Costumes, Coat Suits, Skirts, Waists, Top Coats and Wraps. Alterations are made FREE OF CHARGE by competent tailoresses and promptly. We carry the largest stocks in these lines to be found in North Carolina.

JOHN T. PULLEN, President N. W. WEST, Vice-President
CHARLES ROOT, Cashier

RALEIGH SAVINGS BANK

RALEIGH, N. C.

RESERVED INTEREST	$5,000.00
CAPITAL	$15,000.00
SURPLUS	$50,000.00
DEPOSITS OVER	$750,000.00

FOUR PER CENT INTEREST PAID ON DEPOSITS

BOYLAN-PEARCE CO.

Dry Goods Leaders in the Capital City
A Store With a State-wide Reputation

Staple and Fancy Dress Goods, Silks and Cotton Fabrics, White Goods in Immense Variety, Coat Suits, Waists and Skirts, Swellest Millinery, Laces, Embroideries, Parasols, Fans, Gloves and Handkerchiefs, Blankets, Comforts, Toweling, Sheeting and Pillow Cases, Lace and Net Curtains, and Scrims, Damask Napkins and Towels, Carpets, Art Squares, Rugs, Linoleums and Oil Cloths.

Samples submitted and contracts taken for public buildings, churches, libraries and private residences.

BOYLAN-PEARCE COMPANY

206-208 Fayetteville Street RALEIGH, N. C.

ANTICEPHALALGINE

THE WONDERFUL REMEDY FOR HEADACHE AND NEURALGIA

FOR SALE BY ALL DRUGGISTS
25 AND 50 CENTS PER BOTTLE

RALEIGH
NORTH CAROLINA

MISSES REESE & CO.

109 Fayetteville Street

RALEIGH, N. C.

The Place

THAT STANDS FOR

Correct Styles in Millinery

Two Stores in One

Heller Bros.

SHOES AND TRUNKS

RALEIGH, N. C.

Weathers & Perry

Fayetteville Street

RALEIGH, N. C.

China and Art Store and Interior Decorators

Carolina Electrical Co.

RALEIGH, N. C.

Engineers Contractors Supplies

Electric Light, Telephone and Annunciator Installation.

J. C. Ellington

Pictures, Artists' Materials

Wall-papers and Window-shades

Embroidery Silks Wools and Zephyrs

RALEIGH, N. C.

FORTY-NINTH ANNUAL

N. C. STATE FAIR, Raleigh, Oct. 18-23, 1909

Four full days. $12,000 offered in prizes. Grand display of live stock, agricultural and horticultural products, machinery and fine arts. Fastest trotting and pacing races, special stage and musical attractions and specialties Biggest midway in the South. General admission 50 cents, children 25 cents. For prize list and information, address JOSEPH E. POGUE, Secretary, Raleigh, N. C.

CORNELIUS HARNETT An Essay in North Carolina History. By R. D. W. Connor, Secretary of the North Carolina Historical Commission.

"I have just finished reading Harnett. . . . You have made an interesting story of a most significant and interesting man."—EDWARD K. GRAHAM, Professor of English Literature, University of North Carolina.

"I have read with pleasure and pride Mr. Connor's forthcoming sketch of Cornelius Harnett. It is an interesting and scholarly piece of work and should have a wide circulation."—C. ALPHONSO SMITH, Professor of the English Language, University of North Carolina; Author of "Our Debt to Cornelius Harnett."

EDWARDS & BROUGHTON PRINTING CO., RALEIGH, N. C.

Price, $1.50

Vol. IX. JANUARY, 1910 No. 3

The North Carolina Booklet

GREAT EVENTS IN NORTH CAROLINA HISTORY

PUBLISHED QUARTERLY
BY
THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY
DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION
RALEIGH, N. C.

CONTENTS

	Page
The History of Lincoln County, By Alfred Nixon	111
Our State Motto and Its Origin, By Chief Justice Walter Clark	179
The Work Done by the D. R. in Pasquotank County, By C. F. S. A.	183
Biographical and Genealogical Memoranda, By Mrs. E. E. Moffitt	185
Abstracts of Wills, By Mrs. H. DeB. Wills	194

SINGLE NUMBERS 35 CENTS $1.00 THE YEAR

ENTERED IN THE POST-OFFICE AT RALEIGH, N. C., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

The North Carolina Booklet.

Great Events in North Carolina History.

Volume IX of the BOOKLET will be issued quarterly by the North Carolina Society Daughters of the Revolution, Raleigh, N. C., beginning July, 1909. Each BOOKLET will contain three articles and will be published in July, October, January and April. Price $1.00 per year, 35 cents for single copy.

EDITORS:

MISS MARY HILLIARD HINTON. MRS. E. E. MOFFITT.

VOLUME IX.

General Joseph Graham.....Mrs. Walter Clark.
Indians, Slaves, and Tories: Our Early Legislation Regarding Them, Mr. Clarence H. Poe.
General Thomas Person.....Dr. Stephen B. Weeks.
History of Lincoln County.....Mr. Alfred Nixon.
History of States Rights in North Carolina Down to 1840, Professor H. M. Wagstaff.
George Durant .....Captain S. A. Ashe.
Historic Duels of North Carolina.....Mr. F. M. Harper.
The Early History of Medicine in North Carolina, Dr. Hubert Royster.
Der North Carolina Laud und Colonie Etablissement, Miss Adelaide Fries.
Our Colonial Historians: Hakluyt, Lawson, Brickle, Williamson, Right Reverend Joseph Blount Cheshire, D.D.

This list of subjects may be changed, as circumstances sometimes prevent the writers from keeping their engagements.

The histories of the separate counties will in future be a special feature of the BOOKLET. When necessary, an entire issue will be devoted to a paper on one county.

The BOOKLET will contain short biographical sketches of the writers who have contributed to this publication, by Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

The BOOKLET will print abstracts of wills prior to 1760, as sources of biography, history and genealogy, by Mrs. Helen DeB. Wills.

Parties who wish to renew their subscriptions to the BOOKLET for Vol. IX, are requested to give notice at once.

Many numbers of Volumes I to VIII for sale.

THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET,

Address

MISS MARY HILLIARD HINTON,

"MIDWAY PLANTATION,"

Raleigh, N. C.

HON. WALTER CLARK
Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of North Carolina.

Vol. IX JANUARY, 1910 No. 3

The North Carolina Booklet

"Carolina! Carolina! Heaven's blessings attend her!
While we live we will cherish, protect and defend her."

Published by
THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY
DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION

The object of the BOOKLET is to aid in developing and preserving North Carolina History. The proceeds arising from its publication will be devoted to patriotic purposes. EDITORS.

ADVISORY BOARD OF THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET.

Mrs. Spier Whitaker.
Dr. D. H. Hill.
Mr. W. J. Peele.
Dr. Kemp P. Battle.
Mr. Marshall DeLancey Haywood.
Mr. R. D. W. Connor.
Dr. E. W. Sikes.
Dr. Richard Dillard.
Mr. James Sprunt.
Judge Walter Clark.

EDITORS:
Miss Mary Hilliard Hinton, Mrs. E E. Moffitt.

OFFICERS OF THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION, 1906–1908.

REGENT:
Mrs. E. E. MOFFITT.

VICE-REGENT:
Mrs. WALTER CLARK.†

HONORARY REGENT:
Mrs. SPIER WHITAKER.

RECORDING SECRETARY:
Mrs. LEIGH SKINNER.

CORRESPONDING SECRETARY:
Mrs. PAUL H. LEE.

TREASURER:
Mrs. FRANK SHERWOOD.

REGISTRAR:
Miss MARY HILLIARD HINTON.

GENEALOGIST:
Mrs. HELEN De BERNIERE WILLS.

Founder of the North Carolina Society and Regent 1896-1902:
Mrs. SPIER WHITAKER.

REGENT 1902:
Mrs. D. H. HILL, Sr.*

REGENT 1902-1906:
Mrs. THOMAS K. BRUNER.

---

*Died December 12, 1904. †Died December 10, 1909.

THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET.

Vol. IX JANUARY, 1910 No. 3

THE HISTORY OF LINCOLN COUNTY.

BY ALFRED NIXON.

THE COLONIAL PERIOD.

Lincoln County was born mid the throes of the American Revolution, and christened for a patriot soldier, then battling for independence. Prior to that time, while Carolina was a Province of Great Britain, in the bestowal of names there was manifest a desire to please royalty: New Hanover was called for the House of Hanover; Bladen, in honor of Martin Bladen, one of the Lords Commissioners of Trade and Plantations; Anson, set up in 1749 from Bladen, derived its name from Admiral Anson, of the English Navy, who in 1761 was charged with the mission of bringing to her marriage with George the Third, Charlotte of Mecklenburg. So, when the western part of Anson was set up into a county in 1762, it was called Mecklenburg, with county seat the Queen City of Charlotte, in compliment to the wife of His Majesty, George the Third. As the settlements extended westward from the Atlantic seaboard new counties were formed to meet the convenience of the inhabitants. In 1768, Mecklenburg was divided "by a line beginning at Earl Granville's line where it crosses the Catawba River and the said river to be the line to the South Carolina line, and all that part of the county lying to the westward of the said dividing line shall be one other distinct county and parish, and remain by the name of Tryon County and Saint Thomas Parish." The name Tryon was given in honor of His Excellency, William Tryon, Royal Governor of the Province.

William Tryon, an officer in the regular army of Great Britain, landed at Cape Fear October the 10th, 1764, with a commission as Lieutenant-Governor of the Province. His administration as Governor of North Carolina lasted from the death of Governor Dobbs, 28th March, 1765, to the 30th day of June, 1771, when he was appointed Governor of New York. In the rupture with Great Britain he was a Major-General in command of American Loyalists, vainly endeavoring to re-establish Royal Rule. He remained nominally Governor of New York until March 22, 1780. The name of Governor Tryon appears at the head of the list of names enumerated in the confiscation acts of both North Carolina and New York, and the county of Tryon in each of these States was enpunged from the map. Tryon Mountain and Tryon City in the county of Polk, and one of the principal streets in the city of Charlotte yet preserve his name. Shortly after relinquishing the government of New York, he sailed for England, where he rose to the rank of Lieutenant-General. He died in London, the 27th of January, 1788, aged 58 years.

The War of the Revolution rages. The patriots are battling for independence. Oppressions of the Royal Governor have made his name odious. "The large extent of the county of Tryon renders the attendance of the inhabitants on the extreme parts of the said county to do public duties extremely difficult and expensive. For remedy whereof," the General Assembly in 1779, instead of setting the western part off into a new county, as had been its custom, blotted the name of Tryon from the list of counties and divided its territory into two counties, "by a line beginning at the south line near Broad River, thence along the dividing ridge between Buffalo Creek and Little Broad River to the line of Burke County"; and to the two counties thus formed were given the names of two patriotic soldiers. The western portion was named Rutherford in honor of Griffith Rutherford, of Rowan County, a Brigadier-General in the Revolution; and the eastern portion Lincoln, in compliment to Maj.-Gen. Benjamin Lincoln, of Rhode Island, commander of the Southern armies.

Benjamin Lincoln was born January 23d, 1733, at Hingham, about thirteen miles from Boston. In February, 1777, he was appointed Major-General in the Revolutionary Army and served with gallantry throughout the struggle. At the request of the delegation in Congress from South Carolina, he was assigned to command the Army in the South. In 1780 General Lincoln was forced to surrender to the superior force of the British at Charleston. When exchanged he resumed the service, and was at the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown, where the generous Washington designated him to receive the conquered arms of the British. He was appointed Secretary of War in 1781, with permission to retain his rank in the army. He died in the house of his birth 9th of May, 1810.

When Tryon was divided the Tryon court-house fell in Lincoln County, and the courts of Lincoln were held there until April, 1783, and the Tryon records are still in Lincolnton. The pioneers came into what is now Lincoln County between the years 1745 and 1749, when it was Bladen County; they continued to come until the American Revolution. So the pioneer history of Lincoln County is covered by Bladen, Anson, Mecklenburg and Tryon counties. The Tryon records cover ten years of the Colonial history of Lincoln County, 1769 to 1779. When Tryon was formed, the first settlers had not been here more than a score of years. The Tryon records contain many quaint things, mingled with matters of grave public concern, and a glance at them is of interest to the student of Lincoln County history.

TRYON COUNTY.

In a letter of Governor Tryon of date December 12th, 1768, he describes Tryon County as "forty-five miles in breadth due north and south and eighty miles due east and west it having been found to be that distance from the Catawba River to the western frontier line which was run last year between the Cherokee hunting grounds and this Province." The site for the public buildings was not fixed until 1774. As there was no court-house the courts during this time were held at private residences that happened to be convenient and suitable for the purpose.

The Tryon records begin with these words: "North Carolina, Tryon County. Pursuant to Act of Assembly of the Province aforesaid bearing date the fifth of December, 1768, in the ninth year of his Majesty's reign, for dividing Mecklenburg into two distinct counties by the name of Mecklenburg County and Tryon County and for other purposes in the said Act mentioned." His Majesty's commission under the great seal of the Province appointing certain justices to keep the peace for the county of Tryon is read. Ezekiel Polk, Clerk, John Tagert, Sheriff, and Alexander Martin, Attorney for the Crown, produce commissions and take oaths of office. Waightstill Avery produces license of attorney and takes oath of office.

The court records, beginning at April Sessions, 1769, are in the handwriting of Ezekiel Polk, the first clerk, who lived near King's Mountain. Ezekiel Polk removed to Mecklenburg County, and afterwards became famous through his grandson, James K. Polk, president of the United States.

The Tryon Courts were styled the "County Court of Pleas and Quarter Sessions." In this court deeds and wills were probated, estates settled, land entries recorded, guardians appointed, orphans apprenticed, highways opened, overseers appointed, and many other matters attended to. There were grand and petit juries and an "attorney for the crown."

These courts convened quarterly and continued without material change until the adoption of the constitution of 1868.

The courts of Oyer and Terminer, corresponding to our Superior Courts, were District Courts, several counties comprising one district. Tryon County was in the Salisbury District, and each County Court appointed its quota of jurors to attend the Salisbury Court. In 1782 the Salisbury District was divided, and Lincoln and other western counties were declared a separate district by the name of Morgan, where the Judges of the Superior Courts shall sit twice every year and hold a Superior Court of law. Lincoln County remained in the Morgan District, the courts being held at Morgan Town, until 1806, when a Superior Court was established in each county of the State to be held twice every year.

The Tryon Court was organized at Charles McLean's, and the Quarter Sessions for the years 1769, 1770, and 1771, were held at his house. He lived in the southern part of what is now Gaston County, on the headwaters of Crowder's Creek, near Crowder's Mountain. Charles McLean was an early, active, and zealous friend of liberty. At January Sessions 1770 he produced his Excellency's commission appointing him captain in the Tryon Regiment of Foot, and took the oath of office. In 1774 he was one of his Majesty's justices, and chairman of the committee appointed to select a permanent site for the court-house of Tryon County. He was a delegate from Tryon County to the Provincial Congress at Halifax, 4th April, 1776; also representing Tryon County in Assembly during the years 1777 and 1778. Between sessions, as colonel of the Tryon Regiment, he was actively engaged against western Tories.

The criminal docket of Tryon is marked "Crown Docket," and the indictments are brought in the name of the "King" or "Rex," as we now use "State." The minutes of a few cases tried at the first term will serve to show the administration of justice: "The King v. John Doe. Petty Larceny.

Jury empaneled finds the defendant guilty of the charge against him. Judgment by the Court that the defendant be detained in the Sheriff's custody till the costs of this prosecution be paid, and that at the hour of one o'clock of this day the said defendant on his bare back at the public whipping post receive thirty-nine lashes well laid on. "Rex. v. Thomas Pullham. Profane swearing. Submitted and fined five shillings." "The King v. John Case. Sabbath breaking. Defendant pleads guilty, fined ten shillings and the cost." "The King v. John Carson. Neglect of the King's Highway. Submitted and fined one shilling and sixpence." Letters testamentary granted Nicholas Welsh on the estate of John Welsh, deceased. William Wilson, appointed overseer of the road from the South Fork to Charles Town in that part between King's Mountain and Ezekiel Polk's; Charles McLean in that part between Ezekiel Polk's and the head of Fishing Creek. The road orders extend to the "temporary line between So. and No. Carolina." At October Sessions the claims against Tryon County for the year 1769, include a charter, twenty pounds expenses in sending for charter, eight pounds; Charles McLean, to two courts held at his house, five pounds; other items swell the amount to seventy-one pounds, sixteen shillings, and ten pence; and a tax of three shillings and two pence was levied on each of the 1221 taxable persons in Tryon County to meet the same.

At July Term, 1770, "Thomas Camel came into court and proved that the lower part of his ear was bit off in a fight with Steven Jones, and was not taken off by sentence of law; certified to whom it may concern." At a later term, "James Kelly comes into open court of his own free will and in the presence of said court did acknowledge that in a quarrel between him and a certain Leonard Sailor on the evening of the 2d day of June, 1773, he did bite off the upper part of the left ear of him, the said Leonard Sailor, who prays that the same be recorded in the minutes of the said court." This confession gave James Kelly such standing in the esteem of his Majesty's Justices that at the same term it was "Ordered by the Court that James Kelly serve as constable in the room of George Trout and that he swear in before Thomas Espy, Esq." From the court entries biting off ears was a popular way of fighting, but whole ears were at least an outward sign of honesty.

An old parchment, yellowed with age, labeled "Charter of Tryon County," encased in a frame, with great wax seal appended hangs on the court-house walls. It is addressed in the name of his Majesty, "George the Third by the Grace of God of Great Britain, France and Ireland, King Defender of the Faith, and so forth, To All and Singular our Faithful Subjects, Greeting," and is officially attested by "our trusty and well-beloved William Tryon, our Captain-General, Governor and Commander-in-Chief," at Wilmington, 26th June, 1769. It authorized Tryon County to elect and send two representatives to sit and vote in the House of Assembly.

The Quarter Sessions of 1772 were held at Christian Reinhardt's. The site of his house is now in the northern corporate limits of the town of Lincolnton, on the Ramsour Battle Ground. The Tories were encamped around his house, and after the battle it was used as a hospital. His house was built of heavy hewn logs, with a basement and stone foundation, that served some of the purposes of a fort both during Indian troubles and the Revolution. Some evidence of its strength is furnished by this item from the record of July Sessions, 1783: "Ordered by the Court that Christian Reinhardt's loft be the public gaol of said county until the end of next Court, October Term, 1783."

The courts of 1773 and 1774 were held at Christopher Carpenter's. He lived in the Beaver Dam section. There were some half-dozen Carpenters among the pioneers. Their signatures to all early deeds and wills are written in the German, Zimmerman.

The commissioners appointed by Act of Assembly to select the place whereon to erect and build the court-house, prison and stocks of Tryon County, on 26th July, 1774, reported their selection of the place "called the cross-roads on Christopher Mauney's land, between the heads of Long Creek, Muddy Creek, and Beaver Dam Creek in the county aforesaid as most central and convenient for the purpose aforesaid." The county court adjourned to meet at the "house of Christy Mauney or the cross-roads in his land." The site of the old Tryon court-house is eight miles southwest of Lincolnton, in Gaston County. October Sessions, 1774, were held at the house of Christian Mauney, and a room in his dwelling was used as a jail.

The old county of Lincoln, with its fine farms and beautiful homes, dotted with towns and villages, and musical with the hum of machinery, the pioneers found a wild, luxuriant with native flora, the habitat of the red man and wild animals. There were herds of fleet-footed deer; there were clumsy brown bears and fierce wild cats and panthers; there were droves of buffalo, and countless beavers building their dams on the creeks. The early settlers waged a relentless war on these animals and set a bounty on many of their scalps. The scalps on which a price was set were the wolf, panther, wild cat, and such other as preyed on domestic animals. For killing a grown wolf the price was one pound; a young wolf ten shillings; a wild cat five shillings. The claims filed in court were for "scalp tickets." As late as October Sessions, 1774, there were audited in favor of various individuals forty-nine "wolf scalp tickets." We still retain Indian, Beaver Dam, and Buffalo Creeks, Bear Ford, Wolf Gulch, and Buffalo Mountain, Buffalo Shoals, and the Indian names Catawba and Tuckaseegee, memorials of these primeval days.

In Tryon County there were many loyal subjects of the king, and there was likewise a gallant band of patriots who as early as August, 1775, adopted and signed the following bold declaration:

"The unprecedented, barbarous and bloody actions committed by British troops on our American brethren near Boston, on 19th April and 20th of May last, together with the hostile operations and treacherous designs now carrying on, by the tools of ministerial vengeance, for the subjugation of all British America, suggest to us the painful necessity of having recourse to arms in defense of our National freedom and constitutional rights, against all invasions; and at the same time do solemnly engage to take up arms and risk our lives and our fortunes in maintaining the freedom of our country whenever the wisdom and counsel of the Continental Congress, or our Provincial Convention shall declare it necessary; and this engagement we will continue in for the preservation of those rights and liberties which the principles of our Constitution and the laws of God, nature and nations have made it our duty to defend. We therefore, the subscribers, freeholders and inhabitants of Tryon County, do hereby faithfully unite ourselves under the most solemn ties of religion, honor and love to our country, firmly to resist force by force, and hold sacred till a reconciliation shall take place between Great Britain and America on Constitutional principles, which we most ardently desire, and do firmly agree to hold all such persons as inimical to the liberties of America who shall refuse to sign this association. (Signed) John Walker, Charles McLean, Andrew Neel, Thomas Beatty, James Coburn, Frederick Hambright, Andrew Hampton, Benjamin Hardin, George Paris, William Graham, Robt. Alexander, David Jenkins, Thomas Espey, Perrygreen Mackness, James McAfee, William Thompson, Jacob Forney, Davis Whiteside, John Beeman, John Morris, Joseph Harden, John Robison, James McIntyre, Valentine Mauney, George Black, Jas. Logan, Jas. Baird, Christian Carpenter, Abel Beatty, Joab Turner, Jonathan Price, Jas. Miller, John Dellinger, Peter Sides, William Whiteside, Geo. Dellinger, Samuel Carpenter, Jacob Moony, Jun., John Wells, Jacob Costner, Robert Hulclip, James Buchanan, Moses Moore, Joseph Kuykendall, Adam Simms, Richard Waffer, Samuel Smith, Joseph Neel, Samuel Loftin.

In 1777 an act was passed establishing State courts, providing that all suits and indictments instituted and fines imposed "in the name or the use of the King of Great Britain, when this territory was under his government, and owed allegiance to him, and all breaches on penal statutes directed to be prosecuted in the name of the king shall be prosecuted and proceeded in the name of the State." This act terminated the "Crown Docket," and the King or Rex as prosecutor. The "State Docket" begins at October Sessions, 1777.

The change of government from royal to state in Tryon County was consummated without a jar. The last Tryon court was held in January, 1779. During this year Tryon is blotted from the list of counties and the War of the Revolution is in progress. Lincoln County became the scene of many thrilling Revolutionary events.

THE BATTLE OF RAMSOUR'S MILL.

The Tories were embodied at Ramsour's Mill through the efforts of Lieut.-Col. John Moore and Maj. Nicholas Welch. These officers left the victorious British on the march from Charleston and arrived at their homes early in June, 1780. Moses Moore, the father of Colonel Moore, was a native of Carlyle, England, married a Miss Winston, near Jamestown, Virginia, and came to this section with the pioneers. Esther, a sister of Colonel Moore, married Joshua Roberts, a patriot soldier. The late Capt. John H. Roberts, a grandson, lived on the Moore homestead. It is situate on Indian Creek, eight miles southwest of Ramsour's Mill. Colonel Moore was an active partisan throughout the Revolution. Major Welch was a son of John Welch, and was reared next neighbor to Colonel Moore on Indian Creek. He was of Scottish descent, of great fluency of speech and fine persuasive power. They bore English commissions, were arrayed in splendid official equipments, and made lavish display of British gold. By the twentieth of June, these zealous loyalists collected at Ramsour's Mill a force of 1,300 Tories, and were actively engaged in their organization and drill preparatory to marching them to unite with the British in South Carolina. They occupied a well-chosen and advantageous position for offense and defense. It was on a high ridge that slopes three hundred yards to the mill and Clarke's Creek on the west, and the same distance to a branch on the east.

Col. Francis Locke collected a force of Rowan and Mecklenburg militia to engage the Tories. His detachments met at Mountain Creek, sixteen miles from Ramsour's, on Monday, the 19th, and when united amounted to four hundred men. They marched at once to the assault of the Tory position. At dawn of day on the morning of the 20th, in two miles of Ramsour's, they were met by Adam Reep, a noted scout, with a few picked men from the vicinity of the camp, who detailed to Colonel Locke the position of the enemy, and the plan of attack was formed. The mounted men under Captains McDowell, Brandon and Falls, marching slowly, were to follow the road due west to the camp, and not attack until the footmen under Colonel Locke could detour to the south, and reach the foot of the hill along the Tuckaseegee road, and make a simultaneous assault. They proceeded without other organization or order, it being left to the officers to be governed by circumstances when they reached the enemy.

The mounted men came upon the Tory picket some distance from the camp, were fired upon, charged the Tory camp, but recoiled from their deadly fire. The firing hurried Colonel Locke into action, a like volley felled many of his men, and they likewise retired. The Tories, seeing the effect of their fire, came down the hill and were in fair view. The Whigs renewed the action, which soon became general and obstinate on both sides. In about an hour the Tories began to fall back to their original position on the ridge, and a little beyond its summit, to shield a part of their bodies from the destructive fire of the Whigs, who were fairly exposed to their fire. In this situation the Tory fire became so effective the Whigs fell back to the bushes near the branch; and the Tories, leaving their safe position, pursued half way down the hill. At this moment Captain Hardin led a company of Whigs into the field from the south and poured a galling fire into the right flank of the Tories. Some of the Whigs obliqued to the right, and turned the left flank of the Tories; while Captain Sharpe led a few men beyond the crest of the ridge, and, advancing from tree to tree, with unerring aim picked off the enemy's officers and men, and hastened the termination of the conflict. The action now became close and warm. The combatants mixed together, and having no bayonets, struck at each other with the butts of their guns. When the Whigs reached the summit they saw the Tories collected beyond the creek, with a white flag flying. Fifty Tories, unable to make the bridge, were taken prisoners. Those beyond soon dispersed and made their escape. One-fourth of the Tories were unarmed, and they with a few others retired at the commencement of the battle.

Seventy men, including five Whig and four Tory captains, lay dead on the field, and more than two hundred were wounded, the loss on each side being about equal. In this contest, armed with the deadly rifle, blood relatives and familiar acquaintances and near neighbors fought in the opposing ranks, and as the smoke of battle occasionally cleared away recognized each other in the conflict.

Moore's defeat destroyed Toryism in this section. When Lord Cornwallis marched through the county the following January, and encamped at Ramsour's Mill, he lost more men by desertion than he gained by recruits.

THE BATTLE OF KING'S MOUNTAIN.

Col. Patrick Ferguson pitched his camp on the summit of King's Mountain, the 6th of October, 1780. So well pleased was he with his position that he gave vent to the impious boast that God Almighty could not drive him from it. In his army were eleven hundred men, brave and well disciplined, every one of whom knew what actual fighting meant. The patriot army aggregated a like number of eleven hundred men. Their only weapon was the long-barreled rifle in whose use they were experts. Ferguson had out foraging parties, and some of the patriots on foot could not keep up with the march, so it is probable the combatants on each side numbered nine hundred men.

To Colonel Shelby is due the inception of the campaign and much of the mobilization of the patriot army. To its successful culmination the little band of Lincoln men, sixty in number, contributed their full share. They united with the mountain men in pursuit of Ferguson at the Cowpens about sunset on October the 6th. Between 8 and 9 o'clock of the same evening the army set out toward King's Mountain in quest of Ferguson. Enock Gilmer, an advance scout, dined at noon of the 7th with a Tory family. From them he learned that Ferguson's camp was only three miles distant, on a ridge between two creeks, where some deer hunters had a camp the previous fall. Major Chronicle and Captain Mattocks stated that the camp was theirs and that they well knew the ground on which Ferguson was encamped; whereupon it was agreed that they should plan the battle. They rode a short distance by themselves, and reported that it was an excellent place to surround Ferguson's army; that the shooting would all be uphill with no danger of destroying each other. The officers instantly agreed to the plan, and without stopping began to arrange their men, assigning to each officer the part he was to take in surrounding the mountain. To the north side were assigned Shelby, Williams, Lacey and Cleveland, and on the south side Campbell, Sevier, McDowell and Winston, while the Lincoln men, under Lieut.-Col. Frederick Hambright, were to attack the northeast end of the mountain. It was three o'clock in the afternoon when the patriots reached their position, and Campbell's men were first to fire into the enemy. His column was charged by Ferguson's men with fixed bayonets, and driven down the mountain side. Shelby was advancing in quick time from the other side, so the enemy found it necessary to give attention to Shelby's assault, when Campbell's men returned to the fight, and Shelby and his men were forced to retreat before the dashing charge of Ferguson's bayonets. Thus back and forth, Campbell, Sevier, McDowell and Winston on the one side, Shelby, Williams, Lacey and Cleveland on the other, charged up the mountain and were driven back, only to renew the charge, until the mountain was enveloped in flame and smoke, and the rattle of musketry sounded like thunder.

The South Fork boys marched to their position with quick step, Major Chronicle ten paces in advance, and heading the column were Enock Gilmer, Hugh Ewin, Adam Barry and Robert Henry. Arriving at the end of the mountain, Major Chronicle cried, "Face to the hill!" The words were scarcely uttered when they were fired upon by the enemy's sharp-shooters, and Major Chronicle and William Rabb fell dead. But they pressed up the hill under the leadership of Lieutenant-Colonel Hambright, Maj. Jos. Dixon, Capts. James Johnston, Samuel Espey, Samuel Martin, and James White. Before they reached the crest, the enemy charged bayonets, first, however, discharging their guns, killing Captain Mattocks and John Boyd and wounding William Gilmer and John Chittim. As Robert Henry, a lad of sixteen, raised his gun to fire, a bayonet glanced along the barrel, through his hand and into his thigh. Henry discharged his gun, killing the Briton and both fell to the ground. Henry observed that many of his comrades were not more than a gun's length in front of the bayonets and the farthest not more than twenty feet. Reaching the foot of the hill, they reloaded, and fired with deadly effect upon their pursuers, in turn chasing their enemies up the mountain. William Caldwell, seeing Henry's condition, pulled the bayonet out of his thigh, kicked his hand from the bloody instrument and passed on. Thus the battle raged on all sides. No regiment, no man failed to do his duty. The unerring aim of the mountain men from behind every tree and every rock was rapidly diminishing the brave fighters under Ferguson, who began to despair. At the end of an hour Ferguson was killed, and a white flag was hoisted in token of surrender. Three hundred of his men were dead and wounded, and six hundred prisoners. The Americans suffered a loss of twenty-eight killed and seventy-four wounded.

Thus was fought one of the decisive battles of the Revolution. It was the enemy's first serious disaster and turned the tide of war. Ferguson and his army were wiped out of existence. Its immediate result was to check the enemy's progress until the patriots could muster strength for his final overthrow.

The Lincoln County men, considering their small number, suffered considerably in the engagement: Maj. William Chronicle, Capt. John Mattocks, William Rabb, John Boyd and Arthur Patterson were killed; Moses Henry died soon thereafter in the hospital at Charlotte of the wound he received in the battle; Capt. Samuel Espey, Robert Henry, William Gilmer, John Chittim, and William Bradley were wounded. The Tories, shooting down the steep mountain side, much of their aim was too high. Lieutenant-Colonel Hambright's hat was perforated with three bullet holes, and he received a shot through the thigh, his boot filled and ran over with blood, but he remained in the fight till the end, gallantly encouraging his men.

CORNWALLIS IN PURSUIT OF MORGAN.

Morgan defeated Colonel Tarleton in a signal victory at the Cowpens, South Carolina, 17th January, 1781. In less than an hour five hundred of Tarleton's Legion were prisoners, the remainder slain and scattered, and he scampering in mad haste to Cornwallis, then but twenty-five miles distant. General Morgan, anxious to hold every one of his prisoners to exchange for the Continental line of North Carolina captured at Charleston, and then languishing on British prison ships, immediately began his famous retreat toward Virginia, while Cornwallis, in command of 4,000 well-equipped veterans, gave pursuit. Colonel Washington's cavalry, with the prisoners, safely crossed the Catawba at the Island Ford; the prisoners were sent on, while Washington rejoined General Morgan, who had crossed with the main army eight or nine miles farther down at Sherrill's Ford, where they tarried awhile on the eastern bank.

The British came by way of the old Tryon court-house. Cornwallis says "I therefore assembled the army on the 25th at Ramsour's Mill on the south fork of the Catawba, and as the loss of my light troops could only be remedied by the activity of the whole corps, I employed a halt of two days in collecting some flour, and destroying superfluous baggage, and all my wagons except those loaded with hospital stores, and four reserved in readiness for sick and wounded." Steadman says that Lord Cornwallis, "by first reducing the size and quantity of his own, set an example which was cheerfully followed by all the officers in his command, although by so doing they sustained a considerable loss. No wagons were reserved except those loaded with hospital stores, salt and ammunition, and four empty ones for the accommodation of the sick and wounded. And such was the ardour, both of officers and soldiers, and their willingness to submit to any hardship for the promotion of the service, that this arrangement, which deprived them of all future prospect of spirituous liquors, and even hazarded a regular supply of provisions, was acquiesced in without a murmur."

Cornwallis crossed the South Fork River at the Reep Ford, one mile from Ramsour's Mill, and pitched his marquee on the Ramsour battle-ground; O'Hara remained on the west bank of the river at the Reep place; Webster occupied the hill west of the Ramsour Mill; while Tarleton, who had crossed the river three miles lower down, between the Laboratory and the present railway bridge, in rejoining his chief, camped on the hill south of Cornwallis. Foraging parties were sent out in different directions to collect grain, and Ramsour's Mill was kept running day and night converting the grain into flour to replenish his Lordship's commissary.

In the destruction of baggage, Cornwallis first ordered his splendid camp chest burned. His mahogany tea chest with the remainder of his tea, and six solid silver spoons, he sent to Mrs. Barbara Reinhardt, wife of Christian Reinhardt, with a note requesting that she accept them. These presents were treasured and carefully preserved. At the breaking out of the Civil War they belonged to a granddaughter, whose sons were Confederate volunteers. Believing an old saying that whoever carries anything in war that was carried in another war by a person that was not killed, will likewise be unharmed, she gave each of her sons one of the silver spoons, and the others to neighbor boys, and in this way the spoons were lost and Federal bullets shattered faith in their charm. The chest is yet preserved. After the conflagration many irons were tumbled in the mill-pond while others left on the ground were picked up by citizens. The milldam was taken down the next summer and much iron valuable to the farmers taken out. A few defective muskets were found; also one piece of artillery, so damaged it was not removed from the mud. Where the whiskey and rum bottles were broken the fragments lay in heaps for years. These were afterwards gathered up and sold to the potters for glazing purposes.

To this destruction of his whole material train and necessary outfit for a winter campaign Judge Schenck attributes the final discomfiture of Cornwallis at Guilford Court House. The supplies he burned could not be replaced short of Wilmington, and thither he was compelled to go when a reverse met his arms.

While here Cornwallis requested Christian Reinhardt to point out Colonel Moore's position, and describe the battle of Ramsour's Mill. At the conclusion his only observation was that Colonel Moore had a fine position, but did not have the tact to defend it; that he ought not to have risked a battle but should have fallen back to Ferguson.

Early on the morning of the 28th the British broke camp and marched toward Beattie's Ford, a distance of twelve miles, to Jacob Forney's. The moving Britons, in scarlet uniforms, with glittering muskets, made an impressive sight, and tradition still preserves their route. Jacob Forney was a thrifty farmer and well-known Whig. Here they encamped three days, consuming his entire stock of cattle, hogs, sheep and poultry, and taking his horses and forty gallons of brandy. Some state that Cornwallis approached the Catawba on the evening of the 28th, and found it considerably swollen and impassable for his infantry and this caused him to fall back to Jacob Forney's plantation.

THE BATTLE OF COWAN'S FORD.

The tardiness of Cornwallis was not altogether due to the flushed condition of the Catawba, however much the swollen waters of the Yadkin and the Dan may have later impeded his pursuit. The prime cause of delay was the vigilance of the Whigs in guarding the several fords. On the approach of the British, Gen. William Davidson placed guards at the Tuckaseegee, Tool's and Cowan's fords; with his greatest force and Capt. Joseph Graham's cavalry troops, he took position himself at Beattie's Ford; while Morgan and Washington were at Sherrill's Ford. Cornwallis kept posted on these dispositions. Cowan's was a private ford, guarded only by Lieut. Thomas Davidson with twenty-five men. After getting the best information he could obtain, Cornwallis resolved to attempt the passage at Cowan's Ford. Each army was keeping close watch on the movements of the other. On the 30th Captain Graham's cavalry was dispatched across Beattie's Ford and ascertained that the British were encamped within four miles, and in two miles they discovered one hundred of the enemy's cavalry, who followed them to the river but kept at a respectful distance, evincing fear of an ambuscade. Green, Morgan and Washington came to Davidson's headquarters at Beattie's Ford on the afternoon of the 31st and held a consultation. The British vanguard of four or five hundred men appeared on the opposite hill beyond the river and viewed the American position. After General Green's departure, leaving a portion of his force at Beattie's Ford, under Colonel Farmer, General Davidson, with 250 men and the cavalry, marched down the river four miles to Cowan's Ford, where he arrived after dark.

The river at Cowan's Ford is one-fourth of a mile wide. The wagon ford went directly across the river. The horse ford, entering at the same place, obliqued down the river, through an island, and came out on the Mecklenburg side a quarter of a mile lower down. The latter was the shallower and most used, and the one the British were expected to follow, so General Davidson took position on the hill overlooking this ford. Above the coming-out place of the wagon ford was a narrow strip of level bottom, and then an abrupt hill. Lieutenant Davidson's picket remained at their post on this level strip, fifty steps above the landing and near the water's edge.

Cornwallis broke camp at one in the morning of the first of February, and detached Lieutenant-Colonel Webster with that part of the army and all the baggage to Beattie's Ford, where General Davidson was supposed to be posted, with direction to make every possible demonstration by cannonading and otherwise of an intention of forcing a passage, while he marched to Cowan's Ford, arriving at the bank of the river as day began to break. The command of the front was given to Colonel Hall of the Guards. Under the guidance of Frederick Hager, a Tory living on the west bank, employed by Cornwallis on account of his familiarity with the ford, the bold Britons plunged into the river, with the firm determination of encountering the small band of Americans on the eastern bank. When one hundred yards in the river they were discovered and fired upon by Lieutenant Davidson's picket which aroused the guard, who kept up the fire, but the enemy continued to advance. No sooner did the guide who attended the light infantry to show them the ford, hear the report of the sentinel's musket than he turned around and left them. This, at first seemed to portend much mischief but in the end proved fortunate for the British. Colonel Hall, forsaken by his guide, and not knowing the true direction of the ford, led his column directly across the river to the nearest point of the opposite bank. The picket fire alarmed Davidson's camp, who paraded at the horse ford, then Graham's cavalry was ordered to the assistance of the picket. By the time the cavalry were in position on the high bank, and ready for action the British were within fifty yards of the Mecklenburg shore. The cavalry poured a destructive fire into the advancing columns. The British did not fire a gun while in the water; as they landed they loaded their guns and fired up the bank. The firing was kept up some minutes, but the Whigs soon retreated from the unequal contest.

By the time his Lordship crossed the river Webster had his force in array on the face of the hill fronting Beattie's Ford, and was making demonstrations of attempting a passage. His front lines were firing by platoons, a company went into the water fifty steps and fired; while four cannon were booming for half an hour, the flying balls cutting off the limbs of trees and tearing up the opposite bank, the sound rolling down the river like peals of thunder. All this, however, was only a feint. Colonel Farmer, being notified by an aide of General Davidson, that the enemy had crossed at Cowan's Ford, retired. The pickets at other points were notified and all united at John McKnitt Alexander's that afternoon, eight miles from Charlotte; while Cornwallis united his forces two miles from Beattie's Ford at Given's farm.

In this action, the Americans lost General Davidson, a gallant, brave and generous officer, and three others. Of the British, Colonel Hall and another officer and twenty-nine privates were killed and thirty-five were wounded. The horse of Cornwallis was shot and fell dead as he ascended the bank. Lord Cornwallis on the 2d of February returns his thanks "to the Brigade of Guards for their cool and determined bravery in the passage of the Catawba, while rushing through that long and difficult ford under a galling fire."

IMPORTANCE OF THESE ENGAGEMENTS.

On the 18th June, 1780, General Rutherford, in command of the Mecklenburg and Rowan militia, marched to attack the Tories at Ramsour's Mill. At the Catawba, Col. William Graham, with the Lincoln County Regiment, united with General Rutherford, swelling his command to twelve hundred. He encamped at Col. Joseph Dickson's, three miles from the Tuckaseegee, twenty miles from Ramsour's, and about the same distance from Colonel Locke on Mountain Creek. General Rutherford dispatched a message directing Colonel Locke to join him at the Dickson place on the evening of the 19th or the morning of the 20th. Colonel Locke likewise dispatched James Johnston to inform General Rutherford of his intention to give the Tories battle on the morning of the 20th. However, no junction was formed and after a hard and well-fought battle Colonel Locke defeated the Tories. General Rutherford followed the Tuckaseegee road and arrived at Ramsour's Mill two hours after the battle. The dead and most of the wounded were lying where they fell. General Rutherford remained here two days sending Davie's Cavalry and other troops in pursuit of the Tories, thus accenting the victory and making the defeat crushing and complete, subduing the loyalist spirit, with consequent encouragement of the patriots.

Three days after the battle Allaire, who was with Ferguson, referring to the battle of Ramsour's Mill, recorded in his dairy: "Friday, 23d. Lay in the field at Ninety-six. Some friends came in. Four were wounded. The militia had embodied at Tuckaseegee, on the South Fork of the Catawba River. Were attacked by a party of rebels, under command of General Rutherford. The militia were scant of ammunition, which obliged them to retreat. They were obliged to swim the river at the milldam. The Rebels fired on them and killed thirty." Col. John Moore with thirty men reached Cornwallis at Camden, where he was threatened with a trial by court-martial for hastening organization in advance of Ferguson.

The Battle of Ramsour's Mill was fraught with important results. It was fought at a gloomy period of the Revolution, when the cause of liberty seemed prostrate and hopeless in the South. The victorious British considered South Carolina and Georgia restored to English rule and were planning the invasion of North Carolina. It marks the turning point in the war. But for this battle Moore and Welch could have reinforced Ferguson with an army of 1,500 or 2,000 men, and there might have been no King's Mountain, or King's Mountain with a different result. But instead of aid to Ferguson, the Lincoln Regiment with the South Carolinians under Hill and Lacey were again encamped on the Catawba, and when Colonel Williams crossed the Tuckaseegee, and united with these troops, the entire force encountering no opposition, followed the Tuckaseegee road, via Ramsour's Mill, the Flint Hill road to Cherry Mountain, later uniting with the mountain men at the Cowpens, the next day helping to destroy Ferguson, and gain the glorious victory, that makes the name of King's Mountain famous in our country's history, of which the Battle of Cowpens, Guilford Court House and the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown were the direct consequences.

LINCOLN COUNTY PENSION ROLL.

On the pension roll as late as 1834, more than fifty years after the Revolution, the following is the Lincoln County list of soldiers yet living and drawing pensions: Robert Abernethy, Vincent Allen, Christian Arney, Matthew Armstrong, Robert Berry, Jonas Bradshaw, Caspar Bolick, Alexander Brevard, Samuel Caldwell, William Carroll, John Chittim, Michal Cline, Samuel Collins, Martin Coulter, Thomas Costner, George Dameron, Joseph Dixon, Peter Eddlemon, William Elmore, Samuel Espey, James Farewell, Abraham Forney, Robinson Goodwin, Joseph Graham, William Gregory, Nathan Gwaltney, Nicholas Hafner, Simon Hager, John Harman, John Helm, James Henry, James Hill, John Kidd, John Kincaid, Robert Knox, Shadrack Lefcy, Tapley Mahannas, Marmaduke Maples, Samuel Martin, Thomas Mason, William Mayes, William McCarthy, William McLean, Nathan Mendenhall, Alexander Moore, John Moore, William Moore, Jeremiah Mundy, Humphrey Parker, Hiram Pendleton, Jacob Plonk, William Potter, William Rankin, Charlie Regan, Adam Reep, Michael Reep, Joshua Roberts, James Robinson, Henry Rumfeldt, Peter Scrum, John Stamey, Bartholomew Thompson, Charles Thompson, Phillip Tillman, Conrad Tippong, Robert Tucker, John Turbyfill, Charles Whit, John Wilfong, Joseph Willis, James Wilkinson, and Elisha Withers.

LINCOLNTON AND LINCOLN COUNTY.

When Tryon County was divided the Tryon Court-house fell in Lincoln County, but too near its western border for public convenience. The courts for part of the years 1783 and 1784 were held at the house of Capt. Nicholas Friday. His residence stood on the east side of the river, seven miles south of Lincolnton. The courts of July and October sessions, 1784, were held at the house of Henry Dellinger, and his spring house was designated as the "gaol." This spring house was a two-story affair, the lower stone, the upper logs; the upper story was used as the public jail. Some of the prisoners escaping, the sheriff was ordered "to make use of a room in Henry Dellinger's house to be strengthened for the purposes of a common gaol." The sheriffs, for protection against the escape of prisoners from these very odd jails, always had entered on the court record their "protest against the sufficiency of said gaol." The site of Henry Dellinger's home is Magnolia, six miles southeast of Lincolnton, where the late John B. Smith lived.

While the location of the county seat remained an open question, the map of the county changed. In 1753, the western portion of the Granville domain was set up into the county of Rowan. Rowan in 1777, was divided by a line beginning on the Catawba River at the Tryon and Mecklenburg corner, thence up the meanders of the said river to the north end of an island, known as "the Three Cornered Island," etc., and the territory west and south of said line erected into a new county, by the name of Burke, and the county seat, Morganton, located fifty miles from the southeast part of the county on the Catawba. It being represented to the General Assembly that "certain of the inhabitants of Burke labor under great hardships in attending on courts and other public meetings from their remote situation from the court-house," in 1782 it enacted that all that part of Burke from Sherrill's Ford to the Fish Dam Ford of the South Fork, "and from thence a southwest course to Earl Granville's old line," be taken from Burke and added to Lincoln County. In 1784 a greater slice of Burke was added to Lincoln. The line separating the counties began at the Horse Ford on the Catawba and ended at the same point in the Granville line. This is now a noted point, known as the "Three County Corner," the corner of Lincoln, Burke and Cleveland, and is the only established point in the old Granville line west of the Catawba River.

The act of 1784 appointed Joseph Dickson, John Carruth, John Wilson, Joseph Steele and Nicholas Friday, commissioners to locate the county town, which they did by entering for the purpose three hundred acres of "vacant and unappropriated land, lying between the lines of Christian Reinhardt and Phillip Cansler in our county of Lincoln on both sides of the wagon road leading from the Tuckaseegee Ford to Ramsour's Mill and including the forks of the road leading to Cansler's sawmill." The grant for same was made December 14th, 1785, to "Joseph Dickson in trust for the citizens of Lincoln County." The General Assembly, in 1786, granted a charter for Lincolnton, reciting that the place is "a healthy and pleasant situation and well watered." The same year the town was laid off into lots. At the intersection of Main and Aspin streets, the two principal streets of the town, was left a public square on which the court-house was erected. The first hundred lots laid off the commissioners disposed of by a town lottery, the draft of which and the papers connected therewith are yet on file. Chances were taken by the prominent men of that day and also by many ladies. A specimen ticket reads: "This ticket entitles the bearer to whatever number is drawn against it in the Lincoln Lottery, No. 86, Jo. Dickson." The corporate limits have been twice extended in the last decade, and the western boundary now rests on Clarke's Creek and the South Fork River.

In the history of Lincolnton and Lincoln County the name of Joseph Dickson stands conspicuous. The site of his homestead is two miles northwest of Mount Holly, on the line of the Seaboard Air Line Railroad. General Rutherford, en route to attack the Tories at Ramsour's Mill, encamped at Dickson's the night before the battle. He accompanied General Rutherford next day, passing over the ground then vacant land, where five years later, the grant was made to him as proprietor in trust for the citizens of Lincoln County. He was one of the immortal heroes of King's Mountain. With the rank of major he was one of the officers that led the South Fork boys up the rugged northeast end of the mountain, facing with undaunted spirit the lead and the charge of the enemy's bayonet. In 1781 he opposed the British invasion of North Carolina, serving with the rank of colonel. During this year he was elected county court clerk, which office he held the next ten years. He was chairman of the committee that selected the site of Lincolnton, and the grant for the land on which the town was built was made to him. The grantor to all the original purchasers of lots is, "Joseph Dickson, Esq., proprietor in trust for the commissioners appointed to lay off a town in the county of Lincoln by the name of Lincolnton." He was chosen Senator from Lincoln County in 1788, and continuously succeeded himself until 1795. In 1789 he was one of the forty great men of the State selected by the General Assembly to constitute the first trustees of the University of North Carolina. He then served as a general in the militia. From 1799 to 1801 he was a member of Congress. December 27th, 1803, he sold his plantation of twelve hundred acres, and removed to Rutherford County, Tennessee, where he died, April 24th, 1825, aged eighty years, and was buried with military and Masonic honors.

Lincolnton is situate 869 feet above sea level in the hill country of the great Piedmont belt. In the county are Reece, Clubbs, Daily, Rush and Buffalo Mountains; they are small peaks not larger than Hog Hill in the northern part of the county. From Lincolnton mountains are visible in almost every direction. On the northeast is Anderson's Mountain; in the southwest looms up King's Mountain, on whose historic heights was fought the memorable battle that broke the power of the British crown; in line with King's Mountain to the south can be seen Spencer, Crowder, and Pasour Mountains; in the north and northwest are Baker's Mountain, Carpenter and Ben's Knobs, and numerous peaks of the South Mountains; while in the distance in solemn grandeur lies the upturned face of the Grandfather; and yet still farther away rise the far-distant peaks of the great Blue Ridge. The Carolina and Northwestern Railway comes in from Chester, South Carolina, and runs northwesterly into the heart of the mountains of North Carolina; while from the east comes in the Seaboard Air Line, and extends westwardly to Rutherfordton.

Lincoln thus remained a large county until 1841, when the first slice was taken to form, with a portion of Rutherford, the county of Cleveland. In 1842, Catawba was set up from Lincoln by an east and west line passing one and a half miles north of Lincolnton. In 1846, the southern part was set off into the county of Gaston, by a line to pass four and a half miles south of Lincolnton, and four miles of Catawba ceded back to Lincoln. The formation of these new counties reduced Lincoln to a narrow strip, ten miles in width with an average length of thirty miles, and it is with this strip that the remainder of this narrative will deal. Lincoln County is bounded on the north by Catawba County; on the east by the Catawba River, which separates it from Iredell and Mecklenburg; on the south by Gaston; on the west by Cleveland, and one-fourth mile of Burke.

FIRST SUPERIOR COURT CLERK.

Lawson Henderson was long an influential citizen, filling the offices of county surveyor, sheriff, and clerk of the county and Superior Courts. He was a son of James Henderson, a pioneer settler, and was appointed Superior Court clerk for life under the Act of Assembly of 1806 establishing a Superior Court in each county of the State. He served from April term, 1807, to Fall term, 1835, when he resigned. At Fall term, 1833, John D. Hoke applied for the clerk's office, having been elected pursuant to act of 1832. Then followed the suit of "Hoke vs. Henderson," in which Mr. Henderson was the winner. This was a famous case. It decided that an office is property, and was not reversed until 1903, and then by a majority opinion, two justices dissenting.

PLEASANT RETREAT ACADEMY.

This school occupied four acres in the northern part of Lincolnton. From its institution it bore the attractive name of Pleasant Retreat Academy. The older students delighted to speak of its refreshing shades—the oak and the hickory interspersed with the chestnut and the chinquepin—and the spring at the foot of the hill. It was chartered by the General Assembly, 10th December, 1813, with the following trustees: Rev. Philip Henkle, Rev. Humphrey Hunter, Lawson Henderson, Joseph Graham, John Fullenwider, John Hoke, Peter Forney, Robert Williamson, Daniel Hoke, J. Reinhardt, Vardry McBee, David Ramsour, Peter Hoyle, Henry Y. Webb, George Carruth, William McLean, Robert Burton, John Reid, and David Reinhardt. In this school were trained a long roll of men whose names adorn their county's history. Of its students—

James Pinkey Henderson, son of Maj. Lawson Henderson, sought the broad area of the "Lone Star State" for the full development of his giant intellect and won fortune and fame. An eminent lawyer, Attorney-General of the Republic of Texas, its minister Plenipotentiary and Envoy Extraordinary to France, England and the United States, Major-General of the United States Army in the War with Mexico, Governor of Texas, and at the time of his death United States Senator, he adorned the positions his courage and talents won.

William Lander, brilliant, impetuous and chivalric, was one of the foremost advocates of the bar and member of the convention from Lincoln County that passed the Ordinance of Secession. Afterwards his splendid eloquence found congenial fellowship amid the fiery spirits of the Confederate Congress. Lawyer, solicitor, legislator and member of the Confederate Congress, he has a monument of love and affection in the hearts of those who knew him best. His brother, Rev. Samuel Lander, was a man of broad scholarship, an educator of note, and a preacher of wide repute.

Thomas Dews, when a mere lad, entered the State University, graduated in the class of 1824, taught awhile in Pleasant Retreat, and began the practice of law. He was drowned in Second Broad River, August 4th, 1838, aged 30 years, 2 months and 25 days. His remains lie in honor beneath a marble shaft, the tribute of a noble-hearted woman to the man who adored her while he lived, and marks the spot where rests her lover and her love. Judge William H. Battle knew Mr. Dews at Chapel Hill and often spoke of his talents and his genius. Toward the close of an address before the literary societies at the commencement of 1865, growing reminiscent, Judge Battle said: "I will occupy a few more moments of your time in recalling from the dim recollections of the past the names of a few men, each of whom was regarded as a college genius of the day, and who with well-directed energies, and a longer life might have left a name the world would not willingly let die. In the year 1824 Thomas Dews, a young man from the county of Lincoln, took his degree of Bachelor of Arts, dividing with Prof. Sims, Judge Manly and ex-Governor Graham the highest honor of the class. His parents were poor, and it is said resorted to the humble occupation of selling cakes for the purpose of procuring means for the education of their promising boy. After graduation, he studied law and commenced the practice with every prospect of eminent success, when unhappily, a morbid sensitiveness of temperament drove him to habits of intemperance, during one of the fits of which he came to an untimely end. His name, which ought to have gone down to posterity on account of great deeds achieved by extraordinary talents, will probably be remembered only in connection with a happily-turned impromptu epitaph." Yet it has gone down in history immortalized by his neighbor and friend, Col. James R. Dodge, a distinguished practitioner for many years at the Lincolnton bar. Colonel Dodge was a son of Gen. Richard Dodge and Sarah Ann Dodge, his mother being a sister of Washingtnn Irving, of New York. Those acquainted with the playful writings of Washington Irving will not be surprised at the spontaneous retort of his nephew. But one residence separated the Dews home from that of Colonel Dodge in Lincolnton. At April term, 1832, of Rutherford Superior Court, David L. Swain, afterwards Governor, was on the bench and in the bar were Samuel Hillman, Tom Dews and Mr. Dodge. While Mr. Dodge was addressing the jury, Judge Swain recalled a punning epitaph on a man named Dodge, wrote it on a piece of paper, and passed it around to the merriment of the bar; and when Colonel Dodge had finished his speech, he found lying on his table:

"EPITAPH OF JAMES R. DODGE, ESQ., ATTORNEY-AT-LAW.

"Here lies a Dodge, who dodged all good,
And dodged a deal of evil,
Who after dodging all he could,
He could not dodge the Devil."

Mr. Dodge read the paper, turned it over and wrote on the other side:

"EPITAPH OF THREE ATTORNEYS.

"Here lies a Hillman and a Swain,
Whose lot let no man choose;
They lived in sin and died in pain,
And the Devil got his Dews" [dues].

Among the post-bellum students are Hoke Smith, lawyer, journalist, Secretary of the Interior, and Governor of Georgia; William Alexander Hoke, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of North Carolina; William E. Shipp, Lieutenant Tenth United States Cavalry, killed on San Juan Hill, Battle of Santiago, July 1st, 1898; T. H. Cobb, Beverly C. Cobb, David W. Robinson, Charles E. Childs, Charles C. Cobb, and Lemuel B. Wetmore, lawyers; Silas McBee, Editor of the Churchman; Rev. William L. Sherrill of the Western North Carolina Conference; William E. Grigg, banker; Blair and Hugh Jenkins, Charles and Henry Robinson, merchants; William W. Motz, architect and builder; William A. Costner, Thomas J. Ramsour, Charles M. Sumner, farmers, and a long list of others.

The Pleasant Retreat Academy property has been transferred to the Daughters of the Confederacy for a Memorial Hall. In this there is eminent fitness, for among its students were William A. Graham, Confederate States Senator; William Lander, member of the Confederate Congress; Maj.-Gen. Stephen D. Ramseur; Maj.-Gen. Robert F. Hoke; Col. John F. Hoke; Col. William J. Hoke; Maj. Frank Schenck; Capts. James F. Johnston, Joseph W. Alexander, George W. Seagle, George L. Phifer, James D. Wells, and others, making an honor roll of more than a hundred Confederate soldiers.

Lincolnton Female Academy was chartered by the General Assembly December 21st, 1821, with James Bivings, Vardry McBee, David Hoke, John Mushatt, Joseph E. Bell, and Joseph Morris, trustees. Four acres on the south side of the town were conveyed to the trustees for school purposes, and the two school properties were connected by Academy street. The Female Academy likewise had a long and useful career. It is now the site of the Lincolnton graded school.

EARLY SETTLERS AND CHURCHES.

The early settlers of Lincoln were of Scotch-Irish and German origin. There were but few of other nationalities. They came in swarms, by "hundreds of wagons from the northwards." About the year 1750, the Scotch-Irish settlement covered both banks of the Catawba, so the eastern portion of Lincoln was populated by this race, while the South Fork and its tributaries—the remainder of the county—were contemporaneously settled by Germans.

The Scotch-Irish are stern and virile, noted for hatred of sham, hypocrisy and oppression. The Germans are hardy and thrifty, characterized by love of home and country, tenacious of custom and slow to change. Both were a liberty-loving, God-fearing people, among whom labor was dignified and honorable. A charm about these pioneers is, that their heads were not turned by ancestral distinction. They were self-reliant and mastered the primeval forest, with its hardships and disadvantages. They became adepts in handicraft and combated the foes of husbandry in an unsettled region. They were the silent heroes who shaped destiny and imbued unborn generations with strength of character and force of will. The early Scotch-Irish preachers taught the creed of Calvin and Knox, and the first place of worship on the east side was Presbyterian. The pioneer Germans were followers of the great central figure of the Reformation, Martin Luther, and the Swiss Reformer, Ulrick Zwingle, and the oldest place of worship on the west side is Lutheran and Reformed. To-day the county is dotted with churches which, according to numerical strength, rank in the following order:

Methodist Episcopal, Baptist, Lutheran, Methodist Protestant, Presbyterian, Reformed and Protestant Episcopal.

When churches were few camp meetings were held by the Presbyterians, Baptists, Reformed, Protestants and Methodists. They have all been discontinued except one, the celebrated Rock Springs Camp Meeting of the Methodists in east Lincoln. There a great arbor is surrounded by three hundred tents, and the meeting has been held annually since 1830. It is incorporated after the style of a town, and governed much the same way. It is held on forty-five acres of ground, conveyed 7th August, 1830, by Joseph M. Mundy to Freeman Shelton, Richard Proctor and James Bivings, trustees of the Methodist Episcopal Church, Lincoln circuit. The estate an owner has in a lot is conditional, and ceases upon failure to keep and maintain a tent on it. The meeting continues one week and embraces the second Sunday in August. It is attended by all denominations from the surrounding counties by from ten thousand to fifteen thousand people. Deep religious interest is manifest and many date their conversion from these meetings. Viewed from a social standpoint this is also a great occasion. The old camp ground combines the best elements of social life in the country, city and summer resort. Rock Springs is the successor of an older camp ground called Robey's, which was situate near the Catawba Springs.

The memory of the old people runs back to the time when the printing press had not filled the churches with hymn books, when there were no church organs, nor organists to lead the choir. In those days the congregations sung, being led by a precentor called the clerk, a man of importance, and the minister lined out the hymn. Four young men from Lincolnton attended a camp meeting. When the minister lined out a couplet of a familiar hymn, the congregation followed the clerk, sung the couplet and paused for the next

The four boys, filled with the spirit of John Barleycorn, paused not, but in well-trained musical voice, carrying the several parts finished the stanza; then the second and the entire hymn to the dismay of the minister, the clerk, and dumbfounding of the congregation. A charge of disturbing public worship was preferred in the courts, conviction followed and the offenders sentenced to sit one hour in the stocks.

Most of the people in North Brook, the western township in the county, are Methodist Protestants, and they have one church, Fairfield, near the Catawba River on the eastern side of the county.

Long Creek was the first Baptist church established in Lincoln County, either in 1772 or 1777. It is on Long Creek, one mile from Dallas. Hebron was organized at Abernethy's Ferry on the Catawba about 1792. Six miles from Beattie's Ford was Earhardt's church, constituted in the 18th century. Abraham Earhardt, upon whose land the church was located, was an ordained minister and preached at his church and elsewhere. He married Catharine Forney, sister of Peter, Abram and Jacob Forney, and owned more than a thousand acres of land, on which he operated a flouring mill, tan yard, blacksmith shop and a distillery. The Earhardt place is now the home of Maj. W. A. Graham. To-day the Baptists have churches in every section of the county.

The act of the Provincial Assembly in 1768, erecting that portion of Mecklenburg County west of the Catawba into a separate county by the name of Tryon, also created Saint Thomas Parish; and, according to the custom of that day, county and parish were coterminous. While nominally under a church establishment, no clergyman of the Church of England exercised any pastoral care in colonial days. In 1785 Robert Johnston Miller, afterwards known as Parson Miller, came to Lincoln, and became the religious teacher, lay reader, and catechist of the Episcopalians he found in the county. While avowing himself an Episcopalian, he received Lutheran ordination. In 1806 he resigned his Lincoln charge to David Henkel, a Lutheran licentiate, and removed to Burke. From 1785 to 1823, Parson Miller was almost the only Episcopal minister in this region. In 1823 John Stark Ravenscroft was elected Bishop, Parson Miller, being in the chair. The Bishop visited Lincoln County in 1824, and in the three parishes of Smyrna, White Haven and St. Peter's confirmed forty-one persons. In 1828 he again visited Catawba Springs and endeavored to collect the remains of the three old parishes in that neighborhood, but found it a hopeless task. While at the Springs he preached at Beattie's Ford and "on Sunday in the public room at the Springs to such of the company as a very rainy day detained from visiting a camp meeting in the vicinity." In the year 1835 Dr. Moses A. Curtis, the noted botanist, was stationed at Lincolnton. The year 1837 found him in another field. On the 2d of March, 1842, Col. John Hoke conveyed to "E. M. Forbes, Jeremiah W. Murphy, T. N. Herndon, Michael Hoke, Leonard E. Thompson and Haywood W. Guion, vestry and trustees of the Saint Luke's church in Lincolnton, the lot on which Saint Luke's church yet stands. Its rectors have been Rev. E. M. Forbes, Rev. A. F. Olmstead, Rev. J. C. Huske, Rev. T. S. W. Mott, Rev. H. H. Hewitt, Rev. C. T. Bland, Rev. G. M. Everhart, and Rev. Dr. W. R. Wetmore for forty years—from 1862 until his death.

Rev. Robert Johnston Miller was born in Scotland July 11th, 1758. His parents designed him for the ministry, and sent him to the Dundee classical school. Before he entered the ministry he migrated to America, arriving in Charlestown, Massachusetts, A. D. 1774. Soon after the colonies declared their independence and young Miller at once espoused the cause of liberty, and when General Greene passed through Boston, he enlisted as a Revolutionary soldier. He participated in the battles of Long Island, where he was wounded in the face, of Brandywine, White Plains, and the siege of Valley Forge. With the army he traveled south, where he remained after peace was restored and the army disbanded. He began his work as a licentiate of the Episcopal Church without authority to administer the sacraments. His people of White Haven church, in Lincoln County, sent a petition to the Lutheran pastors of Cabarrus and Rowan, with high recommendations, praying that he might be ordained by them, which was accordingly done at St. John's church, Cabarrus County, on the 20th of May, 1794. His ordination certificate reads: "To all to whom it may concern, Greeting: Whereas, A great number of Christian people in Lincoln County have formed themselves into a society by the name of White Haven church, and also have formed a vestry: We the subscribers having been urged by the pressing call from the said church to ordain a minister for the good of their children, and for the enjoyment of ye gospel ordinances among them, from us, the ministers of the Lutheran Church in North Carolina, have solemnly ordained," etc., * * * "according to ye infallible word of God, administer ye sacraments, and to have ye care of souls; he always being obliged to obey ye rules, ordinances and customs of ye Christian Society, called ye Protestant Episcopal Church in America," etc. This White Haven was situated near the Catawba, on the opposite side of the great highway from Castanea Presbyterian church. The Lutherans subsequently built a White Haven three miles north on the same highway. Rev. Miller attended the Episcopal Convention, held in Raleigh, April 28th, 1821. His object was to connect himself fully with the Episcopal Church, to which he really belonged. As there was no Episcopal diocese at the time of his ordination in the State, he felt it his duty to form a temporary connection with the Lutheran Church, was admitted a member of the Lutheran North Carolina Synod at its organization in 1803, and labored for her welfare twenty-seven years, until 1821, when he severed that connection, and was ordained to deacon's and priest's orders in the Episcopal ministry. Mr. Miller likewise attended the Lutheran North Carolina Synod in 1821, and from its minutes the following is quoted: "The president now reported that the Rev. R. J. Miller, who had labored for many years as one of our ministers had been ordained by the Bishop of the Episcopal Church as a priest at a convention of that church; that he had always regarded himself as belonging to that church, but because the Episcopal Church had no existence at that time in this State, he had himself ordained by our ministry, with the understanding that he still belonged to the Episcopal Church. But as the said church had now reorganized itself (in this State) he has united himself with it, and thus disconnected himself from our Synod, as was allowed him at his ordination by our ministers. Rev. Miller then made a short address before Synod and the congregation then assembled, in which he distinctly explained his position, so that no one should be able to say that he had apostatized from our Synod, since he had been ordained by our Ministerium as a minister of the Episcopal Church. He then promised that he would still aid and stand by us as much as lay in his power. With this explanation the whole matter was well understood by the entire assembly, and was deemed perfectly satisfactory. Whereupon it was resolved that the president tender to Rev. Miller our sincere thanks, in the name of the Synod, for the faithful services he had hitherto rendered our church. This was immediately done in a feeling manner." Mr. Miller died in 1833. One of the last acts of his ministry was to marry in that year Col. Michael Hoke and Miss Frances Burton, daughter of Judge Robert H. Burton. The marriage took place at Beattie's Ford. A carriage was sent to bring Mr. Miller from Burke to solemnize it. Some time after marriage Colonel and Mrs. Hoke were confirmed. One of their sons is the distinguished Confederate General, Robert F. Hoke.

Col. W. L. Saunders, eminent authority, pays the State a tribute (Col. Records, IV, Pref. Notes), that applies to Lincoln County: "Remembering the route that General Lee took when he went into Pennsylvania on the memorable Gettysburg campaign, it will be seen that very many of the North Carolina boys, both of German and Scotch-Irish descent, in following their great leader, visited the homes of their ancestors, and went thither by the very route by which they came away. To Lancaster and York counties in Pennsylvania, North Carolina owes more of her population than to any other part of the known world, and surely there was never a better population than they and their descendants—never better citizens, and certainly never better soldiers."

As the waters of the Catawba, that lave its eastern border, and the South Fork, that flows through its center, united as they left old Lincoln in their onward sweep to form the Great Catawba, so have the settlers on the Catawba and the South Fork merged into a Scotch-Irish-German people, preserving the virtues, and mayhap the weaknesses, of a noble ancestry. These settlements will be noticed separately.

THE SCOTCH-IRISH SIDE.

Early in the eighteenth century the Scotch-Irish emigrated to Pennsylvania, and from thence some came direct, while others, and their descendants settled in Virginia before coming to this section. A few of these settlers may have been of other nationalities, but a careful writer has referred to this part of the country as "one of the areas of North Carolina, dominated by the sturdy Scotch-Irish strain; where the thistle and the shamrock were planted toward the close of the eighteenth century; where they throve and flourished, and unaided produced results marvelous for the place and time. The Scotch gumption and Irish ardor, finely blended, was the patrimony of this section."

On the early maps the Great Catawba marked the tribal division between the Catawbas and the Cherokees. East of the river dwelt the Catawbas, once a numerous and powerful people. This nation "writ its name in water," the Catawba embalms it and it will be perpetuated while its majestic waters flow

> "To where the Atlantic lifts her voice to pour
> A song of praise upon the sounding shore."

As the white settlements extended, the Cherokees receded toward the setting sun, and occupied the peaks of the Blue Ridge. Roving bands raided the settlements. One of the Beattys went into the range in search of his cattle. He was discovered and pursued by the Indians. When within a mile of home he concealed himself in the hollow of a large chestnut tree. The bark of his little dog disclosed his hiding place and cost him his scalp and his life. The old chestnut disappeared long since, but the place where it stood is yet well known.

Jacob Forney and two of his neighbors were attacked by a band of Cherokees. One of them, Richards, was wounded and scalped. Forney, though shot at many times by the Indians, reached his log fort in safety. The neighbors buried poor Richards where he fell.

> "No useless coffin enclosed his breast, > Nor in sheet nor in shroud they wound him."

The site of his lone grave in the depth of the wildwood is yet pointed out, situate near the old log fort where Jacob Forney first settled.

Among the settlers on this side occur the names, Allen, Anderson, Armstrong, Baldridge, Ballard, Barkley, Barnett, Beal, Bell, Beatty, Black, Bradshaw, Brevard, Bryant, Cherry, Childers, Cooper, Cox, Daily, Davis, Derr, Duncan, Edwards, Graham, Hunter, Hutchinson, Jetton, Johnston, Kelly, Kincaid, King, Knox, Little, Long, Lowe, Luckey, Lynch, McAlister, McCaul, McCombs, McConnell, McCormick, McIntosh, McLean, McMinn, Nixon, Proctor, Regan, Reid, Robinson, Shelton, Stacy, Thompson, Wilkinson, Wingate, and Womack; while in the western part, are found, Alexander, Baxter, Blackburn, Cobb, Goodson, Henderson, Hill, McBee, McCaslin, Potts, Ramsey, Williamson, Wilson, and others.

The first pale-face to set foot on the soil of Lincoln was the bold pioneer, John Beatty. One of his land grants bears date July 17th, 1749. He settled on the west bank of the Catawba. The shoal at this point, over which the river tumbles with a gentle murmur, forms a splendid ford. It was at this ford John Beatty crossed, and it yet bears his name, Beattie's Ford. As the soil of Lincoln at Beattie's Ford felt the primal tread of Anglo-Saxon, Beattie's Ford deservedly figures largely in the recital.

The old pioneer, John Beatty, located his home above the ford, in the shade of the hillside, overlooking the beautiful Catawba. Near by gurgled a limpid spring, its waters trickling off in a sparkling brooklet to the river. John Beatty had two sons, Thomas and Abel, and one daughter, Mary, the wife of Matthew Armstrong. It is always interesting to hear the last words of the departed. John Beatty's will bears date 5th January, 1774. In this he gives to Margaret Beatty certain items of personalty and his homestead to William Beatty. These were his grandchildren, the children of Thomas Beatty. Marked traits of his character are apparent in this document. A short quotation will exhibit his love for rectitude and obedience, and desire to keep his homestead in the line of his own blood: "And if y^e^ above named Margaret or William Beatty or either of them does misbehave or be disobedient when come to y^e^ years of maturity, either going against their parents will in the contract of marriage or any way remarkable otherwise, that legatee is liable to y^e^ loss of his part of this legacy, and to be given to y^e^ other, the offending person entirely cut off at their parents discretion, or those that it may please to have the guardian and care over the above-mentioned persons William and Margaret Beatty. And further I do not allow the said lands that is left to y^e^ above named William Beatty to be ever sold or disposed of by any means or person whatsoever, but to firmly remain and continue in the line and lawful heirs of the above named William Beatty's body and to continue in that name as long as there is a male heir on the face of the earth, and after for the lack of a male heir to y^e^ nighest female heir."

Thomas Beatty died in 1787, leaving three sons, John, Thomas, and William. The inventory of his estate exhibits in minute detail the entire possessions of a well-to-do man of the pioneer period. A few items ranging between his broad acres and a fine-toothed comb will indicate the extent and variety of his possessions: "944 acres of land, ten negroes, seventeen horses, sixty-six cattle, eighteen hogs, thirteen sheep, thirty-four geese, five ducks, lot poultry, five pewter dishes, sixteen pewter plates, twenty-four pewter spoons, one pewter basin, one pewter tankard, one crook and two pot hooks, one dutch oven, and griddle and frying pan, one dough trough, one chest, two spinning wheels, and one big wheel, three pair cards, cotton, wool, and tow, one .check reel, one weaving loom, twenty-three spools, for spooling cotton, five reeds for weaving, nine sickles, one foot adze, one thorn hack, one hackel, two iron wedges, two bleeding lances, one hair sifter, two riddles, three gimlets, thirteen bushels flax seed, six bushels buckwheat, one slide, two bells and collars, 750 clapboard nails, four pair half worn horse shoes, one redding comb, one fine-toothed comb, three coats and one great coat, two jackets, one pair buckskin breeches, one pair trousers, three hats and two linen shirts," constitute about one-fourth of the articles enumerated.

In the pioneer stage every man was his own carpenter, and the women knew how to card, spin, weave, and sew. The men wore linen shirts and buckskin breeches; the women, arrayed in their own handiwork, were beautiful in the eyes of the forester. The patrimony of the son was broad acres; the dowry of the daughter was a horse and saddle, cow and calf, a spinning wheel and check reel. The young men were gallant, and the young maids charming. The young men learned the art of horsemanship not only in the chase, but by the constant habit of traveling on horseback, and every woman was an expert horse-rider. The horse sometimes served as a tandem, the man riding in front, the woman behind; and, if trustworthy tradition is given credence the young men sometimes augmented the pleasure of this system of equestrianism by making their steeds caper, thereby frightening their innocent companions into a firm embrace to retain their positions.

Most of the early Scotch-Irish were Presbyterians, and the religious center was Beattie's meeting house. This place of worship was established by the pioneer, John Beatty, one mile west of Beattie's Ford. The meeting house stood on a level plat of ground in a beautiful grove of oak and hickory near a spring. Beattie's meeting house was built of logs. In 1808, it was decided to erect a more commodious edifice, and a plat of several acres was conveyed for the purpose by James Little to "James Connor, Alexander Brevard, John Reid and Joseph Graham, trustees." The kirk is named in the deed, Unity. In 1883 another church was erected and additions to the former church lands made by conveyances from Robert H. Burton, W. S. Simonton, and Mary King to "John D. Graham, D. M. Forney, and John Knox, trustees." This is the conventional structure of that period with its gallery and large pulpit.

From the first settlement this was a place of worship. The headstones date back to 1776. Dr. Humphrey Hunter, a native of Ireland, and soldier in the Revolution, was pastor from 1796 to 1804. Next came Rev. Henry N. Pharr. He was succeeded by Patrick Sparrow. Mr. Sparrow's father was a potter in Vesuvius furnace. When lads the future Governor Graham was hard put to it to keep pace with Patrick, and the members of the Governor's family ascribed some of his success to this auspicious rivalry in the old-field schools. General Graham, thus having the lad's aptitude brought to his attention, interested others with him in giving Patrick an education. When he became pastor of Unity an old negro servant of General Graham's expressed her surprise at his rise of fortune, by exclaiming that the boy who ate ash cakes with her children had become her master's preacher. Mr. Sparrow was the first professor of languages at Davidson College, and afterwards President of Hampden-Sidney. The present pastor is Rev. C. H. Little, descended from a pioneer family.

About the year 1790 Maj. John Davidson, with his sons-in-law, Maj. Joseph Graham and Capt. Alexander Brevard, crossed from the Mecklenburg side into Lincoln, and with Gen. Peter Forney engaged in the manufacture of iron. These were all Revolutionary soldiers. The beginning of the nineteenth century witnessed civilization progress with leaps and bounds. Then followed years of plenty. The virgin soil brought forth bountifully. Herds of cattle and droves of swine ranged at large unrestrained by any stock law. Deer, turkey, wild geese and duck abounded. The Catawba was filled with shad, trout and red horse. A trackless wilderness had been transformed into a moving, populous community. Instead of the wigwam, was the homestead dwelling. Instead of the Indian war-whoop, was to be heard the furnace blast breathing forth actual and potential energy, and the stroke of the great trip hammer at the mighty forge as it beat the heart throbs of commercial activity. They were years of peace and growth, of marriage and home-building, of quiet domestic happiness.

The different grants to the Beattys approximate three thousand acres. William and John Beatty sold to John Fullenwider, an early iron master; and Thomas Beatty to Alfred M. Burton. Mr. Fullenwider divided his purchase between his sons-in-law, Alfred M. and Robert H. Burton; they settled on their splendid estates and became potent influences in the community. Alfred Burton settled above the ford, the old John Beatty house constituting one wing of the residence he erected. Robert H. built a spacious mansion below the ford. They were learned lawyers and elegant gentlemen. Their dust reposes in Unity graveyard, beside that of their kinsman, Hutchings G. Burton, once Governor of the State. Robert H. Burton filled the office of Superior Court Judge. After Judge Burton's death his homestead was purchased by Col. John H. Wheeler, the genial historian. Colonel Wheeler filled the office of State Treasurer and many positions of trust, but is best known for his great work, "Wheeler's History of North Carolina." This he compiled at Beattie's Ford, devoting to it about ten years' time. The preface bears date, "Ellangowan, Beattie's Ford, N. C., 1st July, 1851."

Three brothers—Charles, James and Henry Connor—from Antrim, Ireland, settled near Beattie's Ford. James was a captain in the Revolution. Henry, the youngest, a patriot soldier, located near Cowan's Ford. Colonel Wheeler sold out at Beatty's Ford to Maj. Henry W. Connor, the son of Charles. Major Connor derived his title for service under General Graham in the campaign against the Creek Indians. He was a man of great popularity and represented his district in Congress twenty-three years. His homestead was identical with Judge Burton's.

Skilled physicians of sweet memory are William B. McLean and Robert A. McLean, father and son. The elder was a son of Dr. William McLean, a continental surgeon, resident in the forks of the Catawba.

Jacob Forney first settled on the creek near the present town of Denver, the scene of his Indian troubles. This farm passed to his son, Capt. Abraham Forney, a soldier of the Revolution, and yet belongs to his descendants. Gen. Peter Forney, son of the pioneer, was a patriot soldier, member of the House, Senate and Congress. As presidential elector, he voted for Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, and Jackson. He erected a forge at his home and Madison furnace on Leeper's Creek, that was afterwards owned by J. W. Derr. He obtained possession of valuable ore beds, and commenced building his iron works in 1787, and recorded that he produced hammered iron in his forge 26th August, 1788.

Maj. Daniel M. Forney, eldest son of Gen. Peter Forney, received his title in the war of 1812, also served as Senator from Lincoln County, and member of Congress. He erected a palatial residence, modeled after a house at the national capital. The site chosen is an eminence between two creeks, where Jacob Forney lived when the British quartered on him. This picturesque old mansion, with its long white columns, surrounded by a grove of original oaks, yet retains the charms of its ancient architecture. Major Forney sold to Alexander F. Gaston, a son of Judge Gaston. It next passed to James Anderson, and is now owned by Mrs. W. E. Hall. Henry Y. Webb, Bartlett Shipp, William Johnston, C. L.

Hunter, and Christian Reinhardt, married daughters of Gen. Peter Forney. Henry Y. Webb was a lawyer and represented Lincoln County in the House of Commons. Bartlett Shipp was a lawyer, a member of the Legislature, and of the constitutional convention of 1835. His son, William M. Shipp, was a member of the House of Commons, Senator, Superior Court Judge, and Atttorney-General of the State. W. P. Bynum married Eliza, daughter of Bartlett Shipp, and settled on the Henry Y. Webb homestead. He was an eminent lawyer, Colonel in the Confederate Army, Solicitor of his district, and Justice of the Supreme Court. His son, William S. Bynum, was a Confederate soldier, lawyer and Episcopal clergyman.

William Johnston, a physician, married Nancy Forney, and located at Mt. Welcome, General Forney's homestead. His five sons were gallant Confederate soldiers. William H., Robert D., and James F. entered the service in the Beatty's Ford Rifles, which was mustered into service as Company K, 23d Regiment; William H. and James F. won captains' commissions; while Robert D., by promotion became a distinguished Brigadier General; Joseph F., late Governor of Alabama and now United States Senator from that State, was Captain of Company A, 12th Regiment; Bartlett S. Johnston served in the Confederate States Navy. Dr. William Johnston was a son of Col. James Johnston, a soldier of the Revolution, one of the heroes of King's Mountain, the first Senator from Lincoln, and elder at Unity. When Gaston County was set up from Lincoln, Colonel Johnston's homestead on the Catawba fell in Gaston County. Dr. C. L. Hunter was a scientist and historian. He was the son of Rev. Humphrey Hunter, a soldier in the Revolution. Mary, daughter of Gen. Peter Forney, married Christian Reinhardt, a planter, and they migrated west.

Joseph Graham attained the rank of major in the Revolution and his title as general in 1814, when commissioned Brigadier-General and sent in command of North Carolina troops to aid General Jackson in the Creek War. To his narratives of the battles of Ramsour's Mill, King's Mountain and Cowan's Ford is largely due the preservation of the Revolutionary history of this section. John D. Graham, his eldest son, retiring from Vesuvius furnace, erected a brick residence on the Catawba below Beattie's Ford, now the home of his son, Clay Graham. James was a lawyer and politician, representing his district in Congress sixteen years. William A., the general's youngest son, read law and located at Hillsboro for the practice of his profession. He was twice Governor, United States Secretary of the Navy, and Confederate States Senator, and candidate for Vice-President on the Scott ticket. Pure and spotless in private life, a learned lawyer, a ripe scholar, a statesman of ability and clear judgment, he is esteemed by many as the greatest man produced by the State of North Carolina. William A. Graham, son of the Governor, Major and Assistant Adjutant-General, historian and author, the present Commissioner of Agriculture, resides at Forest Home, the ancestral homestead.

Robert Hall Morrison, D.D., the first President of Davidson College, an eminent divine, was the honored pastor of Unity for forty years. He married Mary, daughter of Gen eral Graham. Cottage Home, his homestead, is intimately associated with the Confederacy, for it was there that J. P. Irwin, Lieut.-Gen. D. H. Hill, Lieut.-Gen. Stonewall Jackson, Brig.-Gen. Rufus Barringer, Maj. A. C. Avery, and Col. John E. Brown, respectively married Harriet, Isabella, Anna, Eugenia, Susan, and Laura, daughters of Dr. Morrison. His sons were Maj. William W. Morrison, Joseph G. Morrison, A.D.C., on General Jackson's staff, Robert H. Morrison, A.D.C. to General Barringer and General Hill.

His youngest son, Alfred J. Morrison, was a lawyer, politician, and Presbyterian minister.

Alexander Brevard early received a captain's commission in the Continental Army. He built Mount Tirzah and Rehoboth furnaces. Captain Brevard's homestead passed to his son Robert A. Brevard, then to his grandson, Alexander F. Brevard, and upon his death to Brevard McDowell, a great-grandson. Captain Brevard and General Graham were honored elders at Unity, but were buried in a private cemetery of their selection where Macpelah Church was afterwards built. Vesuvius furnace passed into the hands of J. M. Smith, a man who by his own initiative and endeavor rose to position and influence and left a name distinguished for good sense, kindness of heart, and business tact. He built Stonewall furnace, on Anderson Creek.

On the post road between Beattie's Ford and Vesuvius furnace are the Catawba Springs, a famous resort in ante-bellum days. This was formerly Reed's Springs, owned by Capt. John Reed, a soldier of the Revolution and Senator from Lincoln County. Valuable factors of this community are the Asburys and Mundys, descendants of Rev. Daniel Asbury and Rev. Jeremiah Mundy, pioneer Methodist ministers. Rev. Daniel Asbury, when a youth, was taken by a band of Shawnee Indians, carried to the far northwest and held in captivity five years. In 1791 he established in Lincoln County the first Methodist church west of the Catawba River. Rev. Jeremiah Mundy was a native of Virginia and located in Lincoln County in 1799. He was a soldier in the Revolutionary War three years and a minister for thirty-five years.

As one thinks of the old country 'squire who settled disputes between his neighbors, of the kind-hearted physician, and the "lords of the manor," it seems "there were giants in those days." But life was not all serious; it had its great sunshiny side. They were apt at repartee, fond of the innocent joke, and in social intercourse, peals of laughter went the merry round; for, has not the wisest of men said, "there is a time to laugh"? And, alas, in those halycon days, they loved not the flagon to excess, but indulged a morning horn to ward off the rising vapors, and the invitation to sample the liquid contents of the sideboard was a mark of hospitality. The sweet women, the embodiment of all that is true, charming and good, raised high the standard of social purity. The blushing bride became the uncrowned queen of the home, around which the husband entwined the noblest affections of his heart. In this genial clime the pioneers found a fertile land, undulating with hills and vales, chequered with creeks and rills, and bountifully supplied with springs. One mile west of Beattie's Ford, and flowing for some distance parallel with the river, is a large branch. On this they found a maritime city, with streets of water through meadows green, the habitation of the beaver. This animal had felled trees, builded a great dam, ponding the waters over many acres, so it was called Beaver Dam Branch. The Burton mill was situate on the site of the old beaver dam. The water from the pond was conducted through a race to the great overshot wheel, the motive power of the mill. On the ridge between the Ford and Beaver Dam Branch three highways came together. At their convergence was situate the village of Beattie's Ford with its mercantile establishments. One of these roads was the great stage line via Lincolnton and Salisbury connecting far distant points. The post-office of Beattie's Ford supplied a wide extent of country. The approach of the stage was announced by winding blasts from the long tin horn of the driver.

Exhaustless iron beds were discovered in other sections in connection with limitless coal veins, and the fires of the charcoal furnace were quenched, and the furnace blast and forge hammer were heard no more. Some of the leading spirits opposed the entrance of railroads, and their tracks were laid over other routes. Trade centers sprang up on their lines, and the stores at Beattie's Ford were closed. The long interregnum of peace came to an end. The noise of war was again heard in the land, and this section suffered in blood and treasure and shattered homes.

THE DUTCH SIDE.

The German settlers came from Pennsylvania. Their ancestors and some of them came from Germany. Their settlement covers the whole of the county, except the eastern portion bordering on the Catawba, and in this portion among the Scotch-Irish were the German families of Cloninger, Earnhardt, Forney, Hager, Lockman, Keever, Killian, Nantz, Sifford and others. The names of the German pioneers deserve special mention, and many follow: Aderholdt, Anthony, Arndt, Bangel, Benick, Beisaner, Beam, Bolinger, Boyles, Botz, Coulter, Dellinger, Detter, DeVepaugh, Dietz, Eddlemon, Finger, Freytag, Gantzler, Gross, Haas, Hafner, Helderman, Hallman, Hartzoge, Houser, Heedick, Heil, Heltebrand, Henkel, Hoke, Huber, Hull, Jared, Jonas, Jundt, Keener, Kizer, Kistler, Klein, Kneip, Krauss, Kuhn, Lantz, Leeper, Lehnhardt, Leonard, Lingerfelt, Link, Lohr, Loretz, Lorentz, Lutz, Michal, Miller, Mosteller, Plonk, Propst, Quickel, Ramsauer, Rein, Reinhardt, Rieb, Rinck, Rudisill, Sain, Scheidel, Schenck, Schufordt, Scronce, Seigel, Shrum, Seitz, Shoup, Shull, Sigmon, Speigel, Strutt, Summerrow, Troutman, Tutherow, Warlick, Weber, Weckesser, Wehunt, Weiand, Weiss, Wetzstein, Wisenhunt, Workman, Yoder, Zimmerman.

Many of the American names have been anglicised, and the spelling changed. To be a Zimmerman when one could be a Carpenter was too unprogressive. Likewise Weber became Weaver, Kruss, Crouse; Huber, Hoover; Freytag, Friday; Gantzler, Cansler; Heil, Hoyle; Jundt, Yount; Kuhn, Coon; Klein, Cline; Rieb, Reep; Weiss, Wise; Wetzstein. Whetstone; and so with many others.

They selected the finest lands and settled along the streams. Their first dwellings were log cabins, then followed the red-painted mansion. A few of the old red-painted houses, built near the spring, yet stand, monuments of a bygone age. They have always built large barns. Sweet memories of the pioneers, and many valuable papers linger among their descendants. To give some illustration of pioneer times and conditions a few notes of one family will be made.

Derrick Ramsour came with the pioneers about 1750. He erected a mill on Clark's Creek, near its junction with the South Fork River, that was a noted industry and place in colonial days. The subjects of the king often divided their estates to prevent the oldest son becoming sole heir under the English law of primogeniture. In April, 1772, impelled by natural love and affection, he conveyed his property to his two surviving sons, Jacob and David; first, however, requiring them to enter into a bond in the sum of one thousand pounds proclamation money for his support, conditioned that they pay unto him every year during his natural life, "fifteen pounds proclamation money, twenty-five bushels clean, sound wheat, twenty-five bushels Indian corn, fifty-two pounds of good butter, four hundredweight of good wholesome beef, one-sixth of the net profits of the fruit trees, thirty pounds sugar, three pounds Bohea tea, two pounds coffee, twelve gallons of whiskey, four bushels of malt, one bushel of salt." They also engaged to erect "a commodious and convenient residence for him, the said Derrick Ramsour, in order to live retired with a sufficient store and store room, and furnish the same with the necessary furniture sufficient for his accommodation which building is to be erected on such a part of the premises as he, the said Derrick Ramsour, pitches upon." Also to find for him "one good feather bed and decent and necessary furniture, and find and provide for him sufficient firewood, ready hauled to his dwelling, to be cut a foot length as often as occasion or necessity shall require; and also to supply him with a gentle riding horse, saddle, and bridle to carry him wheresoever he may require to go, together with a sufficient and necessary stock of wearing apparel both woolen and linen, warm and decent, and becoming one of his circumstances to wear, together with the proper food and washing during his natural life."

Then by bill of sale he conveys to his sons Jacob and David his "whole stock of black or neat cattle running on the said lands whereon I now live, or to be found in the woods or range, whether in my own proper mark, or the mark of those from whom I might heretofore have purchased; also all and singular my horses, mares, colts, yearlings, etc., which of right doth or ought to belong to me, whether at this time in my actual possession, or running their range at large, also all my stock of hogs and sheep, be the same more or less in number, wherever to be found, together with my wagons, gears, plows, harness, still and vessels, plantation and carpenter tools of every kind whatsoever."

To Jacob he conveys the plantation situate in the forks of the South Fork River and Clark's Creek and adjoining tracts, in all 960 acres, including the mill. This tract adjoins the western limits of Lincolnton. The residence erected for Derrick stood beside that of Jacob on the slope of the hill a few hundred feet to the west of the mill that was destined to become historic during the Revolution. The South Fork River, in a great bend, forms its junction with Clark's Creek. In this bend are three hundred acres of fertile bottom. Jacob Ramsour died in 1787, and was buried in a private burying ground, on the highest part of the ridge west of his house.

To David Ramsour he conveyed six hundred acres lying three miles farther up the river. This tract is likewise situate in a great bend of the river including a broad sweep of level bottom. On this farm to-day is the one-story cabin, built of immense hewn logs, erected by David Ramsour, a relic of pioneer days and architecture. The great stone chimney is built entirely inside the house with fireplace seven feet across, over which is the mantel nine feet long hewn out of a log. In the chimney are cross bars from which the pot-hooks were suspended to hold the cooking utensils in position over the fire. This cabin occupies a knoll, commanding a fine view with picturesque surroundings. It slopes toward the south forty yards to the river. Near by is the rock-walled spring, with stone steps leading down to its cool waters, shaded by giant white oaks. Next stands the old red-painted mansion characteristic of the early Dutch, built by his son, John Ramsour, every part of which is put together with hand forged nails. A little way out in the bottom is the brick mansion of Jacob Ramsour, son of John. These, with the modern residence of Thomas J. Ramsour, in view of each other, standing in a radius of half a mile, represent four generations of the Ramsour family. On a gentle knoll in the great bottom is the family burying ground, where rests Jacob Ramsour, who died in 1785, and many of his descendants.

The Germans encountered many hardships incident to the settlement of a new country, but one of their most trying ordeals was the change of their language from their native German to English. They called themselves Dutch and their language Dutch, and so are called to this day both by themselves and others. The pioneer Germans were Lutherans and Reformed, and they usually occupied the same house of worship, where on alternate Sabbaths they worshiped, and this is still the case in a number of churches. Four miles northwest of Lincolnton the pioneers established a place of worship and a schoolhouse called Daniel's, on a tract of fifty acres, but did not take a grant. In 1767 a grant was issued to Matthew Floyd for the tract of fifty acres including a "schoolhouse." In 1768 it was purchased by Nicholas Warlick, Frederick Wise, Urban Ashehanner, Peter Statler, Peter Summey and Deter Hafner, who conveyed it to the "two united Congregations of Lutherans and Calvinists." The services were in German, and the records written in German script until 1827. On this tract each has a brick church and by them stands the brick schoolhouse. Eleven miles east of Lincolnton, on the great highway is the site of the "Old Dutch Meeting House." The deed is from Adam Cloninger to the "German Congregation of Killian's Settlement." The first church lot in Lincolnton was conveyed June 10th, 1788, to Christian Reinhardt and Andrew Hedick, trustees for the "socicties of Dutch Presbyterians and Dutch Lutherans" of the town and vicinity, "for the intent and purpose of building thereon a meeting house for public worship, schoolhouses, both Dutch and English, and a place for the burial of the dead." This was called the old White church and occupied the site of the present Lutheran church. The reference in title deeds to "Calvinists," and "Dutch Presbyterians" is to the German Reformed or, as now known, the Reformed Church.

The pioneers brought with them Luther's German translation of the Bible. No dust was allowed to gather on this precious volume. These have been handed down from generation to generation, and in almost every family to-day can be found the Dutch Bible of the pioneers printed in a language now considered foreign, yet justly esteemed precious heirlooms.

Rev. Johann Gottfried Arndt came from Germany as a school-teacher in 1773, and was ordained into the Lutheran ministry in 1775. He died in 1807 and was buried beneath the old White church in Lincolnton. The inscription on his tombstone is in German, above it an eagle and thirteen stars, and the motto of the new republic, E pluribus unum. The Reformed preacher of this time was Rev. Andrew Loretz, a native of Switzerland. He died in 1812 and was buried at Daniel's. On the gable of his mansion, outlined in colored brick, are the initials of his name and the date, A. L. 1793. Only the German was used during their pastorates. Living in the same county, and preaching in the same churches, these godly men were devoted friends, and engaged that whichever died first should be buried by the survivor. The Lutheran pastor at Daniel's is Rev. Luther L. Lohr, and in Lincolnton Rev. Robert A. Yoder, D.D., descendants of the Dutch settlers. While Rev. William Ramsour Minter, pastor of the Presbyterian church in Lincolnton, is a grandson of Jacob Ramsour, and great-grandson of David Ramsour, both elders in that church; David Ramsour was a son of Jacob Ramsour, owner of the historic Ramsour's Mill.

The North Carolina Synod held an historic meeting in the "old White church" in May, 1820. Then occurred the first rupture in the Lutheran Church in the New World. The president maintained his position in a long discourse in the German, the secretary followed in a longer one in English. This church and others withdrew and, July 17th, organized the Tennessee Synod. At its first meeting German was made the business language and all its transactions were to be published in German. In 1825 the minutes were published in both German and English. In 1826 David Henkle was appointed interpreter for the members who did not understand the German, and it was ordered that "the business of Synod shall be transacted in the German language during the first three days, afterwards the English shall be used."

But perhaps the greatest hindrance was in the State. The English was the dominant language. The laws were written and expounded in English, and all public affairs conducted in that language, and this prevented many from active participation in public affairs. The change was gradual, but was perhaps most marked between the years 1820 and 1830. The entire German population outgrew the use of the German tongue. In their pulpits no longer is it heard, nor have they German schools. Now the Pennsylvania Dutch is seldom ever heard, and even the accent and idiom remain on but few tongues; yet it is sometimes observed in the use of the letters v and w, b and p, t and d. This is seen in some of the family names; Bangel and Pangle are the same name; likewise Boovey and Poovey, Tarr and Darr; David Darr was called Tavy Tarr. A venerable elder of fragrant memory, when the preacher ascended the pulpit to begin service, was accustomed to step to the door and proclaim to those outside, "De beobles will now come in, te breaching is reaty."

The Pennsylvania Dutchman had his humorous side, for

> "A little nonsense now and then > Is relished by the best of men."

They had their sports and amusements, their holidays and gala days, their Easter fun and Kriss Kringle frolics. Many of their sports and amusements partook more of skill and labor than dissipation and debauchery, such as corn-shuckings, choppings, log-rollings, house-raisings, spinning-matches, quiltings and the like, tending to manly vigor and modest womanhood, and brightening the links of friendship and brotherly love. By hunting deer and turkey, the squirrel and other game they became expert riflemen. In the fall of the year shooting-matches were common, the usual prize a quarter of beef or a turkey. A witness at court, when asked to fix the date of a certain transaction, replied "at shooting-match time." They were great fanciers of fine stock, and the old Dutch farmer never felt more lordly than when hauling great loads with his sleek team of horses. The race track also had its devotees. Two prominent Germans were once called to the bar of the church for some cause resulting from a noted race run on the Warlick path. The one who lost expressed proper contrition. The other was incorrigible. Proud of his horse, the stakes, and exulting in the plaudits of the community, he promptly responded "I not sorry. I von. Mr. H. werry sorry, he loss."

On the Dutch side are many signs and folk lore of interest. The Dutch farmer is a close observer and is often governed by signs. The moon is a powerful potentate. Its phases are closely watched, and there is a time to plant every seed, cut timber and do many things. A champion turnip grower used an incantation of virtue in casting the seed, resulting in a fourfold quantity. Each time he threw the seed with his hand he repeated a line of the following:

"Some for the pug,
Some for the fly,
Some for the Debil,
And in comes I."

Michael Schenck, in 1813, erected the first cotton factory, run by water power, south of the Potomac. It was a small affair located on a branch, one mile east of Lincolnton, but proving profitable, attracted Col. John Hoke and Dr. James Bivins, and they became partners of Michael Schenck. The firm in 1819 erected the Lincoln Cotton Mills, with three thousand spindles, on the South Fork, the beginning of the cotton mill industry in this section. This mill was burned in 1863.

There are situate in Lincolnton and within four miles along the South Fork, thirteen cotton mills controlled by descendants of the Dutch. The only cotton mill in the county at the close of the war was the Elm Grove, owned by John F. Phifer, now operated by Robert S. Reinhardt. The Confederate States government, about 1864, erected a laboratory for the manufacture of medicines on the site of the old Lincoln factory. In 1887, J. A. Abernethy and D. E. Rhyne erected the Laboratory Cotton Mills on the site of the Confederate laboratory, R. E. Costner, J. A. Anthony, L. J. Dellinger, John M. Rhodes, and W. A. Rudisill are mill men. Daniel E. Rhyne is proprietor of three of these mills. Other successful mill men are J. A. Abernethy, Edgar Love, and J. M. Roberts. The late Capt. Joseph G. Morrison erected the Mariposa Mills, at the old Forney forge on Leeper's Creek. Paper mills were operated for many years on the South Fork. Among the noted manufacturers of paper were William and Rufus Tiddy.

One of the noted pioneers was Daniel Warlick. His entries approximate three thousand acres. In 1769 he made division of it among his five sons and four daughters. The oldest enterprise in the county to-day is the mill he established on a branch five miles west of Ramsour's. It was once destroyed by the Cherokees. This property has passed from father to son, and is to-day owned by Jacob R. Warlick, a great grandson. It is now a modern roller-mill, the motive power a waterfall of sixty-two feet.

The old highway from Ramsour's Mill to Warlick's Mill crossed the South Fork River at Reep's Ford, just below the present Ramsour bridge. Here lived Adam Reep and his brothers, Adolph and Michael, all Whig soldiers. Just to the west, in a private burying ground, rests Nicholas Heamer, a patriot soldier and one of the last survivors of the Battle of Ramsour's Mill.

The subject of dress properly occupies large space in woman's thought. In the olden time there were no stores near with heavily laden shelves from which to select, but they knew how to color, then combine the colors in beautiful fabrics, and were experts in fine weaving. They perhaps were not bothered with gores and biases, frills and puffs, yet they had their trouble in cutting, fitting, and arranging the trimming as do those of the present with the latest magazine and fashion plate. It is certain that in the vigor and strength of perfect development they were fair to look upon, equally at home, in the parlor or in the kitchen alive to the wants of humanity and duty to God. Much of this inspiriting record is due the examples, counsels and prayers of pious mothers; and while the songs of the nursery mingle with lessons of peace and love, and tender hearts are impressed with religious truth the result will be men and women of high type.

As the century waned the German citizens were becoming prominent in public affairs. In 1797, John Ramsour represented Lincoln County in the House of Commons and twice afterwards. Then follows John Reinhardt in 1799, Peter Forney in 1800. Peter Hoyle was elected in 1802 and fourteen times afterwards; Henry Hoke in 1803; David Shuford in 1806. Then follows Loretz, Killian, Cansler and others.

Henry Cansler was long an influential citizen. He filled the offices of county surveyor, sheriff, clerk of the court and member of the General Assembly. His father and grandfather each wrote his name in the German, Philip Gantzler.

Jacob Costner was one of the first justices of Tryon County, sheriff of Tryon 1774 and 1775, major of the Tryon Regiment in 1776, died in 1777. Ambrose Costner, his great-grandson, planter and financier, was often the popular representative of Lincoln County in the House and Senate.

John F. Reinhardt, Confederate soldier, planter, commoner and senator, is a great-grandson of Christian Reinhardt, "agent of the Dutch Presbyterians." He owns the Bartlett Shipp homestead. His father, Franklin M. Reinhardt, operated the Rehobeth furnace.

Andrew Hedick, a great-grandson of Andrew Hedick, "agent of the Dutch Lutherans," resides on the ancestral homestead. He lost his right arm in the fearful struggle at Chancellorsville. After the war he attended Pleasant Retreat, and prepared himself for school teaching. For many years he filled the office of county treasurer and is one of the county's honored citizens. Andrew Hedick is likewise the survivor of the usually mortal wound of a musket ball passing entirely through his body, as are also Abel Seagle and David Keever.

David Schenck, grandson of Michael Schenck, was a great advocate and lawyer, a judge of the Superior Court and historian. He removed to Greensboro in 1882 and has a monument in the Guilford Battle-ground.

John F. Hoke, son of Col. John Hoke, won a captain's commission in the Mexican War, and commanded his company with gallantry in the battles of Cerro Gordo, Tolema and National Bridge. He was adjutant-general in North Carolina, and colonel in the Civil War. He was an able lawyer and often the representative of Lincoln County in the General Assembly. His son, William A. Hoke, as citizen, lawyer, legislator, judge of the Superior Courts, and now Associate Justice of the Supreme Court, occupies a large space in public esteem.

Michael Hoke, son of Col. John Hoke, was an eminent lawyer and an accomplished orator, whose brilliant career added luster to his county and Commonwealth. The campaign of 1844 justly ranks among the famous in the history of the State. There were many causes contributing to its intensity. It was a presidential election. Henry Clay, the Whig nominee, a matchless orator and the idol of his party, made a speech in Raleigh on the 12th day of June of that year. James K. Polk, of Tennessee, a native of Mecklenburg and graduate of our State University, was the nominee of the Democrats, and his party hoped to carry the State.

The Republic of Texas was seeking annexation to the United States, and this was a burning issue. Each political party was on its mettle, and marshaling its forces for a battle royal. Standard bearers must be selected with care and the very best. Each party named a son of Lincoln County as its candidate for Governor. The Democrats nominated Michael Hoke, a gentleman of fine person, fine address, of long legislative experience and high position at the bar, whose ease of manner and brilliancy of oratory won for him troops of friends. The Whigs were equally fortunate in the selection of William A. Graham, a man of exalted character and ability; and, like his competitor, the fairness of his conduct, his open, generous temper, and elevated mode of argument met the highest expectation of his most ardent admirers. Never in any campaign were two political antagonists more evenly matched. Both were in the prime of life. Hoke was only thirty-four, and Graham forty years of age. Both were strikingly handsome men, tall, well-formed and graceful, of polished manner and placid temper, pure of character and free from guile. While possessing all these amiable qualities when it came to the advocacy of the principles of their respective parties, or assaulting those of the other, they exhibited the courage of a Washington and the aggressiveness of a Jackson. The dignified and majestic presence of Graham was formidably rivaled by the matchless manner and ready humor of Hoke. Their joint canvass was a battle of giants. Graham was elected Governor, Clay carried the State and Polk was elected President. Hoke scarce survived the campaign. He died September 9, 1844, at the youthful age of 34 years, 4 months and 7 days.

Among the record of baptisms at Daniel's is this, "George Kuhn, und desen frau ihr sohn George Gebohren den 31 ten December, 1809, Taufzeugen sind Johnannes Rudisill und desen frau," which being translated reads, "George Coon and his wife, their son George was born the 31st December, 1809, sponsors John Rudisill and his wife." The infant George grew into a man full of years and honor. An old Frenchman in Lincolnton, Lorenzo Ferrer, often bought farm products from Mr. Coon, and so admired his perfect integrity, and "full measure of potatoes," that one of his bequests was: "I will and bestow to honest George Koon one hundred dollars."

Lorenzo Ferrer, having been introduced, shall have place in this history. He was a native of Lyons, France, but spent his long life from early manhood in Lincolnton. He died August 16th, 1875, aged ninety-six years. He had his coffin made to order and gave directions concerning his grave. It is marked by a recumbent slab, supported on marble columns. The first paragraph of his will is in these words:

"I, Lorenzo Ferrer, here write my last will and testament whilst I am in possession of my faculties, as I have shortly to appear at the tribunal of St. Peter at the gate of eternity; when St. Peter is to pronounce according to my merits or demerits: for our Lord Jesus Christ entrusted the key of Heaven to St. Peter and enjoined him to admit the deserving to enter into Heaven and enjoy an eternal happiness, but to condemn the undeserving defrauders to the everlasting sulphurious flames in the Devil's abode. Therefore, I am endeavoring to comfort myself in such a manner in order to merit an eternal happiness in the presence of God, and his angels, and in company with St. Peter, St. Paul, St. Titus and the other saints. For I am anxious to converse with those happy martyred saints and rejoice with them at the firmness, patience, and willingness they endured at their martyrdom for the sake of our Lord Jesus Christ. I am also in hope to see and embrace my kind friends Michael Hoke, William Lander, and other good and honest friends with whom I hope to enjoy an eternal felicity," etc.

Adam Springs approached the dark river with no such beatific vision. In the confident possession of a sound mind and good judgment he likewise wrote his own will, the first part of which follows: "North Carolina, Lincoln County,— Know all men by these presents, that I, Adam A. Springs, believing himself of sufficient judgment of mind do now set about making my will in hopes that my surviving fellow-citizens will aid me in the disposal of my wish. If it should lack form, I call upon our Constitution. Then I ordain this my last will and testament as follows: As to my soul or finer part, whatever it may be, I surrender it to its author without any impertinent and intrusive requests against the immutable laws of Deity. In the first place, I will to be buried alongside of James Henderson on the hill on the east of the shoals formerly called Henderson's Shoals," etc.

Mr. Springs was one of the first students at the State University, a graduate in the Class of 1798, a large real estate owner, including among his possession the Henderson Shoals on the South Fork, afterwards known as the Spring Shoals, now McAdensville, where his dust reposes beside James Henderson. The paper-writing was propounded for probate, a caveat entered, the issue, devisavit vel non, submitted, the will established, and executed by his surviving fellow-citizens according to the true intent and meaning thereof.

A will of marked conciseness and brevity, and the shortest in the county is that of the late V. A. McBee. Mr. McBee was a University graduate, lawyer, three times clerk of the Superior Court, and left a considerable estate in North and South Carolina. His entire will with date and signature contains but twenty-three words: "I will all my estate, real and personal to my wife, Mary Elizabeth McBee, this 31st day of March, 1888. V. A. McBee."

Robert F. Hoke and Stephen D. Ramseur, twin soldiers of destiny, became distinguished Major-Generals in the armies of the Confederacy. Their gallant deeds and noble services added luster to their home and country. The one survives, honored and loved; the soil of Virginia drank the precious blood of the other.

The laudable principles, liberty of conscience, health of state, and purity of morals, the Dutch hold in sacred esteem; the great virtues of the home and the common duties of the good citizens have ever charmed most their ambitions. Of persistent energy, high purpose, and sturdy inclination, they have made and are making indestructible footprints of nobly performed deeds in the varied sands of life that will remain a memorial to them for all time.

THE CIVIL WAR.

The men of Lincoln County bore an honorable part in the American Revolution, and were in evidence in the second bout with the mother country; they helped to win Texan independence and fought in the Mexican War; at the outbreak of the great Civil War, they presented a solid front in defense of their Southland.

Stephen D. Ramseur, a graduate of West Point, and a lieutenant in the United States Army, resigned his commission, tendered his service to the Confederacy and was appointed captain of artillery; by promotion he passed through the grades to the rank of Major-General, and met the death of a hero at Cedar Creek, on the 19th of October, 1864.

Alvin DeLane was a soldier in the United States Navy, whose flag was endeared to him by many years service. When the war clouds gathered a decision was to be made. He hesitated not; the battle-cry of the South expressed his sentiment and his resolve:

> "In Dixie land I'll take my stand,
> And live and die for Dixie."

In the darkness of the night he scaled the walls of Fort Sumter with a ladder, which served him many hours as a float on the briny deep, was rescued, became the hero of Charleston, and for the next four years a gallant Confederate.

William S. Bynum, the soldier boy, September 25th, 1862, at the age of fourteen years, enlisted in Company K, 42d Regiment, and was a gallant Confederate until the surrender.

Lincoln County furnished the Confederacy eight full companies: (1) The Southern Stars, Company K, Bethel Regiment, William J. Hoke, Captain; (2) Company I, 11th Regiment, A. S. Haynes, Captain; (3) Company K, 23d Regiment, Robert D. Johnston, Captain; (4) Company E, 34th Regiment, John F. Hill, Captain; (5) Company K, 49th Regiment, Peter Z. Baxter, Captain; (6) Company G, 52d Regiment, Joseph B. Shelton, Captain; (7) Company H, 52d Regiment, Eric Erson, Captain; (8) Company G, 57th Regiment, John F. Speck, Captain; besides members of other companies.

Many of the Bethel soldiers won commissions of honor. Capt. William J. Hoke became Colonel of the 38th Regiment; Second Lieutenant Robert F. Hoke was promoted through the grades to the rank of Major-General; Eric Erson was Lieutenant-Colonel of the 52d Regiment; William R. Edwards, Sidney Haynes, John F. Speck, Benjamin F. Grigg, Peter M. Mull, Lauson A. Dellinger, and James D. Wells won captains' commissions; while David A. Coon, Ed. D. Sumner, W. A. Summerow, and George M. Hoke were first lieutenants, and Lemuel J. Hoyle, Charles Elmer, Josephus Houser and Oliver A. Ramsour, second lieutenants.

John F. Hoke was Brigadier-General and Adjutant-General of the State. Through him the volunteer regiments were organized. He was the first Colonel of the 23d Regiment, and at the surrender was Colonel of the 73d Regiment.

William Preston Bynum entered the service as first lieutenant of the Beattie's Ford Rifles; this company was mustered in as Company K, 23d Regiment; he was promoted Lieutenant-Colonel, and Colonel of the 2d Regiment.

Robert D. Johnston, second lieutenant of the Beattie's Ford Rifles, rose by promotion for gallantry to the rank of brigadier-general. He was wounded at Seven Pines, Gettysburg and on the Catawba River.

Other commissioned officers: Colonel—Samuel D. Lowe. Lieutenant-Colonels—Hiram W. Abernethy and Charles J. Hammarskold. Majors—Sidney M. Finger and William A. Graham. Captains—James T. Adams, Phillip W. Carpenter, A. H. Houston, G. W. Hunter, James F. Johnston, William H. Johnston, Joseph F. Johnston, James M. Kincaid, Milton Lowe, Joseph G. Morrison, George L. Phifer, Benjamin H. Sumner, Woodberry Wheeler, and C. C. Wrenshall. First Lieutenants—Peter S. Beal, John H. Boyd, John P. Cansler, William H. Hill, Wallace M. Reinhardt, Daniel Reinhardt, and Thomas L. Seagle. Second Lieutenants—Thomas Abernethy, William Arndt, William H. Hill, Wallace M. Reinhardt, Daniel Asbury, George W. Beam, Caleb Bisaner, John Caldwell, Eli Crowell, Henry Eaton, Henry Fullenwider, John F. Goodson, Emanuel Houser, Bruce Houston, Lee Johnston, Thomas Lindsey, William M. Monday, John Rendleman, Samuel Rendleman, David Rhodes, Alfred Robinson, Samuel Thompson, W. A. Thompson, Henry Wells and Rufus Warlick. Chaplains—Robert B. Anderson and Eugene W. Thompson.

Summary—Two major-generals, one brigadier-general, four colonels, three lieutenant-colonels, two majors, two chaplains, twenty-eight captains, sixteen first lieutenants, thirty-three second lieutenants and 1,219 non-commissioned officers and privates, a grand total of 1,311 Confederate soldiers.

AUTHORITIES:—Counties of North Carolina, by K. P. Battle; Governor William Tryon, by Marshall DeLancey Haywood; Colonial Records of North Carolina; State Records of North Carolina; Public Laws of North Carolina; Public Records of Tryon County, N. C.; Public Records of Lincoln County, N. C.; General Joseph Graham and His Revolutionary Papers, by W. A. Graham; History of North Carolina, by John H. Wheeler; Reminiscences and Memoirs, by John H. Wheeler; Sketches of Western North Carolina, by C. L. Hunter; Manuscript of Wallace M. Reinhardt; King's Mountain and Its Heroes, by L. C. Draper; Narratives of the Battle of King's Mountain, by David Vance and Robert Henry; North Carolina, 1780-81, by David Schenck; German Settlements in North and South Carolina, by G. D. Bernheim; History of the Reformed Church; South Fork Association, by W. A. Graham; The Broad Axe and the Forge, by Brevard McDowell; Old Lincoln Homes, by Brevard Nixon; Roster of Confederate Soldiers of Lincoln County, by A. Nixon.

OUR STATE MOTTO AND ITS ORIGIN.

BY CHIEF JUSTICE WALTER CLARK.

The General Assembly of 1893 (chapter 145) adopted the words "Esse Quam Videri" as the State's motto and directed that these words with the date "20 May, 1775," should be placed with our Coat of Arms upon the great seal of the State.

The words "Esse Quam Videri" mean "to be rather than to seem," and are a suitable recognition of the honest, sturdy, unpretending character of our people. Beside the motto of the Union, "E Pluribus Unum," nearly every State has adopted a motto. With few exceptions these mottoes are in Latin. The reason for their being in Latin and not in English is not far to seek. Owing to the Latin tongue expressing the different forms of the verb and of the noun by a mere change in termination, and not, as in English, by the addition of particles and prepositions, it is far more condensed and terse. The three words, "Esse Quam Videri," require the use of at least six English words to express the same idea. For this reason mottoes are most usually in Latin.

Curiosity has been aroused to learn the origin of our State motto. It is found in Cicero in his Essay on Friendship (Cicero de Amicitia, chap. 26) though it is not there used in the same sense now ordinarily attached to it. He says, "Virtute enim ipsa non tam multi prediti esse quam videri," i. e. "Virtue is a quality which not so many desire to possess as desire to seem to possess," or, translated literally, "For indeed not so many wish to be endowed with virtue as wish to seem to be."

But in reality the phrase can be traced much farther back. It was used by the Greek poet Eschylus in the famous tragedy

"The Seven against Thebes." In line 592 of that play, it is said (not using the Greek letters for want of proper type) "ou gar dokein aristos, all' einai thelei." Truly this is the identical sentiment of "Esse Quam Videri." Plutarch, in his Life of Aristides, chap. 3, says that when this line was pronounced in the theater all eyes were turned upon Aristides "the Just," who was present.

Socrates expressed nearly the same idea in his Apologia, 36 E, where he says that the victor of Olympia "makes you seem to be happy, but I make you so."

The phrase is a striking one and Cicero's version of it has been caught up and often used as a motto. In that best collection of mottoes extant, the "Coats of Arms of the British Peerage" no less than three noble houses have adopted it, to wit: the Earl of Winterton, Earl Brownlow and Lord Lurgan.

It has been adopted by many associations, especially literary societies. In this State it is the motto of Wilson Collegiate Institute and, with some modifications, of one of the societies at Wake Forest College.

The sentiment and its expression are good enough. It is appropriate to North Carolina, and her sons will make it memorable and distinguished. Among our sister States it can proudly take its place between the "Sic Semper Tyrannis" of Virginia and the "Animis, Opibusque Parati" of South Carolina.

The figures on our State Coat of Arms are Liberty and Plenty. It has been objected that the motto has no reference or application to the figures on the Coat of Arms. It is very rarely that such is the case. The national motto, "E Pluribus Unum," has no reference to the Eagle and Shield and the Thunderbolts on the national Coat of Arms. Nor has the "Excelsior" of New York, the "Dirigo" of Maine, the "Qui Transtulet, Sustinet" of Connecticut any application to the figures above them. Indeed Virginia's "Sic Semper Tyrannis" is one of the very few instances in which the motto bears such reference. But, in fact, is our motto so entirely without reference to the Coat of Arms as is usually the case? The figures are, as just stated, Liberty and Plenty. Is it inappropriate to say we prefer to be free and prosperous than seem to be so? There have been States that had all the appearance of liberty and prosperity, when in truth having lost the reality of both, they were tottering to their fall.

Indeed, as the learned and accomplished president of one of our State colleges has observed, "The motto has a deep philosophical meaning; one might evolve a whole system of metaphysics from the two basal ideas in it, that of being (esse) and that of phenomenality (videri) on which two poles the whole of modern theories of knowledge have hung."

It is a little singular that until the act of 1893 the sovereign State of North Carolina had no motto since its declaration of independence. It was one of the very few States which did not have a motto, and the only one of the original thirteen without it. It is very appropriate too that simultaneously with the adoption of the State motto, there was also placed on the State Seal and Coat of Arms, the date of the Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence—the earliest of all American Declarations—the ever-memorable 20 May, 1775.

It may be noted that up to the time it became a "sovereign and independent State" the Colony or Province of North Carolina bore on its great seal "Quae sera tamen respexit." This was taken from the first Eclogue of Virgil (line 27) and, referring to the figure of Liberty, meant "Which, tho late, looked upon me"—the full line in Virgil being "Liberty, which tho late looked upon me indolent." No wonder that this was dropped by the new State. Nothing could possibly have been more inappropriate. Liberty came not to her late, but the first of all the American States. And it came not to a people inert or unseeking her rewards. To such, liberty never comes. But she came to North Carolina, to a people energetic, earnest, devoted, seeking her smiles as a lover wooing a beauteous maiden, and in the pursuit tireless, as a sleuth hound seeking its quarry. Here first she came. As Burns said of Summer, on the banks of bonnie Doon, Liberty

> "Here first unfolds her robe,
> And here may she longest tarry."

It may be mentioned, to prevent any misunderstanding as to the scope of the Act of 1893 (now Revisal, sec. 5320) that it does not apply to County Seals. Each county is authorized to adopt its own seal, Revisal, sec. 1318 (24). Many counties now have on their county seals the appropriate phrase, "Leges Juraque Vindicamus." Some have adopted the State motto. But this is a matter left to the discretion of the county commissioners in each county.

It might be well to go further and, following the example of many States, adopt a State tree and flower. As appropriate to our State the writer, with diffidence, suggests the adoption of the White Oak as emblematic of the sturdy vigor of the manhood of North Carolina and the Violet as typical of the beauty, modesty and sweetness of its women.

NOTE BY THE EDITORS.—The bill which was passed in 1893 to adopt our State motto was introduced by Senator Jacob Battle, of Nash, afterwards Judge of the Superior Court. We have before us a letter from him in which he states that the motto was selected by Judge—since Chief Justice—Walter Clark, who also drew the bill and requested him to present it. He adds that the words "20 May, 1775," secured the hearty cooperation of Senator Brevard McDowell, of Mecklenburg, and by their joint efforts the bill passed by the unanimous vote of both houses of the General Assembly and without amendment.

THE WORK DONE BY THE D. R. IN PASQUOTANK COUNTY.

The Sir Walter Raleigh Chapter of the Daughters of the Revolution was organized in Elizabeth City a little over two years ago. Since then the members of the Chapter have been working quietly, and faithfully, studying the Colonial and Revolutionary history of the Albemarle section and locating points of historic interest in this and adjoining counties, with the purpose of some day having their sites marked with suitable tablets.

Pasquotank County is rich in such landmarks. Near Nixonton at Hall's Creek Church, there still stands the stump of an old oak, under whose branches there met on February 6, 1666, 244 years ago, the first law-making assembly ever convened in our State. At this spot the Daughters of the Revolution hope to place a handsome granite tablet, commemorating the event, early in the spring.

Through the efforts of the Chapter the following interesting places have been located, and with the help of the patriotic citizens of Pasquotank County the ladies hope to preserve these landmarks from oblivion.

The first school in the State was in Pasquotank County, near Salem. This school was taught by Mr. C. Griffin in 1705. The first house of worship, a Quaker meeting house, was built in Pasquotank on Symond's Creek in 1706.

The first court held in the State was held under an old tree, which is standing near Flatty Creek. Winslow's farm, called in Colonial days Winfield or Enfield, was the scene of the historic "Culpepper's Rebellion," and in one of the rooms still in good condition, Governor Miller was confined by the brave revolutionists.

On the banks of the Pasquotank at Brick House Point, stood Elmwood, the old Swann home, in which, as our Secretary of State, Hon. Bryan Grimes, stated in his speech before the State Literary and Historical Association last year, more distinguished men lived than ever occupied one residence in North Carolina. At Elmwood lived and with it were identified two speakers of the Assembly, five Congressmen, one United States Senator, a candidate for Governor, and a President of the University. Farther up the river is another old brick house reported to have been one of the homes of Teach, the pirate. Pasquotank County furnished two regiments to the Revolutionary army and two of its bravest generals, Gen. Isaac Gregory and Gen. Peter Doughe. The former was distinguished by his brave stand at the disastrous battle of Camden and later, at the close of the war, drove the Tories out of the State. Gen. Peter Doughe distinguished himself and did his country noble service at the battle of Great Bridge in Virginia. The graves of these two heroes have been located, as has also been the resting place of John Harvey, "The Father of the Revolution," and over these now unmarked graves the Daughters of the Revolution have determined to place suitable stones.

Through the instrumentality of this patriotic organization a North Carolina History Society of twenty members has been organized among the ladies of the town, and this society has agreed to cooperate with the Chapter in its work of preserving our landmarks. The Chapter has also organized among the children of the Primary, Grammar and High Schools a Carolina Memorial Association, the members of which have agreed to contribute a small sum each year to be used in placing these tablets at suitable spots throughout the county. The Regent of the Chapter hopes to interest the teachers in the county schools in this work also, and to have all the school children in Pasquotank help in this patriotic task. The Chapter numbers only eight members so far, but hopes to add more names to its roll before the close of the year 1909. C. F. S. A.

BIOGRAPHICAL AND GENEALOGICAL MEMORANDA.

COMPILED AND EDITED BY MRS. E. E. MOFFITT.

ALFRED NIXON.

Alfred Nixon, the author of the "Sketch of Lincoln County, North Carolina, is the son of Robert Nixon and Millie (Womack) Nixon. He was born at his father's farm on the 28th day of May, 1856. He is of Scotch-Irish and German descent; was reared on his father's farm in Lincoln County. His earliest education was acquired in the public schools; attended Rock Spring Seminary and prepared for the University of North Carolina, where he graduated in the class of 1881. After returning to his county he filled many important positions—county surveyor, sheriff, superintendent of public instruction, and at the present writing is clerk of the Superior Court of Lincoln County. Living in an old historic county, a student of history by taste and cultivation, these positions have afforded him extensive opportunities, not only for acquaintance with the people of every part of the county but with its past. The following estimate of Mr. Nixon is given by a prominent judge of his county: "Some time after leaving the University he served as sheriff of his county, to which he was elected several terms, and no doubt could have continued to hold it if he had so desired. He made a most excellent officer, kindly in manner, merciful in disposition, but throughout firm and efficient. He was elected clerk of the Superior Court and has been continued in that office, and has filled this important place most acceptably, showing good judgment, diligence and capacity. As a man and citizen he holds and deserves to hold the esteem and confidence of all of his neighbors and fellow-citizens."

GENEALOGY.

Alfred Nixon, son of Robert Nixon and Millie (Womack) Nixon. Grandson of Robert Nixon and Catherine (Luckey) Nixon. Catherine Luckey was the daughter of Robert Luckey and Dorcas (Armstrong) Luckey. He is the great-grandson of William Nixon and Elizabeth (Black) Nixon. William Nixon came to Lincoln County from Charlotte County, Va., in 1780. His ancestors came from Ireland to New Jersey and from thence to Virginia; descendants of an old English family whose history runs back to the thirteenth century. An early member of which was Sir William Nykson, who was granted a coat of arms in 1416.

Womack: Millie (Womack) Nixon, the mother of Alfred Nixon, was the daughter of Archibald Womack and Sallie (Huger) Womack, who emigrated from near Richmond, Va., and from where he inherited valuable property.

Huger: Sallie (Huger) Womack, the grandmother of Alfred Nixon was the daughter of John Huger and Sallie (Stacey) Huger. The Hugers came to Lincoln County prior to and during the American Revolution; are of Huguenot descent, a noble sect of whom Mr. Winthrop said "has furnished to our land blood every way worthy of being mingled with the best that ever flowed in the veins of either Southern Cavaliers or Northern Puritans."

Nixon, Womack, Luckey, Armstrong and Black came to Lincoln County from Virginia soon after the Revolutionary War, and many of their descendants reside in this and other States.

WALTER CLARK.

Walter Clark, the distinguished Chief Justice of the State, the author of the article on the "Great Seal of North Carolina," was born in Halifax County, North Carolina, on August 19, 1846, and since 1873 has been a resident of Raleigh, N. C. The first of the name Colin Clark came to North Carolina from Fifeshire, Scotland. His son, David Clark, was a prominent man of Halifax County; one of the board of internal improvements, one of the originators and a director of the Roanoke Navigation Company, which was such an important factor in the trade of Roanoke River before the era of railroads. He had a son named for himself, David Clark, who was the father of the subject of this sketch. David Clark, though a man of fine education, entered neither professional nor public life. He was one of the wealthiest planters on the Roanoke, a man of wide reading, and with a great landed interest; he found ample occupation in superintending his estates and among the books in his large private library. During the war between the States he was commissioned by the State of North Carolina as a brigadier-general, and in January, 1862, was assigned to the command of the defenses of Roanoke River. Other important military appointments were assigned him on account of his capabilities, his superior intelligence and his influence over the militiamen of that section. General David Clark married Miss Anna M. Thorne, of Halifax County, who became the mother of the subject of this sketch, and through the Thornes Judge Clark is connected with the well-known families of Hilliard, Davis, Alston and Williams, and through the Thornes is also related to General Warren, the distinguished corps commander of the United States Army. Through the Clarks, Judge Clark is descended from the Blounts, Grays, Norfleets, McKenzies and other prominent families of northeastern North Carolina, and the Bryans of Southampton, Va.; the same family as that from whom William Jennings Bryan is descended.

Through the Williams Judge Clark is descended from Gilbert Johnston, a brother of Governor Gabriel Johnston.

At an early age Walter Clark became a student, first, under Prof. Ralph H. Graves, in Granville County, and in 1860 at Colonel Tew's Military Academy near Hillsboro, N. C. In the spring of 1861, before he not yet fifteen years of age, being proficient in the drill, he was among the cadets of that institution who, on recommendation of its officers, were appointed by the governor to drill the troops assembled at Camp Ellis near Raleigh. Upon the organization of the Twenty-second North Carolina Regiment in July, he was assigned to duty as drill-master for that regiment, commanded by Col. J. Johnston Pettigrew, and proceeded with it to Virginia. He continued to act in that capacity in its camp at Evansport, on the Potomac, until November, when he returned to Camp Mangum, at Raleigh, where the Thirty-fifth North Carolina was being organized. In February, 1862, resigning, he returned to the military academy and resumed his studies. On August 1, 1862, he was appointed, upon the solicitation of its officers, who had known him at the camp of instruction, first lieutenant and adjutant of the Thirty-fifth North Carolina, of which Matthew W. Ransom had then become the colonel, and joining his regiment he participated in the first Maryland and Fredericksburg campaigns, and was wounded at Sharpsburg (Antietam). In the latter battle his brigade held Marye's Heights and drove back, among others, Meagher's Irish brigade.

Being then just sixteen years of age and rather small, in spite of this he performed his duties with great acceptability, and became a general favorite, enjoying the esteem and respect of both officers and men. He behaved in the battle of Fredericksburg with coolness and distinguished intrepidity.

In February, 1863, the regiment having returned to North Carolina to recruit, there seeming to be no early prospect of further active service, Adjutant Clark resigned with the purpose of completing his education, and entered as a student at Chapel Hill, where he graduated with first distinction on June 2, 1864. The day after he graduated he was elected major of the Sixth Battalion of Junior Reserves, then organized for active service by Lieutenant-General Holmes, and under his command the battalion did service at Goldsboro, Weldon and at Gaston, protecting the railroad bridge from a threatened cavalry raid.

On July 4th his battalion and the First were consolidated into a regiment that became the Seventieth North Carolina Regiment of State troops, and in the election of officers Major Clark was elected lieutenant-colonel.

Lieutenant-Colonel Clark was then seventeen years of age, and the youngest officer of his rank in either army. At the request of his colonel later he relinquished this position temporarily (which eventually failed of its purpose) and he was elected major, in which position he contined to serve during the remainder of the war. In October this regiment was ordered to Boykin's Depot, Va., and to the defense of Plymouth, and to Hamilton to guard the approaches to Martin, Edgecombe and Pitt counties whence large supplies were drawn for the support of Lee's army.

Early in November he with four companies were dispatched to Williamston where Major Clark took command of the post, embracing cavalry and infantry as well as artillery. For one so young this was an important command, but Major Clark bore himself so well as to justify the confidence reposed in him at that time. Captain Moore, speaking of him at that time, says, "he had the bearing and command of a born soldier and displayed the executive talent which he has since shown."

On Dec. 25, 1864, the regiment was at the repulse of the gunboats at Poplar Point and in other minor encounters. About the middle of Feb., 1865, it was ordered to Kinston, N. C., where it engaged in battle on March 8th and from thence to Smithfield, N. C., to join General Johnston, and from thence to Bentonsville where it engaged the advance corps of Sherman's army, which was held in check three days—the 19th, 20th and 21st of March—during which time the skirmish line of Major Clark gallantly held its position the entire period. No brigade made a finer appearance on that field than the Junior Reserves, and it bore itself with such bravery as to win the highest encomiums from General Hoke and all the veterans on that field of battle.

While Sherman was resting at Goldsboro, General Johnston remained at Smithfield, but on April 10th began to retire before Sherman's advancing army. On the 12th the Seventieth Regiment passed through Raleigh and then to High Point in Randolph County where, on the afternoon of May 2d, Major Clark, with his associates in arms, were paroled; and then they dispersed to their respective homes.

As soon as order was restored, Major Clark, who had studied law under Judge William H. Battle, while a student at the University, became a student in a law office in Wall street, New York. Later, completing his course at the Columbian Law School in Washington, D. C., he obtained license to practice in January, 1867. He located at Scotland Neck, but subsequently removed to Halifax, where he entered into partnership with Hon. J. M. Mullen, and soon established a lucrative business. He removed to Raleigh in 1873, where larger opportunities would be opened to him professionally, and became one of the leading influences in the Democratic party.

In April, 1885, was appointed by Governor Scales judge of the Superior Court for the metropolitan district and was elected by the people to succeed himself the next year.

In November, 1889, he was transferred to the Supreme Court bench and subsequently elected to that position in 1890. In 1896, while still on the Supreme Court bench, he was virtually tendered the nomination of governor, but did not accept it, preferring at that time to remain on the bench.

In 1896 his name was presented by the North Carolina delegation to the National Democratic Convention for the vice-presidency. In 1902 he was nominated for the office of chief justice and was elected to that position. His opinions to date appear in forty-eight volumes of North Carolina Supreme Court Reports, beginning with 104 N. C.

Judge Clark is an indefatigable worker, and his contributions to literature have been numerous and notable. Besides the preparation of his judicial opinions he has annotated and edited one hundred and fifteen volumes North Carolina Supreme Court Reports, He is the author of numerous other works of national importance. Many of his articles are of historical character, relating to espisodes in North Carolina history; his chief work in this line has been the preparation of the "State Records," a continuation of the valuable publication begun by Col. Wm. L. Saunders, the "Colonial Records," running through sixteen quarto volumes, which entailed on him vast labor and is of the highest historical value. Another great work of still higher interest is that known as the "Regimental Histories" embraced in five volumes, in which is preserved the record of each North Carolina regiment, battalion and division during the war between the States. To Judge Clark is due the conception as well as the compilation of this memorial of the courage and patriotic service of the soldiers of North Carolina in that great war. The method employed in executing the design is admirable, recording the story of each organization, while the articles prepared by some competent member of each regiment are themselves of unusual merit. In accomplishing the publication of these two great works of the State, Judge Clark has rendered a most important service to the State and to posterity. Both of these works have been executed by him as a labor of love without any pecuniary compensation whatever.

During his whole career he has been astute to place the State on a high plane and promote such action as would redound to the credit of North Carolina. Indeed there has been no man of more versatile gifts and unremitting labor than Judge Clark, nor has any other of North Carolina's sons done more to preserve the memorials of her people and to perpetuate a remembrance of the glorious deeds that have "adorned them by his learning, virtues and character."

In all the positions which have been tendered him he has adorned them by his learning, virtues and character.

On January 28, 1874, he had the good fortune to marry Miss Susan Washington Graham, the only daughter of Hon. William A. Graham, of Hillsboro, N. C., and they have reared a most interesting family of five sons and two daughters. His family is as follows: Mrs. J. Ernest Erwin, of Morganton; Capt. David Clark, of Charlotte; W. A. Graham Clark, special agent of the Department of Commerce and Labor of the United States government; Walter Clark, Jr., City Attorney of Raleigh; John W. Clark, of Concord; Thorne M. Clark, of Halifax County, and Eugenea G. Clark.

To the North Carolina Booklet Judge Clark has been an unfailing friend, not only by his contributed articles of historic value but by his continued interest in this work undertaken by the "North Carolina Society of the Daughters of the Revolution." He contributed an article on the "Indian Massacre and Tuscarora War" in No. 3 of Vol. II. "Colony of Transylvania," No. 9, of Vol. III. "Expedition to Cartagena in 1740," No. 6, Vol. IV, and the "History of State Seal," in this number, Vol. IX, No. 3, Jan., 1910.

The writer is indebted to Capt. Samuel A. Ashe for the facts of the above sketch, taken from his article on Judge Clark in Vol. VII of the "Biographical History of North Carolina" (1908). There is no doubt of the authenticity of these facts since they were obtained from Captain Samuel A'Court Ashe, a "citizen" of commanding individuality and one of the best equipped editors and historians of the South in the last thirty-five years.

WILLS FROM THE OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE, RALEIGH, N. C.

Will of John Clark, of Perquimans. Wife Anne, sons John and Thomas; in case of their death property to go to Simos and Thomas Trumbell. Sarah Trumbell. Sept. 6th, 1716; Nov. 14, 1717.

Richard Evans, of Perquimans; Sept. 7th, 1692; Oct. 2, 1693. Wife Elizabeth, four children, Jonathan, Richard, Rebecca and Ann Evans. Wife and Alexander Lillington, Exrs.

Will of John Fendall, of Perquimans; Dec. 17, 1695, April 8th, 1696. Brother Robert Fendall, wife Elizabeth, father-in-law Alex. Lillington.

Robert Fendall. Nov. 30, 1711; Isaac Wilson; Thomas Levy Exor.

George Fort, May 15, 1719; prob. October 20, 1719. Son Elias Fort, son George Fort, sons John and Samuel Fort; daughter Phillis Fibath, daughter Catherine Fort. Wife Elizabeth; Elias Fort Exr.

John Fort, August 6, 1745; March Court, 1745-6. Sons John and Moses, daughter Ternshaw's son, Denby, Arthur Fort.

John Gorbe, 17th, 6th mo., 1693. Wife, son John, daughter Sarah; cousins Samuel and Joseph Nicholson Exrs. Test. Rich'd. Dorman.

Adam Gambell, of Glasgow, Scotland. Nov. 14th, 1694. John Land living in London; Adam Hill in London; John Argy in France; Robert, Thomas and John West, sons-in-law of Thomas Pollock; John Hunt, brother James Gambell of Glasgow. Thomas Pollock and John Hunt Exrs. Test. Henel Gregory, Elizabeth Hunt, W. Lynch.

Will of Joshua Grainger of Wilmington, June 1741; wife Elizabeth, daughter Ann, son Joshua, grandson Wilmington, son of Joshua; son Caleb.

Caleb Grainger, New Hanover; October 5, 1765, (main body of will dated 1763), probated October 31st, 1765. Wife Mary, daughter Mary Grainger, son Caleb, son Cornelius Harnett Grainger, son William, child in esse, Maurice Moore, Cornelius Harnett, Samuel Ashe, Alexander Duncan, Exrs. Test. Mary Granger, Margaret Douglass, Edward Trogerin, Samuel Gidden, Anthony Ward, Joseph Stockley.

John Hill, of Bath; March 27, 1731. Sons Joshua and John; friend Thomas Tison, my children. Wife and Edward Peads Exrs. Test. Thomas Tison, Harmon Hill, William Nicholls.

John Hill, Northampton, June 15, 1747. Sons Nathaniel, Daniel Lewis and Peter. Sons Nathaniel and Daniel Exrs. Test. William Floaryday, Hosea Tapsley.

William Hill, Chowan, 10th, 1st mo., 1750-51. Grandson Aaron, son of Moses Hill; my father-in-law, Thomas Spivey; son Moses, grandson Robert Hill, son of Aaron, daughter Rachel Hill, son William, daughter Sarah Barrow, wife of Joseph; wife Mary, daughter Mary Nicholson, daughters Susannah White, Leah Moore, and Ruth Davis. Son Aaron and son-in-law Thomas Nicholson Exrs. Test. James Griffin, Jethro Rabey, Ann Peters.

Harman Hill, Beaufort, Dec. 4, 1752; Mch. Court, 1755. Wife Sarah, son Harman, daughter Elizabeth Hancock, her children James and William; Sarah Rice, daughter Ann Slade, her husband Joseph Slade, daughters Mary Smit and Rachel Hill. Wife, Joseph Slade and John Barrow Exrs. Test. Edmund Pierce, Griffith Howell, Joshua Pierce.

(Signed) Mrs. Helen deB. Wills.

Edwards & Broughton Printing Company, Raleigh, N. C.

INFORMATION

Concerning the Patriotic Society

"Daughters of the Revolution"

The General Society was founded October 11, 1890,—and organized August 20, 1891,—under the name of "Daughters of the American Revolution"; was incorporated under the laws of the State of New York as an organization national in its work and purpose. Some of the members of this organization becoming dissatisfied with the terms of entrance, withdrew from it and, in 1891, formed under the slightly differing name "Daughters of the Revolution," eligibility to which from the moment of its existence has been lineal descent from an ancestor who rendered patriotic service during the War of Independence.

"The North Carolina Society"

a subdivision of the General Society, was organized in October, 1896, and has continued to promote the purposes of its institution and to observe the Constitution and By-Laws.

Membership and Qualifications

Any woman shall be eligible who is above the age of eighteen years, of good character, and a lineal descendant of an ancestor who (1) was a signer of the Declaration of Independence, a member of the Continental Congress, Legislature or General Court, of any of the Colonies or States; or (2) rendered civil, military or naval service under the authority of any of the thirteen Colonies, or of the Continental Congress; or (3) by service rendered during the War of the Revolution became liable to the penalty of treason against the government of Great Britain: Provided, that such ancestor always remained loyal to the cause of American Independence.

The chief work of the North Carolina Society for the past eight years has been the publication of the "North Carolina Booklet," a quarterly publication on great events in North Carolina history—Colonial and Revolutionary. $1.00 per year. It will continue to extend its work and to spread the knowledge of its History and Biography in other States.

This Society has its headquarters in Raleigh, N. C., Room 411, Carolina Trust Company Building, 232 Fayetteville Street.

Some North Carolina Booklets for Sale

Address, EDITOR, Raleigh, N. C.

Vol. I

"Greene's Retreat," Dr. Daniel Harvey Hill.

Vol. II

"Our Own Pirates," Capt. S. A. Ashe.

"Indian Massacre and Tuscarora War," Judge Walter Clark.

"Moravian Settlement in North Carolina," Rev. J. E. Clewell.

"Whigs and Tories," Prof. W. C. Allen.

"The Revolutionary Congresses," Mr. T. M. Pittman.

"Raleigh and the Old Town of Bloomsbury," Dr. K. P. Battle.

"Historic Homes—Bath, Buncomb Hall, Hayes," Rodman, Blount, Dillard.

"County of Clarendon," Prof. John S. Bassett.

"Signal and Secret Service," Dr. Charles E. Taylor.

"Last Days of the War," Dr. Henry T. Bahnson.

Vol. III

"Trial of James Glasgow," Kemp P. Battle, LL.D.

"Volunteer State Tennessee as a Seceder," Miss Susie Gentry.

"Historic Hillsboro," Mr. Francis Nash.

"Colony of Transylvania," Judge Walter Clark.

"Social Conditions in Colonial North Carolina," Col. Alexander Q. Holladay, LL.D.

"Battle of Moore's Creek Bridge, 1776," Prof. M. C. S. Noble.

"North Carolina and Georgia Boundary," Mr. Daniel Goodloe.

Vol. IV

"Battle Ramseur's Mill, 1780," Major Wm. A. Graham.

"Quaker Meadows," Judge A. C. Avery.

"Convention of 1788," Judge Henry Groves Connor.

"North Carolina Signers of Declaration of Independence, John Penn and Joseph Hewes," by Mr. T. M. Pittman and Dr. E. Walter Sikes.

"Expedition to Cartagena, 1740," Judge Walter Clark.

"Rutherford's Expedition Against the Indians," Capt. S. A. Ashe.

"Changes in Carolina Coast Since 1585," Prof. Collier Cobb.

"Highland Scotch Settlement in N. C.," Judge James C. McRae.

"The Scotch-Irish Settlement," Rev. A. J. McKelway.

"Battle of Guilford Court-house and German Palatines in North Carolina," Major J. M. Morehead, Judge O. H. Allen.

"Genesis of Wake County," Mr. Marshall DeLancey Haywood.

Vol. V.—(Quarterly).

No. 1.

"St. Paul's Church, Edenton, N. C., and its Associations," Richard Dillard, M.D.

"N. C. Signers of the National Declaration of Independence, Part II, William Hooper," Mrs. Spier Whitaker.

No. 2.

"History of the Capitol," Colonel Charles Earl Johnson.

"Some Notes on Colonial North Carolina, 1700-1750," Colonel J. Bryan Grimes.

"North Carolina's Poets," Rev. Hight C. Moore.

No. 3.

"Cornelius Harnett," Mr. R. D. W. Connor.

"Celebration of the Anniversary of May 20, 1775," Major W. A. Graham.

"Edward Moseley," by Dr. D. H. Hill.

No. 4.

"Governor Thomas Pollok," Mrs. John W. Hinsdale.

"Battle of Cowan's Ford," Major W. A. Graham.

"First Settlers in North Carolina Not Religious Refugees," Rt. Rev. Joseph Blount Cheshire, D.D.

Vol. VI—(Quarterly.)

No. 1.

"The Indian Tribes of Eastern North Carolina," Richard Dillard, M.D.

"History Involved in the Names of Counties and Towns in North Carolina," Kemp P. Battle, LL.D.

"A Colonial Admiral of the Cape Fear" (Admiral Sir Thomas Frankland), Hon. James Sprunt.

"Biographical Sketches: Introduction; Maj. Graham Daves." By Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

October, No. 2.

"The Borough Towns of North Carolina," Mr. Francis Nash.

"Governor Thomas Burke," J. G. de Roulhac Hamilton, Ph.D.

"Colonial and Revolutionary Relics in the Hall of History," Col. Fred. A. Olds.

"The North Carolina Society Daughters of the Revolution and its Objects."

"Biographical Sketches: Dr. Richard Dillard, Mr. Francis Nash, Dr. J. G. de R. Hamilton and Col. Fred A. Olds," Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

January, No. 3.

"State Library Building and Department of Archives and Records," Mr. R. D. W. Connor.

"The Battle of Rockfish Creek, 1781," Mr. James Owen Carr.

"Governor Jesse Franklin," Prof. J. T. Alderman.

"North Carolina's Historical Exhibit at Jamestown," Mrs. Lindsay Patterson, Miss Mary Hilliard Hinton.

"Biographical Sketches: Mrs. S. B. Kenneday, R. D. W. Connor, James Owen Carr and Prof. J. T. Alderman," Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

April, No. 4.

"Lock's Fundamental Constitution," Mr. Junius Davis.

"The White Pictures," Mr. W. J. Peele.

"North Carolina's Attitude Toward the Revolution," Mr. Robert Strong.

Biographical Sketches: Richard Benbury Creecy, the D. R. Society and Its Objects, Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

Genealogical Sketches: Abstracts of Wills; Scolley, Sprott and Hunter, Mrs. Helen de B. Wells.

Vol. VII. (Quarterly.)

July, No. 1.

"North Carolina in the French and Indian War," Col. A. M. Waddell.

"Locke's Fundamental Constitutions," Mr. Junius Davis.

"Industrial Life in Colonial Carolina," Mr. Thomas M. Pittman.

Address: "Our Dearest Neighbor—The Old North State," Hon. James Alston Cabell.

Biographical Sketches: Col. A. M. Waddell, Junius Davis, Thomas M. Pittman, by Mrs. E. E. Moffitt; Hon. Jas. Alston Cabell, by Mary Hilliard Hinton.

Abstracts of Wills. Mrs. Helen DeB. Wills.

October, No. 2.

"Ode to North Carolina," Miss Pattie Williams Gee.

"The Finances of the North Carolina Colonists," Dr. Charles Lee Raper.

"Joseph Gales, Editor," Mr. Willis G. Briggs.

"Our First Constitution, 1776," Dr. E. W. Sikes.

"North Carolina's Historical Exhibit at Jamestown Exposition," Miss Mary Hilliard Hinton.

Biographical Sketches: Dr. Kemp P. Battle, Dr. Charles Lee Raper, Willis Grandy Briggs, Pattie Williams Gee. By Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

January, No. 3.

"General Robert Howe," Hon. John D. Bellamy.

"Early Relations of North Carolina and the West," Dr. William K. Boyd.

"Incidents of the Early and Permanent Settlement of the Cape Fear," Mr. W. B. McKoy.

Biographical Sketches: John Dillard Bellamy, William K. Boyd, William B. McKoy. By Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

April, No. 4.

"St. James's Churchyard" (Poem), Mrs. L. C. Markham.

"The Expedition Against the Row Galley 'General Arnold'—A Side Light on Colonial Edenton," Rev. Robt. B. Drane, D.D.

"The Quakers of Perquimans," Miss Julia S. White.

"Fayetteville Independent Light Infantry," Judge James C. MacRae.

Biographical Sketches: Mrs. L. C. Markham, Rev. R. B. Drane, Miss Julia S. White, Judge James C. MacRae. By Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

Vol. VIII.—(Quarterly)

July, No. 1.

"John Harvey," Mr. R. D. W. Connor.

"Military Organizations of North Carolina During the American Revolution," Clyde L. King, A.M.

"A Sermon by Rev. George Micklejohn," edited by Mr. R. D. W. Connor.

Biographical and Genealogical Sketches: R. D. W. Connor, Clyde L. King, Marshall DeLancey Haywood, by Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

"Abstracts of Wills," Mrs. Helen DeB. Wells.

October, No. 2.

"Convention of 1835," Associate Justice Henry G. Connor.

"The Life and Services of Brigadier-General Jethro Sumner," Kemp P. Battle, LL.D.

"The Significance of the Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence," Prof. Bruce Craven.

"Biographical and Genealogical Sketches: Judge Henry G. Connor, Kemp P. Battle, LL.D., Prof. Bruce Craven," by Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

January, No. 3.

"The Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence," Mr. A. S. Salley, Jr.

"The Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence," Prof. Bruce Craven.

"Mr. Salley's Reply."

"Mr. Craven's Rejoinder."

"Biographical and Genealogical Sketches: Prof. Bruce Craven, Mr. Alexander, S. Salley, Jr.," by Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

"Patriotic Objects."

"Information Concerning the Patriotic Society D. R."

April, No. 4.

"Unveiling Ceremonies."

"Carolina," by Miss Bettie Freshwater Pool.

"The Battle of King's Mountain," by Dr. William K. Boyd.

"Schools and Education in Colonial Times," by Dr. Charles Lee Smith.

"North Carolina Heroines of the Revolution," by Richard Dillard, M.D.

"Biographical and Genealogical Sketches: Bettie Freshwater Pool, William K. Boyd, Charles Lee Smith, Richard Dillard," by Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

The North Carolina Booklet

A QUARTERLY PUBLICATION ISSUED UNDER
THE AUSPICES OF THE

"NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION"

THIS PUBLICATION treats of important events in North Carolina History, such as may throw light upon the political, social or religious life of the people of this State during the Colonial and Revolutionary periods, in the form of monographs written and contributed by as reliable and painstaking historians as our State can produce. The Ninth Volume begins in July, 1909.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION:

One Year, One Dollar; Single Copies, Thirty-five Cents.

Miss Mary Hilliard Hinton, Mrs. E. E. Moffitt, Editors, Raleigh, North Carolina.

Registered at Raleigh Post-office as second class matter.

Notice should be given if the subscription is to be discontinued. Otherwise it is assumed that a continuance of the subscription is desired.

Send all orders for back numbers to Mrs. E. E. MOFFITT, Raleigh, N. C.

All communications relating to subscriptions should be sent to

Miss Mary Hilliard Hinton,
Midway Plantation, Raleigh, N. C.

Genealogical Department

North Carolina Society

DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION

YOUR ANCESTRY CAN BE CAREFULLY TRACED

The Colonial and State Records of North Carolina, Pay-rolls of Revolutionary Soldiers filed in State Auditor's Office, County Records, Family Records, State Histories and Biographies will be diligently examined.

Fee for Such Researches, $7.00 to $10.00, according to Difficulty of Research (not less than $7.00 paid with order).

Write for particulars, enclosing stamp for reply, to

MRS. HELEN DEBERNIÈRE WILLS.
(Genealogist for N. C. D. R.)
RALEIGH, NORTH CAROLINA.

Kindly remit by money order.

COATS-OF-ARMS
PAINTED

Coats-of-Arms painted, decorated with helmet, lambrequin, etc., and enclosed in passe partout	$12 00
Same style and size, but unframed	10 00
A painted Coat-of-Arms, without helmet lambrequin, etc., unframed	5.00
India Ink Drawing of Arms	5.00
Searches for Coats-of-Arms, including (if found) a small sketch of the arms	8.00
Arms burned on wood	5.00

Book plates designed.

Write for particulars, enclosing stamp.

MISS MARY HILLIARD HINTON.
"Midway Plantation,"
RALEIGH, NORTH CAROLINA.

The Science of Accounts

SINGLE AND DOUBLE ENTRY
Book-keeping
A TEXT BOOK FOR PUBLIC SCHOOLS

The Graded School Edition. 65 pages, 25 lessons; cloth. Price, 65 cents. Will be ready August 1st.

The High School Edition. 130 pages, 50 lessons, and supplement; cloth bound. Price, $1.00, sent prepaid. This edition will be ready September 1st.

A 32-page Booklet with 10 Sample Lessons will be sent FREE to any subscriber to the N. C. BOOKLET who applies for it.

Address

GEORGE ALLEN, Raleigh, N. C.

Smith's Old Book Store

Raleigh, N. C. and Richmond, Va.

50,000 rare volumes in stock, 20-000 on North Carolina and Southern history. 25 years in business. All kinds of books and relics bought and sold.

IF YOU WILL SEND US A POSTAL

and mention the N. C. Booklet,
we will send you

THREE FREE SAMPLE COPIES OF THE PROGRESSIVE FARMER.

The Progressive Farmer should be read by every North Carolina man or woman who owns or operates a farm, and every farm owner should see that all his tenants read it

"In increased production and valuation of farm and stock, The Progressive Farmer has made me $100 to every $1 I have paid for it," says J. M. Parris, Jackson County, N. C.

THE PROGRESSIVE FARMER, RALEIGH, N. C.

North Carolina Education

(Formerly N. C. Educational at Durham, N. C.)

Is a wide-awake monthly devoted to every phase of education in North Carolina. If you are interested in any phase of it, then North Carolina Education should interest you.

One Dollar a Year is the Price

Edited by E. C. BROOKS, Chair of Education in Trinity College, Durham, N. C., and W. F. MARSHALL, President Mutual Publishing Co., Raleigh, N. C.

Address, W. F. MARSHALL, Publisher, 108 W. Martin Street, Raleigh, N. C.

THE NORTH CAROLINA HISTORICAL COMMISSION

ESTABLISHED BY CHAPTER 767, PUBLIC LAWS OF 1903

AMENDED BY CHAPTER 714, PUBLIC LAWS OF 1907.

MEMBERS

J. BRYAN GRIMES, Chairman.....RALEIGH, N. C.
W. J. PEELE.....RALEIGH, N. C.
THOS. W. BLOUNT.....ROPER, N. C.
M. C. S. NOBLE.....CHAPEL HILL, N. C.
D. H. HILL.....RALEIGH, N. C.

SECRETARY.

R. D. W. CONNOR - - - - - - - - - RALEIGH, N. C.

PURPOSES.

1. "To have collected from the files of old newspapers, court records, church records, private collections, and elsewhere, historical data pertaining to the history of North Carolina and the territory included therein from the earliest times."

2. "To have such material properly edited, published by the State Printer as other State printing, and distributed under the direction of the Commission."

3. "To care for the proper marking and preservation of battlefields, houses and other places celebrated in the history of the State."

4. "To diffuse knowledge in reference to the history and resources of North Carolina."

5. "To encourage the study of North Carolina history in the schools of the State, and to stimulate and encourage historical investigation and research among the people of the State."—Section 2, Chapter 714, Public Laws of 1907.

The Secretary wishes to correspond with any person who is willing to assist the Commission, by gifts or loans or manuscripts, information of the whereabouts of such documents, or otherwise in carrying out the above purposes.

Address all Communications to the Secretary

The Atlantic Fire Insurance Company

Raleigh, North Carolina.

SOLICITS YOUR PATRONAGE

CASH CAPITAL $125,000

A HOME COMPANY, OWNED AND OPERATED BY HOME PEOPLE.

CHAS. E JOHNSON, President. H. W. JACKSON, Treasurer.
J. G. BROWN, Vice-President. G. H. DORTCH, Secretary.

CAPITAL $100.000.00 SURPLUS $100.000.0

The

Commercial National Bank

RALEIGH, N. C.

The policy of this bank is to conduct its business along the most conservative lines; to restrict its operations to legitimate enterprises; to eliminate all speculative ventures.

OFFICERS

B . JERMAN, President. H. W. JACKSON, Cashier.
A. A. THOMPSON, Vice-President. E. B. CROW, Asst. Cashier.
J. J. THOMAS, Chairman of Board.

CITIZENS NATIONAL BANK,
RALEIGH, N. C.

Our customers are guaranteed every accommodation their business, balances and responsibility warrant.

THE OLDEST BANK—LARGEST BANK—AND ONLY NATIONAL BANK IN RALEIGH.

JOS. G. BROWN, President. HENRY E. LITCHFORD, Cashier

DIRECTORS:

JOSEPH G. BROWN. A. B. ANDREWS.
R. H. BATTLE. DR. A. B. HAWKINS.
DR. RICHARD H. LEWIS. WM. J. ANDREWS.
IVEN M. PROCTOR. JOHN C. DREWRY.
S. C. VANN.

THE KEYSTONE

A Southern Woman's Journal, Published Monthly by Southern Women. Now in its 7th year.

Official Organ for the Clubwomen and Daughters of the Confederacy in Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Florida and Mississippi.

SUBSCRIPTION, 50c. PER YEAR

North Carolina Booklet, $1.00 per year—The Keystone and the North Carolina Booklet for $1.10 per year.

Address

Miss MARY HILLIARD HINTON,
EDITOR N. C. BOOKLET,
Midway Plantation, Raleigh, N. C.

BOOKS AND MAGAZINES DURABLY AND BEAUTIFULLY BOUND

ARTISTIC PRINTING

EDWARDS & BROUGHTON PRINTING CO. RALEIGH, N.C.

LOWEST PRICES

Club Programs and Embossed Stationery

ESTIMATES ON APPLICATION

Circumstances Alter Cases

But Not our Cases. They are Always the same. Guaranteed whether Filled or Gold.

Jolly-Wynne Jewelry Co.

RALEIGH, - - - - NORTH CAROLINA.

Thomas H. Briggs & Sons

Raleigh, North Carolina

THE BIG

Hardware Men

PAINTS

MAJESTIC RANGES

Thomas A. Partin Co.

131 Fayetteville Street RALEIGH, N. C.

Dry Goods
Ladies' Furnishings and Novelties

Prompt attention given to local and mail orders.

Darnell & Thomas

118 Fayetteville St. Raleigh, N. C.

Pianos, Organs
Sheet Music ::

The Soul Stirring "DIXIE" a Specialty

J. R. FERRALL & CO.

Grocers

222 FAYETTEVILLE ST.

RALEIGH, N. C.

Raleigh Christian Advocate

Established 1858.

Organ of the North Carolina Conference, Methodist Episcopal Church, South.

Reaches weekly over 9,000 Subscribers.

King's Business College
(INCORPORATED)

CAPITAL STOCK
$30.000.

A personal investigation will convince any one that KING'S is absolutely the Largest, Best Equipped and Most Successful College of Business, Shorthand, Typewriting, Penmanship and English in the Carolinas, regardless of any claims the small fry are making. Strong, financial backing.

Reference: Every Bank and Leading Business Concern in Raleigh or Charlotte.
College Journal and Special Offers FREE.
We also teach Bookkeeping, Shorthand and Penmanship by mail.

Address King's Business College, Raleigh, N. C., or Charlotte, N. C.

"It's worth the difference"

WHARTON & TYREE

RALEIGH, N. C.

Workers in Artistic Photography

Negatives on file of most all N. C. Famous Men

North Carolina State Flags
State Flag Post Cards
State Flag Buttons, &c.

All sizes and prices of State Flags on hand, from the smallest 1-cent Muslin, to the largest Bunting.

Send for price-list.

PINCK. C. ENNISS,
RALEIGH. N. C.

THE SECOND EDITION OF "A SOUTHERNER IN EUROPE"

By CLARENCE H. POE.

is now on the press—(the first edition having been quickly exhausted)—in larger type, handsomer binding and better paper than the first. Price: cloth $1.00; heavy paper 60 cents. Order to-day from

THE MUTUAL PUBLISHING CO., RALEIGH, N. C.

Chief Justice Walter Clark of North Carolina: "Mr. Poe's are the best travel letters I have ever seen from any European tourist."

Birmingham (Ala.) Age-Herald: "'A Southerner in Europe' is all right—not like the ordinary book of travels, but charming letters—different and pleasing."

Dr. Chas. R. Henderson, University of Chicago: "Mr. Poe certainly travels with his eyes open and knows how to interpret what he finds for the advantage of our country."

Columbia State, Columbia, S. C.: "A collection of charming letters of travel, full of interesting observations. . . . This volume will prove delightful to every class of readers."

President Geo. H. Denny, Washington and Lee University, Lexington, Va.: "Mr. Poe is to be congratulated upon 'A Southerner in Europe.' I have read it with genuine interest and satisfaction, and it will do a great deal of good."

President H. N. Snyder, Wofford College, Spartanburg, S. C.: "'A Southerner in Europe' has brought me much pleasure and profit both from the author's charm of manner and the freshness of his point of view."

Zach McGhee, author "The Dark Corner," Washington, D. C.: "Entertaining and inspiring, I wish every Southerner in our land could read it. Mr. Poe has drawn lessons no one else has drawn, and has presented them in truly charming style."

Dr. Edwin Mims, author of "The Life of Sidney Lanier": "Not the conventional book of travel, but the impression of an alert, open-minded, progressive Southerner with insight and discrimination, a constructive leader in the development of the South."

Presbyterian Standard, Charlotte, N. C.: "There are no dull places. The entertainment is pronounced throughout. If anybody, who would know more of the wide world, and love his country better, has never read this little book, let him sit down and order a copy at once."

Ex-Governor Charles B. Aycock of North Carolina: "I read the last chapte the other night, having for the first time found the opportunity to look into it. Having read the last chapter I turned back and took the book up from the beginning, and nearly completed it before laying it down. It is in every way most delightful and instructive."

Nashville Christian Advocate, Nashville, Tenn: "The man who knows how to produce so sprightly a paper as he edits, and whose contributions on Southern industrial conditions are welcomed by the best magazines, naturally knows what to look for in Europe and how to tell the story when he has seen it. Mr. Poe has made a capital little book."

R. E. Borden, Strasburg, Va: "I'm just reveling with the greatest delight in reading 'A Southerner in Europe.' It is charmingly written and holds one's interest easily to the end. My only complaint is, it is entirely too brief, and I wish the author had toured every country of Europe, and part of Asia and Africa."

Jeffersonian Magazine, Atlanta, Ga.: "It was time for a new book of travels in Europe. All of the works of that kind that are on our bookshelves are out of date. What we wanted was a volume which would picture to us the condition of things now. Mr. Poe has supplied this demand. Without the waste of a page he has furnished a view of the European world which enables one to see the town and farm of to-day, and the manner of life, the diversity of work and the trend of things as they are at this very time."

J. M. BROUGHTON T. B. MOSELEY

J. M. Broughton & Co.

Real Estate and Insurance

City and country property bought and sold on commission.
Rents collected and satisfaction guaranteed.
Oldest Real Estate concern in the city.

OFFICE: 12 West Martin St. RALEIGH, N. C.

LADIES

Why not carry a $1,000 Policy in the

Jefferson Standard Life Ins. Co.

for the benefit of your children? The Jefferson Standard is the strongest in the South.

Home Office, Raleigh, N. C.

The

News and Observer

RALEIGH, N. C.

Published at the Capital City

JOSEPHUS DANIELS
EDITOR

Growth of Circulation

1894,	1,800 subscribers	1901,	6,500
1895,	2,400 subscribers	1902,	7,054
1896,	3,100 subscribers	1903,	8,201
1897,	4,200 subscribers	1904,	9,111
1898,	4,880 subscribers	1905,	10,000
1899,	5,200 subscribers	1906,	11,000
1900,	5,700 subscribers	1907,	12,000

THE J. G. BALL COMPANY

WHOLESALE GROCERS

131 AND 133 SOUTH WILMINGTON STREET

RALEIGH, N. C.

SOLICIT THE TRADE OF MERCHANTS ONLY

TRY CAPUDINE

for COLDS and GRIPP

It relieves the feverishness and aching and restores normal conditions Take a dose as soon as you are exposed and feel the cold coming on and. it will generally prevent it. Taken afterwards will relieve the ailment.

SOLD AT ALL DRUG STORES

LET THE

Mechanics Savings Bank

TAKE CARE OF YOUR

SAVINGS

WE PAY FOUR PER CENT INTEREST ON DEPOSITS

DOBBIN-FERRALL COMPANY

123-125 FAYETTEVILLE STREET

RALEIGH, N. C.

North Carolina's Largest and Leading Retail Dry Goods Establishment

Greatest attention is given to Ready-to-wear Garments for Ladies and Misses. Costumes, Coat Suits, Skirts, Waists, Top Coats and Wraps. Alterations are made FREE OF CHARGE by competent tailoresses and promptly. We carry the largest stocks in these lines to be found in North Carolina.

JOHN T, PULLEN. President N. W. WEST, Vice-President
CHARLES ROOT, Cashier

RALEIGH SAVINGS BANK

RALEIGH, N. C.

RESERVED INTEREST	$5,000.00
CAPITAL	$15,000.00
SURPLUS	$50,000.00
DEPOSITS OVER	$750,000.00

FOUR PER CENT INTEREST PAID ON DEPOSITS

BOYLAN-PEARCE CO.

Dry Goods Leaders in the Capital City
A Store With a State-wide Reputation

Staple and Fancy Dress Goods, Silks and Cotton Fabrics, White Goods in Immense Variety, Coat Suits, Waists and Skirts, Swellest Millinery, Laces, Embroideries, Parasols, Fans, Gloves and Handkerchiefs, Blankets, Comforts, Toweling, Sheeting and Pillow Cases, Lace and Net Curtains, and Scrims, Damask Napkins and Towels, Carpets, Art Squares, Rugs, Linoleums and Oil Cloths.

Samples submitted and contracts taken for public buildings, churches libraries and private residences.

BOYLAN-PEARCE COMPANY

206-208 Fayetteville Street RALEIGH, N. C.

ANTICEPHALALGINE

THE WONDERFUL REMEDY FOR
HEADACHE AND NEURALGIA

FOR SALE BY ALL DRUGGISTS RALEIGH
25 AND 50 CENTS PER BOTTLE NORTH CAROLINA

MISSES REESE & CO.

109 Fayetteville Street

RALEIGH, N. C.

The Place

THAT STANDS FOR

Correct Styles in Millinery

Two Stores in One

Heller Bros.

SHOES AND TRUNKS

RALEIGH, N. C.

Weathers & Perry

Fayetteville Street

RALEIGH, N. C.

China and Art Store and Interior Decorators

Carolina Electrical Co.

RALEIGH, N. C.

Engineers Contractors Supplies

Electric Light, Telephone and Annunciator Installation.

J. C. Ellington

Pictures, Artists' Materials

Wall-papers and Window-shades

Embroidery Silks Wools and Zephyrs

RALEIGH, N. C.

FIFTIETH ANNUAL

N. C. STATE FAIR, RALEIGH, OCT. 1910.

Four full days. $12,000 offered in prizes. Grand display of live stock, agricultural and horticultural products, machinery and fine arts. Fastest trotting and pacing races special stage and musical attractions and specialties. Biggest midway in the South General admission 50 cents, children 25 cents. For prize list and information, address JOSEPH E. POGUE, Secretary, Raleigh, N. C.

CORNELIUS HARNETT. An Essay in North Carolina History. By R. D. W. Connor, Secretary of the North Carolina Historical Commission.

"I have just finished reading Harnett. . . . You have made an interesting story of a most significant and interesting man."—EDWARD K. GRAHAM, Professor of English Literature, University of North Carolina.

"I have read with pleasure and pride Mr. Connor's forthcoming sketch of Cornelius Harnett. It is an interesting and scholarly piece of work and should have a wide circulation."—C. ALPHONSO SMITH, Professor of the English Language, University of North Carolina; Author of "Our Debt to Cornelius Harnett."

EDWARDS & BROUGHTON PRINTING CO., RALEIGH, N. C.

Price, $1.50

Vol. IX. APRIL, 1910 No. 4

The North Carolina Booklet

GREAT EVENTS IN NORTH CAROLINA HISTORY

PUBLISHED QUARTERLY
BY
THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY
DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION
RALEIGH, N. C.

CONTENTS

Page

Der North Carolina Land und Colonie Etablissement, . 199
By Miss Adelaide L. Fries

George Durant, ... 215
By Capt. S. A. Ashe

Hatorask, ... 223
By Jaques Busbee

The Truth About Jackson's Birthplace, . . . 232
By Prof. Bruce Craven

Biographical and Genealogical Memoranda, . . 236
By Mrs. E. E. Moffitt

SINGLE NUMBERS 35 CENTS $1.00 THE YEAR

ENTERED IN THE POST-OFFICE AT RALEIGH, N. C., AS SECOND CLASS MATTER.

The North Carolina Booklet

Great Events in North Carolina History

Volume X of THE BOOKLET will be issued quarterly by the North Carolina Society, Daughters of the Revolution, beginning July, 1910, Each BOOKLET will contain three articles, and will be published in July, October, January and April. Price $1.00 per year, 35 cents for single copy.

EDITOR:
MISS MARY HILLIARD HINTON.

VOLUME X.

The Chase (Poem) ..... Mr. James Sprunt
Colonel Polk's Rebellion ..... Captain S. A. Ashe
Francis Locke ..... Mr. George McCorkle
The Art of Painting as a Handmaid to History ..... Mr. Jaques Busbee
The Croatans ..... Mr. Hamilton McMillan
Glimpses of Historic Yorktown ..... Mrs. Helen DeB. Wills
History of Orange County ..... Mr. Francis Nash
Governor Richard Caswell ..... Dr. E. C. Brooks
History of Internal Improvements in North Carolina Prior to 1860, Mr. J. A. Morgan
Governor Samuel Johnston ..... Hon. Francis D. Winston
History of Craven County ..... Prof. S. M. Brinson

This list of subjects may be changed, as circumstances sometimes prevent the writers from keeping their engagements.

The histories of the separate counties will in future be a special feature of THE BOOKLET. When necessary, an entire issue will be devoted to a paper on one county.

THE BOOKLET will print abstracts of wills prior to 1760, as sources of biography, history and genealogy, by Mrs. Helen DeB. Wills.

Parties who wish to renew their subscriptions to THE BOOKLET for Vol. X, are requested to give notice at once.

Many numbers of Volumes I to IX for sale.

Address
MISS MARY HILLIARD HINTON,
"MIDWAY PLANTATION,"
Raleigh, N. C.

From Painting by Jaques Busbee.

HATTERAS — "GOLGOTHA OF THE SEA"

Vol. IX APRIL, 1910 No. 4

The North Carolina Booklet

"Carolina! Carolina! Heaven's blessings attend her!
While we live we will cherish, protect and defend her."

Published by
THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY
DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION

The object of the BOOKLET is to aid in developing and preserving North Carolina History. The proceeds arising from its publication will be devoted to patriotic purposes. EDITOR.

ADVISORY BOARD OF THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET.

MRS. HUBERT HAYWOOD.
MR. E. E. MOFFITT.
MRS. SPIER WHITAKER.
MR. R. D, W. CONNOR.
DR. D. H. HILL.
DR. E. W. SIKES.
MR. W. J. PEELE.
MISS MARTHA HELEN HAYWOOD.
DR. RICHARD DILLARD.
DR. KEMP P. BATTLE.
MR. JAMES SPRUNT.
MR. MARSHALL DELANCEY HAYWOOD.
CHIEF JUSTICE WALTER CLARK.
MAJOR W. A. GRAHAM.

EDITOR:
MISS MARY HILLIARD HINTON.

OFFICERS OF THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION 1910–1912.

REGENT:
MISS MARY HILLIARD HINTON.

VICE-REGENT:
MISS CATHERINE FAUNTLEROY SEYTON ALBERTSON.

HONORARY REGENTS:
MRS. SPIER WHITAKER.
MRS. E. E. MOFFITT.

RECORDING SECRETARY:
MRS. J. LEIGH SKINNER.

CORRESPONDING SECRETARY:
MRS. PAUL H. LEE.

TREASURER:
MRS. FRANK SHERWOOD.

REGISTRAR:
MISS ELIZA HARWOOD DRANE.

GENEALOGIST AND HISTORIAN:
MRS. HELEN DEBERNIERE WILLS.

CUSTODIAN OF RELICS:
MRS. JOHN E. RAY.

CHAPTER REGENTS.

Bloomsbury Chapter.....MRS. HUBERT HAYWOOD, Regent.
Penelope Barker Chapter.....MRS. PATRICK MATTHEW, Regent.
Sir Walter Raleigh Chapter.....MRS. WALKER WALLER JOYNES, Regent.
DeGraffenried Chapter.....MRS. CHARLES SLOVER HOLLISTER, Regent.

FOUNDER OF THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY AND REGENT 1896-1902:
MRS. SPIER WHITAKER.

REGENT 1902:
MRS. D. H. HILL, SR.*

REGENT 1902-1906:
MRS. THOMAS K. BRUNER.

REGENT 1906-1910:
MRS. E. E. MOFFITT.

* Died December 12, 1904.

THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET.

Vol. IX APRIL, 1910 No 4

DER NORTH CAROLINA LAND UND COLONIE ETABLISSEMENT.

BY ADELAIDE L. FRIES.

How could the Moravian Church, small in numbers, and at a time of great financial stress, purchase 98,985 acres of land in North Carolina, and successfully colonize and develop it?

American historians of the present day are searching European archives for information concerning more or less obscure events in American history, and it was natural to expect that the collection of papers in Herrnhut, Germany, would contain much of interest relating to the Moravian settlement in North Carolina, since Herrnhut was the center from which Moravian activity in the Eighteenth Century radiated. A visit of some weeks last summer enabled the writer to spend many an hour in the little Arbeit Zimmer, set apart for the convenience of those making researches in the Herrnhut "Archiv Haus," and the following sketch presents such part of the information gained as relates to the "Etablissement."

Perhaps the simplest way to begin is with Jonas Paulus Weiss's account of the circumstances surrounding Der North Carolina Land und Colonie Etablissement—that is, "The North Carolina Land and Colony Enterprise" (commonly called Wachovia),—in the days when the purchase and development of the property were made possible by the formation of the "North Carolina Societaet," or Society. Weiss was a merchant of Nuremberg, who had joined the Moravian Brethren, had contributed most generously to their various undertakings, and at this time was one of their financial leaders. He was the man of all others to whom the success of the North Carolina Societaet was due, and the account of it which he wrote in the spring of 1758 is full of interest.

On March 25, 1752, Count Zinzendorf signed a contract with Earl Granville, in which, as "Lord Advocate, Chancellor and Agent of the Unitas Fratrum," he agreed to purchase from Granville 100,000 acres of land in North Carolina, "in behalf of the Unitas Fratrum." The land was to be selected by Zinzendorf's agents in that section of the State which had been retained by Earl Granville when the seven other "Lords Proprietors" sold their shares to the Crown in 1744; and in the fall of 1752, August Gottlieb Spangenberg and several companions, including one of Granville's surveyors, made a long and at times dangerous tour of Northern Carolina, seeking land suited to the Moravian purpose. Ten tracts here and there were selected and plotted, and at last the party reached "Gargales Creek," where they first surveyed fourteen tracts, which, with the ten already chosen, would make up the desired 100,000 acres, and then surveyed five more, adjoining the fourteen, so that if it proved desirable, the Brethren could have all their purchase in one block. With the maps and all the information he had gathered, Spangenberg returned to England and made full report to Zinzendorf and other leading Brethren there. It was, however, a time of great financial stress in the German and English Moravian Church, and it appeared simply impossible to raise the money for the purchase, and for necessary expenses in developing the land. Moreover, the pieces of good land lay widely scattered, and it was estimated that the large tract was "one-third poor land." The Brethren, therefore, decided to abandon the project, and asked Granville to release them from the contract. Granville refused, but made the conditions easier, and a new contract was prepared, and signed by the Earl, and James Hutton, "Secretary of the Unitas Fratrum," in the presence of Arthur Dobbs, next Governor of North Carolina, and of Benjamin Wheatley. It was decided that the Brethren should take the contiguous tracts of land (Nos. I to XIX on accompanying map), as it was thought best to have the property all together, even if some of it was not fertile. On account of the expense of having nineteen deeds prepared, the Brethren suggested that it be all included in one deed, but their attorney advised against this, for if at any time they failed in their payment of quitrents, and Lord Granville was forced to take back part of the land, it could be more easily arranged if there were a number of smaller tracts, of which some could be surrendered without disturbing the rest. To-day this seems a useless precaution, but it looked otherwise to men who were facing a financial crisis in their affairs, and now in addition must arrange to pay £193 Sterling for having the deeds prepared, £223 more for expenses of the survey, £500 purchase-money, and £148:9:2½ annual quitrent, plus all that might be needed for establishing a settlement on the frontier of civilization.

Several plans were suggested for raising the necessary funds, and that proposed by Weiss was adopted. It was neither more nor less than a land company, in which each shareholder was to pay a definite proportion of these initial expenses and the annual quitrent, and was to receive 2,000 acres of land in the "Etablissement" in return. A temporary loan was obtained from a Swiss gentleman, Rudolph Oehs by name, to cover immediate needs, and then plans for the land company were energetically pushed. Spangenberg and Cornelius van Laer were elected directors of the Society, the former as corresponding secretary and the latter as treasurer. Formal instructions were drawn up, and full powers of attorney for both were signed in London, December 18, 1753, by Count Zinzendorf, Count Henry 28th Reuss, James Hutton, and Weiss. Spangenberg wished to have Weiss also as a director, but he declined "for good reasons, and because he could serve the cause and the shareholders better" in other ways. An office was opened in Zeist, Holland, with Weiss in charge, and members and friends of the Unitas Fratrum were asked to subscribe.

The first response came from Johann Christoph Sack, of Koenigsberg, who, with hearty approval of the plans, took the first share, and sent his £68. Others followed, until twenty-six shares had been sold, and by the end of 1757 the purchase-price and other initial expenses had all been paid, and certain sums advanced by the Unity or borrowed in 1754 had been covered by gifts from generous members of the Unity.

As each share was taken two papers were issued—a "Contract" and a "Certificate." The wording was not always identical, but so similar that a translation of No. 1 of each will serve to represent all.

CONTRACT No. 1.

"I, the undersigned, request that a lot of 2,000 acres may be granted to me in the settlement which the Unity of Brethren has undertaken in North Carolina. I promise to pay my yearly contingent thereto. I will moreover comply with any regulations which may at any time be made regarding it. To this end I have hereunto set my hand and seal, and have also sent ____ Sterling to be entered to my credit. Koenigsberg, Nov. 13, 1753.

"JOHANN CHRISTOPH SACK."

CERTIFICATE No. 1.

"Herr Johann Christoph Sack, in Koenigsberg. Whereas, he, in due form, has taken a share of one lot in the Brethren's settlement in North Carolina in America, and has paid his promised quota—

For purchase-money	£18:
For the expenses of selecting and surveying the tracts, and preparing the general deeds	15:
For first expenses in developing	30:
For quitrent for the first year to Michaelmas, 1754	5:

a total of Sixty-eight Pounds Sterling, to Herr Cornelius van Laer in Amsterdam, authorized agent of the Society; therefore, to him above mentioned, in consideration of this and future regular payments, in order that he may be entitled to one lot of Two Thousand Acres belonging to the Brethren in North Carolina, this Certificate is issued and delivered in the name of the Society.

London and Amsterdam,

J. Spangenberg,* mpp. Kornelis van Laer."

Registered Book A, page 13.

Jonas Paulus Weiss.

In 1755 each shareholder's proportion of expense for development was £30; in 1756, £25; in 1757, £25. In addition, there was an annual payment of £5 toward the quitrent for Lord Granville, but as this was more than the actual amount due from each 2,000 acres, it was, in 1765, reduced to £3 per annum for each lot.

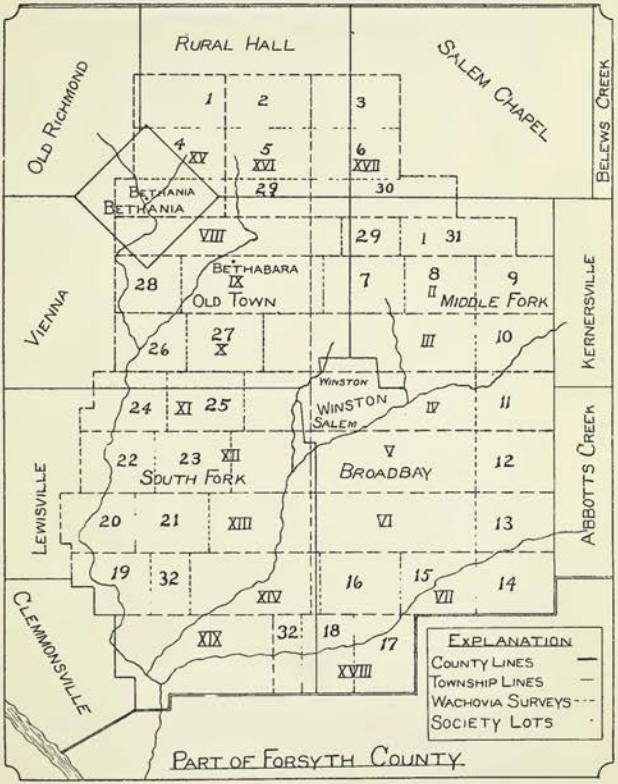
Strangely enough, almost all the contracts and certificates issued by the Society are preserved in the Herrnhut Archives, and after the lapse of more than a century it is possible to compile a complete list of the original shareholders, to note their places of residence, and the order in which they subscribed:

1. 1753. Johann Christoph Sack, Koenigsberg, Germany.

*August Gottlieb Spangenberg frequently used the name "Joseph"—why, is uncertain.

2. 1753. Reinhold Gerhard Georgi, Koenigsberg, Germany.
*3/1. 1754. Georg Gottfried Gambs, Strassburg, France.
3/2. 1754. Johann Leonard Roederer, Strassburg. France.
4. 1754. Hans Ernst von Zezschwiz, Herrnhut, Saxony.
5. 1754. Johann Steinhauer, Riga, Russia.
6/1. 1754. Traugott Bagge, Gottenberg, Sweden.
6/2. 1754. Benjamin Bagge, Gottenberg, Sweden.
7. 1754. Cornelius van Laer, Zeist, Holland.
8. 1754. Abraham Duerninger & Co., Herrnhut, Saxony.
9. 1754. Johanna Sophia von Schweinitz, Herrnhut, Saxony.
10. 1754. Johann Caspar Rosenbaum, Dantzig, Prussia.
11. 1754. Heinrich Giller, Herrnhut, Saxony.
12. 1754. Madtz Jensen Klein, Drammen, Norway.
13. 1754. Johann Steinhauer, Riga, Russia.
14. 1754. C. F. Martens (for Single Brethren's Diaconies), Herrnhut, Saxony.
15. 1754. Johann Hartmann, Hirschberg, Silesia.
16. 1754. Jean Jacque de Schwarz, Coire, Switzerland.
17. 1754. Christian Schmidt, Stettin, Prussia.
18. 1754. Jean Henri de Planta de Wildenberg, Coire, Switzerland.
19/1. 1754. Michael Zellich, Riga, Russia.
19/2. 1754. Johannes Andreas Schmutz, Strassburg, France.
20. 1754. Friedrich von Wiedebach, Herrnhut, Saxony.
21. 1754. Gottfried Clemens, Barby, Saxony.
22. 1754. Johann Christoph Sack, Koenigsberg, Germany.
23. 1754. Johann Erhardt Dehio, Herrnhut, Saxony.

*1,000 acres—½ lot.



RURAL HALL
SALEM CHAPEL
OLD RICHMOND
BELEWS CREEK VIENNA
KERNERSVILLE
LEWISVILLE
ABBOTTS CREEK
CLEMMONSVILLE
BETHANIA
BETHANIA
BETHABARA
OLD TOWN
MIDDLE FORK
WINSTON
SALEM
SOUTH FORK
BROADBAY
1
2
3
4
XV
5
XVI
6
XVII
29
30
VIII
29
1
31
28
IX
7
8
II
9
26
27
X
III
10
24
XI
25
IV
11
22
23
XII
V 12
20
21
XIII
VI
13
19
32
XIV
16
15
VII
14
XIX
32
18
17
XVIII
EXPLANATION
COUNTY LINES TOWNSHIP LINES
WACHOVIA SURVEYS
SOCIETY LOTS
PART OF FORSYTH COUNTY

24. 1754. Friedrich Justin von Bruiningk, Livonia, Russia.
25/1. 1754. Hans Hermann von Damnitz, Guettau, Saxony.
25/2. 1755. Johann Gustav Frey, Errestfer, Russia.
26. 1759. Fredrich Heinrich von Bibra, Modlau, Silesia.

A map of Der North Carolina Land und Colonie Etablissement, dated 1754, shows the Wachovia Tract as divided into "Societaets Land" and "Unitaets Land." The former consists of thirty-two long, narrow lots, running east and west, arranged in three sections, six across the north end of the tract, fifteen on the east side, and eleven on the west. A strip across the south, up the middle, and out to the west border was reserved for the Unity, and included the sites of Bethabara ("Old Town"), Bethania, and Salem. That this Unity land was reserved with a definite purpose appears from a letter written by Peter Boehler in March, 1752, before Spangenberg started on his surveying tour: "In picking out a 100,000 acres of land they should lay it out four square; * * * in the center also, the town or Ort Gemein could be built. And so the inhabitants of the farthest limits of that land would not be above two hours' moderate walk, and one hour's moderate ride from the Ort Gemein." For the time being it was considered that each certificate carried with it the lot bearing the corresponding number, though an actual award of the lots was not made until 1767, as will appear later.

Cornelius van Laer resigned his office as director of the Society in the fall of 1763, his formal release bearing date of October 3d; and Spangenberg, who had many other duties and responsibilities, felt that he could not properly attend to the matter alone, so tendered his resignation also as director. This caused a thorough discussion of Wachovia affairs in the Directorial Conference, a board created by the Synod of 1756 to care for the temporal affairs of the entire Unitas Fratrum. It was decided, July, 1763, to drop the organization of the North Carolina Societaet, as such, and to let the management of the North Carolina settlement revert to the Directorial Conference. Jonas Paulus Weiss, who was a member of the Conference, was put in full charge of the office, being already familiar with its details through his service as bookkeeper. Weiss was directed to notify the shareholders of this change, and to inform them that Frederick William von Marshall had been appointed agent for the Unity in North Carolina, and that on arrival there he would look into the question of the proper plotting of the Society lots, with the intention of their being soon transferred into the possession of the shareholders. The map of 1754 had been pronounced unsatisfactory, on account of the odd shape of the lots, already described; a newer map, 1759, showed the lots more or less square, and seemed far better. After further deliberation it was noticed that the lines of the lots did not coincide with those of the nineteen surveys, and in view of the ever-present danger that failure to pay quitrents might work the forfeiture of part of the land, it was deemed wise to have another map drawn, with due attention to this point. This third map bears date of February 19, 1765, and was like the one finally accepted, except that there were only twenty-two lots, the numbering was different, and there were no lots on the west, but three additional ones on the east, which were later dropped to give more free ground for the central town, Salem, the site for which had been selected just five days before this map was drawn. The Conference minutes of 1765 state that the value of land in North Carolina at that time was £10 to £15 Proclamation money, or £5 to £7:10 Sterling per 100 acres; that is, from 25 cents to 37½ cents per acre. Further, that it was very difficult to lease or rent land, for industrious men wished to own their farms, and had no trouble in getting them, and those who were content to rent were apt to be poor pay. In this year, also, it was decided to put the owners of the Societaet lots into actual possession, but the distribution was postponed until Marshall, who was then in America, could come to Europe and give them the benefit of his personal observations there. The Unity did not wish to run any risk of the lot owners letting their property pass into strange and possibly unfriendly hands, so it was resolved that in case any man wished to sell, the Unity should have the refusal of the lot, at such price as the owner might be able to secure from others.

By this time various changes had occurred in the ownership of the shares. Six had been given up entirely, for various reasons; Gambs (3/1) had died in 1756, and, according to his previously expressed desire, his share was returned to the Unity. This share was reissued to Peter Drews and Johann Nuescke, of Stettin, in 1758, but the latter died, and the former found it difficult to keep up the payments, so in 1763 it was for a second time returned. Zezschwiz (4) gave up his because of the death of the son for whose benefit he had subscribed. Van Laer seems to have dropped his lot (7) because his son was not interested. Rosenbaum (9) returned his in 1755, but after his death Johann Heinrich Koeber took it up again for the benefit of the family. Clemens (21) sold half to Johann Leonard Weinel, Herrnhut, but both found the payments too heavy, and surrendered the shares. Damnitz (25/1) became dissatisfied, and gave up his. Only in the last-named case was there any claim for the money already paid in, which had ranged from £21 to £193. Sack (1 and 22) arranged with the Conference that his lots should be held for the benefit of Mrs. Schiffert and her children, the shares thereafter being entered as "Sack and Schiffert." Georgi's share (2) had passed by will to his two sons-in-law, Bujak and Hojer. The former had died, but his widow and son inherited his half. Zellich's lot (19/1) had passed to his widow, and Schwarz's (16) to his partner, Conradin von Perini. Mrs. von Schweinitz had also died, and one-half of her share (10) was held by her heirs, and one-quarter each by Rennekampf and Walther. Dehio (23) had sold one-half to George Kandler in 1761. Giller (11) had presented his share to Nathaniel and Anna Johanna Seidel, who had given it to the congregation of Bethlehem, Pa., which had sold it to John Leinbach, who took possession of his lot, built a house, and moved into it, June 27, 1765. In February, 1767, Benjamin Bagge and his wife transferred their half share (6/2) to Traugott Bagge, who was going to Salem to live.

At last, on June 30, 1767, the actual distribution of the lots took place, and July 17th, a circular letter was sent out to the shareholders. It explains that the somewhat lengthy delay had been caused by war, and by the death of Count Zinzendorf, and other circumstances affecting the Unity. Hearty thanks are expressed to the "Interessenten" for their aid in promoting this good work, and for their patience through all difficulties and delays. The establishment of the central town, Salem, and the erection of the first houses there, is noted with pleasure. The map of the Societaet lots (see cut, Nos. 1 to 32,) is explained in detail, and also the method by which the lots had been apportioned, so that no question of partiality could be raised. The annual quitrent for 2,000 acres is fixed at £3; and option reserved to the Unity, in case any lot owners wish to sell. The advantage of going in person to settle the lots, or inducing others to go, is set forth; but if any can not do this, the services of Frederick William von Marshall—who is about to return to America and settle in Wachovia as the representative of the Unity—are offered, and it is suggested that owners write direct to him, authorizing him to sell or rent their land as occasion may offer. The circular is dated from Herrnhut, and signed by the Unitaets Vorsteher Collegium" (Board of Wardens), which had succeeded the Directorial Conference in the management of the Unity's financial affairs.

Marshall returned to Wachovia in 1769, and many of the lot owners authorized him to sell their land on the most favorable terms he could secure. At first this was no easy matter. From letters he sent home to the "Collegium" it appears that there was no great demand for land, and that prices were low. Nor could he do anything toward pushing one or another lot whose owners were pressing for sale, for newcomers wished to be near friends and acquaintances, or near a mill, or a schoolhouse, and he must of necessity sell what and where they wished to buy. Gradually the growth of population produced increased demand and increased value of land, and whereas £20, North Carolina currency, per 100 acres was deemed high in 1768, he was able to secure £32, North Carolina currency, per 100 acres in 1772. In the Salem archives there is a small, brown, leather-covered memorandum book, in which Marshall noted various things which he wished to have convenient for reference. There are plots of small tracts bought and sold; items concerning the water supply in Salem; the wages paid surveyors, etc., etc.; but especially pertinent to this sketch is the rate of exchange between the various kinds of currency then in use. This varied from time to time, but in 1772

£—: 15:1 Sterling = £1:6:9 Proclamation, or,
£11:5:6½ Sterling = £20:—:— Proclamation.

An elaborate table of comparative values is not dated, but other entries show that it was written in 1774. By that time Proclamation money, or North Carolina currency, had fallen off a little:

50 hard dollars or pieces of eight =
£18:15:—Pennsylvania currency =
£20:—:— North Carolina currency =
£11:5:— Sterling.

According to this table, the price of land had increased from $50 to $80 per hundred acres, in four years.

As opportunity offered, Marshall sold land belonging to the Unity or to the Societaet; while in Germany the U. V. C. bought lots from those Societaet members who did not care to hold for Marshall's disposal to actual settlers. As the books of the Societaet are not at hand, it is not always possible to tell whether land was sold through the Unity or to the Unity, but the following list gives the names of those who received lots in the distribution of 1767, the number of the corresponding stock certificates, and as accurate a statement of the final disposition of the lots as it has been possible to procure. For the sake of convenience the price, where known, is given in dollars. Not all the lots plotted were required for distribution, and numbers not assigned are here omitted.

Lot No.	Certificate Number.	Name.
1	11	John Leinbach	Deeded to five of his sons, four parts in 1770, one in 1771.
2	26	Baron F. H. von Bibra	Purchased by "Unitaets-Vorsteher-Collegium."
3	6	Traugott Bagge	Deeded to Bagge in 1770.
5	18	Jean Henri Planta de Wildenberg.	Purchased by U. V. C. 1774, for $1022.22.
6	2	Mrs. Bujak and Son; Daniel Heinrich Hojer	The latter transferred his half interest to Mrs. Schiffert in May 1768. Entire lot sold to U. V. C. 1772, for $900.00.
8	16	Conradin von Perini	Sold to Jac. Ulr. Albertini, and by him to U. V. C. 1774, for $773.32.
9	1	Sack and Schiffert	Sold to U. V. C. 1772, for $900.00.
10	9	Von Schweinitz heirs ½; Mrs. Rennekampf, ¼; Walther ¼	Purchased by U. V. C.
12	13	Johann Steinhauer	Passed by will to his son Daniel. 411¼ acres sold to Frederick Miller, 1774; balance to Magdalene Rigelmann, of Riga, 1788. She sold to the U. V. C., 1789, for $1125.
13	15	Johann Hartmann	Given to the U. V. C. in 1768. In 1769 sold by Marshall for the Broadbay settlement.
14	20	Friedrich von Wiedebach	Passed to heirs. Sold to U. V. C. 1774.
15	5	Johann Steinhauer	More than half sold for his heirs. Remainder purchased by U. V. C., in 1789.
16	3½ 25½	Johann Roederer—½ John Gustav Frey, ½	Roederer sold his half interest to U. V. C. in 1773, for $430.92. Frey's half also bought by Unity.
18	17	Christian Schmidt	Passed to his heirs. Sold for them by Marshall, 1772, for $1600.00.
21	19½ 19½	Zellich's widow—½ Johann A. Schmutz ½	Both sold to U. V. C., the latter in 1773.
22	8	Abraham Duerninger & Co.	Sold to Traugott Bagge, Sept., 1774.
23	12	M. J. Klein	Purchased by U. V. C.
25	14	C. F. Martens (for single Brethren's Diaconies)	Part sold on their account; balance bought by U. V. C. in 1812.
26	22	Sack and Schiffert	Sold to U. V. C. 1772, for $900.00.
27	24	F. J. von Bruinmgk	Purchased by U. V. C.
30	23	Johann E. Dehio ½ George Kandler½	Purchased by U. V. C.

It will be noted that Traugott Bagge was the only one of the original shareholders who took a deed to his lot, and himself conducted its sale. Having settled permanently in Salem, he became one of the leading citizens of that central town, and the competency which he gradually gained was doubtless founded on the 2,000-acre lot which he took in the Society, and the additional 2,000 acres he bought from Abraham Duerninger. John Leinbach was the only man in the 1767 list who built a house on his lot and actually settled there.

Marshall's memorandum book states that the money expended by each Societaet lot owner to Michaelmas, 1772, amounted to £244 Sterling—$1,085.50. It is, therefore, evident that few if any of the lot owners received the equivalent of the sum invested, and had the Societaet been organized as a speculative scheme the shareholders would have had good cause to feel disappointed. It is quite certain, however, that most of the men and women interested cared more for the cause than for their pocketbooks. And "Der North Carolina Land und Colonie Etablissement" was unquestionably a success. Made possible by the generous subscriptions of these friends, borne loyally on their shoulders through the early difficult years, liberally endowed with the lands which they allowed to slip back into its hands as it was able to receive them, the enterprise, at the beginning of the Revolutionary War, was becoming so prosperous as to awaken the jealousy of less successful neighbors.

Marshall was called to Europe in 1775 to attend a General Synod of the Moravian Church, and the war which broke out between England and the Colonies prevented his return for four years. Of the trials and difficulties of those years for the Moravian settlers in Wachovia no mention need here be made. Under all circumstances they were wonderfully preserved, and they emerged from those trying times but little the worse for their experiences. The most serious danger came at the close of the war, when, under the Confiscation Act, many claimed that the Moravian title to Wachovia had been forfeited because it was vested in James Hutton, an Englishman, and therefore an alien. By order of U. V. C., Hutton transferred his title, by deed of lease and release, to Marshall, October 28, 1778, but the validity of the transfer was questioned on account of the date, although Marshall had become a naturalized citizen of North Carolina during his residence in Salem.

Marshall returned to Wachovia in the fall of 1779, and the matter was brought before the General Assembly of North Carolina in 1782. There it was argued that Hutton held title only "in trust for the Unitas Fratrum," that title had been transferred to Marshall subject to the same trust, and that peaceful Moravians who had been living in Wachovia since before the war ought to be protected in their property rights. To this view the General Assembly agreed, and an act was passed, bearing date of April 13th, which confirmed to Marshall the title to Wachovia and certain other lands in North Carolina "in trust as aforesaid."

The custom of vesting title in an individual for the benefit of the Church continued for many years, as the Church was not an incorporated body. Each "proprietor" was required to make a will, whereby at his death the estate would pass to another Moravian, selected by the U. V. C. Sometimes the estates were transferred by deed, when the ruling Board thought the best interests of Wachovia required it. There were eight Proprietors of Wachovia between August 7, 1753, and December 1, 1877: James Hutton, London; Frederick William von Marshall, Salem; Christian Lewis Benzien, Salem; John Gebhard Cunow, Bethlehem; Lewis David von Schweinitz, Bethlehem; William Henry Van Vleck, New York City; Charles F. Kluge, Salem; Emil A. de Schweinitz, Salem. On December 1, 1877, the last named deeded to "The Board of Provincial Elders of the Southern Province of the Moravian Church," all the property remaining unsold in his hands, this Board having been incorporated, and therefore being able to take over the title, the land having been bought by the Southern Province from the Unity at large. To-day scarcely fifty acres of all the tract remains unsold.

And how great the change in one hundred and fifty-seven years! From the "Etablissement" with its Unitaet and Societaet lots, its few scattered settlers and three small villages, to Forsyth County, with its townships, the bustling Twin City of Winston-Salem, the railways, macadam roads, thriving villages, well-tilled farms, and comfortable country homes. Surely the fathers planned more wisely than they knew, for the old "Etablissement" has become one of the centers of prosperity in the Old North State.

GEORGE DURANT.

BY CAPTAIN S. A. ASHE.

The events of the distant past in the forests of Virginia and Carolina are largely veiled in obscurity. In June, 1635, a grant was issued to Richard Bennett for land in Nansemond County, "due for the importation of forty persons," among the names of whom was that of William Durant. The actual settlement may have preceded the grant some years.

In 1644 a new law was passed in Virginia, requiring all persons officiating in any church service to use the Book of Common Prayer, and this led to the removal of Bennett and many of his colony to Providence, near Annapolis, in Maryland. Apparently Durant was of the number, although the name was sometimes erroneously written Durand, and Duren. At Providence he was a landowner, an "elder" and a "leading man." About 1656 the settlement of Independents at Providence was broken up, and the use of the Book of Common Prayer in any church being at that time prohibited by law in Virginia, many of Bennett's followers returned to that province.

The entry in George Durant's Bible is that he was born October 1, 1632; and it is surmised that he was a son of William Durant, and born in Nansemond County, Virginia; and that his youth was passed there and in Maryland. On January 4, 1659, being then 26 years of age, he married Ann Marwood, in Northumberland County, where the Potomac comes into Chesapeake Bay. The service was performed by Reverend David Lindsey; but whether Parson Lindsey was of the Church of England or not is now unknown.

Just about the time of this marriage—1659—a number of adventurous spirits settled on the great Sound of Carolina, buying their lands from the Indians. Among these first settlers were John Battle, Dr. Thomas Relfe, Roger Williams, Thomas Jarvis, Captain John Jenkins and Samuel Pricklove. George Durant accompanied them, but did not at once locate. He spent two years in exploring the country and examining locations, and then bought from the Indian king a tract at the mouth of the Perquimans River, that has since been known as Durant's Neck, his deed bearing date March 1, 1661. He then purchased an adjoining tract for George Catchmaid, Gent., of Ipswich, who brought into the colony thirty dependents. Others brought in nearly as many; John Harvey seventeen, Dr. Relfe fifteen, Captain Jarvis fourteen—and so on.

Within a year after Durant had located, Governor Berkley, of Virginia, went to England to pay his court to the restored monarch; and while there he received instructions to require the settlers on Carolina Sound, who had purchased their land from the Indians, to take out grants from Virginia, although that region was in the territory granted many years earlier to Sir Robert Heath, under the name of Carolina.

Catchmaid, being in Virginia, became aware of this order, and promised Durant, while getting a grant for himself, also to get one for him. Instead, however, he took out a single grant in his own name for the two adjoining tracts which Durant had bought from the Indian king, but agreed with Durant to make him title for his part at some convenient season.

In the meantime Durant had built a home for his family on his new possessions, and thither had come Mrs. Durant and her children, for on December 24, 1659, she had borne to her husband a son, George, and on February 15, 1661, a daughter, Elizabeth. These first children were certainly born in Virginia, but perhaps their third child, John, born December 26, 1662, and the subsequent children, were native Carolinians. And also a home was built on Durant's Neck for Catchmaid, Gentleman, who lived there with his wife, the nearest neighbors of the Durants. Being a man of great consequence, Catchmaid was at once chosen Speaker of the Assembly, and he had much business on hand; so much that he never settled his matters with Durant, and they were unsettled when he died. However, as he was Speaker and a leader, he may have been suddenly killed in an Indian war that broke out in 1666. At any rate, at his death there were accounts to be settled between his estate and Durant, and title to Durant's home passed to the heirs of Catchmaid. There being no children, his widow took possession of Catchmaid's estate, but soon married Timothy Biggs, who made up the account, and agreed to make the title to Durant, but likewise died without doing so. Many years afterwards, when Durant himself was dead, Edward Catchmaid, of London, claimed the property as nephew and heir of Catchmaid, and Durant's sons brought a suit in chancery to enjoin him. The evidence in this suit is preserved; and from it some of the above facts have been gleaned.

The historian John Lawson, who was in Albemarle forty years after the settlement, says that "the first who came found the winters mild and the soil fertile beyond expectation; that everything came by nature, and the husbandman lived almost void of care and free from the fatigues of providing necessaries; that they were men of substance, each attended by a considerable retinue of servants." As Durant quickly built his own house and appears to have been a man of substance when his family moved to Carolina, they had such comforts as an abode in the forest could afford. And as the settlement grew, his residence became one of the houses where the courts were held, and where the inhabitants met on public occasions. Although in the wilderness of a new country, he was by no means isolated, but enjoyed the association of congenial neighbors.

From the first the settlers were prosperous, and made good crops of tobacco, which found a ready market in Virginia and New England, yielding in return cloths and household goods and ample domestic supplies. Indeed, there was both a business and social connection with New England, as well as Virginia, some of the settlers coming from Massachusetts; and there was much trade between the two colonies. But this trade was in contravention of the English navigation laws passed to promote the commercial interests of the mother country. One of these laws forbade the importation of any manufactures except through the merchants of London, and another laid a tax on tobacco imported into England, for the private purse of the king; and another, passed in 1672, levied a tax on tobacco shipped from one colony to another. The first effort to enforce these laws in Albemarle was made in 1675. It raised a great commotion among the planters, as it lessened the value of their tobacco and interfered with their obtaining the manufactured articles they were supplied with by the Massachusetts traders. Durant himself was largely interested in tobacco, and the people, aroused by him and other leaders, were ready to rebel against the enforcement of these laws. Just then also a war broke out with the Meherrin Indians; and Captain Zack Gilliam brought his vessel, "Carolina," into Albemarle, well supplied with ammunition and firearms, at the very moment when needed.

The people first marched against the Indians and subdued them, and then they forced the Governor to let up somewhat in the enforcement of the navigation laws. Being "in arms, they were persuaded by George Durant, Valentine Bird, the collector, and one White, with others, to force the Governor to remit to the New England men three farthings per lb. The said Durant having then a considerable quantity of tobacco to receive, which he was to ship to New England."

Later, the Assembly deposed the Governor, and established a government after "their own model," and Durant was one of the leaders in the matter. The next year, Speaker Eastchurch, being in England, the Lords Proprietors appointed him Governor, but Durant was himself in London* later, and declared to some of the Proprietors that Eastchurch should not be Governor, and threatened to revolt. (C. R. I., 287-8.) Captain Gilliam was also in Londan, and Durant returned on his vessel, then well armed. Whatever were the objections to Eastchurch, Durant was as determined as he was bold. He knew his people and had confidence that they would follow where he led. His purpose to revolt soon became known in Albemarle. On the first day of December, 1677, the "Carolina" again came into port, with Durant on board. A "New England Ambassador" had also been among the people, stirring them up on this very matter of the tobacco tax and the restrictive trade legislation that bore so hard on the colonists.

Eastchurch not having arrived, acting Governor Miller, aware of Durant's purpose to revolt, went on board the "Carolina," and putting a pistol to Durant's head, arrested him; but the revolutionists did not dally. All of the officers who did not fall in with them were speedily taken, and confined in log houses, ten feet square, specially built for their accommodation. Durant, Culpeper and their associates, having found the great seal of the colony, now carried on government in Albemarle in a regular and orderly administration, electing assemblies and establishing courts and making laws as if they had the sanction of the Lords Proprietors. When at length Governor Eastchurch reached Virginia, a force was raised by Durant to oppose his entering into Albemarle, but the Governor unexpectedly died with fever, and the peace of the colony was not further disturbed.

* It is said that George Durant had a brother, John Durant, living in London. In D'Israeli's Curiosities of Literature there is this statement: "There was a most bloody-minded 'maker of working balls,' as one John Durant is described, appointed a Lecturer by the House of Commons—the Long Parliament—who always left out of the Lord's Prayer, 'as we forgive them that trespass against us,' and substituted, 'Lord, since Thou has now drawn Thy sword, let it not be sheathed again till it be glutted in the blood of the malignants,' the malignants being the cavaliers." This person, or chaplain of the House of Commons, may have belonged to the same connection. As the name is found sometimes written "Duren," the emphasis would seem to have been on the first syllable.

In 1672, William Edmundson, a follower of George Fox, had visited Albemarle and found one Quaker there, Henry Phillips, but that faith then took root, and when these disturbances began there was quite a number of Friends, who refused to aid the revolutionists, and sympathized with Biggs, the tax collector, who was himself a Quaker. These complained bitterly of the treatment Durant gave them, and some of them fled to Virginia because of Durant's oppressions, as they alleged; and they sent a strong petition and remonstrance to the Proprietors against Durant's oppression and persecution.

In view of these facts, now well established by contemporaneous documents, it seems odd to read in some histories that Albemarle was originally settled by Quakers, and by others fleeing from Virginia to escape religious intolerance and oppression, and that Durant himself was a Quaker. The settlement, says Lawson, was by wealthy planters; but one Quaker was in Albemarle in 1672, and later Durant was regarded by the Friends as their persecutor and oppressor.

Eventually this revolt against Miller and Eastchurch was legalized by the Lords Proprietors, and Jenkins, who had cooperated with Durant and the other leaders, was appointed Governor, and Durant Attorney-General. But the Proprietors could not give immunity against the navigation laws, and the English government was too strong to be resisted; so it soon came about that the navigation laws and tobacco taxes were submitted to, although doubtless there were constant evasions. It was not until a century later, and then by a united continent, that the power of Parliament to tax America was definitely determined by force of arms. What was patriotism in 1776 would have been treason in 1676.

During the succeeding administrations, Durant doubtless exerted the influence that was inseparable from his character, talents and means. His residence was still a meeting place for the inhabitants, and there the court of "Berkeley Precinct" was held. By the commission of Governor Harvey, in 1679, "Georjius Durant vel Alexandrus, Lillington,"—justice, was to inquire into all offences, etc.; and Durant held the Court of Berkeley, afterwards Perquimans, precinct.

After some years, Seth Sothell, one of the Proprietors who had been appointed Governor, reached Albemarle, and soon began a course of oppression, seeking wealth at the expense of the people. Among other allegations made against Sothell was this: Richard Humphrey died, leaving a will in which Thomas Pollock was named executor. Sothell would not allow the will to be proved, but took Humphrey's property into his own hands. Pollock prepared to go to England to complain, and Sothell threw him into prison.

Another allegation was that he imprisoned George Durant upon pretense that Durant had said something reflecting on him, and then compelled him to give a bond while in durance, and afterwards, on pretense of the bond, seized on Durant's estate and converted it to his own use.

These high-handed outrages were more than the people would stand, and in the subsequent proceedings Durant certainly played a part with the spirit of his younger days. It was about the time of "the glorious revolution of 1688" in England, when the people modified their constitution, called in William to supplant James II, and limited the descent of the crown. In Albemarle, they were equally resolute. They seized the Governor, and, following the precedent of 1676, incarcerated him in a ten-foot log house, and proposed to send him to England for trial. Sothell, however, entreated them not to deport him to England, but, instead, to try him themselves, promising that he would submit to the judgment of the Assembly. The election was held, the Assembly met, and on the trial he was found guilty on the above and other charges, and the Assembly gave judgment disqualifying him from ever holding the office of Governor, and banishing him from Albemarle for twelve months.

In this episode, as Durant was involved personally, he, as well as Pollock, doubtless was a chief actor, and the management and outcome of it are creditable not merely to his determined spirit, but to his wisdom and moderation. If there was an excess of turbulence ten years earlier, now the proceedings seem to have been conducted with decorum, as well as with energy and force. While the details have not been preserved, there must, first, have been an association, and a directory with power to manage, and an administration provided for. And it was this directory or administration that imprisoned the Governor and proposed to send him a prisoner to England; and it was this same body that entered into the agreement with Sothell to have the new General Assembly try him for his offenses. The preliminary steps, the conduct of the affair, the trial and the judgment, constitute an historical episode illustrative of the high capacity of the inhabitants of Albemarle to govern themselves, and with decorum and orderly administration to arrest oppression and maintain their liberties; and as Durant was necessarily a controlling spirit in the affair, the moderation of the proceedings reflect great credit on him for wisdom and prudence as well as for spirit and patriotism.

While Durant does not seem to have been employed by the Lords Proprietors in their government after this period, yet doubtless he continued to exert a personal influence during the remainder of his life. He died earlier than July, 1693, and his will was admitted to probate on February 6, 1694. He left descendants who have in every generation been among the most respectable and influential citizens of North Carolina.

HATORASK.

BY JAQUES BUSBEE.

As that mighty ocean river, the Gulf Stream, rushes hot from the straits of Florida around the corner of the continent, it meets full in the face the cold waters of the North Atlantic as they roll in an unbroken sweep from the frozen rim of the world.

With impact primordial the sands, swept along by the currents, shift, swirl and precipitate more slowly but not less surely than the vast cumulations of vapor forever hanging above the Diamond Shoals, and glorious as a vision of Walhallah. The three-mile stretch of flat beach forming the cape pushes twenty miles further to sea beneath the flood—a fringe of horror surrounding smiling, semi-tropical forests and sedges, like a necklace of scalps and skulls around some savage maiden. Yesterday, to-day and forever the quicksands of the Diamond demand their toll; human courage is unavailing, modern science is powerless to oppose it. A ragged end of the world in flux, to the cockle shells of commerce venturing within its dynamic circle, it is and ever will be "the graveyard of the American merchant marine."

In the year of grace, 1584, two barques, bearing the first English adventurers to set foot on the American continent, borne north on the current of the Gulf Stream, sighted land across the flashing breakers of the Diamond Shoals. A low-lying line of blue behind ramparts of sinuous golden sand hills, it seemed a strange and mysterious world to these English after two months of hardship and hope.

But no chance of landing presented itself. "The second of July we found shoal water, where we smelled so sweet and so strong a smell as if we had been in the midst of some delicate garden abounding with all kinds of odoriferous flowers, by which we were assured that the land could not be far distant; and keeping good watch and by bearing slack sail, the fourth of the same month we arrived upon the coast, which we supposed to be a continent and firm land, and we sailed along the same a hundred and twenty English miles before we could find any entrance or river issuing into the sea." So writes Captain Barlowe. Six years later Hatorask is again the setting of the fifth and final act of Sir Walter Raleigh's tragedy of the first attempt to colonize America by Englishmen.

The story of Roanoke Island has been thrashed and rethrashed by historians till nothing remains to tell except the sphinx-like closing of the last chapter—the Lost Colony—and this remains an enigma to all, historian and poet alike. It is properly a part of Hatorask history also. Croatan, that mystic land and vanishing point of the Lost Colony is generally considered to be the mainland across Croatan Sound from Roanoke Island, but such is not the case—and John Lawson is responsible for the error. Let us see.

John White writes most vividly of his return to Roanoke and the desolation he found there. "* * * We let fall our grapnel near the shore and sounded with a trumpet call, and afterwards many familiar English tunes of songs, and called to them friendly, but we had no answer, * * * and as we entered up the sandy bank, upon a tree in the very brow thereof were curiously carved these fair Roman letters, C R O, which letters presently we knew to signify the place where I should find the planters seated, according to a secret token agreed upon between them and me at my last departure from them; * * * therefore at my departure from them in A. N. 1587, I willed them, that if they should happen to be distressed in any of those places, that then they should carve over the letters or name a cross X in this form; but we found no such sign of distress. And having well considered this we passed toward the place where they were left in sundry houses, but we found the houses taken down, and the place very strongly enclosed with a high palisado of great trees with curtains and flankers very fort like; and one of the chief trees or posts at the right side of the entrance had the bark taken off, and five feet from the ground in fair capital letters was graven C R O A T A N, without any cross or sign of distress."

Then he goes on to describe the dismantled and deserted wreck of the fort, with rusted iron fowlers and lockershot scattered and overgrown with grass; and at length he comes upon his chests, buried and dug up, and you see the man's selfishness: "* * * where we found five chests that had been carefully hidden by the planters, and of the same chests three were my own, and about the place many of my things spoiled and broken, and my books torn from the covers, the frames of some of my pictures and maps rotten and spoiled with rain, and my armor almost eaten through with rust; this could be no other than the deed of the savages, * * * but although it grieved me to see such spoil of my goods, yet on the other side I greatly joyed that I had safely found a certain token of their safe being at Croatan, which is the place where Manteo was born, and the savages of the Island our friends."

So with more rough weather and the loss of all but one anchor and some water casks, White suggests that they leave the colonists (his daughter and grandchild among them) to the savage friends at Croatan and winter in the West Indies, "with hope to make two rich voyages in one" and capture golden galleons.

So much for White—we have evidence of the colony at Croatan—but where was Croatan?

John Lawson was the first to set down as Croatan on his map the mainland across from Roanoke Island, and he no doubt reasoned that as they had agreed to move fifty miles "into the main" before White departed for England, and as they left the word "Croatan" carved on a tree as their destination, that they had sought the nearest point on the continent, and that was of course Croatan.

But White did not so understand. To him the mainland across from Roanoke Island was Desamonquepenk and Secotan, the Island of Croatan lying some sixty odd miles to the south, for he had proposed to sail to it on the open sea. On White's own map, published by DeBry, he gives the name of Croatan to the banks from Cape Hatorask all the way down to Ocracoke Inlet (Wokoken next adjoining).

Hatorask was the home of Manteo's people, the friendly tribe to which he led the colony when supplies and help failed and treacherous Wanchese with his following pressed hard.

When White returned to England it was agreed that the colony was to move "fifty miles into the main," but when supplies ran short and no help came, what was the wisdom of going further away from possible aid? It would be madness!

The natural and sensible move would be to the banks, with the hope of sighting some English ship. Sir Francis Drake had sailed up the coast, and the first news of his arrival came to Ralph Lane from the man whom he had stationed seaward for the expected supply ships. To send a man to the Croatan of Lawson's map would be ridiculous, for the ocean can not be seen from there even with a modern field glass.

Drake had relieved and carried back to England the former colony under Lane when reduced to the last extremity. So the Lost Colony doubtless took their only chance, and let Manteo lead them to his own friendly people on Hatteras banks, where the opportunity of sighting some vessel was greatest. There lived the only friendly tribe, the only place of comparative safely in a wild and savage country. Furthermore, the inlets by which vessels entered the sounds lay on either side of these banks. It was the point of vantage, the outlook where it would be impossible for a vessel to slip by without being seen. In Sir Richard Grenville's report of the diurnal of his voyage are these items: "The 26th we came to anchor at Wokoken. The 6th July * * * Captain Aubry and Captain Boniton, the same day were sent to Croatan where they found two of our men left there, with thirty others by Captain Raymond some twenty days before. The 8th, Captain Aubry and Captain Boniton returned with two of our men found by them to us at Wokoken. * * * The 21st, our fleet anchoring at Wokoken we weighed anchor for Hatorask (the present New Inlet), the 27th our fleet anchored at Hatorask and there we rested." Knowing the country, the time it would take sail or row-boats to make these trips, the dates given are most significant.

There is more land at Hatorask than at any other point along the banks, the forests covering some fifty square miles, to this day teeming with game. And it was undeniably here that the colony merged into the Indian tribe (the nursing mother of the Croatans), which afterwards, in accordance with Indian customs, moved farther south, and reaching the narrow and shallow waters of Core Sound, crossed over to the main land.

Hatorask is the vanishing point of the Lost Colony. They went there in 1587 or 1588, and a little more than a hundred years after, Lawson writes of them, in 1709: "A further confirmation of this we have from the Hatteras Indians (note that he calls them Hatteras Indians), who either then lived on Roanoke Island or much frequented it. These tell us that several of their ancestors were white people and could talk in a book as we do; the truth of which is confirmed by gray eyes being found frequently amongst these Indians and no others. They value themselves extremely for their affinity to the English, and are ready to do them all friendly offices.

It is probable that this settlement miscarried for want of timely supplies from England; or through the treachery of the natives, for we may reasonably suppose that the English were forced to cohabit with them for relief and conversation; and that in process of time they conformed themselves to the manners of their Indian relatives; and thus we see how apt human nature is to degenerate."

On Hatteras banks to-day are disconnected scraps of evidence to lend color to this belief. Traversing the sandy roads, hedged with youpon and holly, palm and pine, with houses flamboyantly painted and prosperous with lightning rods, people pass with swarthy skins, high cheek bones, straight black hair, and with that peculiar modeling of nose and mouth distinctly Indian.

And if one should stop to talk with these friendly, hospitable people, the use of many old obsolete words and phrases of Chaucer's time would be noted; quaint turns of expression, words used with a significance they had long ago, but now spoken with a modern meaning.

Most houses are set in a clearing sufficient for a yard, but little attempt at beautifying is made. A garden is a rarity. Fishing, hunting, oystering—and a man lives well.

There is little land on the banks with a clear title. The best titles are possession. At Trent where some families lived who were known as "Red Men," but who strenuously objected to being called Indians, are examples of the puncheon fence—simply an Indian stockade made by driving down stakes close together.

All this is but indirect evidence, yet it forces belief and is probable. Still you go back to the thought that here on Hatteras, though the evidence is slight and circumstantial, the Lost Colony merged and blended with the Indian tribe that saved them from slaughter.

In the hook of the cape, leaning desperately away from the wind, in an attitude of hopelessly arrested flight, stands a giant live oak, with a copper spike driven deep into its dead trunk some four feet from the ground.

It is Teach's Oak; and back in the forest, on the summit of a high sand hill, defended by well-nigh impenetrable jungles, are three deep pits where ever-credulous cupidity has dug for buried treasure. Legend says that it was found, but by whom is still a mystery. Teach, whose stamping ground was Hatteras, lurked in the calm hook of the cape for vessels distressed by a northeast gale and the current of the Gulf Stream, unable to double the cape till the wind should shift. Many are the tales and traditions he has left on the banks, and to this day, in wild weather, his phantom ship is seen sailing safely over the mad waters of the Diamond Shoals, to send to everlasting doom some crew in dire distress. Who knows how many corpses he has added to the multitudinous drowned of many lands and times, who shriek with the wind at the horror of that moving, shifting sand, that lies in wait beneath the waves but never shows its hydra head!

Teache was finally captured and killed further down the banks, at Ocracoke Inlet, and his head, nailed to the mast of Lieutenant Maynard's boat, was carried in triumph to Bath Town and presented to his reputed friend, Governor Eden. Yet a guilty thrill of admiration rises in the heart (since Teache is at the safe distance of two hundred years) for a man of such strong personality, strength and initiative, and this North Carolina pirate will always be mentioned with deprecatory pride.

From cape to inlet, Hatteras is ten miles long, a series of high sand hills, densely wooded and combed with parallel sedges, running from east to west the entire length of the island. The woods disappear at Trent and the western end is low and wet, the marsh dividing almost equally with the beach, which encroaches year by year—fifty years ago trees waving two miles to sea where now porpoise play. Houses are perched on any dry ground that remains, nestling among scrubby, stunted live oaks and water bushes and alive with mocking birds. Where beach and marsh converge to a bare point of sand at the inlet, are traces of Forts Clark and Hatteras. They were sand redoubts held in place by turf from the adjoining marshes, and pitifully inadequate to the attacking squadron of Butler's thirteen men-of-war. The force in Fort Hatteras was 718 men; the action lasted three hours and twenty minutes. Over three thousand shells were fired by the bombarding fleet during that time, twenty-eight in a minute falling within the fort.

The Confederate guns, old style smooth-bore pieces, were entirely out of range, and after a futile attempt, ceased firing altogether. This action occurred on August 29, 1861, and was the first naval victory, or victory of any sort for that matter, won by the Federals (if the pounding into destruction of a well-nigh helpless fort could be called a victory). This caused great rejoicing at the North, for it put the entire eastern section of the State at the mercy of the Federals.

One beautiful October day, tropically warm, we drove a shaggy little sun-burned beach pony and two-wheeled cart up to Trent to see the sand hills fantastically piled up by the wind, and changing shape more slowly but not less surely than the clouds of heaven, smothering the woods steadily and stealthily as they blow inland. The sea before us was oil-slick—only an undulation of white on the beach showed its breathing. We strolled over the wind-swept wastes of Trent, looked at tombs overturned, and bones exposed by the moving sands, and I picked up two teeth filled with gold.

"I can remember when these people were buried," said my friend; "they have not been dead over forty years; but when I was a boy a skeleton blew out at King's Point that was over six feet long, and it had strips of metal all over the upper part of the body. No—it was not a coffin. It must have been armor. We boys sold it for junk. It was copper."

And uprises a vision of the Lost Colony, blended with Manteo's people, living on these banks, hunting among these forests the deer and game that still abound; fishing in the shallow waters of Pamlico Sound; and the old free life of man, before civilization threw her restraining arms around him, surging back through his blood, blended with the Indian, that made the call of the wild irresistible. You behold the old people, crushed by hope abandoned of ever sighting some English ship, and nursing memories of home forever lost, as they see their children growing up more Indian than English; of the bitter tears that fall upon their comrades in adventure and misfortune as they lay them down in the armor so long and bravely worn, in a hole scraped in the sand.

THE TRUTH ABOUT JACKSON'S BIRTHPLACE.

BY BRUCE CRAVEN.

"Living, Homer begged for bread;
A dozen cities begged for Homer, dead."

This quaint and true saying is apt in connection with the dispute regarding the birthplace of Andrew Jackson. Living, the seventh President was not partial to, nor loved by, either of the Carolinas. He was the bitter enemy of South Carolina's greatest statesman, and as President defied the Carolinas and Georgia in the Cherokee Indian land troubles when, in answer to a Supreme Court decision in favor of the States, he said: "John Marshall has made his decision, now let him enforce it." These things account for the fact that there was no discussion or investigation of the location of the birthplace during Jackson's life, and consequently he died with the false belief that South Carolina was his "native State," as he often said.

That he believed he was born in South Carolina is without doubt, and there is no dispute in the whole story except as to one detail. In 1765, six sisters, with their husbands and families, landed in Charleston from the old world, and settled in the "Waxhaws," an undefined section between the present towns of Monroe, N. C., and Lancaster, S. C. These sisters, whose maiden name was Hutchison, were related to many others of their own name who had settled in the same section, and their husbands were Andrew Jackson, Sr., who settled near the site now known as the old Pleasant Grove camp-ground, nine miles inside North Carolina; James Crawford, who settled on Waxhaw Creek, about a mile inside South Carolina; George McKemey, near the Crawford home, but in North Carolina; John Leslie, Samuel Leslie, and James Crow.

In February of 1767, Andrew Jackson, Sr., died, leaving his widow and two children. His body was buried in the old Waxhaw cemetery, in Lancaster County, though there is nothing by which his grave can be identified, and no evidence to prove he was buried there except the settled traditions of the neighborhood, which seem to be specific and reliable. Soon after his death, his widow, with her two sons, left their North Carolina home to go to make their home with the Crawfords, who were the wealthiest of all the families mentioned. The road they traveled passed in sight of the McKemey home, where lived her sister Margaret.

To this point there is no dispute, but right here is the dividing line.

THE NORTH CAROLINA CLAIM.

Mrs. Jackson stopped to visit her sister Margaret, and there, in the night of March 15, 1767, Andrew Jackson was born. Three weeks later they located at the Crawford home in South Carolina, where Jackson lived until grown, then studied law in Salisbury, and located in the western part of North Carolina, which was later made into the new State of Tennessee.

This statement of the case rests upon three pieces of evidence: First is the settled traditions of the families above mentioned, some living in one State and some in the other. Colonel S. H. Walkup gathered their testimony and published it in the Wadesboro Argus of September 23, 1858. There were fourteen statements, representing all the families, and all agreeing that Jackson was born in the McKemey house, and that there were present in the house at the time Mrs. Elizabeth McWhorter, Mrs. Sarah Leslie, Mrs. Sarah Lathen, Mrs. Covsar, and Mr. and Mrs. McKemey. All of these people died before 1800, and their accounts of the incident were given by their children and grandchildren, who remembered well the oft-repeated story. There was no discrepancy in any of the many accounts.

There is no denial of the Walkup evidence, and all that is said in rebuttal is that Colonel Walkup led his witnesses by leading questions to say just what he wanted them to say. The character of the witnesses, however, is proven, and this, with the fact that some of them were South Carolinians, is sufficient reply to the charge. The original publication is in my possession, and was well and carefully prepared. At the time of the publication there was some doubt as to whether or not the McKemey home was in North Carolina, and this was not finally settled until recent years, when the land records in Register's books 11 and 14, in the Mecklenburg court-house were investigated and the records found proving completely that the McKemey tract of land was deeded to him in 1766, and deeded by him to Thomas Crawford in 1792, and in each case the residence of McKemey was given as Mecklenburg County, North Carolina.

The other point in the evidence is the statement of Jackson that he was born in the McKemey house, though believing at the time that the house was in South Carolina.

SOUTH CAROLINA'S CONTENTION.

For the South Carolina side of the case, there has never been but one solitary bit of evidence, and that is that Jackson himself thought he was born in South Carolina. Various biographers, etc., are cited to prove the claim, but in each case it is plain that they relied solely upon Jackson's erroneous belief, and nothing has ever been cited that was not founded on that error. Nothing could more conclusively show the utter worthlessness of the claim than the dependence put in a map of that section, made by J. Boykin in 1820. A cross mark on the map is made to designate the birthplace of Jackson, on the testimony, of course, of Jackson's own statement; but in the same map the Waxhaw Creek is made to rise in South Carolina, though, as any one can find out for himself, it rises three miles inside of North Carolina. If J. Boykin was not accurate as to the location of a considerable creek, the location of which was a certainty, how could he locate the birthplace, about which he knew nothing?

So there is no evidence whatever except Jackson's. He believed he was "a native of South Carolina," but his testimony, without any proof, would be worthless when opposed to the real evidence above set forth. Jackson, himself, knew he was born in McKemey's cabin, and said so to James Faulkner, when both were spending the night in the cabin. (See Parton's Biography, volume 1, page 55.) This leaves his own testimony, which is all South Carolina has, as being his belief that he was born "in the McKemey cabin in South Carolina." He said one time that he was born "on the Crawford place," and the McKemey place was a part of the Crawford place and was naturally so considered, as Crawford was prosperous and McKemey was not; and the place was sold by McKemey to a Crawford, so at the time Jackson made the statement, it was the Crawford place. He never said he was born in the Crawford home, in which he was raised, and his only definite statement as to his birthplace was that he was born in the McKemey cabin. That specific declaration outweighs all his various statements that he was born in South Carolina, for he believed the McKemey cabin was in South Carolina.

CONCLUSION.

This is the plain statement of the whole dispute about the much-discussed question. The North Carolina claim is based on documentary facts. The South Carolina claim is based solely on the unsupported opinion of Jackson, whose opinion alone would leave the presumption in favor of North Carolina. All else that has been written or will be written on the subject is vain repetition and "words, words, words."

BIOGRAPHICAL, GENEALOGICAL AND HISTORICAL MEMORANDA.

COMPILED AND EDITED BY MRS. E. E. MOFFITT.

ADELAIDE L. FRIES.

Miss Adelaide Fries, the author of "Der North Carolina Land und Colonie Etablissement," in this number of THE BOOKLET, was born in Salem, that quiet, quaint and charming old Moravian town in North Carolina, settled in 1765.

She is the daughter of John William Fries (1846) and Agnes S. de Schweinitz, daughter of Bishop Emil de Schweinitz, of the Moravian Church. She is the granddaughter of Francis Fries (1812-1863) and Lizzette (Vogler) Fries, daughter of John Vogler, Sr.

She is the great-granddaughter of William Fries (1775-), who emigrated from Germany to North Carolina in 1809 and here married Elizabeth Nissen. She is also a descendant on the maternal side of Count Zinzendorf, of Germany.

The Fries family is of German descent, and trace their lineage from the middle of the seventeenth century. They were distinguished types of the church of the "Unity of Brethren," the official name of which was "Unitas Fratrum," a body of earnest men who agreed to accept the Bible as their only standard of faith and practice, and established a strict discipline which should keep their lives in the simplicity, purity and brotherly love of the early apostolic church.

Miss Fries is a graduate of Salem Academy, is President of the Salem Alumnæ Association, and Chairman of the Literature Department. She has made extensive investigations in Moravian archives in America and Europe, and is well prepared to give with accuracy and fidelity the history of the Moravian Church in America, and the broader history of our country, which it touches on every side. She has written extensively on the subject, and has published "History of Forsyth County"; "The Moravians in Georgia, 1735-1740"; "The Funeral Chorals of the Moravian Church"; "Salem Academy"; "Brief History of Moravian Church," and has been a faithful contributor to the Wachovia Historical Society. This cultivated and useful woman is a fine type of the German element that has been a blessing to every community in which it settled.

Miss Fries is a worthy descendant of a noble ancestry, and fully sustains the reputation won by them. She continues a close student of history and literature, and will fix her place securely among the historical writers of our time.

SAMUEL A'COURT ASHE.

THE BOOKLET is indebted to Captain Ashe for the article on George Durant, which is given in his usual readable and charming style. It goes without saying that Captain Ashe, the subject of this sketch, is an historical genius and one in line with the foremost writers in North Carolina. He was born at Wrightsville Sound, eight miles from Wilmington, N. C., on the 13th of September, 1840. He was the son of William Shepperd Ashe, of the Rocky Point family of that name, and his wife Sarah Ann Green, who in the maternal line was a Grange.

Captain Ashe is connected lineally and collaterally with the old families who settled the Cape Fear country—the Porters, Swanns, Moseleys and Lillingtons. At the age of nine years, this young and promising boy was placed at school in Macon, Ga. Afterwards, until the age of fifteen, he attended schools at Georgetown, D. C.; Rugby Academy, Washington, D. C.; Oxford Academy, Maryland; where he received such education as to enable him to enter the Naval Academy at Annapolis. Here he was called one of the "star" members of his class until he resigned and returned to his father's home, at Rocky Point, where he devoted himself to the study of history and literature bearing on the profession of law, reading "Reeve's History of the Common Law," Sharon Turner's "Anglo-Saxons," Robertson's "Charles V," "Hallam's Middle Ages," and "Constitutional History," and such other works. From such a course of reading he was well prepared to take up a careful study of the law under Mr. William Ruffin, a man well endowed with great faculties and of a superior legal mind. About this time the Civil War broke out, and Mr. Ashe, like the other spirited young men, the flower of the South, laid aside his law books and responded to the call of his country. His first service was under General Whiting, at Wilmington. He was appointed lieutenant and assigned to duty at Fort Caswell. This fort, at that time, was entirely defenseless, and entailed upon young Ashe an immense amount of responsibility; but under the direction of Captain F. L. Childs, he was largely instrumental in putting it in condition for defense. He filled several other positions, serving with fidelity and valor any place to which he was assigned. In June, 1861, he accepted the appointment as captain and adjutant-general on the staff of General Pender. Later he enlisted as a private in Co. I of the regiment then known as the Eighth, but later the Eighteenth North Carolina Troops. Captain Ashe served the whole term of the war, with credit to himself and an honor to the cause. His life as a soldier has been fully written by his comrades in arms; therefore this writer will dwell principally on his career as student, lawyer, legislator, editor, historian, and citizen.

It was at Rocky Point that Captain Ashe spent his early childhood. This was formerly the home of Edward Moseley, that man among men; a defender of the people's rights, and "who espoused the cause of religious freedom against the bigotry and narrowness of his age and country." Might it not be said that here Captain Ashe imbibed the spirit of Edward Moseley? For it can not be doubted that material surroundings ofttimes impart influences that have their effect for good or bad, as the case may be.

It was here at Rocky Point, far from "the crowds of madding strife," that the foundation strong and sure was laid by Captain Ashe, fitting him for the exigencies of life. The knowledge of military tactics, acquired in four years of service as a soldier; his intimate knowledge of law, his experience as a public official; his monumental work as an editor, and his innate love for the history of his native State, have been, and are, of incalculable advantage to him whose services are so often called into requisition. As a public official, his acts are recorded in the archives of State. As an editor, his name will descend to generations as one whose forecast, ability, judgment and discretion were of the best. By his editorials he led the party of the people from victory to victory. During the critical period after the war he directed his best efforts to save the State from vicious and dangerous rule.

Captain Ashe has given much time to the study of North Carolina history, and is looked upon and appealed to as authority on any disputed point. He was a valuable aid to Colonel William L. Saunders in the preparation of that gigantic work, the Colonial Records; and to Judge Walter Clark in the preparation of the State Records. He has prepared a school history of the State, which has not yet been published. He has made many valuable public addresses bearing on State literature and history. His last most valuable contribution is his "History of North Carolina from 1584 to 1783." Only Volume I has been published. The first volume has been characterized thus by an acknowledged critic:

"The greatest event that North Carolina has known was the publication of Captain Ashe's history." Every library in the State should have a copy of this book. It contains about 725 pages, and is full of interest from cover to cover. He states in the preface that the work is based almost exclusively on the State publications; nearly every statement relating to North Carolina has for its support contemporaneous documents. It is dedicated to Thomas Jordan Jarvis and Colonel William Laurence Saunders, and closes with this paragraph:

"I dedicate this volume to you and to the memory of my departed friend, it being an early fruitage of his important State publications, the preparation of which was made possible by your own cordial concurrance: and I inscribe your name on this page in recognition of your great service to the people of North Carolina and in token of my friendship.

"S. A. Ashe."

Captain Ashe has contributed several articles of historic value to The North Carolina Booklet. In Vol. II his article on "Our Own Pirates" is a story of those desperate robbers who infested the coast of Carolina in the early Colonial period.

In Vol. IV "Rutherford's Expedition Against the Indians" is told in a most interesting way and treated more fully than is done by any other writer.

In addition to many historical and biographical essays which he has written, he has frequently made literary addresses of great merit and popularity. The address made on General Lee in 1906, under the auspices of the Johnston Pettigrew Chapter, Daughters of the Confederacy, received the highest commendations from those who heard it. This address was printed in pamphlet form and distributed by the Daughters as a means of enlightening the young generation and keeping fresh in their minds the greatness of Lee.

The ability and success with which Captain Ashe has wielded his pen proves the verity of the assertion that "the pen is mightier than the sword."

Captain Ashe married, in 1871, Miss Hannah Emerson Willard, of Raleigh, whom he survives, and has eight children.

NOTE.—Credit is due to Dr. T. B. Kingsbury for facts contained in the above sketch, the Biographical History of North Carolina, and other sources.—EDITOR.

BRUCE CRAVEN.

Mr. Bruce Craven, author of "The Truth About Jackson's Birthplace," has previously contributed to THE BOOKLET two articles on the Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence; and a sketch of his life appeared in THE BOOKLET for January, 1909. Mr. Craven is Superintendent of the City Schools of Kinston, and besides his high standing in educational circles, is a lawyer and public speaker of ability, has had experience in newspaper work, and is a frequent contributor to leading newspapers and magazines. His writings are characterized by conciseness and precision.

RESOLUTIONS OF RESPECT TO THE MEMORY OF MRS. SUSAN GRAHAM CLARK, WHO DIED DECEMBER 10, 1909.

IN MEMORIAM.

WHEREAS, God in His infinite love and wisdom, has seen fit to remove from earth to heaven our loyal member, our beloved Vice-Regent, Mrs. Susan Graham Clark:

Therefore be it resolved, That the North Carolina Society, Daughters of the Revolution, deplore the great loss they have sustained in her death.

That they are thankful for the influence and inspiration of her noble life, and feel that they have lost a faithful and highly esteemed member, beloved of all other members, ever devoted to the work of the Society and ready to contribute to the success of all its undertakings.

That they mourn the absence of her personal charm, and will ever lament the loss of her wise counsel.

That we tender to the afflicted husband and family our heartfelt sympathy in this great bereavement.

That these resolutions be spread upon the minutes of the Society and a copy sent to the family.

MRS. JOHN E. RAY,
MRS. LEIGH SKINNER,
Committee.

TRIBUTE FROM A FRIEND.

In Memoriam Mrs. Susan Graham Clark.

The North Carolina Society, Daughters of the Revolution, has sustained a loss in the removal to a higher, brighter life of one of her most prominent officers and loyal members, which will be felt not only in the present but through the coming years. Our beloved Vice-Regent was ever wise in counsel, true to the Society, just to her co-workers, and faithful to every duty that was hers, always anxious to assume even more than was her share. Those who were so fortunate as to have known her through this organization, feel that in knowing her they were amply compensated aside from other advantages.

Mrs. Susan Graham Clark was the only daughter of the late Honorable William Alexander Graham and Susan Washington, his wife. Her father was one of the greatest men of his time, and he lived in an age in which intellectual giants were not exceptions. Of noble lineage, reared amid an uplifting environment, where lofty ideals and brilliant intellects were guides to the moulding of a grand character, she maintained the standards established by her progenitors in this and other lands. She was ever the unconscious leader of every circle honored by her presence. To few it has been given the privilege to dwell under the influence of greatness which she keenly appreciated as well as inspired.

The gift of intellectuality is to be prized and admired, but nobility of heart is to be cherished even more. With both Mrs. Clark was richly endowed. Her sympathy and kindness to those in sorrow knew no bounds.

Another bright star has passed beyond our horizon, though the radiance will linger, a sweet reminder of the precious friend whose place will ever remain an empty void that can not be filled.

INFORMATION

Concerning the Patriotic Society

"Daughters of the Revolution"

The General Society was founded October 11, 1890,—and organized August 20, 1891,—under the name of "Daughters of the American Revolution"; was incorporated under the laws of the State of New York as an organization national in its work and purpose. Some of the members of this organization becoming dissatisfied with the terms of entrance, withdrew from it and, in 1891, formed under the slightly differing name "Daughters of the Revolution," eligibility to which from the moment of its existence has been lineal descent from an ancestor who rendered patriotic service during the War of Independence.

"The North Carolina Society"

a subdivision of the General Society, was organized in October, 1896, and has continued to promote the purposes of its institution and to observe the Constitution and By-Laws.

Membership and Qualifications

Any woman shall be eligible who is above the age of eighteen years, of good character, and a lineal descendant of an ancestor who (1) was a signer of the Declaration of Independence, a member of the Continental Congress, Legislature or General Court, of any of the Colonies or States; or (2) rendered civil, military or naval service under the authority of any of the thirteen Colonies, or of the Continental Congress; or (3) by service rendered during the War of the Revolution became liable to the penalty of treason against the government of Great Britain: Provided, that such ancestor always remained loyal to the cause of American Independence.

The chief work of the North Carolina Society for the past eight years has been the publication of the "North Carolina Booklet," a quarterly publication on great events in North Carolina history—Colonial and Revolutionary. $1.00 per year. It will continue to extend its work and to spread the knowledge of its History and Biography in other States.

This Society has its headquarters in Raleigh, N. C., Room 411, Carolina Trust Company Building, 232 Fayetteville Street.

Some North Carolina Booklets for Sale

Address, EDITOR, Raleigh, N. C.

Vol.

"Greene's Retreat," Dr. Daniel Harvey Hill.

Vol. II

"Our Own Pirates," Capt. S. A. Ashe.

"Indian Massacre and Tuscarora War," Judge Walter Clark.

"Moravian Settlement in North Carolina," Rev. J. E. Clewell.

"Whigs and Tories," Prof. W. C. Allen.

"The Revolutionary Congresses," Mr. T. M. Pittman.

"Raleigh and the Old Town of Bloomsbury," Dr. K. P. Battle.

"Historic Homes—Bath, Buncomb Hall, Hayes," Rodman, Blount, Dillard.

"County of Clarendon," Prof. John S. Bassett.

"Signal and Secret Service," Dr. Charles E. Taylor.

"Last Days of the War," Dr. Henry T. Bahnson.

Vol. III

"Trial of James Glasgow," Kemp P. Battle, LL.D.

"Volunteer State Tennessee as a Seceder," Miss Susie Gentry.

"Historic Hillsboro," Mr. Francis Nash.

"Colony of Transylvania," Judge Walter Clark.

"Social Conditions in Colonial North Carolina," Col. Alexander Q. Holladay, LL.D.

"Battle of Moore's Creek Bridge, 1776," Prof. M. C. S. Noble.

"North Carolina and Georgia Boundary," Mr. Daniel Goodloe.

Vol. IV

"Battle Ramseur's Mill, 1780," Major Wm. A. Graham.

"Quaker Meadows," Judge A. C. Avery.

"Convention of 1788," Judge Henry Groves Connor.

"North Carolina Signers of Declaration of Independence, John Penn and Joseph Hewes," by Mr. T. M. Pittman and Dr. E. Walter Sikes.

"Expedition to Cartagena, 1740," Judge Walter Clark.

"Rutherford's Expedition Against the Indians," Capt. S. A. Ashe.

"Changes in Carolina Coast Since 1585," Prof. Collier Cobb.

"Highland Scotch Settlement in N. C.," Judge James C. McRae.

"The Scotch-Irish Settlement," Rev. A. J. McKelway.

"Battle of Guilford Court-house and German Palatines in North Carolina," Major J. M. Morehead, Judge O. H. Allen.

"Genesis of Wake County," Mr. Marshall DeLancey Haywood.

Vol. V.—(Quarterly.)

No. 1.

"St. Paul's Church, Edenton, N. C., and its Associations," Richard Dillard, M.D.

"N. C. Signers of the National Declaration of Independence, Part II, William Hooper," Mrs. Spier Whitaker.

No. 2.

"History of the Capitol," Colonel Charles Earl Johnson.

"Some Notes on Colonial North Carolina, 1700-1750," Colonel J. Bryan Grimes.

"North Carolina's Poets," Rev. Hight C. Moore.

No. 3.

"Cornelius Harnett," Mr. R. D. W. Connor.

"Celebration of the Anniversary of May 20, 1775," Major W. A. Graham.

"Edward Moseley," by Dr. D. H. Hill.

No. 4.

"Governor Thomas Pollok," Mrs. John W. Hinsdale.

"Battle of Cowan's Ford," Major W. A. Graham.

"First Settlers in North Carolina Not Religious Refugees," Rt. Rev. Joseph Blount Cheshire, D.D.

Vol. VI—(Quarterly.)

No. 1.

"The Indian Tribes of Eastern North Carolina," Richard Dillard, M.D.

"History Involved in the Names of Counties and Towns in North Carolina," Kemp P. Battle, LL.D.

"A Colonial Admiral of the Cape Fear" (Admiral Sir Thomas Frankland), Hon. James Sprunt.

"Biographical Sketches: Introduction; Maj. Graham Daves." By Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

October, No. 2.

"The Borough Towns of North Carolina," Mr. Francis Nash.

"Governor Thomas Burke," J. G. de Roulhac Hamilton, Ph.D.

"Colonial and Revolutionary Relics in the Hall of History," Col. Fred. A. Olds.

"The North Carolina Society Daughters of the Revolution and its Objects."

"Biographical Sketches: Dr. Richard Dillard, Mr. Francis Nash, Dr. J. G. de R. Hamilton and Col. Fred A. Olds," Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

January, No. 3.

"State Library Building and Department of Archives and Records," Mr. R. D. W. Connor.

"The Battle of Rockfish Creek, 1781," Mr. James Owen Carr.

"Governor Jesse Franklin," Prof. J. T. Alderman.

"North Carolina's Historical Exhibit at Jamestown," Mrs. Lindsay Patterson, Miss Mary Hilliard Hinton.

"Biographical Sketches: Mrs. S. B. Kenneday, R. D. W. Connor, James Owen Carr and Prof. J. T. Alderman," Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

April, No. 4.

"Lock's Fundamental Constitution," Mr. Junius Davis.

"The White Pictures," Mr. W. J. Peele.

"North Carolina's Attitude Toward the Revolution," Mr. Robert Strong.

Biographical Sketches: Richard Benbury Creecy, the D. R. Society and Its Objects, Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

Genealogical Sketches: Abstracts of Wills; Scolley, Sprott and Hunter, Mrs. Helen de B. Wells.

Vol. VII. (Quarterly.)

July, No. 1.

"North Carolina in the French and Indian War," Col. A. M. Waddell.

"Locke's Fundamental Constitutions," Mr. Junius Davis.

"Industrial Life in Colonial Carolina," Mr. Thomas M. Pittman.

Address: "Our Dearest Neighbor—The Old North State," Hon. James Alston Cabell.

Biographical Sketches: Col. A. M. Waddell, Junius Davis, Thomas M. Pittman, by Mrs. E. E. Moffitt; Hon. Jas. Alston Cabell, by Mary Hilliard Hinton.

Abstracts of Wills. Mrs. Helen DeB. Wills.

October, No. 2.

"Ode to North Carolina," Miss Pattie Williams Gee.

"The Finances of the North Carolina Colonists," Dr. Charles Lee Raper.

"Joseph Gales, Editor," Mr. Willis G. Briggs.

"Our First Constitution, 1776," Dr. E. W. Sikes.

"North Carolina's Historical Exhibit at Jamestown Exposition," Miss Mary Hilliard Hinton.

Biographical Sketches: Dr. Kemp P. Battle, Dr. Charles Lee Raper, Willis Grandy Briggs, Pattie Williams Gee. By Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

January, No. 3.

"General Robert Howe," Hon. John D. Bellamy.

"Early Relations of North Carolina and the West," Dr. William K. Boyd.

"Incidents of the Early and Permanent Settlement of the Cape Fear," Mr. W. B. McKoy.

Biographical Sketches: John Dillard Bellamy, William K. Boyd, William B. McKoy. By Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

April, No. 4.

"St. James's Churchyard" (Poem), Mrs. L. C. Markham.

"The Expedition Against the Row Galley 'General Arnold'—A Side Light on Colonial Edenton," Rev. Robt. B. Drane, D.D.

"The Quakers of Perquimans," Miss Julia S. White.

"Fayetteville Independent Light Infantry," Judge James C. MacRae.

Biographical Sketches: Mrs. L. C. Markham, Rev. R. B. Drane, Miss Julia S. White, Judge James C. MacRae. By Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

Vol. VIII.—(Quarterly.)

July, No. 1.

"John Harvey," Mr. R. D. W. Connor.

"Military Organizations of North Carolina During the American Revolution," Clyde L. King, A.M.

"A Sermon by Rev. George Micklejohn," edited by Mr. R. D. W. Connor.

Biographical and Genealogical Sketches: R. D. W. Connor, Clyde L. King, Marshall DeLancey Haywood, by Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

"Abstracts of Wills," Mrs. Helen DeB. Wills.

October, No. 2.

"Convention of 1835," Associate Justice Henry G. Connor.

"The Life and Services of Brigadier-General Jethro Sumner," Kemp P. Battle, LL.D.

"The Significance of the Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence," Prof. Bruce Craven.

"Biographical and Genealogical Sketches: Judge Henry G. Connor, Kemp P. Battle, LL.D., Prof. Bruce Craven," by Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

January, No. 3.

"The Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence," Mr. A. S. Salley, Jr.

"The Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence," Prof. Bruce Craven.

"Mr. Salley's Reply."

"Mr. Craven's Rejoinder."

"Biographical and Genealogical Sketches: Prof. Bruce Craven, Mr. Alexander, S. Salley, Jr.," by Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

"Patriotic Objects."

"Information Concerning the Patriotic Society D. R."

April, No. 4.

"Unveiling Ceremonies."

"Carolina," by Miss Bettie Freshwater Pool.

"The Battle of King's Mountain," by Dr. William K. Boyd.

"Schools and Education in Colonial Times," by Dr. Charles Lee Smith.

"North Carolina Heroines of the Revolution," by Richard Dillard, M.D.

"Biographical and Genealogical Sketches: Bettie Freshwater Pool, William K. Boyd, Charles Lee Smith, Richard Dillard," by Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

Vol. IX.—(Quarterly.)

July, No. 1.

"Indians, Slaves and Tories: Our 18th Century Legislation Regarding Them," Clarence H. Poe.

"Thomas Person," Dr. Stephen B. Weeks.

"Sketch of Flora McDonald," Mrs. S. G. Ayr.

"Biographical and Genealogical Memoranda: Clarence H. Poe, Dr. Stephen B. Weeks, Mrs. S. G. Ayr," Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

"Abstracts of Wills: Shrouck, Stevens, Sanderson, Shirley, Stevenson, Sharee, Shearer, Shine, Smithson, Sitgreaves," Mrs. Helen DeB. Wills.

October, No. 2.

"General Joseph Graham," Mrs. Walter Clark.

"State Rights in North Carolina Through Half a Century," Dr. H. M. Wagstaff.

"The Nag's Head Portrait of Theodosia Burr," Miss Bettie Freshwater Pool.

"Biographical and Genealogical Memoranda: Mrs. Walter Clark, H. M. Wagstaff," Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

"Abstracts of Wills: Arnold, Ashell, Avelin, Adams, Battle, Burns, Boge, Bennett," Mrs. Helen DeB. Wills.

January, No. 3.

"History of Lincoln County," Mr. Alfred Nixon.

"Our State Motto and Its Origin," Chief Justice Walter Clark.

"Work Done by the D. R. in Pasquotank County," C. F. S. A.

"Biographical and Genealogical Memoranda: Alfred Nixon, Walter Clark," Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

"Abstracts of Wills: Clark, Evans, Fendall, Fort, Gorbe, Gambell, Grainger, Hill, White," Mrs. Helen DeB. Wills.

April, No. 4.

"Der North Carolina Land und Colonie Etablissement," Miss Adelaide L. Fries.

"George Durant," Capt. S. A. Ashe.

"Hatorask," Mr. Jaques Busbee.

"The Truth about Jackson's Birthplace," Prof. Bruce Craven.

Biographical and Genealogical Memoranda: Miss Fries, Captain Ashe, Professor Craven," Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

Vols. I, II, III, IV, 25 cents each number.

Vols. V, VI, VI, VIII, IX, 35 cents each number.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

VOLUME IX.

PAGE

Indians, Slaves and Tories: Our 18th Century Legislation Regarding Them ..... By Clarence H. Poe. 3-15

Thomas Person ..... By Dr. Stephen B. Weeks. 16-35

Sketch of Flora McDonald..... By Mrs. S. G. Ayr. 36-51

Biographical and Genealogical Memoranda: Clarence H. Poe, Stephen B. Weeks, Mrs. S. G. Ayr, By Mrs. E. E. Moffitt. 52-56

Abstracts of Wills previous to 1760: Shrouck, Stevens, Sanderson, Shirley, Stevenson, Sharee, Shearer, Shine, Smithson, Sitgreaves..... By Mrs. Helen DeB. Wills. 57-58

General Joseph Graham..... By Mrs. Walter Clark. 61-78

State Rights in North Carolina Through Half a Century, By Dr. H. M. Wagstaff. 79-97

The Nag's Head Picture of Theodosia Burr, Miss Bettie Freshwater Pool. 98-104

Biographical and Genealogical Memoranda: Mrs. Walter Clark, H. M. Wagstaff..... By Mrs. E. E. Moffitt. 105-106

Abstracts of Wills previous to 1760: Arnold, Ashell, Avelin, Adams, Battle, Burns, Boge, Bennett, By Mrs. Helen DeB. Wills. 107-108

Illustrations:

General Joseph Graham.

Supposed Portrait of Theodosia Burr Alston.

History of Lincoln County..... By Mr. Alfred Nixon. 111-178

Our State Motto and Its Origin, By Chief Justice Walter Clark. 179-182

The Work Done by the D. R. in Pasquotank County, By C. F. S. A. 183-184

Biographical and Genealogical Memoranda: Alfred Nixon, Walter Clark ..... By Mrs. E. E. Moffitt. 185-193

Abstracts of Wills previous to 1760: Clark, Evans, Fendall, Fort, Gorbe, Gambell, Grainger, Hill, White, Mrs. Helen DeB. Wills. 194-196

Der North Carolina Land und Colonie Etablissement, By Miss Adelaide L. Fries. 199-214

George Durant..... By Captain S. A. Ashe. 215-222

Hatorask..... By Mr. Jaques Busbee. 223-231

The Truth About Jackson's Birthplace, By Prof. Bruce Craven. 232-235

Biographical and Geneological Memoranda: Miss Fries, Captain Ashe, Prof. Craven..... By Mrs. E. E. Moffitt. 236-241

Illustrations:

Map of Part of Forsyth County.

Hatteras—"The Golgotha of the Sea."

The North Carolina Booklet

A QUARTERLY PUBLICATION ISSUED UNDER
THE AUSPICES OF THE

"NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION"

THIS PUBLICATION treats of important events in North Carolina History, such as may throw light upon the political, social or religious life of the people of this State during the Colonial and Revolutionary periods, in the form of monographs written and contributed by as reliable and painstaking historians as our State can produce. The Ninth Volume begins in July, 1909.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION:

One Year, One Dollar; Single Copies, Thirty-five Cents.

Miss Mary Hilliard Hinton, Mrs. E. E. Moffitt, Editors, Raleigh, North Carolina.

Registered at Raleigh Post-office as second class matter.

Notice should be given if the subscription is to be discontinued. Otherwise it is assumed that a continuance of the subscription is desired

Send all orders for back numbers to Mrs. E. E. MOFFITT, Raleigh, N. C.

All communications relating to subscriptions should be sent to

Miss Mary Hilliard Hinton,
Midway Plantation, Raleigh, N. C.

Genealogical Department

North Carolina Society

Daughters of the Revolution

YOUR ANCESTRY CAN BE CAREFULLY TRACED

The Colonial and State Records of North Carolina, Pay-rolls of Revolutionary Soldiers filed in State Auditor's Office, County Records, Family Records, State Histories and Biographies will be diligently examined.

Fee for Such Researches, $7.00 to $10.00, according to Difficulty of Research (not less than $7.00 paid with order).

Write for particulars, enclosing stamp for reply, to

Mrs. Helen DeBernière Wills,
(Genealogist for N. C. D. R.)
Raleigh, North Carolina.

Kindly remit by money order.

COATS-OF-ARMS
PAINTED

Coats-of-Arms painted, decorated with helmet, lambrequin, etc., and enclosed in passe partout	$12.00
Same style and size, but unframed	10.00
A painted Coat-of-Arms, without helmet, lambrequin, etc., unframed	5.00
India Ink Drawing of Arms	5.00
Searches for Coats-of-Arms, including (if found) a small sketch of the arms	8.00
Arms burned on wood	5.00

Book plat s designed.

Write for particulars, enclosing stamp.

Miss Mary Hilliard Hinton,
"Midway Plantation,"
Raleigh, North Carolina.

The Science of Accounts

SINGLE AND DOUBLE ENTRY
Book-keeping
A TEXT BOOK FOR PUBLIC SCHOOLS

The Graded School Edition. 65 pages, 25 lessons; cloth. Price, 65 cents. Will be ready August 1st.

The High School Edition. 130 pages, 50 lessons, and supplement; cloth bound. Price, $1.00, sent prepaid. This edition will be ready September 1st.

A 32-page Booklet with 10 Sample Lessons will be sent FREE to any subscriber to the N. C. BOOKLET who applies for it.

Address

GEORGE ALLEN, Raleigh, N. C.

Smith's Old Book Store

Raleigh, N. C. and Richmond, Va.

50,000 rare volumes in stock, 20-000 on North Carolina and South-ern history. 25 years in business. All kinds of books and relics bought and sold.

IF YOU WILL SEND US A POSTAL

and mention the N. C. Booklet,
we will send you

THREE FREE SAMPLE COPIES OF THE PROGRESSIVE FARMER.

The Progressive Farmer should be read by every North Carolina man or woman who owns or operates a farm, and every farm owner should see that all his tenants read it

"In increased production and valuation of farm and stock, The Progressive Farmer has made me $100 to every $1 I have paid for it," says J. M. Parris, Jackson County, N. C.

THE PROGRESSIVE FARMER, RALEIGH, N. C.

North Carolina Education

(Formerly N. C. Educational at Durham, N. C.)

Is a wide-awake monthly devoted to every phase of education in North Carolina. If you are interested in any phase of it, then North Carolina Education should interest you.

One Dollar a Year is the Price

Edited by E. C. BROOKS, Chair of Education in Trinity College, Durham, N. C., and W. F. MARSHALL, President Mutual Pub-lishing Co., Raleigh, N. C.

Address, W. F. MARSHALL, Publisher, 108 W. Martin Street, Raleigh, N. C

THE NORTH CAROLINA HISTORICAL COMMISSION

ESTABLISHED BY CHAPTER 767, PUBLIC LAWS OF 1903

AMENDED BY CHAPTER 714, PUBLIC LAWS OF 1907.

MEMBERS

J. BRYAN GRIMES, Chairman.....RALEIGH, N. C.
W. J. PEELE.....RALEIGH, N. C
THOS. W. BLOUNT.....ROPER, N. C.
M. C. S. NOBLE.....CHAPEL HILL, N. C.
D. H. HILL.....RALEIGH, N. C.

SECRETARY.

R. D. W. CONNOR - - - - - - - - - RALEIGH, N. C.

PURPOSES.

1. "To have collected from the files of old newspapers, court records, church records, private collections, and elsewhere, historical data pertaining to the history of North Carolina and the territory included therein from the earliest times."

2. "To have such material properly edited, published by the State Printer as other State printing, and distributed under the direction of the Commission."

3. "To care for the proper marking and preservation of battlefields houses and other places celebrated in the history of the State."

4. "To diffuse knowledge in reference to the history and resources of North Carolina."

5. "To encourage the study of North Carolina history in the schools of the State, and to stimulate and encourage historical investigation and research among the people of the State."—Section 2, Chapter 714, Public Laws of 1907.

The Secretary wishes to correspond with any person who is willing to assist the Commission, by gifts or loans or manuscripts, information of the whereabouts of such documents, or otherwise in carrying out the above purposes.

Address all Communications to the Secretary

The Atlantic Fire Insurance Company

Raleigh, North Carolina.

SOLICITS YOUR PATRONAGE

CASH CAPITAL $125,000

A HOME COMPANY, OWNED AND OPERATED BY HOME PEOPLE.

CHAS. E JOHNSON, President
J. G. BROWN, Vice-President.

H. W. JACKSON, Treasurer.
G. H. DORTCH, Secretary.

CAPITAL $100.000.00 SURPLUS $100.000.0

The

Commercial National Bank

RALEIGH, N. C.

The policy of this bank is to conduct its business along the most conservative lines; to restrict its operations to legitimate enterprises; to eliminate all speculative ventures.

OFFICERS

B. S. JERMAN, President. H. W. JACKSON, Cashier.
A. A. THOMPSON, Vice-President. E. B. CROW, Asst. Cashier.
J. J. THOMAS, Chairman of Board.

CITIZENS NATIONAL BANK,
RALEIGH, N. C.

Our customers are guaranteed every accommodation their business, balances and responsibility warrant.

THE OLDEST BANK—LARGEST BANK—AND ONLY NATIONAL BANK IN RALEIGH.

JOS. G. BROWN, President. HENRY E. LITCHFORD, Cashier

DIRECTORS:

JOSEPH G. BROWN. A. B. ANDREWS.
R. H. BATTLE. DR. A. B. HAWKINS.
DR. RICHARD H. LEWIS. WM. J. ANDREWS.
IVEN M. PROCTOR. JOHN C. DREWRY.
S. C. VANN.

THE KEYSTONE

A Southern Woman's Journal, Published Monthly by Southern Women. Now in its 7th year.

Official Organ for the Clubwomen and Daughters of the Confederacy in Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Florida and Mississippi.

SUBSCRIPTION, 50c. PER YEAR

North Carolina Booklet, $1.00 per year—The Keystone and the North Carolina Booklet for $1.10 per year.

Address

MISS MARY HILLIARD HINTON,
EDITOR N. C. BOOKLET,
Midway Plantation, Raleigh, N. C.

BOOKS AND MAGAZINES DURABLY AND BEAUTIFULLY BOUND

ARTISTIC PRINTING

EDWARDS & BROUGHTON PRINTING CO. RALEIGH, N. C.

LOWEST PRICES

Club Programs and Embossed Stationery

ESTIMATES ON APPLICATION

Circumstances Alter Cases

But Not our Cases. They are Always the same. Guaranteed whether Filled or Gold.

Jolly-Wynne Jewelry Co.

RALEIGH, - - - - NORTH CAROLINA.

Thomas H. Briggs & Sons

Raleigh, North Carolina

THE BIG

Hardware Men

PAINTS

MAJESTIC RANGES

Thomas A. Partin Co.

131 Fayetteville Street RALEIGH, N. C

Dry Goods
Ladies' Furnishings and Novelties

Prompt attention given to local and mail orders.

Darnell & Thomas

118 Fayetteville St. Raleigh, N. C.

Pianos, Organs
Sheet Music ::

The Soul Stirring "DIXIE" a Specialty

J. R. FERRALL & CO.

Grocers

222 FAYETTEVILLE ST.

RALEIGH, N. C.

Raleigh Christian Advocate

Established 1858.

Organ of the North Carolina Conference, Methodist Episcopal Church, South.

Reaches weekly over 9,000 Subscribers.

King's Business College
(INCORPORATED)

CAPITAL STOCK
$30.000.

A personal investigation will convince any one that KING'S is absolutely the Largest, Best Equipped and Most Successful College of Business, Shorthand, Typewriting, Penmanship and English in the Carolinas, regardless of any claims the small fry are making. Strong, financial backing.

Reference: Every Bank and Leading Business Concern in Raleigh or Charlotte.
College Journal and Special Offers FREE.
We also teach Bookkeeping, Shorthand and Penmanship by mail.

Address King's Business College, Raleigh, N. C., or Charlotte, N. C.

"It's worth the difference"

WHARTON & TYREE

RALEIGH, N. C.

Workers in Artistic Photography

Negatives on file of most all N. C. Famous Men

North Carolina State Flags
State Flag Post Cards
State Flag Buttons, &c.

All sizes and prices of State Flags on hand, from the smallest 1-cent Muslin, to the largest Bunting.

Send for price-list.

PINCK. C. ENNISS,
RALEIGH. N. C.

THE SECOND EDITION OF "A SOUTHERNER IN EUROPE"

By CLARENCE H. POE.

is now on the press—(the first edition having been quickly exhausted)—in larger type, handsomer binding and better paper than the first. Price: cloth $1.00; heavy paper 60 cents. Order to-day from

THE MUTUAL PUBLISHING CO., RALEIGH, N. C.

Chief Justice Walter Clark of North Carolina: "Mr. Poe's are the best traves etters I have ever seen from any European tourist."

Birmingham (Ala.) Age-Herald: "'A Southerner in Europe' is all right—not like the ordinary book of travels, but charming letters—different and pleasing."

Dr. Chas. R. Henderson, University of Chicago: "Mr. Poe certainly travels with his eyes open and knows how to interpret what he finds for the advantage of our country."

Columbia State, Columbia, S. C.: "A collection of charming letters of travel, full of interesting observations. . . . This volume will prove delightful to every class of readers."

President Geo. H. Denny, Washington and Lee University, Lexington, Va.: "Mr. Poe is to be congratulated upon 'A Southerner in Europe.' I have read it with genuine interest and satisfaction, and it will do a great deal of good."

President H. N. Snyder, Wofford College, Spartanburg, S. C.: "'A Southerner in Europe' has brought me much pleasure and profit both from the author's charm of manner and the freshness of his point of view."

Zach McGhee, author "The Dark Corner," Washington, D. C.: "Entertaining and inspiring, I wish every Southerner in our land could read it. Mr. Poe has drawn lessons no one else has drawn, and has presented them in truly charming style."

Dr. Edwin Mims, author of "The Life of Sidney Lanier": "Not the conventional book of travel, but the impression of an alert, open-minded, progressive Southerner with insight and discrimination, a constructive leader in the development of the South."

Presbyterian Standard, Charlotte, N. C.: "There are no dull places. The entertainment is pronounced throughout. If anybody, who would know more of the wide world, and love his country better, has never read this little book, let him sit down and order a copy at once."

Ex-Governor Charles B. Aycock of North Carolina: "I read the last chapter the other night, having for the first time found the opportunity to look into it. Having read the last chapter I turned back and took the book up from the beginning, and nearly completed it before laying it down. It is in every way most delightful and instructive."

Nashville Christian Advocate, Nashville, Tenn: "The man who knows how to produce so sprightly a paper as he edits, and whose contributions on Southern industrial conditions are welcomed by the best magazines, naturally knows what to look for in Europe and how to tell the story when he has seen it. Mr. Poe has made a capital little book."

R. F. Borden, Strasburg, Va: "I'm just reveling with the greatest delight in reading 'A Southerner in Europe.' It is charmingly written and holds one's interest easily to the end. My only complaint is, it is entirely too brief, and I wish the author had toured every country of Europe, and part of Asia and Africa."

Jeffersonian Magazine, Atlanta, Ga.: "It was time for a new book of travels in Europe. All of the works of that kind that are on our bookshelves are out of date. What we wanted was a volume which would picture to us the condition of things now. Mr. Poe has supplied this demand. Without the waste of a page he has furnished a view of the European world which enables one to see the town and farm of to-day, and the manner of life, the diversity of work and the trend of things as they are at this very time."

J. M. BROUGHTON T. B. MOSELEY

J. M. Broughton & Co.

Real Estate and Insurance

City and country property bought and sold on commission.
Rents collected and satisfaction guaranteed.
Oldest Real Estate concern in the city.

OFFICE: 12 West Martin St. RALEIGH, N. C.

LADIES

Why not carry a $1,000 Policy in the

Jefferson Standard Life Ins. Co.

for the benefit of your children? The Jefferson Standard is the strongest in the South.

Home Office, Raleigh, N. C.

The

News and Observer

RALEIGH, N. C.

Published at the Capital City

JOSEPHUS DANIELS
EDITOR

Growth of Circulation

1894,	1,800 subscribers	1901,	6,500
1895,	2,400 subscribers	1902,	7,054
1896,	3,100 subscribers	1903,	8,201
1897,	4,200 subscribers	1904,	9,111
1898,	4,880 subscribers	1905,	10,000
1899,	5,200 subscribers	1906,	11,000
1900,	5,700 subscribers	1907,	12,000

THE J. G. BALL COMPANY

WHOLESALE GROCERS

131 AND 133 SOUTH WILMINGTON STREET

RALEIGH, N. C.

SOLICIT THE TRADE OF MERCHANTS ONLY

TRY CAPUDINE

for COLDS and GRIPP

relie ves the feverishness and aching and restores normal conditions Take a dose as soon as you are exposed and feel the cold coming on and. it will generally prevent it. Taken afterwards will relieve the ailment.

SOLD AT ALL DRUG STORES

LET THE

Mechanics Savings Bank

TAKE CARE OF YOUR

SAVINGS

WE PAY FOUR PER CENT INTEREST ON DEPOSITS

DOBBIN-FERRALL COMPANY

123-125 FAYETTEVILLE STREET

RALEIGH, N. C.

North Carolina's Largest and Leading Retail Dry Goods Establishment

Greatest attention is given to Ready-to-wear Garments for Ladies and Misses. Costumes, Coat Suits, Skirts, Waists, Top Coats and Wraps. Alterations are made FREE OF CHARGE by competent tailoresses and promptly. We carry the largest stocks in these lines to be found in North Carolina.

CHARLES ROOT, Cashier

RALEIGH SAVINGS BANK

RALEIGH, N. C.

RESERVED INTEREST	$5,000.00
CAPITAL	$15,000.00
SURPLUS	$50,000.00
DEPOSITS OVER	$750,000.00

FOUR PER CENT INTEREST PAID ON DEPOSITS

BOYLAN-PEARCE CO.

Dry Goods Leaders in the Capital City
A Store With a State-wide Reputation

Staple and Fancy Dress Goods, Silks and Cotton Fabrics, White Goods in Immense Variety, Coat Suits, Waists and Skirts, Swellest Millinery, Laces, Embroideries, Parasols, Fans, Gloves and Handkerchiefs, Blankets, Comforts, Toweling, Sheeting and Pillow Cases, Lace and Net Curtains, and Scrims, Damask Napkins and Towels, Carpets, Art Squares, Rugs, Linoleums and Oil Cloths.

Samples submitted and contracts taken for public buildings, churches libraries and private residences.

BOYLAN-PEARCE COMPANY

206-208 Fayetteville Street RALEIGH, N. C.

ANTICEPHALALGINE

THE WONDERFUL REMEDY FOR HEADACHE AND NEURALGIA

FOR SALE BY ALL DRUGGISTS
25 AND 50 CENTS PER BOTTLE

RALEIGH
NORTH CAROLINA

North Carolina State Library
Raleigh

MISSES REESE & CO.

109 Fayetteville Street

RALEIGH, N. C.

The Place

THAT STANDS FOR

Correct Styles in Millinery

Two Stores in One

Heller Bros.

SHOES AND TRUNKS

RALEIGH, N. C.

Weathers & Perry

Fayetteville Street

RALEIGH, N. C.

China and Art Store and Interior Decorators

Carolina Electrical Co.

RALEIGH, N. C.

Engineers Contractors Supplies

Electric Light, Telephone and Annunciator Installation.

J. C. Ellington

Pictures, Artists' Materials

Wall-papers and Window-shades

Embroidery Silks Wools and Zephyrs

RALEIGH, N. C.

FIFTIETH ANNUAL

N. C. STATE FAIR, RALEIGH, OCT. 1910.

Four full days. $12,000 offered in prizes. Grand display of live stock, agricultural and horticultural products, machinery and fine arts. Fastest trotting and pacing races, special stage and musical attractions and specialties. Biggest midway in the South. General admission 50 cents, children 25 cents. For prize list and information, address JOSEPH E. POGUE, Secretary, Raleigh, N. C.

CORNELIUS HARNETT. An Essay in North Carolina History. By R. D. W. Connor, Secretary of the North Carolina Historical Commission.

"I have just finished reading Harnett. . . . You have made an interesting story of a most significant and interesting man."—EDWARD K. GRAHAM, Professor of English Literature, University of North Carolina.

"I have read with pleasure and pride Mr. Connor's forthcoming sketch of Cornelius Harnett. It is an interesting and scholarly piece of work and should have a wide circulation."—C. ALPHONSO SMITH, Professor of the English Language, University of North Carolina; Author of "Our Debt to Cornelius Harnett."

EDWARDS & BROUGHTON PRINTING CO., RALEIGH, N. C.

Price, $1.50

Vol. X JULY, 1910 No. 1

The North Carolina Booklet

"Carolina! Carolina! Heaven's blessings attend her!
While we live we will cherish, protect and defend her."

Published by
THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY
DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION

The object of the BOOKLET is to aid in developing and preserving North Carolina History. The proceeds arising from its publication will be devoted to patriotic purposes. EDITOR.

ADVISORY BOARD OF THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET.

MRS. HUBERT HAYWOOD.
MR. E. E. MOFFITT.
MRS. SPIER WHITAKER.
MR. R. D. W. CONNOR.
DR. D. H. HILL.
DR. E. W. SIKES.
MR. W. J. PEELE.
MISS MARTHA HELEN HAYWOOD.
DR. RICHARD DILLARD.
DR. KEMP P. BATTLE.
MR. JAMES SPRUNT.
MR. MARSHALL DELANCEY HAYWOOD.
CHIEF JUSTICE WALTER CLARK.
MAJOR W. A. GRAHAM.

EDITOR:
MISS MARY HILLIARD HINTON.

OFFICERS OF THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION 1910–1912.

REGENT:
MISS MARY HILLIARD HINTON.

VICE-REGENT:
MISS CATHERINE FAUNTLEROY SEYTON ALBERTSON.

HONORARY REGENTS:
MRS. SPIER WHITAKER.
MRS. E. E. MOFFITT.

RECORDING SECRETARY:
MRS. J. LEIGH SKINNER.

CORRESPONDING SECRETARY:
MRS. PAUL H. LEE.

TREASURER:
MRS. FRANK SHERWOOD.

REGISTRAR:
MRS. JOSEPH CHESHIRE WEBB.

GENEALOGIST AND HISTORIAN:
MRS. HELEN DEBERNIERE WILLS.

CUSTODIAN OF RELICS:
MRS. JOHN E. RAY.

CHAPTER REGENTS.

Bloomsbury Chapter.....MRS. HUBERT HAYWOOD, Regent.
Penelope Barker Chapter.....MRS. PATRICK MATTHEW, Regent.
Sir Walter Raleigh Chapter.....MRS. WALKER WALLER JOYNES, Regent.
DeGraffenried Chapter.....MRS. CHARLES SLOVER HOLLISTER, Regent.

FOUNDER OF THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY AND REGENT 1896-1902:
MRS. SPIER WHITAKER.

REGENT 1902:
MRS. D. H. HILL, SR.*

REGENT 1902-1906:
MRS. THOMAS K. BRUNER.

REGENT 1906-1910:
MRS. E. E. MOFFITT.

*Died December 12, 1904.

THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET.

Vol. X JULY, 1910 No 1

[After Homeward Bound.]

THE CHASE.

Freed from the lingering chase, in devious ways
Upon the swelling tides
Swiftly the Lillian glides
Through hostile shells and eager foemen past;
The lynx-eyed pilot, gazing through the haze,
His engines straining, "far hope dawns at last."

Now falls in billows deep the welcome night
Upon white sands below;
While signal lamps aglow
Seek out Fort Fisher's distant answering gleams,
The blockade runner's keen, supreme delight,—
Dear Dixie Land, the haven of our dreams!

JAMES SPRUNT.

The Confederate Steamer "Lillian," commanded by Captain John Newland Maffitt, and laden with war material from Bermuda for Wilmington, in the early part of 1864, had been hard pressed all day by a swift Federal cruiser which Maffitt ultimately baffled by using coal dust in his furnaces, raising a dense black smoke, under cover of which he closed his dampers and changed his course, while the cruiser continued to chase the trail of smoke. Maffitt then drove his vessel at full speed for New Inlet Bar and on the rising tide in the haze of the early evening ran a gauntlet of fire from fourteen blockaders while coursing down the beach towards Fort Fisher. A welcome darkness then enveloped the little fugitive. A signal officer called Fort Fisher's assistance by masked lights, and as the Fort responded, it also opened fire upon Maffitt's pursuers, and the goal was won.

ART AS A HANDMAIDEN OF HISTORY.

BY JAQUES BUSBEE.

Descriptions never describe—or only to the extent that they correspond with visual experience already possessed. Could a man from the mountains who had never seen the ocean ever be told how it looked? Would not the actual first sight of it come as a soft shock and a total surprise?

However well we may know the actions of the past, however well we may know the personal traits of historic personages, we gain an added knowledge, a clearer appreciation of men and events when we can look upon their features fixed in paint or marble; when we can see the pageant of the past spread upon some great canvas. What we would know of Greece without her marbles would be vague and intangible. How many people have ever read Greek literature, Thucydides, Æschylus, Euripides, yet few golden oak tables, book-cases or mantlepieces lack their plaster casts of the Venus of Milos, or the winged Victory of Samothrace.

The whole history of the Renaissance could be rewritten from the frescoes and paintings of the old Italian Masters—the growth and supremacy of the Roman Catholic Church, the subtle intrusion of pagan ideas, the beginnings of modern culture. Masquerading as Madonnas and Saints, they are nevertheless the features and costumes of the men and women of the period—marvelously vivid records of the times.

Holbein, Van Dyke, Reynolds have done the same thing for English history. What vivid searchlight spots on the English Reformation are Holbein's portraits, fat King "Harry," the shrewd, beautiful face of Anne Boleyn, Warham, Archbishop of Canterbury, sour and inhuman with religious zeal; Sir Thomas More, with utopia written on his benign features; sickly little Edward Sixth, and that dear old English matron, with her mediæval manners and intelligence, Lady Butts.

From John White's Painting

From DeBry's Engraving of White's Painting

It has been said that the whole period of Charles Second could be rewritten from Pepy's Diary were all else lost, but incompletely written were it not for the portraits by Sir Peter Lely and Sir Godfrey Kneller. One look at the portrait of that shiftless, sensuous Monarch's features and we breathe the atmosphere of those degenerate times.

We long to see! a name is but a name, a face we never forget. Abstractions even we are compelled to visualize. In the Sargent room of the Boston Library is a fresco of the Trinity—three old men with long, gray whiskers, wrapt under one cloak.

We think mainly with our eyes.

One of the greatest educators of the times is the moving picture show. Its popularity illustrates the point and goes to prove this unconquerable desire to see. The possibilities of the motion picture are incalculable. Already many a famous picture has been arraigned, acted and photographed. Washington crossing the Delaware is a case in point. North Carolina history needs illustrating. Events abound, splendid and inspiring, but they lie invisible, buried in old books and forgotten pamphlets, known only to a few enthusiasts. Painted history is irresistible, unavoidable, for once the eye rests upon it, the thing is done—it is hypodermic teaching.

The pace has already been set, yet it remains a sporadic performance to this day, three hundred and twenty-five years afterward.

The Prologue to the first act of North Carolina history has been wonderfully illustrated by John White in seventy-six water color drawings preserved in the Grenville Collection of the British Museum, purchased by the Trustees in March, 1866, of Mr. Henry Stevens at the instigation of Mr.

Panizzi. When these paintings came to light, it dissipated the strong suspicion that DeBry had invented his illustrations. How these paintings first came to be made should be as interesting to North Carolinians as it is little known by them. The story of the French and Spanish occupation of Florida, the incident of their butchering each other in religious frenzy to the astonishment of the American Savages is not germain to our subject. Suffice it to say that Jaques Le Moyne, the painter and mathematician, survived the butchery, reached England and finally found shelter in the household of Sir Walter Raleigh, with his paintings of the Florida Indians, fruits, flowers and animals, together with his journal intact.

Sir Walter, with his usual sagacity, realizing the immense importance of illustrating his long meditated projects of colonizing in America, sent with his first colony to Roanoke Island John White, who in all probability was a pupil of Le Moyne: for certainly in every respect Le Moyne was his model. In the manuscript department of the British Museum is a volume of original drawings relating to Florida and Virginia (Sloan, No. 5270) manifestly a mixture of Le Moyne's and White's sketches. They are very valuable and show the intimate relation of master and pupil.

John White came to Roanoke with the first colony under Lane and remained a year drawing the Indians, the fruits and animals from life, and in surveying and mapping the country with his friend, Thomas Hariot.

Upon the return of the colony to England, some of the adventurers (London gentlemen no doubt, who did not find their Coca-Cola and Piedmont Cigarettes on sale at corner drug stores) cast aspersions and slanders abroad in certain influential quarters. So Hariot's book was put forth in hot haste to counteract the reports of those ignorant persons returned from Virginia, who "woulde seeme to knowe so much as no men more," and who "had little understanding, lesse discretion, and more tongue then was needful or requisite."

The book professes to be only an epitome of what was to come, for near the end the author says: "This is all the fruits of our labours, that I have thought necessary to advertise you of at present;" and further on, "I have ready in a discourse by itself in manner of Chronicle according to the course of times, and when time shall be thought convenient, shall also be published."

The Florida Journal of Laudonniere was published in Paris in 1586, and dedicated to Sir Walter Raleigh. Falling under the eye of the celebrated engraver of Frankfort, Theodore DeBry, he conceived the idea of issuing a luxurious edition of it illustrated with the exquisite paintings of Jaques Le Moyne. DeBry went to London in 1587, to see Le Moyne and arrange with him the illustrations; but Le Moyne, it seems, was contemplating some such scheme himself, and so DeBry failed in his mission. Le Moyne died in 1588, and DeBry succeeded in buying a portion of the artist's work from his widow, together with his version of the French Florida Expeditions. While in London he fell in with the geographer Richard Hakluyt, who at that time was seeing his first folio collection of voyages of the English through the press.

Seizing the psychological moment, Hakluyt introduced DeBry to John White, Governor of Virginia, then in London. White had done for Raleigh's Colony in Virginia what Le Moyne had done for Laudonniere in Florida. The enthusiastic Hakluyt impregnated DeBry with his hobby and induced him to abandon his plan of a separate publication and make a series of illustrated voyages, laying aside Le Moyne for the present and beginning with White. Le Moyne was dead, but White, Hariot and others were then in London to aid with eyewitness accounts and descriptions. Hakluyt suggested reprinting Hariot's "Virginia" just coming out in February, 1589, illustrated from the portfolio of White. He himself engaged to write descriptions of the plates, and his geographical touches are easily recognized. Thus DeBry was induced to make Hariot's "Virginia" the first part of his celebrated "Peregrinations," with a dedication to Sir Walter Raleigh.

Full of Hakluyt's ideas, DeBry returned to Frankfort and in an incredibly short time (in 1590) issued his famous book in four languages, Latin, French, German, and English.

Thus we see that this book, the blending and interdependence of several men and interests leads up to Thomas Hariot. It is necessary to refrain from giving title page, dedication, etc., to this fascinating folio, as it would extend this account to undue length. A fragment of the Latin Edition (the plates without Hariot's "Virginia") is in the State Library. As to the engraved plates taken in connection with the eighteen copies in color from White's original paintings in the Hall of History, they are of exceeding interest.

Considering the state of art in England at the time, White's pictures are wonderful. Despite the inadequate technique, the crude drawing and color, nevertheless there shines out the truth of things actually seen. Discounting the certain conventionalties of art, the translations and transpositions it is necessary to make in art, in White's pictures of the Indians the aboriginal Savages are before us. That strange unbridged gulf that separates them from civilization is felt and wonderfully rendered. However poorly they are painted from the technical standpoint of to-day, they carry with them the conviction of reality, of things actually seen and rendered from life—easy to reconstruct with our present knowledge.

Out of the seventy-six paintings in the British Museum, only eighteen copies have found their way to North Carolina, fourteen figures of Indians, three of villages and one of fish. They are in the Hall of History. Undoubtedly the State should own perfect copies of the entire collection.

Theodore DeBry engraved twenty-three of the paintings for his book. With his academic training he has so Dutched the figures by fattening them up and perfecting the drawing that they have lost all trace of Indian characteristics. True he had never seen an Indian, but all the subtle suggestiveness of White's paintings is lost. With that unconquerable desire to see he has supplied us with reverse views of many of the figures like modern fashion plates. Also the figures are reversed from the exigencies of engraving. Some of his fat Dutch ladies, masquerading as Indian women are quite laughable, with rotund breasts and sugar-cured hams.

Compare plate IV by DeBry with White's original drawing. The Indian woman of the drawing stands with folded arms, a small deer-skin apron around her loins and lavishly tatooed. Although rather heavy, she is long of limb, stolid of countenance, with an abundant suggestiveness of savagery in her unblinking gaze. The figure is painted in water-color on a background of white paper.

DeBry has engraved this plate showing also a reverse view, with her deer-skin apron tied in a coquettish knot behind, both views exhibiting a very rotund lady with tiny feet and smirking countenance. He has also added a landscape background, filled with men spearing fish and poleing canoes. He has perfected his described landscape with here and there the addition of a few dock leaves, the nearest approach in his experience to tropical vegetation. In other plates he shows Indian gardens that seem to be laid off with the neat precision of a Dutch horticulturist.

Plate VIII shows a greater liberty taken by DeBry than in any other, perhaps. A long-limbed, big-footed Indian woman stands with her weight equally on both feet, one hand resting in a necklace of shells, the other holding a large water gourd. An Indian child follows her with a doll dressed in Elizabethan costume. The child is particularly Indian in character. DeBry shows us this lady fattened on Frankfurters, tipping herself archly, her weight on one foot, her beads very much finer, and with deep dimples in her elbows. The child is beyond all recognition, with fat, cherubimic limbs, curled hair, one arm held aloft with a rattle in the hand and the doll (an Elizabethan doll; DeBry had seen such dolls) the only thing in the picture better done than the original, held in the other hand. But, oh the feet!—nothing but angels that seldom perch could find them of any use. These two figures are placed much further apart than in White's picture, to satisfy DeBry's sense of balance and composition.

The book has an ornamental title page with five Indian figures very skillfully adapted to a decorative design.

Sir Walter Raleigh's coat of arms and the dedication to him by DeBry follow; then Hariot's dedication and preface; then his reprinted book, "Virginia." Following this is an engraving of Adam and Eve tempted by the serpent, then "To the gentle reader."

The plates begin with White's map of Virginia and the arrival of the English, twenty-three plates in all, followed by five pictures of aboriginal "Pictes," to show that the British descended (or ascended more properly) from ancestors no less savage than the Indians. DeBry waives all claim to the authenticity of the five pictures by adding a preface to them in which he says: 'The painter of whom I have had the first of the Inhabitants of Virginia, gave me allso theese 5 figures following, fownd as he did assure me in a oolld English cronicle, the which I wold well sett to the ende of thees first Figures, for to showe how that the Inhabitants of the great Bretannie have bin in times past as sauuage as those of Virginia."

In White's report of his last visit to Roanoke Island, the colony vanished, the wreck and desolation of Fort Raleigh, he drops a word about his pictures that is interesting. "Presently Captain Cook and I went to the place, which was in the end of an old trench, made two years past by Captain Amidas, where we found five chests that had been carefully hidden by the planters, and of the same chests three were my own, and about the place many of my things spoiled and broken, and my books torn from the covers, the frames of some of my pictures and maps rotten and spoiled with rain, and my armour almost eaten through with rust."

Oh! that he had taken these pictures and maps back to England with him when he returned. Some more invaluable Caroliniana gone forever with Hariot's "Chronicle" that up to the present has remained unpublished. North Carolina is allowing to remain unpublished and unpainted her glorious past and her great present. The widespread knowledge of, say, Massachusetts history, is due primarily to her illustrators. What child does not absorb it from the pictures in school histories, from the paintings of all her leading events?

Our own history is illustrated almost entirely from pictures of monuments erected on famous spots, but the actions remain lifeless like the monuments commemorating them. Until some appreciation of the usefulness of art shall arise among us, our history will remain inanimate. Then and not till then can we enforce our claims to events that should be the pride of the nation at large, and are the glory of the old North State.

SKETCH OF COLONEL FRANCIS LOCKE.

BY GEORGE McCORKLE.

How many men appear upon the stage of life, act well their parts, in many instances deserving the gratitude of coming generations, pass off the stage and are forgotten, what, though they have dethroned a tyrant, rescued a country from the heel of oppression, and saved to the people and coming generations the blessings of civil and religious liberty, yet their names perish from the earth seemingly, and often centuries come and go before a grateful posterity attempts to do them honor. This thought comes to me when I think of the subject of this sketch, Colonel Francis Locke, of Rowan, and the numerous heroes of that eventful period in the life of this great country of ours. Their names and their illustrious deeds of valor and heroism should not only live in bronze and marble, but in song and literature that coming generations may not fail to know how and whence came the blessings we enjoy, and knowing, render unto them that homage which is due from a grateful people. The histories of our State, and those outside so far as I have seen, are so conflicting and contradictory, with perhaps one exception, Dr. Rumple's, as to the relationship of Colonel Francis Locke to General Matthew Locke and Francis Locke, Jr., Judge and United States Senator, and as their relationship was so close and their activity so constant and unceasing for the cause of American Independence—lived side by side and buried side by side in old Thyatira Cemetery, hard by their broad plantations in Rowan County—I will state the facts as to their relationship, but first a word concerning the public services of General Matthew Locke.

The first of this once large, influential, and patriotic family in Rowan County came from the north of Ireland to America in the 17th century and settled in Lancaster County, Penn. Tradition says the head of this family was Sir George Locke. He married Mrs. Richard Brandon, a lady of distinguished parentage. From Lancaster County, Penn., the three brothers, Matthew, Francis, George, and his sister Margaret, came to North Carolina and settled in Rowan County. The Lockes were of English descent and originally came from London. General Matthew Locke was born in the year 1730, and died in 1801, was an energetic, public-spirited, popular man, the determined foe of every form of oppression and fraud, and in 1771 sympathized with the Regulators in many of their just complaints and grievances. He was elected a member of House of Assembly in 1769, 1771 and 1773; and of the Provincial Congress at Hillsboro, August, 1775, and of the same body at Halifax in 1776, which formed the first Constitution for North Carolina. From 1777 to 1792 he was continuously a member of the Legislature and served on the most important committees. He was elected Brigadier General of State troops. In 1792 he was elected to the United States Congress and served continuously to 1799. He died September 7, 1801. He married Mary (Margaret), daughter of Richard Brandon, a name distinguished in the annals of those troublous times for courageous devotion to the cause of liberty and independence, and left a family of thirteen children, eight sons and five daughters, and among their descendants have been some of the most distinguished people in this and other States.

In his biographical sketch at Washington he states that four of his sons were in the Revolutionary army at one time. "It is said that in some emergency during the Revolution Colonel Francis Locke raised a strong company of minute men, composed mainly of Lockes and Brandons." One of General Locke's sons, Lieutenant George Locke, fell near Charlotte on September 25th, 1780, fighting for his country.

"While the British were in camp at Charlotte Colonel Davie ordered Captain John Brandon, Major Joseph Graham and Lieutenant George Locke with twenty-five men to reconnoitre their camp. When they marched within fifty yards of the enemy's lines Captain Brandon proposed to advance and deliver a volley, which they did with great precision. Tarleton's troops gave chase and pursued the Americans; Graham, Locke and others saw their capture was imminent and turned off from the main road. Graham fell with nine sabre wounds and three from lead and was left for dead, but marvelously survived. Lieutenant George Locke was literally cut to pieces in a most barbarous manner—two dead British were found near the spot where Lieutenant Locke was killed and Graham wounded. Captain Brandon owed his life to the fleetness of his horse. This testimony has come down from Colonel Alexander Work Brandon, a soldier in the War of 1812 and son of Colonel John Brandon."

The other sons of General Matthew Locke moved to other states. John, who married a daughter of General Griffith Rutherford, removed with him to Tennessee, where General Locke had large landed possessions. His daughters married in North Carolina, gentlemen noted in Revolutionary annals, and from them numerous descendants have adorned the history of our State. Strange as it may seem there is not a male descendant of the Locke or Brandon name in North Carolina to-day, once the two largest families in Rowan County. The head-stone in Thyatira graveyard where General Locke was buried contains the following inscription: "In memory of Matthew Locke, Esquire, died September 7, 1801, aged seventy-one. A promoter of civilization, a legislator and a patriotic friend of his country. In his private character, a tender husband, and an affectionate parent, and an indulgent master, ever a friend to the poor, and attentive to his happiness in that state where we contemplate his existence leaving memory to retain him here."

Colonel Francis Locke, the subject of this sketch as before stated, was the brother of General Matthew Locke and son of Sir George Locke. He also married a Brandon, daughter of Mrs. Richard Brandon, Anna by name, and sister of General Matthew Locke's wife, and settled on an adjoining plantation with his brother, Matthew, about five miles west of Salisbury on Grants or Sills creek, near Thyatira church. Here these two distinguished brothers lived and died proprietors of large landed estates and of numerous slaves. Colonel Francis Locke left four sons and three daughters. Among them was first John, who was a Major in the Revolutionary War, died in 1833, aged eighty-two years. The second and most distinguished of his sons was Francis Locke, Jr. He was born in Rowan County in 1776, was prepared for college in the school of Reverend Dr. McCorkle at Thyatira, who established the first Normal school in the United States. From thence he went to the University at Chapel Hill with his cousin Robert Locke, who graduated in the class of 1798. Francis Locke, Jr., studied law and achieved great eminence in his profession. He was appointed judge in 1803, which office he filled until 1814, when he resigned to accept his election to the United States Senate. This high office he shortly afterwards resigned never having taken his seat.

Colonel Francis Locke was a man of distinguished bearing and address, and was early, 1766, made sheriff of Rowan County. He succeeded Griffith Rutherford, afterwards General Rutherford, in this office which, owing to the wealth and area of Rowan County must have been the most lucrative and responsible in the State. In this trying position, when many of the crown officers were extortionate and dishonest, the popularity of Francis Locke and Griffith Rutherford and the confidence placed in them by the people is evidence of the honesty and uprightness of their official career. He was among the first patriots to offer himself and his all to the cause of American Independence. At the April session of the Provincial Congress in session at Halifax, 1776, he was appointed Colonel of the first regiment of Rowan. In November following he was designated Colonel of the second batallion of volunteers when our State was going to the aid of South Carolina. In 1777-8, Colonel Locke was active in the cause of the Revolution, first organizing his companies, weeding out Tories, (it is said in one of his companies, Captain Johnson's, the Tories were about to elect all the officers), suppressing their activities when they became threatening in this part of the State and the following year, 1779, was with General Rutherford in his campaigns in South Carolina and Georgia —was prevented from participating in the battle of Bryar Creek, perhaps fortunately, and a few days later was engaged in the less strenuous duty of reviewing the errors of those who did, as a member of the court-martial requested by General Ashe.

The following year, 1780, gave to Colonel Locke the opportunity to make his name revered and honored as long as bravery, courage, and patriotism is esteemed among men. Ramsour's mill was the greatest victory for the patriots, and the bloodiest battle in all the Revolution, and Colonel Francis Locke was the chief commander of this great battle. A description of this battle will not be given here as it has been vividly described by General Joseph Graham in Wheeler's history, and lately by our present efficient Commissioner of Agriculture, Major William A. Graham in THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET. A word, however, as to the importance of this battle and its influence upon the cause of our independence. The opening of the year 1780 found the cause of the patriots at its lowest ebb. General Ashe had been defeated at Bryar Creek, General Lincoln had failed to take Savannah, and Charleston had fallen into the hands of the British.

Buford was defeated on the Waxhaw settlements, and the South was left destitute of any regular force to support the cause of the Revolution. There were no regular troops south of Pennsylvania to oppose the British, or keep the Tories in awe. The States of South Carolina and Georgia were under the yoke of British rule, and the hopes of the Revolution in the South, and largely in the whole country, rested upon the courage and bravery of the patriots of the then Young North State, and they were not in vain, and never have been when her sons have been put to the test, and to-day we love to think of her as the dear Old North State. On the 14th of June, 1780, General Rutherford having learned that the Tories were embodied in large numbers in Tryon and surrounding territory, directed Colonel Francis Locke, Major Wilson, Captains Falls, Brandon, and other officers to raise a sufficient force to defeat and disperse them. The Tories were emboldened by the accounts given them of the fall of Charleston and the success of the British generally in the South, and the early coming of Cornwallis to subjugate the State of North Carolina by Lieutenant-Colonel Moore, their leader, who had come from the British army; and by the 20th of June they were thirteen hundred strong at Ramsour's mill, and eager for battle. No less eager were the four hundred patriots who had traveled all night of the 19th without a halt until within three quarters of a mile of Ramsour's where a council was held and Colonel Locke gave directions as to the plan of attack. About sunrise the morning of the 20th the cavalry which led the patriots made a furious onslaught on the Tories and were followed by the infantry. The battle raged furiously all along the line—sometimes against the patriots. Colonel Locke gave but few orders during the battle—his brave captains and fervent soldiers needed none. It was death or victory. One by one his brave captains fell until four lay dead upon the field and two others prostrate with wounds. At many places clubbing with their long rifles in a hand to hand encounter was the order of the hour. A grand charge of the cavalry on the flank of the Tories, led by Captain John Brandon and Major Joseph McDowell, supported by the old guard of infantry directly under Colonel Locke, put the Tories to flight and from that hour Toryism was dead in the west.

Abram Forney, who was in the battle told the writer's father that it lasted more than an hour and a half and that as many Tories were drowned in the mill pond in their rear, killed and wounded as were in the whole force of the patriots. Three months hence and only twenty miles away King's Mountain was to be fought. Think of a victory at Ramsour's and Ferguson at King's Mountain with two thousand more men flushed with victory. On the contrary this great rout of the Tories at Ramsour's completely conquered them in old Tryon and the country around it and the patriots became invincible. Major Graham in a sketch of the battle says: "I do not think in killed and wounded in proportion to the number engaged the battle is equaled in the Revolution * * * The defeat and rout of three times their number is certainly worthy of note."

"He that hath his quarrel just Is thrice armed."

Colonel Locke showed his magnanimity as he saw three Tory captains dead on the field not far from each other. He had seen their valor in the struggle just ended and he said, "these men shall not be buried with the common soldier." He had them buried in the same grave on the crest of the hill, and a rude carving on a soapstone has marked their last resting place for over a hundred years. This great battle with much truth may be said to have been the turning point in that great struggle for liberty and the heroic victors are scarcely mentioned in history, which neglect and ingratitude is said to have been occasioned by the influence of the Tories and their descendants in this section, many of whom were influential and well-to-do people.

After this battle Colonel Locke and his brave men returned to their homes for a short rest and Ferguson's reported invasion of the State was the next call to arms. September, 1780, General Davidson orders "Colonel Armstrong, Cleveland and Locke to unite their forces against Ferguson and stop his progress." September 23d, 1780, Colonel Locke writes to General Sumner: "I have ordered all the militia in Rowan to join me at Sherrill's Ford, where I was ordered by General Davidson to take post, and send him all the intelligence I could of the strength and movements of the enemy. I have now not more than sixty men in camp and from the first accounts of the enemy they are eight hundred, and some say fifteen hundred strong, lying at Burke Court and at Greenleafs. Lead we are in want of. Colonel Armstrong was to have sent on a quantity. If you have any part of your army you could spare to our assistance I think we could drive the enemy out of our State."

But Colonel Locke was not destined to meet Ferguson. The "over the mountain" patriots were to swoop down upon him like the eagle upon its prey and destroy him forever. The movements of Colonel Locke and his men for the few months following were confined to his immediate section until the spring of 1781, when he began his preparations to join General Greene in his campaign against Cornwallis, going into camp near Shallow Ford on the Yadkin, where the famous "contention" arose between the different Colonels of the regiments as to the seniority of their commission and their right to command. Here was patriotism placed above self and State, and General Pickens, of South Carolina, without any special claim or merit over these battle-scarred veterans was generously placed by them in supreme command. The infantry was placed under the command of Colonel Locke and Major Caruth, and with loyalty and supreme devotion the splendid soldier followed General Pickens in his short but brilliant campaign. Setting out immediately for Hillsboro with Colonel Locke in command of the infantry and Graham, of the cavalry, Cornwallis had scarcely pitched his tent before Pickens' men were in sight of the town and preparing to attack him. After engaging in several dashing and brilliant skirmishes and marching and countermarching in the following weeks with a view to re-enforcing General Greene and bringing Cornwallis to mortal combat, Colonel Locke's regiment joined General Greene at High Rock Ford on the Haw River, where their term of service ended on the 3d of March before the battle of Guilford on the 15th. Notwithstanding they remained some days afterward hoping to engage in a general battle and by General Greene's order reluctantly marched in companies for Rowan, Mecklenburg, and Lincoln counties, where they were to hold themselves in readiness to hamper the progress of Cornwallis should he retreat in that direction.

I will not further trace the military services of Colonel Locke other than stating that prior to the Declaration of Independence he buckled on his sword and struck for his country's freedom and obeyed every call of duty to the end; never in all that great struggle did he lead his faithful men to defeat, or turn his back to the foe. After the war closed and the independence of his country was recognized he returned to his home near Salisbury and spent the remainder of his days in the peaceful and dignified pursuits of the Southern planter, where subsequent to the 27th day of June, 1796 (date of his will), he died and was interred in the old historic cemetery of Thyatira Church, in Rowan County, where he lies with many of his devoted comrades in an unknown grave. His distinguished son, Judge Locke, made provision in his will for suitable monuments to be erected to his father and mother out of his large estate, but it was sadly neglected by his unrelated executors and to-day this hero of the Revolution has no stone to mark his last resting place; honored less than the three Tory captains whom he magnanimously and reverently buried on the crest of the hill at Ramsour's Mill and where the little soapstone slab over their graves is the only monument that marks this historic field.

I sincerely trust that in the near future the Daughters of the Revolution, of North Carolina, whose tender memory of the sacrifices and deeds of heroism of their noble ancestors is so vitalizing and encouraging, will see to it that Ramsour's Mill is duly marked and that due honor be paid to the heroes who there fought and died for their country's freedom.

UNVEILING OF MEMORIAL TABLET AT NIXONTON, N. C.

BY MRS. WALKER WALLER JOYNES.

After nearly a year of earnest endeavor on the part of the members of the Sir Walter Raleigh Chapter, Daughters of the Revolution, their efforts and purposes were happily crowned with success by the erection on June 11, at Hall's Creek Church, near Nixonton, North Carolina, of a Memorial Tablet commemorative of the spot on which was held the "First Albemarle Assembly, February 6, 1665."

In pursuance of the avowed ideals of the Daughters as set forth in their constitution, "To perpetuate the patriotic spirit of the men and women who achieved American Independence," the erection of this tablet was undertaken and successfully carried to completion.

The local Chapter, a mere handful of patriotic women, felt considerably handicapped in this comparatively novel undertaking on account of their limited financial resources, which would have been embarrassing, but for the cordial assistance of the citizens of this community.

The tablet stands close to the roadside, almost opposite Hall's Creek Church approximately, as near as can be ascertained, on the identical spot on which stood our sturdy forbears when they first enacted laws along the English lines for the preservation of freedom and liberty in this, the present State of North Carolina.

To Miss Catherine F. S. Albertson, Vice-Regent of the North Carolina Society and former Regent and Organizer of this Chapter, is attributable the inception of the idea to erect a suitable marker on this site and to her devoted and enthusiastic efforts the accomplishment of the project is largely due.

For the dedicatory exercises the Chapter was fortunate to secure as orator of the occasion the Hon. Francis D. Winston, of Windsor, a patriot whose extensive research in North Carolina history, intimate knowledge thereof and high educational attainments seemed to fit him particularly to officiate at this event.

After an informal luncheon at the hospitable home of the Misses Albertson, West Church street, at which were present Judge Winston, Windsor, N. C.; Mrs. W. D. Pruden; Mrs. Eugene Marriner, of the Penelope Barker Chapter Daughters of the Revolution of Edenton, North Carolina; Rev. Dr. Drane, Chaplain of the Sons of the Revolution, Edenton, North Carolina; Rev. C. F. Smith, pastor Christ Episcopal Church; Captain E. R. Outlaw and Miss Outlaw; Miss Sophie E. Martin; Professor Sheep, Superintendent of Public Instruction; Hon. I. M. Meekins, Assistant District Attorney Eastern District, North Carolina, all of this city; Misses Virginia Flora, Catherine Jones, Rose Smith, Mahala Meekins, members of the local chapter Junior Daughters and the members of this chapter, a start was made at 1 p. m. for the scene of the unveiling, under the most discouraging circumstances of lowering skies, frequent showers and muddy roads.

However, upon arriving at Hall's Creek Church, the spirits of the Elizabeth City delegation were quickly revived by the evidences of cordial appreciation and sincere sympathy exhibited on the part of the citizens, men, women and children of the surrounding community, who showed much interest in the object of our visit, introduced us to their church, which had been prettily decorated, and extended us every courtesy. Owing to the weather conditions it was decided to make a change in the program and to unveil the tablet prior to the other exercises. The stone had been previously draped with the North Carolina colors and a National Ensign, to both of which were attached streamers of the buff and blue, held by four charter members of the Junior Chapter, Misses Meekins, Jones, Flora, and Smith, who, upon the conclusion of a brief address by the Rev. C. F. Smith, drew aside the colors, revealing the Memorial Stone in its simple though significant proportions, bearing the inscription, "Here was held the First Albemarle Assembly Feb. 6, 1665. Erected by the Sir Walter Raleigh Chapter, Daughters of the Revolution, June 11, 1910."

Immediately afterwards the audience passed into the church, Rev. R. B. Drane offered the opening prayer and in the absence of the pastor, Rev. J. M. Jackson, who had consented to be present and bid us welcome, this latter office was most fittingly discharged by Mr. H. E. Stokely, of Nixonton. The program was then carried out as follows:

State Anthem.....Old North State.
Introduction of Speaker.....Rev. C. F. Smith.
Address.....Judge F. D. Winston.
Hymn.....My Country, 'Tis of Thee.
Benediction.....Rev. R. B. Drane, Chaplain Sons of the Revolution.

The scholarly address of Judge Winston was not only applicable to this particular occasion, but shed light on historical associations dear to the heart of the North Carolinian. It would be lacking in appreciation were the Daughters to record this happy event without expressing further their sincere thanks to the Rev. C. F. Smith for his hearty sympathy and invaluable services as chairman on the occasion. Upon the conclusion of the exercises the several participants dispersed to their respective homes, impressed with the profitable nature of the proceedings and grateful to those who made it a success. One of the most noticeable features of the whole function was the evident impression it made upon the citizens of this immediate vicinity and the great interest all of them took in the exercises. This, as being directly in line of the intent of the Society, was most gratifying.

Later, at a meeting of the local Chapter, on Monday, June 13, resolutions of thanks were adopted to the citizens of Nixonton for their cordial sympathy and co-operation, and to Judge Winston for his timely and appropriate address, both of which were spread on the minutes of this Chapter.

ADDRESS DELIVERED AT UNVEILING OF TABLET AT NIXONTON, N. C.

BY HON. F. D. WINSTON,
(Former Lieutenant Governor of North Carolina.)

Madame President—Ladies and Fellow Citizens:

For more than three centuries the spread of the English-speaking people, over the waste places of earth, has been not only the most striking feature of the world's history, but also the event of all others, most far-reaching in its effects and its importance.

The tongue which Lord Bacon feared to use in his writings, lest they should remain forever unknown to all but the inhabitants of a relatively unimportant insular kingdom, is now the speech of two continents.

The common law which Lord Coke jealously upheld in the lower half of a single European Island, is now the law of the land throughout the vast regions of Australia and of America to the north of the Rio Grande.

The names of the plays that Shakespeare wrote are household words in the mouths of mighty nations, whose wide domains were to him more unreal than the realm of Prester John.

Over half the descendants of their fellow countrymen of that day now dwell in lands, which, when these Englishmen were born, held not a single inhabitant. The race which, when they were in their prime, was hemmed in between the North and the Irish Seas, to-day holds sway over the world, whose endless coasts are washed by the waters of the three great oceans.

There have been many other races that at one time or another had their great periods of race expansion, as distinguished from mere conquest, but there has never been another whose expansion has been either so broad or so rapid.

Contemporary with the philosopher, with the judge, with the playwright, was the diplomat, the soldier, the discoverer, Sir Walter Raleigh.

It is fitting that this good company should meet under the authority of his name to mark the spot, not far remote from the sands upon which his keels first touched, where the earliest effort at representative government was inaugurated in our State.

We are fortunate indeed in having with us the Penelope Barker Chapter, for that name also recalls another scene in our life hardly less worthy of note than our discovery; for the discovery is in vain unless the subsequent deeds of the planted colony are in keeping with the ideals of the original planting.

The presence of our visitors reminds me that Thomas Barker, the husband of the Penelope Barker, after whom their Chapter is named, was for many years the leading citizen and lawyer of Bertie County. He was born in London, was college bred, and read law in the Inner Temple. He was a man of large affairs. In 1748 he was appointed one of the first Code Commissioners of North Carolina. He lived on his plantation near what is now St. Johns in Hertford County, then the county seat of Bertie County.

In 1742, the seat of government of Bertie County was moved to near Windsor, and it became inconvenient to the great lawyer to search records and attend courts. He therefore sought a wider field for his talents and located at Edenton, where he afterwards married Penelope Ellsbeck, who presided over the Edenton Tea Party.

And here I wish to call attention to the claim made by the descendants of Thomas Barker, that the oil painting in Edenton, a copy of which appears in Dr. Richard Dillard's most interesting "Edenton Tea Party" article, is not the image of Penelope Barker, but is the picture of her step daughter, Betsy Barker. Dr. Edward Williams Pugh, of Windsor, himself a kinsman of the descendants of Thomas Barker, a man of wide genealogical research and splendid and discriminating literary taste, and a writer of note, received from the late John Buxton Willams, a great grandson of Thomas Barker, the statement that the painting is the likeness of his grandmother, Betsy Barker, who married Colonel William Tunstall, of Bertie County.

It will be recalled that Thomas Barker in his will was particular to prevent any of his property falling into the hands of Colonel Tunstall, and his gifts to Mrs. Tunstall were very cautiously guarded to prevent that occurrence.

Dr. Pugh also has in his possession a copy—protograph—of the painting which was sent to him by Mrs. Clement C. Clay, of Huntsville, Alabama. On the back of the picture is endorsed in Mrs. Clay's handwriting, "Betsy Barker, painted in 1760."

Mrs. Clay was the great-great-granddaughter of Thomas Barker and of course the great-granddaughter of Betsy Barker.

Betsy Barker was a daughter of Thomas Barker and his wife, Ferebee (Savage) Pugh, the widow of Francis Pugh, of Bertie County. Mr. John Buxton Williams informed Dr. Pugh that the painting was the work of Princeley, the celebrated English artist.

In tracing the development of a country there are two periods that engage the attention of the historian; the period of discovery and the period of colonization.

The period of discovery passes away with the record of its occurrence. From the period of colonization we estimate and sum up results.

The people who laid the foundations of colonization in this new world were nearly all refugees, exiles, wanderers, pilgrims. They were urged across the ocean by a common impulse; and that impulse was the desire to escape some form of oppression in the old world. Sometimes it was the oppression of the state. Sometimes it was the oppression of society. Sometimes it was the oppression of the church.

In the wake of the emigrant ship there was always tyranny. Men loved freedom; to find it they braved the perils of the deep, traversed the solitary forests of Maine, built log huts on the shores of New England; entered the Hudson, explored the Jerseys; found shelter in the Chesapeake; met starvation and death on the banks of the James; were buffeted by storms around the capes of the Carolinas; bravely dared Hatteras to disappear in mystery; built towns by the estuaries of mighty rivers; made roads through pine forests, and carried the dwellings of men to the very margin of the fever-haunted swamps of the South. It is all one story, the story of the human race seeking for liberty.

The first planting of the English race in America was on North Carolina soil. Raleigh's Colony came for that purpose. Others had come before but not to plant a race. The Norseman had come across frozen seas with the daring and endurance of demigods. They sought only adventure. The Spaniard had come, but only for love of gold. Cortez had conquered Mexico and Pizarro, Peru. The Spanish flag waved and the Spanish Cross glistened on the peaks of the Andes and the shores of the Pacific, but nowhere in the new world, until Raleigh sent his colony to this State, was heard the cry of an infant child of pure Caucasian blood, proclaiming the birth of the white race on the Western Hemisphere. The Spaniard came with sword and cannon, with cross and crucifix, to conquer and to plunder. Soldiers and sailors, priests and friars, adventurers and plunderers, pirates of the sea and robbers of the land, forsaking wives, children and homes, they sought in the new world new fields for lust, avarice and conquest. They left their women behind, and took to wife the savage women of America. Behold the result to-day in the hybrid races of Mexico, and of Central America! Spanish fathers, Indian mothers, hybrid children, homes of lust and of tyranny! Immeasurable inequalities between father, mother and children!

Raleigh knew better. Scholar, soldier, orator, statesman, philosopher, he knew that the English race, with its splendid civilization, could be transplanted to America only by transplanting the English home. He knew that civilization everywhere is built upon the home, and that every home is what the mother makes it. He filled his ships with women as well as men; he sent out colonies, not pirates; he planted in America not English forts but the English race. The Governor of his colony set the example of taking his wife and family, among them a grown daughter, Eleanor, a young wife and expectant mother. Here was life in all its gentleness and fullness! What need for guns and cannon! When the infant cry of Virginia Dare was heard on Roanoke Island, it sounded around the world and called across the seas all of the millions who have since come to build the American nation. It was a new cry, in a new world, a mightier sound than the clash of sword or the roar of cannon; a sweeter call than the vesper bell of hooded priest with his vows of celibacy.

That baby cry sounded the death knell of Spanish power in the universe, and the final overthrow everywhere of king-craft, priest-craft, lust-craft. It told anew the old story of life, how every life not only of the individual human being, but also of races, of nations, of civilizations, must begin with and be dependent on a little child, a little child born in lawful wedlock, a pledge of holy love between man and woman, equally matched and equally sharing the joys and responsibilities of life. This was the lesson of Raleigh's colonies, a chapter of which we read to-day; the lesson the Spaniard never heard in all his heroic efforts to conquer and possess the new world. In Spanish conquest and colonization, no part was played by women and children; it was a jungle struggle for the mastery between human animals. In English conquest and colonization women and children went hand and hand with men. Wherever the English race has gone, to Roanoke Island, to Lucknow, to Gettysburg, a little child has led them; led them in affection, in memory, in inspiration to deeds of daring and fortitude.

Among all the little children of our race none stands out more pathetic, more dramatic, more significant of mighty events, than the child of Raleigh's colony, the first Anglo-Saxon born in America, little Virginia Dare, native of North Carolina.

Upon our soil she received the rite of Christian baptism, without which basis the colonization of America would have failed.

I commend to your enterprising Chapter the placing of a picture of her christening in our nation's capital, with mother and babe and minister of God as the central figure, and around them grouped the little colony, standing on shore; to the east the deep blue ocean stretching far away, on its ever restless bosom an endless procession of ships, bringing races and nations from the old world to new life, liberty and freedom; to the west endless multitudes of Anglo-Saxons, peopling the continent and making indeed a new world; and underneath this inscription:

"And a little child shall lead them."

Many incidents have marked the growth of Raleigh's ideas into our present civilization, either one of which would be proper and profitable for our study at this hour. I leave them to abler hands.

You render your State a rich service in placing this tablet. It will commemorate, not only the first assembling of the people of North Carolina for law-making, but it will also mark their first coming to the State. They had been here but a few years when that first assembly was held here. I shall not enter into controversy with those who have sought special reasons for the settlement of North Carolina. The early settlers here have been on the one hand described as lawless and fugitives from justice, idle and thriftless and simply adventurous and migratory; on the other hand they have been held up as the victims of religious persecution, fleeing hither for conscience sake.

The real situation and facts do not bear out either theory, but both decidedly convince us that the first North Carolina settlers came at the instance of the agents of the Lords Proprietors to take up the valuable lands they then had for settlement.

You will recall that it was a gradual movement—so natural that the particulars are not recorded in the local annals of the time. The truth is that a few active spirits, perhaps more adventurous than their neighbors, resolved to make new homes in a more attractive locality, delightful climate, magnificent bottom lands, and bountiful products.

It was no great company that came from Nansemond through the wilderness and brought their supplies and implements for house building by water from some convenient point in Virginia.

They came not as conquerors, writing their names in blood on the scroll of fame, nor yet were they exiles from the habitations of mankind for conscience sake. It was a time of profound peace in Virginia, when the freemen still governed themselves, chose their own officers, made their own laws.

It was not oppression that drove these first settlers into the wilderness. It was a clergyman of the church of England in Virginia, Roger Green, who was given the first grant of land in 1653 to be located on the Roanoke River in what is now Bertie County, as a reward for inducing settlements to be made.

These first settlers were not discontented with the Democratic-Republican institutions under which they were living. They were not fleeing from the ills of life, nor plunging into the primeval forest to escape the tyranny of their fellow-men. They were bold, enterprising, hardy Virginians, nurtured in freedom's ways, who were wooed to this summer land by the advantages of its situation. The movement involved no great change. It was merely a removal of a few miles beyond the outlying districts of Nansemond with water communication to the marts of trade on the Chesapeake. Nor did they come without the sanction of the Indians, who were to be their neighbors in these new plantations. They came in peace and were received as friends by the native inhabitants, who surrounded them. Lawless men would have made no such peaceful approach. Discontented men would not have been so friendly. Beggars and fugitives from justice could not have brought the means of buying homes and could not have bought them.

Some act of dishonesty, of double dealing, of attempted fraud inevitably follows the advent of the criminal, the vicious, the tramp. Neither history, nor tradition gives us any stain upon the characters of those founders of our State. When they had wrongs to be redressed they petitioned those in authority. The vicious would have had no such inclination; he would have righted his own grievances. Those fleeing from persecution would not have petitioned those of like life and aims and purposes with those from whom they had fled. They would have borne in silence the new wrong as a cherished privilege of again suffering for conscience sake. Within six years, at most, of their coming we find them in lawful assemblage asking the Lords Proprietors for a redress of wrongs. Well authenticated tradition tells us that the meeting was on this spot.

"In Grandfather Tales," the late Colonel Richard Benbury Creecy tells of a ride to this spot with General Duncan McDonald of Edenton: "Towards evening we crossed Hall's Creek bridge in Pasquotank County, a mile from the Hecklefield farm, at Nixonton. On rising the hill at Hall's Creek the General stopped his horse and said to us, 'The first General Assembly of North Carolina met under that tree,' at the same time pointing to a large oak tree on the left-hand side of the road, that towered above the oaks that surrounded it."

As this meeting was in the month of January and the house of a neighbor and well wisher of the movement was near at hand, and as the matter involved careful consideration, doubtless so much of the tradition as places the meeting under the oak may well be ascribed to the romantic.

Had these people come to North Carolina for any other cause than that of better location, no doubt some mention of those causes would have been contained in the action taken, either as a protest against repetition, or as an evidence of their final escape from them and of their real joy in their new home with every form of freedom.

Two propositions were presented. The first was that they be granted the same quit rents as were paid in Virginia. The second was that they be permitted to pay the rents in kind, and not be compelled to pay in money.

Thomas Woodward, the Surveyor-general and a member of the Council when government was set up in Albemarle County, on June 2d, 1665, wrote to the Lords Proprietors, saying: "The people will not remove from Virginia upon harder conditions than they can live there, it being land only that they came for."

He also mentions that he has been "many years endeavoring and encouraging the people to seat Albemarle and that those that live upon a place are best able to judge of the place, therefore, the petition of the General Assembly that was here convened will deserve your Honors' serious consideration."

That these people were not malcontents, lawless, complainers, irresponsible, is evidenced finally both by the reasonable requests they made and by the ready response received to their reasonable demands, for on the first day of May, 1668, the Lords Proprietors delivered to "Our trusty and well beloved Samuel Stephens, Esquire, Governor of our county of Albemarle, and of the Isles and Islets within ten leagues thereof; and to our trusty and well beloved counselors and assistants to our said Governor, the Great deed," in which the quit rents were reduced to the Virginia basis and might be paid in kind.

I have assumed that your program would otherwise provide for giving on this occasion such local historical matter as would give the State its first real view of this historic spot.

You will pardon another reference to the character of the men who settled our State. As a child it made my blood hot with indignation to read that they were indifferent citizens. There is no better way of judging a people than by a study of the laws they enact. Let us for a moment study our ancestors in the light of legislation.

We are not able to say definitely when the people of the colony here in representative assembly first submitted laws to the Lords Proprietors for their ratification. We at least know that it was soon after government was first organized here, for within ten years we find that on January 20, 1669, the Lords Proprietors ratified nine separate acts previously submitted by the Grand General Assembly of Albemarle, in North Carolina. These acts were again ratified and passed at an Assembly held October 15th, 1715, at the house of Captain Richard Sanderson on Little River in Perquimans County. Mr. Francis Nixon, after whom this locality is named transmitted the laws to the Proprietors.

As we would expect much of these acts is devoted to the subject of encouraging immigration and settlement.

As an encouragement to persons to come into the county they stay the hand of the court and bill collector for five years during which time, "Noe person transporting themselves into this county shall be lyable to be sued for any debt contracted or cause of action given without the county and that noe person living in this county shall on any pretence whatsoever receive any letter of Attorney, Bill or account, to recover any debt within the time above mentioned of a debtor living here without the said debtor freely consent to it."

And for this reason mainly the statement is made that our early settlers were thieves, rogues and vagabonds. It is enough to say in reply that Dukes, Earls, Lords and men of eminence on the Board of Lords Proprietors ratified this act twice and gave it their sanction. It happens, however, that North Carolina was neither the pioneer, nor alone in this kind of legislation. Twice her sister state, Virginia, in 1642, and in 1663 re-enacted such a law, and in 1683 and 1696 South Carolina passed similar acts.

You will find similar provisions in the earliest regulations in every effort at colonization. Georgia was founded in opposition to the known law of England—imprisonment for debt.

And to further encourage "the transporting of persons and their families into this county to plant and here seat themselves, they shall be exempted from paying levies for one whole year after their arrival. Provided always there be noe emergent charge which the Vice-Pallatine, Council and Assembly shall judge extraordinary."

And to prevent speculation in lands, and to encourage actual and bona fide settlers, it was provided that "noe person or persons whatsoever shall make sale of their right or rights to land until he hath binn two complete years at least an inhabitant in the county."

The adventurous, the land grabber, met with small favor and they passed an act preventing the taking up of more than 640 acres in any one dividend. And to more readily secure permanence of settlement an act was passed requiring all persons who had made small clearings and quit them, to repair to the land within six months, and actually use and occupy them. In default of this the Governor and Council were to take possession, rent them out and collect the rents, and out of them first to pay the party abandoning the land for any improvements put upon them. The free booter does no such act of justice and equity.

For their own security and for promoting and maintaining their friendly relations with the Indians, an act limited the number and character of people who could trade and truck with these natives. The lawless would have considered the Indian a proper subject of pillage. They also provided for paying the Governor and his Council reasonable compensation and expenses and placed the burden upon those most able to bear it, as a part of the court costs.

The marriage law passed at this session has also been the subject of bitter reproach, although it simply authorized civil officers to celebrate the rites of matrimony. The law, it was said tended directly to gross immorality and vice. Experience has proven otherwise; it made marriage easy, but not divorce. The Virginia law required the marriage rites to be solemnized by a clergyman of the church of England, but as there were no clergymen of any sort in Albemarle, the present law was a necessity, bearing in mind at least St. Paul's wise injunction that "it is better to marry than to burn."

It is divorce, not matrimony, that tends to licentiousness.

It was marriage, not divorce that this law made easy. At this distance of time we can confirm the wisdom of the act by pointing to a pure and holy family status that obtains in North Carolina, not surpassed by any in the civilized world.

Permit one more reference to an act which shows that whatever our first settlers were, we their descendants now are. They were against trusts and combines. Hear them:

"Whereas divers adventurers have transported commodyties into this country which hath binn engrossed by some particular persons to retail again at unreasonable rates to the Inhabitants of this county to prevent which inconvenience for the future. It is enacted and be it enacted by the Pallatine and Proprietors by and with the advice and consent of this present Grand Assembly and the authority thereof that any person whatsoever within this county shall after the publication hereof presume to engross any quantity of goods from any adventurer to sell and retail again at unreasonable rates to the inhabitants shall forfeit for every such offence tenn thousand pounds of tobacco, the one halfe to the informer, the other halfe to the use of the Lords Proprietors."

And to those who deny the right of our law-making power to change the burden of proof and make a presumption of guilt arise on certain academic facts let me commend the rule of evidence laid down. "And it is hereby further declared and enacted by the authority aforesaid that any person or persons that shall buy goods of any adventurer and retail the same, except he cann in tenn days produce to the vallew of said goods so purchased of his own proper Tobacco or Estate according to the bargain in kind, he shall be deemed an Ingrocer and proceed against as in this act for that case is provided."

No, fellow-citizens, those men were the genesis of the present day North Carolina. Measure them by any of the standards that have obtained in estimating colonists, and we are content. They were the first to firmly ask a redress of wrongs. They were the first to declare for freedom. They pursued with valor and ability every known method of men determined to establish an enduring government. Their descendants to-day are the purest Anglo-Saxons on the globe. The highest ideal of personal, mercantile and professional conduct still obtains among them. Now, as then, their legislation is responsive to the needs of the people. The source of this stream must have been pure.

A GLIMPSE OF HISTORIC YORKTOWN

BY MRS. HELEN DE B. WILLS.

On October 19, 1909, the one hundred and twenty-eighth anniversary of the surrender of Lord Cornwallis to General George Washington at Yorktown, Virginia, that historic town was the scene of a memorable celebration, conducted under the joint auspices of the Descendants of Signers and the Yorktown Historical Society of the United States.

The Yorktown of to-day is a village of about one hundred and twenty-five inhabitants, "a relic of antiquity as well as a monument to American patriotism," as it has been called.

A large crowd was present on the occasion above mentioned than has been in Yorktown since 1881, when the monument which overlooks the village and its picturesque surroundings was unveiled—erected in honor of the famous surrender on the centennial of that event. The message conveying the news of the surrender from Yorktown to Philadelphia, then the seat of Government, took four days to go. To-day it might be sent the length and breadth of the United States in less than four minutes.

Situated on a hill overlooking the York River, a broad winding stream of blue water, this historic village is a beautiful and picturesque spot. Unusually this stream is as barren of boats as the hillsides are of houses, but on this 19th of October, 1909, a flotilla of torpedo boats attached to the Maryland Naval Reserves rode at anchor on its bosom, appearing in gala decorations in honor of the occasion.

The lone dock at the foot of the hill swarmed with soldiers —five companies of artillery sent over from Fort Monroe to help in the celebration. These marched through the town, colors flying and bands playing, while a procession of citizens led by a number of mounted horsemen and horsewomen with the Fort Monroe band and a parade of the school children of York County and town, made the streets lively. Lunch followed this demonstration, and at two o'clock the speakers' stand, erected in front of the historic old Nelson Mansion, was occupied by the orators of the day and members of the two patriotic societies.

House Where Cornwallis Surrendered, Yorktown, Va

Earlier in the day these societies had held business meetings in the Nelson house and elsewhere.

Now the school children gathered on the seats arranged for them, the military bands were also seated while banners representing the thirteen original States floated over the heads of the young singers. The children, with the band accompanying, sang "America" and other patriotic songs, at intervals, while the crowd of citizens of York County and elsewhere, stood patiently around listening to the speeches and the music.

A call to order by Dr. Henry Morris, of Philadelphia, President of the Descendants of Signers, was followed by an invocation by Rev. Donald C. MacLeod, of Washington, D. C.

An address by Dr. Morris was heard with marked interest and attention, and one by the Chairman, Hon. James G. Riddick, Mayor of Norfolk, Virginia, was also much appreciated.

After music by the children and the band, Colonel Oswald Tilghman, of Easton, Maryland, read the correspondence between General Washington and Lord Cornwallis concerning the surrender; also the articles of capitulation, and the official message from General Washington to the Continental Congress at Philadelphia, which was carried on horseback by Lieutenant-Colonel Tench Tilghman, the ancestor of the speaker, Colonel Oswald Tilghman, who gave an interesting address.

Music, singing by the children with accompaniment by the band, was followed by an impressive address by Hon. J. Hampton Moore, M.C., of Philadelphia, President of the Atlantic Deeper Waterways Association.

The exercises concluded with a benediction by Rev. George Washington Dame, S.T.D., Chaplain of the Descendants of Signers.

Succeeding these exercises the pleasure was enjoyed by the members of the two societies of making each other's acquaintance, and also of meeting members of the Nelson family, of whom many were present. The historic Nelson Mansion is preserved and used as a museum for relics and other interesting material contributed by members of the family and others.

The Yorktown Historical Society decorated us with their badges for this memorable occasion.

Only want of time prevented our closer examination of all the interesting places and things to be seen at Yorktown, and we left with the resolve to go again, if possible.

COLONEL POLK'S REBELLION.

BY CAPTAIN S. A. ASHE.

The dramatic incidents in the proceeding of Mecklenburg County in May, 1775, were those in which Colonel Tom Polk was the chief actor. "Tom Polk has raised a pretty spirit in the back country," wrote the rebellious Sam Johnston to our Delegates in the Continental Congress; "He has gone farther than I would have chose to have gone," etc. Yes; certainly, it was Tom Polk, and well-known throughout the Province. The figure of the energetic Colonel, stirring up the people, and inciting them to rebellion, and, when all was ripe for action, calling for the election of two delegates from each of his militia districts, prepared to assert Independence and to ordain a rebel government, stands out boldly in the picture of that day, and challenges our admiration. In the scene, he is the central figure and around him cluster his lieutenants as he moves forward in the role of the rebel chieftain of his people. But in full sympathy with him are his patriot associates, among them being the scholarly Brevard who develops the system of government to supplant the cast-off British, and prepares the resolves to be ratified by popular action. At length the plan is evolved, the preliminaries arranged, the election held; the delegates meet, the Resolves are adopted. Independence is decreed, the old government is overthrown and a new one ordained; and the inhabitants with enthusiasm assent and ratify the action! As the occasion was great—so it was a great crowd that sent up a mighty shout when Tom Polk proclaimed Independence from the court-house door—for one-half of all the county were there, and their huzzas made the welkin ring, and hats were thrown high in the air.

And so the design was accomplished, and Colonel Polk's rebellion took form and shape, and a government by the people was ordained, which marked an advance far beyond the action of any other community.

In view of these known facts, is it not remarkable that in the account of the proceedings in Mecklenburg County, commonly accepted as a contemporaneous narrative of these proceedings, the name of Colonel Thomas Polk does not appear? Nor does that of Dr. Brevard appear; nor is there any mention made in that narrative of the great public meeting, or of the ratification by the inhabitants of the action of the delegation. Is it not remarkable that in that narrative of these proceedings there is nothing said about "Independence being proclaimed"? Surely these omissions remind one of "the play of Hamlet, with Hamlet left out." It is Tom Polk's rebellion with no mention of Tom Polk!

This first account, properly called the Alexander narrative, was published in the Raleigh Register in 1819. It was found in the papers of John McKnitt Alexander, who died in 1817; and his son, Dr. Joseph Alexander furnished it for publication. In it, the writer of it stated that Colonel Adam Alexander was colonel of the county and called the election; that Colonel Abram Alexander presided over the meeting, and that John McKnitt Alexander was clerk of the meeting. There was no mention of either Polk or Brevard. But the author of the narrative did not say that it was the original document prepared in 1775; nor did he say that it was even a copy of the original. On the contrary, he appended to it a certificate that the original was burnt in April, 1800, and that later during that year, he prepared this manuscript which therefore "might not literally correspond with the burnt original"—as it was written from memory. There was no mention in it of Colonel Polk's name; nor of Dr. Brevard's name; nor of any meeting of the inhabitants and their ratification of the plan to establish a people's government founded on the will of the people.

How then has it happened that our literature has been enriched by some very eloquent descriptions of that remarkable scene—when the rebel Tom Polk proclaimed Independence? As portrayed by our historical writers we see Colonel Polk's stalwart form on the high steps of the famous courthouse—surrounded by a great concourse of hardy men, eager, excited, enthusiastic. We hear him read the resolves. We hear him proclaim Independence—we hear the shouts and huzzas of a thousand throats and witness a scene of remarkable enthusiasm—a scene for the brush of the painter, for the pen of the artist. But that dramatic episode—that great ending of the tense action of the leaders—that final accomplishment of their high purpose to start the ball of Independence—finds no mention in Colonel Alexander's narrative of these great and memorable proceedings. Certainly it is singular that what is commonly considered to be an account of the Mecklenburg Declaration omits the name of the chief actor, and also omits the important fact that the people endorsed, accepted, confirmed, ratified the proposed Independent government by a manifestation of their enthusiastic approval!

Among the many curious circumstances in our literature, this is indeed one of the most curious!

But notwithstanding these omissions in the Alexander narrative, it is now firmly fixed in our literature that Colonel Polk was the rebel chieftain, the patriot leader, and that he called the election, and, in one of the most dramatic scenes ever enacted, proclaimed Independence.

In view of these circumstances it is interesting to observe the changes which have taken place in the accepted version of these historical proceedings.

Immediately following the first publication of the Alexander narrative—1819—Colonel William Polk, then residing in Raleigh, wrote to old men in Mecklenburg to get their statements about these memorable events. In a general way they confirmed the statement that in May, 1775, Mecklenburg declared Independence. Some said that Colonel Polk was colonel of the county and called the election—and not Abram Alexander. Also they gave an account of the great meeting, at which Colonel Polk proclaimed Independence and of the popular ratification.

Judge Murphey was gathering material for a history of the State, and at his invitation Colonel William Polk prepared a narrative of the proceedings in Mecklenburg, in which he incorporated the Alexander narrative, published in 1819, altered, however, to make it conform to the statements of the other witnesses—that it was Colonel Polk who called the election; and also making reference to the great and enthusiastic ratification meeting.

Judge Murphey, who was an accomplished writer, dressed up Colonel Polk's narrative, slightly changing the language here and there, and introducing expressions of his own. And so it came about that in 1821 the historical version was modified making it conform in some details to the statements of the witnesses made in 1820. Eight years later, in 1829, Judge Martin published in his history of the State a document that followed closely the narrative prepared by Colonel Polk and dressed up by Judge Murphey. The fundamental basis of all was the Alexander narrative, but the Martin document differed from that in some particulars, and was copied from the Polk and Murphey narratives.

In 1830 other witnesses likewise made statements; and in 1833 the Legislative Committee published "The State Pamphlet." In this there was a reproduction of the Alexander narrative as published in 1819, modified by some verbal changes made Dr. Joseph Alexander, who held the manuscript papers of his father. And particularly is it noted that in this publication, it is said that Colonel Polk called the election—not Adam Alexander as was stated in the narrative published in 1819. But the Legislative Committee did not stop there. They brought forward in the "State Pamphlet" all the testimony given by the witnesses in 1820 and 1830. And as the Legislative Committee corrected the "original proceedings" published in 1819, our historical writers have made further corrections and have interwoven into the account of the proceedings such facts and circumstances as the evidence of the witnesses warrants. Thus despite the fact that the Alexander narrative does not mention Colonel Polk's name at all, and that the account given in Martin's history does not mention that Colonel Polk proclaimed Independence—our historical writers brushing aside these accounts, give him all credit for both, and it is now firmly established that the proceedings in Mecklenburg were in truth and indeed Colonel Tom Polk's rebellion and that he was the leading actor in it.

WAS GEORGE DURANT ORIGINALLY A QUAKER?

*Duluth, Minnesota, April 23d, 1910.

Captain S. A. Ashe,
Raleigh, N. C.

Dear Sir:—I was interested in your brief sketch of George Durant, which appeared in the current April number of North Carolina Booklet.

At page 215 you say that George Durant was married in Northumberland County, Virginia, by Reverend David Lindsay; "but whether Parson Lindsay was of the Church of England or not is now unknown."

If Durant were a Quaker and married by a "priest," he would have been "disowned" by the meeting of Friends to which he belonged. The Reverend David Lindsay was a "priest" within the meaning of the term as used by the Quakers, being an Episcopal clergyman of the original Wicomico Church of Northumberland County, Virginia. The first Reverend David Lindsay, Minister of Leith, suburb of Edinburgh, Scotland, was Bishop of Ross. He was the son of Alexander Lindsay, of Edzell Castle, who was the son of David Lindsay, eighth Earl of Crawford. Reverend David Lindsay, Bishop of Ross, was chaplain for King James I of England and VI of Scotland. He accompanied King James on his matrimonial voyage to Denmark and performed the marriage ceremony. Bishop Lindsay baptized King Charles I and his brother, Prince Henry. He was succeeded by his son-in-law, Archbishop Spottswood, the King's Primate, and in the ministry at Leith he died in 1613.

*This letter from a subscriber of The North Carolina Booklet relates to the article in the April issue by Captain S. A. Ashe, and is of such value it is given here in full—Editor.

The Bishop of Ross left two children, a son and a daughter. The son was Sir Hierome (or Jerome) Lindsay. Upon the marriage of the latter with his cousin he became Sir Hierome Lindsay of the Mount and was appointed Lord Lion King at Arms, he being the fourth and last of the Lindsays to hold this office. The daughter of the Bishop of Ross married Archbishop Spottswood, the historian and divine. She was the grandmother of Governor Alexander Spottswood, of Virginia, ancestor of General Robert E. Lee, the Nelsons, etc.

The following record of the baptism of David Lyndsay, first son of Sir Hierome (Jerome) Lyndsay, will be found in the South Leith Church records at the Register House, Edinburgh, Scotland:

"Jerome (or Hierome) Lyndsay and Margaret Colville, their infant, baptized David, 2d January, 1603.

"Witness—1, David Lyndsay, of Edzell, Kt.; 2, George Ramsay, of Dalhousie; 3, Mr. David Lyndsay." (See "Lives of the Lindsays" by Lord Lindsay, published in London, 1849 and again in 1857; "The Lindsays of America" by Margaret Lindsay; Virginia Magazine of History and Biography and Baltimore Sun, 1906.)

On the plantation of Mrs. W. F. Basye, of Cherry Point, Northumberland County, Virginia, there is a burial place where the remains of the Reverend David Lindsay were laid to rest. A tombstone was raised to his memory bearing the following inscription:

"Here Lyeth Interred Ye Body of That Holy and Reverant Devine, Mr. David Lyndsay, Late Minister of Wicomico Church, Who Was Born in ye Kingdom of Scotland, First and Lawfull Sonne of ye Rt. Honorable Sir Hierome Lyndsay, Knt. of Ye Mount, Lord Liu King at Armes, Who Departed This Life in the 64th Year of His Age the 3d Aprill. Anno Dom. 1667."

A copy has been preserved in the family for several generations.

In 1702 his grandson, Captain Thomas Opie, was buried in the same grave. At a later date, because the former stone was beginning to crumble, the following inscription was carved on the slab which bore the name of Captain Opie:

"Here Lyeth the body of Mr. David Lyndsy, Doctor of Divinity, who departed this life the 3d day of April, 1667."

In 1906, a part of the stone first mentioned was discovered beneath the surface of the earth near the grave of the Reverend David Lindsay and upon being freed from soil was photographed disclosing much of the inscription first above quoted, and the family coat of arms.

The facts last stated can be verified by Mr. W. F. Basye, of Cherry Point, Northumberland County, Virginia, by Wm. S. Cralle, Clerk of Court and Notary Public, by Mr. A. B. Garner, Justice of the Peace for said county, and by Mr. W. Dade Hempstone, Clerk of the Circuit Court of Loudon County, Virginia, who saw and examined the older stone..

The will of the Reverend David Lindsay was dated 2d April, 1667, and was proved and recorded in Northumberland County, 8th of April, 1667. In it he refers to himself as follows:

"I, David Lindsay, Minister of God's word in Virginia."

It is quite clear from the antecedents of the Reverend David Lindsay and the inscription on his tombstone above quoted that he was an Episcopal clergyman and it is not improbable that George Durant was a member of the same church. It is extremely improbable that George Durant was a Quaker at the time of his marriage.

It would perhaps be difficult to say from what family our George Durant descended, but in 1627, the Reverend George Durant was incumbent of Blockley in Shropshire, England, and Reverend Robert Durant, of Hagley, in 1706; the latter was succeeded in the rectory of Hagley in 1732 by the Reverend Josiah Durant and he, in 1764, by the Reverend John Durant.

In 1765, General George Durant, M.P., of Clent, in Shropshire, purchased Tong Castle in said county. His son, George Durant, of Tong Castle, was born in 1776.

The pedigree of the Durants was entered at the Visitation of Hants, England, in 1634, but terminates with Thomas Durant, 7 Edward III (1334). A pedigree of the same family was entered at the Visitation of Rutland in 1618. (The Heraldry of Worcestershire.)

In the eighth year of Henry VI (1430), one, John Durant, was Lord of the Manor of Barcheston in Warwickshire, England. He was succeeded by Thomas Durant and the latter by William Durant. The son of the latter, Henry Durant, disposed of the property by deed, 14th September, 23 Henry VII, (1508). Dugdale's "Warwickshire," first edition, pp. 455-6.

I trust that the foregoing notes may be of some assistance in solving the much-mooted question whether George Durant was or was not a Quaker.

It is to be regretted that there is not in each State of our country a society such as that publishing the William Salt Collections in Staffordshire, England. Every shred of information should be secured and preserved now for the future historians who will bitterly censure us for our neglect and loss of most precious materials.

Magazines of the character of the New England Historical and Genealogical Register, the Virginia Magazine of History and Biography and the William and Mary Quarterly, are of great value in this direction. Your State is rich in materials but I fear they are not being cared for properly. The suspension of the North Carolina Register was a public calamity.

Sincerely yours, WM. B. PHELPS.

INFORMATION

Concerning the Patriotic Society

"Daughters of the Revolution"

The General Society was founded October 11, 1890,—and organized August 20, 1891,—under the name of "Daughters of the American Revolution"; was incorporated under the laws of the State of New York as an organization national in its work and purpose. Some of the members of this organization becoming dissatisfied with the terms of entrance, withdrew from it and, in 1891, formed under the slightly differing name "Daughters of the Revolution," eligibility to which from the moment of its existence has been lineal descent from an ancestor who rendered patriotic service during the War of Independence.

"The North Carolina Society"

a subdivision of the General Society, was organized in October, 1896, and has continued to promote the purposes of its institution and to observe the Constitution and By-Laws.

Membership and Qualifications

Any woman shall be eligible who is above the age of eighteen years, of good character, and a lineal descendant of an ancestor who (1) was a signer of the Declaration of Independence, a member of the Continental Congress, Legislature or General Court, of any of the Colonies or States; or (2) rendered civil, military or naval service under the authority of any of the thirteen Colonies, or of the Continental Congress; or (3) by service rendered during the War of the Revolution became liable to the penalty of treason against the government of Great Britain: Provided, that such ancestor always remained loyal to the cause of American Independence.

The chief work of the North Carolina Society for the past eight years has been the publication of the "North Carolina Booklet," a quarterly publication on great events in North Carolina history—Colonial and Revolutionary. $1.00 per year. It will continue to extend its work and to spread the knowledge of its History and Biography in other States.

This Society has its headquarters in Raleigh, N. C., Room 411, Carolina Trust Company Building, 232 Fayetteville Street.

Vol. X OCTOBER, 1910 No. 2

The North Carolina Booklet

"Carolina! Carolina! Heaven's blessings attend her!
While we live we will cherish, protect and defend her."

Published by

THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY
DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION

The object of the Booklet is to aid in developing and preserving North Carolina History. The proceeds arising from its publication will be devoted to patriotic purposes. Editor.

ADVISORY BOARD OF THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET.

MRS. HUBERT HAYWOOD.
MR. E. E. MOFFITT.
MRS. SPIER WHITAKER.
MR. R. D. W. CONNOR.
DR. D. H. HILL.
DR. E. W. SIKES.
MR. W. J. PEELE.
MISS MARTHA HELEN HAYWOOD.
DR. RICHARD DILLARD.
DR. KEMP P. BATTLE.
MR. JAMES SPRUNT.
MR. MARSHALL DELANCEY HAYWOOD.
CHIEF JUSTICE WALTER CLARK.
MAJOR W. A. GRAHAM.

EDITOR:
MISS MARY HILLIARD HINTON.

OFFICERS OF THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION 1910–1912.

REGENT:
MISS MARY HILLIARD HINTON.

VICE-REGENT:
MISS CATHERINE FAUNTLEROY SEYTON ALBERTSON.

HONORARY REGENTS:
MRS. SPIER WHITAKER.
MRS. E. E. MOFFITT.

RECORDING SECRETARY:
MRS. J. LEIGH SKINNER.

CORRESPONDING SECRETARY:
MRS. PAUL H. LEE.

TREASURER:
MRS. FRANK SHERWOOD.

REGISTRAR:
MRS. JOSEPH CHESHIRE WEBB.

GENEALOGIST AND HISTORIAN:
MRS. HELEN DEBERNIERE WILLS.

CUSTODIAN OF RELICS:
MRS. JOHN E. RAY.

CHAPTER REGENTS.

Bloomsbury Chapter.....MRS. HUBERT HAYWOOD, Regent.
Penelope Barker Chapter.....MRS. PATRICK MATTHEW, Regent.
Sir Walter Raleigh Chapter.....MRS. WALKER WALLER JOYNES, Regent.
DeGraffenried Chapter.....MRS. CHARLES SLOVER HOLLISTER, Regent.

FOUNDER OF THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY AND REGENT 1896-1902:
MRS. SPIER WHITAKER.

REGENT 1902:
MRS. D. H. HILL, SR.*

REGENT 1902-1906:
MRS. THOMAS K. BRUNER.

REGENT 1906-1910:
MRS. E. E. MOFFITT.

*Died December 12, 1904.

THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET

Vol. X OCTOBER, 1910 No 2

THE HISTORY OF ORANGE COUNTY—PART I

BY FRANCIS NASH.

Early History of the People of Orange County.

In its genesis, Orange County, like the earth, was without form and void. Created by an act of the Assembly in 1752, its outlines were so indefinite, that no man might know where they were, and for the next two or three years the Assembly was engaged in fixing or moving these lines, after all, to have the whole matter disallowed in England.

The original act (23 S. R., 383) made the county boundary commence "in the Virginia line at a point where Hyco Creek was nearest to it, thence directly to the Bent of the Eno river below the Occanechas, near to the plantation where John Williams now dwelleth," thus leaving what is now Hillsboro in Granville County. The line then ran down the south banks of the Eno and Neuse rivers to the mouth of Horse Creek, thence in a direct line to the intersection of Earl Granville's southern boundary with the Cape Fear River, 35° 34′; thence along said boundary to the Anson County line (half way between the Cape Fear and Yadkin rivers, 23 S. R., 343); thence northwesterly along the Anson line. The next year, 1753, the east boundary of the county was moved further east by running a direct line from the Virginia line 25 miles west of Harrisburg, the county seat of Granville, to the Neuse River. (23 S. R., 390-1.) At the same session, the west boundary of Orange was made more definite by the creation of Rowan County, and making its east boundary a direct line from Earl Granville's line, where the Anson line crossed it, to the Virginia boundary. (23 S. R., 390.) Thus the original county of Orange contained parts of what are now Wake, Randolph, Guilford, and Rockingham counties, and the whole of what are now Durham, Person, Caswell, Alamance, Chatham, and Orange counties. The acts of the Assembly establishing the county of Orange (and others) were disallowed in England and repealed by proclamation as well as by act of Assembly (5 C. R., 1111, and 23 S. R., 446-7). They were, however, re-established in 1756. (23 S. R., 470-1.) In 1761 the east line of the county was straightened by beginning at the southwest corner of Granville and running thence a due south course to Johnston or Cumberland County, whichever line it may first intersect. (23 S. R., 547-8.) In 1771, Guilford (east line 25 miles west of Hillsboro 23 S. R., 823); Chatham (north line 16 miles due south of Hillsboro Idem, 827); and Wake (23 S. R., 819) were established. In 1777, all that part of Orange lying north of a point just 12 miles north of Hillsboro was erected into a county and called Caswell. (24 S. R., 24.) Even after all this pruning Orange remained still a large county, 28 miles north and south by 45 east and west. It is with this territory and its inhabitants that this sketch is principally to deal.

During all this period of doubt and confusion as to the corporate existence of the county, the County Court continued to meet and administer justice between man and man. The first court, Laurence Bankman, Andrew Mitchell, James Dickey, Mark Morgan, John Patterson, John Pittman, Marmaduke Kimbrough, and Joseph Tate, justices presiding, Alexander Mebane, sheriff, and Richard Caswell, clerk, met at the house of John Gray, on Eno, in June, 1752. The court-house was first located on the north bank of Haw River at Piney Ford, within fifteen miles of the west boundary of the county. Finding, however, that this was too far to the west, the court fixed its meeting place at the house of James Watson, situated just east of where the present court-house stands in the town of Hillsboro. The Assembly, in 1754, reciting that the court-house had been located too far to the west, directed that it, with prison and stocks, should be located on, or near, where the western path crosses the Eno River on a piece of land on which James Watson then lived. (Martin Private Laws, 18.) This was the beginning of Hillsboro. In 1766 the Assembly required that the courts of the county, the offices of county officials and the election of representatives and vestrymen should always be held there. (Idem, 47.) In 1768 the Province was divided into six judicial districts, and of these was the Hillsboro district, composed of Granville and Orange counties, with the court to be held at Hillsboro on the 22d of March and September of each year.

The subject of the disagreement between the government in England and the Colonial Assembly in the creation and enfranchisement of the new counties is treated fully in Ashe, 284-8, and I need not elaborate it here. Suffice it to say, that the British Government insisted that the enfranchisement of counties and boroughs was one of the prerogatives of the King, and could not be assumed by the Colonial Assembly. That body finally yielded, and Orange County was enfranchised, with the right to send two members to the Assembly, in 1760. William Churton and Thomas Lloyd were the first representatives, and they appeared in March, 1761. William Churton, one of Earl Granville's surveyors, and the founder of Salisbury and Hillsboro, was Register of Deeds in Orange County. He afterwards returned to the eastern part of the province and, I believe, died there. Thomas Lloyd was a Welshman, and a man of culture and ability, who had recently settled on a place called the Meadows, nine or ten miles south of the county seat. Up to the Revolutionary War he was the most prominent man in the county. He died early in 1792, and to the present day has many descendants in Orange and elsewhere, Lloyds, Hogans, Osbornes, etc., including Mr. Stevenson, Vice-President during Mr. Cleveland's second administration.

The physical features of Orange County constituted it one of the most beautiful sections of North Carolina. Watered abundantly in its west by the Haw and its tributaries, in its north, center and east, by Eno, Little and Flat rivers, and their tributaries, and in its south, by New Hope Creek and its tributaries, it was an ideal range for the early settlers' horses and cattle and hogs. Speaking generally, it was a country of high hills and narrow valleys, with here and there gray, gravelly ridges, or elevated plateaus with much intermixture of sand with clay. The valleys were always fertile. The hillsides and tops and sandy uplands were only moderately so, while the gravelly ridges were generally poor and non-productive. Throughout all this territory, except on the poorer ridges, the forest growth was magnificent, with the oaks predominating. The soil seemed peculiarly adapted to the flourishing growth of all the hard wood, deciduous trees. Oaks four feet in diameter at their base were not uncommon, and occasional specimens six feet in diameter were found. Along the streams these oaks and hickories, birches, beeches, poplars and sycamores towered high, and the elm and the maple attained unusual size and unusual magnificence of foliage. There are remains of these forests to-day, which testify to their pristine grandeur. I have not seen anywhere finer specimens of the white oak, the beech, the cedar, and the maple, than we now have in Hillsboro. The large leaved elm, with fair opportunity the most perfect of shade trees, with its 100 feet spread of foliage, has, alas, been destroyed, in the past ten years, by an insect or blight. In the Dark Walk, too, on the south bank of the Eno, are stately oaks, hickories and poplars, which with their long, straight stems and crowns of foliage, lift themselves high in the air. On New Hope Creek in southeast Orange are acres and acres of original forest growth, which if visited would prove a revelation to the city dweller. Astonishly straight, smooth boles of white oak, hickory or poplar, crowded together, elevate their fronds high in search of sunlight, the billows of their foliage making dense shade below. Nowhere else can one obtain so clear a conception of the immense toil that confronted the early settlers when they came to make a home in this wilderness. It involved more than a contact with nature. It was a wrestling with it, as Jacob wrestled with the Angel of the Lord, and would not let Him go until the blessing had been bestowed.

All this territory was a paradise for the hunter and trapper, abounding in bear, deer, beaver, wild turkey and all the smaller varieties of game. It was the habitat and hunting grounds of the Haw, the Enoee and the Occoneechee Indians. The latter tribe's principal village was located just south of the Occoneechee Mountains. Quite a pretty tradition is told as coming from that tribe. As it concerns a locality with which this sketch is to deal, I give it for what it is worth. It may be entitled "The Maiden and the Birds, or, How the Redbird Obtained His Coat, and the Wood Thrush His Song." The Occoneechees were really a sept or clan of the Cherokees, and not a distinct tribe. They were never warlike, relying when too hard pressed by the Tuscaroras on the east and the Catawbas on the west, more on the protection of their powerful kinsmen, the Cherokees, than on their own prowess. They cultivated the soil much more extensively than did the other Indians of the period, and their dwellings were more comfortable and their towns better situated. Hospitality to the stranger was a tenet of their religion, and they welcomed all who came in peace with open hands. Their women were famed for beauty, and their men, though somewhat contemned for their unwarlike spirit, were noted hunters. Long anterior to the coming of the white man, there was a village of these people just south of the Occoneechee Mountains. In that village was a maiden celebrated in all the land for her modest and gentle beauty. Her name was Ulalee, or the Wood Thrush, and she was a daughter of the chief. From her childhood she seemed to have an almost miraculous control over all birds. She knew all their habits, could imitate all their notes and never went abroad without being attended by them. Instead of fearing her, they were all emulous to attract her attention and fought for the privilege of being first stroked or petted by her. Especially was this true of a brown-backed, gray-breasted, bird, of the same size and shape as our cardinal grosbeak, or red bird. This maiden had many suitors, but cared for none of them. Her father had, however, contracted her to Oneluskee, a young warrior of her own tribe. She did not object to this, because she liked him. She did, though, want further time before assuming her duties as wife. The marriage, then, was postponed for a year, and meantime she was to be free to go and come as she chose.

About a mile from the village was a spring, beautifully located and said to have healing qualities. Here was the favorite resort of this wood nymph of the Occoneechees. There she would sit for hours attended only by the birds that, at her call, came from all the neighboring trees and bushes.

A day in May, as she was seated near the spring, young Kanandagea, of the Tuscaroras, on his first warpath against the Catawbas, came suddenly upon her. Now this young Indian Apollo was as famous for manly beauty among the Tuscaroras, as Ulalee for the softer beauty of women among the Occoneechees, and the two tribes were at peace. The young girl was not then alarmed at his advent, but welcomed him with graceful courtesy, and the two talked long. It was a repetition of the old story, one in which man is never so savage, or so civilized, that he may not be an actor in it. The young warrior washed the war paint from his face, and instead of outlying about a Catawba village for a scalp, he outlay about the Occoneechee town for love. At this spring they met day by day, and the birds became almost as fearless of him as of Ulalee. One day they were sitting there, he whispering into her ear some pleasing story, which she answered by a bright glance of her dark eye and low, rippling, musical laughter, when Oneluskee came upon them. With one glance he knew all, but he greeted them with calm, stately courtesy and passed on. For the first time the young girl realized the danger of her situation. She loved the Tuscarora, but was contracted to Oneluskee, and unfaithfulness to that contract, according to the laws of her tribe, was death. Kanandagea urged her to fly with him at once, but she was unwilling to leave her tribe and her home, which she loved, without bidding them, at least, a silent adieu. She would meet him at the spring the following day, and then his people should be her people, and his God her God. When she returned to the village she met Oneluskee. He made no allusion to what had occurred, but treated her with his usual deferential tenderness. Everything about her, her tribe, her home, her family, the woods and the birds, had become so much a part of the very being of this artless child of nature that it was hard for her to give them up even for love, but the next day she was at the spring an hour before the appointed time. Oneluskee followed her there, and she greeted him with a quiet smile as he took his seat by her side. She was glad that he had come, for she believed him to be magnaminous and generous and her true friend, and she wished to tell him that she loved the Tuscarora and was to be his bride. He heard her story to the end without interruption, then he made no protestations of his own love, did not urge her to give up the Tuscarora. Instead he told her that, according to their customs, she was already his lawful wife; that he had given her respite for a year that she might better fit herself to become such; that she had been unfaithful to him, and therefore she must die. She looked appealingly into his face, but could see no relenting there, so, without a word, bowed her head as he plunged his knife into her heart. He left her there, and her heart's blood, mingling with the little spring stream, discolored it. The birds, frightened away by Oneluskee, returned as he departed, and instead of singing their sweetest songs, uttered their harshest cries of alarm as they fluttered about the dead girl, except the bird with a brown back and a grey breast. He bathed and slashed in the discolored water, while his mate put her feet and bill in it, and sprinkled a little on her breast and on the tips of her wings. That is why the red bird is red now and his mate is not.

An hour after, the Tuscarora came for his bride and found her bleeding corpse. He took it in his arms, carried it to the village, and demanded justice upon the murderer. Oneluskee, before the elders, confessed the deed, and justified it from their immemorial customs. They sustained the defense, but admitted the right of the Tuscarora to single combat. They fought in the presence of the whole tribe, a duel long remembered in tradition, and the Tuscarora conquered. At his request he was adopted into the tribe. Ever after, attended by the birds she had loved, he lived a hermit life in the forest where she had roamed. A huge, time-scarred oak once stood within a few hundred yards of this spring. It was blown down in a great September storm some years ago. There, it is said, was his wigwam, and there, after living to a great age, he died and was buried. And to the present day his spirit and her spirit haunt this spring, and all through the woods, in spring and summer. one may hear the wood thrush calling Ulalee-e-e.

I do not vouch for the historical verity of this tradition, but it is, perhaps, well to preserve it.

The hunter and trapper were the first white invaders of this wilderness. Then came, that ever moving advance guard of civilization, the pioneer, with his pack horse, his cooking utensils, his weapons, a little salt and his wife and children. A small clearing was made in the forest, a log hut built and corn planted. The abundant game would supply his family with meat, the corn patch with bread. One of the earliest of these pioneers was an Englishman, named Alleman, who settled on a creek in what is now Alamance County, and, the writer believes, gave his name to that creek, and hence to the county itself. Then the tide of settlers commenced to flow this way, until the county became dotted here and there with little communities, only to be found by following trails which they had blazed through the forest. All north of 35 degrees 34 minutes being Earl Granville's grant, his surveyors followed hard upon the footsteps of the pioneers.

Pioneers began to locate in Orange as early as 1740, but the great army of settlers began its inflow in 1750 and continued until 1770. Of these the more numerous were the Scotch-Irish, Quakers, Germans and Welsh from Pennsylvania, and the English from Virginia and the eastern counties of the province. As to the Scotch-Irish I take the liberty of reproducing what I wrote three years ago:

The Scotch-Irish.

"Buffalo,[1] Alamance,[2] Hawfields,[3] Eno,[4] Little River,[5] and New Hope[6] were the principal Scottish-Irish settlements of Orange County in the period extending from 1755 to 1770. Buffalo and Alamance are now in Guilford County, while Hawfields is in Alamance. New Hope is an offshoot from [1] Organized in 1756; [2] 1762; [3] 1755; [4] 1755; [5] 1761; [6] by 1765. F. N.

Hawfields, and Little River from Eno. There were two or three smaller settlements in the territory then known as Orange, notably, one on Hyco Creek[7] and one on Country Line Creek, both in what is now Caswell County. The Eno settlement was, however, more distinctively a Scotch-Irish community than any of these. The predominating element in the population of the territory bordering on the Virginia line was settlers from Virginia. The Hyco and Country Line communities to a great degree, and the Alamance and Buffalo communities to some extent, were in the very midst of these Virginia-English. With Eno it was otherwise. That was made up almost exclusively of Scotch-Irish settlers from Pennsylvania. That community, then, furnishes the best example of the Scotch-Irish community in Orange County.

"The Eno River has its source in a spring near the northwest corner of the present county of Orange. It flows in a general southerly direction until it reaches the Occoneechee Mountains. These deflect it to the east. The distance from its source in a direct line to the mountains is less than fifteen miles, yet there we find it a tiny trickling rill, while here it is a rapid-flowing stream, forty feet wide by three or four deep. Numerous brooks, or brooklets, or spring branches have discharged their waters into it since it began its journey to the sea and have made of it a small river. This shows how well the section through which it flows is watered. It is a country of hills and valleys, too. In 1750 huge forests spread in billows across the tops of these hills and down their sides and over the valleys. Along the creeks and larger brooks were to be found rich bottom-lands, needing but to be cleared and planted to yield abundant harvests.

"This section, too, was exempt from Indian raids. The only tribes remaining in the limits of the province of North [7] Organized as "Middle Hyco" in 1755. I am indebted to D. I. Craig, D.D., for these dates. F. N.

Carolina at this period (1750-55) who were at all formidable were the Cherokees and Catawbas. The latter tribe was fast disappearing, from disease and contact with the whites, and the Cherokees were formidable only to the scattered settlements outlying towards their own hunting-grounds. So safety, fertility, convenience and a mild and healthy climate all invited the adventurous Scotch-Irish of Pennsylvania to this section.

"It is probable that one or two families had already settled there as early as 1745, but the migration was at its flood-tide from 1750 to 1775. These immigrants were by no means pioneers, blazing the way for permanent settlers to come after them, but they were citizens of one province moving to another to improve their condition. They had already accumulated some property, owned lands and horses, cattle and sheep. They came from Lancaster, Chester, York, Berks, or Bucks Counties, Pennsylvania.

"Let us take one family as a sample and follow them in their migration. The winter of 1750-51 had been severe in Berks. A killing frost had come unexpectedly early and had seriously damaged the crops of Mr. T. His oldest child had sickened and died with pneumonia, and his wife had been desperately ill. He had heard of the success of some of his neighbors in the beautiful and fertile Valley of Virginia, but the bloody-minded Shawnees were on the warpath and were threatening the outlying settlements. Some of his acquaintances in Bucks County, however, had pressed on further south to the province of North Carolina, had settled on the Eno River and had sent back glowing accounts of the climate and of the country. He determined to go himself and spy out the land with a view of moving his family to a less hostile climate. In the late fall or early winter he sets out on horseback for this distant land of promise. Bearing to the west that he might strike the streams and rivers where they are fordable, he passes across Maryland and through the Scotch-Irish settlements in the Valley of Virginia, and, after the lapse of about thirty days, enters North Carolina, into what is now Caswell County. He pauses for a while, perhaps, with the scattered Scotch-Irish on Hyco Creek, but finally rides on to the Eno River.

"He is pleased with the country, selects his future home, sends for William Churton, one of Earl Granville's surveyors, and has it surveyed. After this is done he pays Churton his fees for the survey and also three shillings sterling,* consideration money for the deed which Churton is to procure for him from Francis Corbin, one of Earl Granville's agents, and have ready for him on his return with his family from Pennsylvania. Then, with the aid of the neighbors, he builds a log cabin on a suitable site, and, with the same aid, clears and fences a small parcel of land near it. The spring advancing, he plants corn in this little clearing, and, leaving it to care for itself, he returns to Pennsylvania for his family. There he sells all property which he can not carry with him to North Carolina, purchases three or four strong, sturdy horses, if he does not already own them, or, perhaps two yoke of oxen and a heavy, unwieldy but commodious wagon. In this are to be carried the household goods, and in it the wife and younger children are to sleep. A milch cow or two are to be tethered to its axle, and perhaps a small flock of sheep are to be driven by the larger children behind it. When all is in readiness for their departure there is a public meeting held in the school-house of the district, for the people are unwilling that they should leave without some testimonial of their regard. A paper drawn up by the school-master is adopted and delivered, signed, to the emigrants. This I copy from the yellow and time-stained original. It is preserved in the family as a precious heirloom:

*In addition an annual quit rent of three shillings sterling.

"'To all persons whom these shall concern—GREETING: Whereas, T. T. and Ann, his wife, the bearers hereof, are determined, God willing, to remove with their family in order to settle in some parts of his Majesty's new settlements, and as divers of us have been well acquainted with them from their early youth, we do certify you that they are of a sober, honest, peaceable and good behaviour and are about to depart in the good esteem of the neighborhood and acquaintances in general. Therefore, as such we commend them to the favorable reception of those among whom it may be their lot to sojourn and settle, heartily wishing their prosperity and welfare on all accounts.

"'In testimony whereof, we, their friends and neighbors, inhabitants of the township of Heidelberg and places adjacent in the county of Berks, in the Province of Pennsylvania, have hereunto set our hands, the 14th day of May, Anno Domini 1752.' Then the signatures follow.

"They commenced their long and tedious journey soon after this paper was given them. All along the way Sunday was to them a Sabbath of rest, and probably of praise and thanksgiving. During the week-days they made on an average ten miles a day, so they would arrive at their new home about the first of August. As they would pass through the settlements in Maryland and Virginia, they would be met with words of cheer, and there they could replenish their supplies of food. When, wearied and footsore, they arrived at the end of their long journey, the neighbors flocked to welcome them and to aid them in establishing their new home. That home was established about eight miles north of the present town of Hillsboro, and is still in the possession of some of the descendants of the original owners.

"This family is a type of the Pennsylvania Scotch-Irish settlers. Many others came in the ensuing five years, quite often several families joining in the migration, and Eno soon became one of the most thickly settled sections of Orange County. By 1755 they had built a log school-house and church, seven miles north of Hillsboro. At this church, or rather school-house, for it was never dedicated as a church, Rev. Hugh McAden preached as he journeyed through the country in 1755. In the same year there was a regular Presbyterian Church organized there, and soon after a frame building was erected, the log house continuing to be used as a school-house. The church organization exists to the present day, being now 160 years old, but in the spring of 1895 a forest fire destroyed the old church building, and the new one was erected at the village of Cedar Grove, some miles off. At the old site, however, there is a very large and well-filled graveyard, in which four generations of Scotch-Irish have been buried.

"The church and the school-house have always been, and always will be, the mainstay of this admirable race. They realized, as few other races of men have realized it, that the church without the school-house was a fosterer of superstition, while the school-house without the church was a promoter of irreligion and infidelity. So, close by their churches they built their school-houses, and over the doors of both they inscribed in living letters, 'The Lord He is God.' This, it seems to me, is the key to their character and the secret of their greatness.

"The criminal records of Orange County, from its organization to the present day, show that there was less immorality and crime among the Scotch-Irish than among any other class of people within its bounds. At all periods of its history they have been most valuable citizens. But this is not all. Their sons have gone out into many other States, carrying with them the respect for law, morality and religion which characterized them at home. Many of them have attained distinction in the various walks of life, and all of them have been useful men and women."

Hawfields, or Haw Old Fields as it was at first called, had certain unique characteristics, which make it worthy of a more extended notice. Here had been the home of the Saxapahaw Indians. These Indians, like nearly all the tribes in central North Carolina, were less nomads and more agriculturists than the northern and western tribes. These old fields had been cleared by them and cultivated by them. Thirty thousand acres of these lands were patented by Edward Mosely. From him they passed to Governor Burrington, and from him to Samuel Strudwick in the manner set out in "Hillsboro, Colonial and Revolutionary," page 95 et seq. As early as July 20, 1731, Colonel Byrd wrote to Governor Burrington of them (3 C. R., 194), "But no place has so great a character for fertility and beauty of situation as the Haw Old Fields." The Scotchman had lost none of his canniness from his temporary abode in the Emerald Isle, or his pausing for a few years in the colony of Pennsylvania. When he came south, then, he generally selected the best lands in the section wherein he located. Hawfields early attracted his attention. The Mebanes and others located there certainly as early as 1745, and possibly earlier. The activity of the northern and western Indians, in the period commencing in 1750 and ending at Braddock's defeat in 1755 not only vastly increased the migration from Pennsylvania, but also from the Valley of Virginia, to North Carolina. It was during this period that the Hawfields and the region about it was settled. When Mr. Strudwick arrived in this country, October, 1764, he found much of the land obtained by him from Burrington already occupied. He immediately set up his claim, with the result that titles were so unsettled in the Hawfields, that many of the inhabitants, such as the Craigs, Blackwoods, Freelands, etc., removed to New Hope.

The Hawfields were on the east side of Haw River. The Quakers and Germans, however, settled on its west side, the Quakers on Cane Creek and the Germans, in the region of Stinking Quarter, and Alamance Creeks. The Quakers had erected their meeting house on Cane Creek as early as October, 1751, there being thirty families in the settlement. (Records of Cane Creek Meeting at Graham, N. C.) The Quakers, however, were not confined to this locality. There was a settlement of them north of Hillsboro, and there was a number of families in the town and east of it. The German settlement, or Dutch, as it was universally called by others of the county, was not large, and it was segregated by its language and the habits of the people themselves. They took little or no interest in public affairs, had their own preachers, who preached to them in the German language, and their own church, which was situated on the neck of land between Stinking Quarter and Alamance Creeks.

Further west on Sandy Creek, the home of Herman Husband, Baptists from Virginia, under Shubael Stearns, organized a church and erected a meeting house in 1755. (5 C. R., 1167.) "These new comers found the inhabitants about their colony grossly ignorant of the essential principles of the Christian religion. They knew something of the form of godliness but nothing of its power. They thought that religion consisted only in the practice of its outward forms, they knew nothing of conviction and conversion, and to be able to ascertain the time and place of this wonderful miracle was to them equally wonderful. The new preachers' style of preaching was to them also very novel. They had acquired a very warm and pathetic address, accompanied by strong gestures and a regular tone of voice. Being often deeply affected themselves when preaching, corresponding affections were felt by their hearers, which was frequently expressed by tears, trembling, screams and exclamations of grief and joy." "Very remarkable things," said Morgan Edwards in 1775, "may be said of this church. It began with 16 souls, and in a short time increased to 606, spreading its branches to Deep River and Abbott's Creek, which branches are gone to other provinces, and most of the members of this church have followed them; insomuch that in 17 years, it is reduced from 606 to 14 souls." It is interesting to note that these early Baptists administered the following rites: Baptism, the Lord's Supper (once a week), Love Feasts, Laying on of Hands, Washing Feet, Anointing the Sick, Right Hand of Fellowship, Kiss of Charity and Devoting Children. The latter rite was thus performed: "As soon as circumstances would permit, after the birth of the child, the mother carried it to the meeting, when the minister either took it in his arms or laid his hands on it, and thanked God for His mercy, and invoked a blessing on the child, at which time it received its name. This rite, which by many was satirically called a dry christening, prevailed not only in the Sandy Creek Association, but in many parts of Virginia." (5 C. R., 1172.)

The Welsh settled in Orange, south of Hillsboro and between that town and the Chatham County line. The number of these was small, but they were unusually intelligent, and have still many descendants.

The English, however, constituted a majority of the settlers in 1755. Communities composed almost wholly of them could be found along the Virginia line and in the eastern part of the county, besides individual families nearly everywhere. There were 950 taxable white polls in the county in 1755, and 50 negro polls, indicating a population of about 5,000. The negro slaves were the property of the English. (5 C. R., 575.) It is interesting to note that at the same period Granville, settled almost wholly by the English, had 779 white polls and 426 black polls. So though the population of Granville exceeded that of Orange by 1,000, that excess, and more, was entirely negro. Again, Granville had 734 militia out of her 779 white polls, while Orange had only 490 militia out of her 950 polls, thus indicating a large proportion of non-combatants, Quakers and others, in the latter county. (Idem.) It was, too, then, as it has always been, a country of small farmers. Of course social conditions were exceedingly primitive and crude, and, if we are to believe some of the itinerant Church of England missionaries who visited this people, in some sections, rough and rude. Especially was this true of the English population. The Scotch-Irish and Quakers have been at all periods of their history strictly upright, honest and moral.

With the organization of the county seat in 1754, its growth and change of name to Childsburg in 1759, and its continued growth and second legally authorized change of name to Hillsboro in 1766, and Governor Tryon's patronage, there was collected a body of men of sufficient culture and intelligence to make them distinctively the most influential class in the county—merchants, attorneys and county officials. The governing body of the county, however, that which not only administered justice between man and man, but managed its finances and controlled its internal affairs, was the County Court, and that was composed of justices selected from all sections of the county. So well did this system suit the genius of our people that it continued in force, with very little or no modification, until after the Civil War, when aliens, usurping the government, abolished it in 1868. The representatives in the Assembly were elected, too, by the freeholders, and land was so cheap and abundant that nearly every one was a freeholder. There is no period of our history in which the rights of the individual as opposed to community rights were so much respected and so vigorously defended, as in our colonial period. This was as much the result of the colonists' British antecedents and British training as of the distance of settlement from settlement—a distance that prevented the mutual dependence of man upon man, out of which the community right springs. In the large view of it, then, the people of Orange embodied in themselves as advanced a democracy as could be found anywhere at that time.

In the decade, 1755 to 1765, the county filled rapidly. In the latter year there were 3,324 white polls and 649 negro polls, indicating a population of about 18,000. (7 C.R., 289.) A year later white polls were 3,573, an increase of 249, and black polls were 729, an increase of 80, indicating a population of over 21,000. (Ibid., 539.) Perhaps the most important event that occurred in the county in 1765 was the location of Dr. David Caldwell there as pastor of Buffalo and Alamance churches, and of Rev. Henry Patillo as pastor of Hawfields, Eno, Little River and New Hope churches. All these churches had been before visited by Mr. Patillo and the Rev. Hugh McAden, and perhaps others, as missionaries; but no Presbyterian minister had been located in the county before 1765. The coming of David Caldwell and Henry Patillo then meant much more than a series of sermons at certain set and stated times. It meant the erection of schoolhouses where they had not been before, and the training of the youth of the country in all that would render them useful men and women. It meant the selection by the people themselves of a competent leader and adviser in all the higher and better things of life. Says Dr. Charles Lee Raper: "When these minister-teachers came to the hills of North Carolina they found only a few people, and these scattered far and wide; they found a very primitive stage of life—pioneers in a very wilderness; they found a people possessed of great ignorance, but with native good sense and vigor; they found a vast amount of the forces of nature to contend with and to conquer and a primitive people to develop into a higher life. And these Scotch-Irish minister-teachers were an energetic body, a band of heroic missionaries. * * * These bright, vigorous and independent men brought with them ideas which have exercised the profoundest influence upon all the phases of our life and thought—upon our religion, our politics, our industry and our education. Their churches and schools soon became the centers of ideas—the places of their nourishment and their spreading * * * the fountains of intellectual vigor for a great portion of our own ancestors. * * * The Scotch-Irish Presbyterian minister-teacher deserves at the hands of the historian and at the hands of our people a thousand times more consideration and veneration than we have ever thought to pay him. * * * He possessed the ability to appreciate intelligence and culture as none other of our colonial ancestors did; he keenly appreciated the exceedingly great and permanent value of education, for the individual and the community alike. He gave his very life—its ideals, its energy, its enthusiasm—to the teaching of his fellow-men; his school was ever a shining and brilliant light. He stood out, and always, for the light of classical thought and culture, and proclaimed the power of knowledge, of character and refinement, in the midst of ignorance and crudeness."

Three years later, in 1768, Rev. Hugh McAden took charge of the churches in what is now Caswell County, and for thirteen years labored within their bounds both as teacher and preacher.

In the Act changing the name of Childsburg to Hillsboro, November, 1766, the Directors of the town were authorized to sell certain lots, excepting, however, among others, a lot or lots which they may or shall reserve for a church, a schoolhouse and a burying ground. The lot that had been, probably, already reserved, was lot 98 in the plan of the town, situated at the corner of Tryon and Churton streets. The building of St. Matthew's church was commenced soon after the enactment of this law, immediately on the corner of these streets. I wish to emphasize this fact, because it is said by some, to the present day, that by some hocus-pocus the Presbyterians got possession of old St. Mathew's and converted it to their own use. Indeed it is constantly said that the Convention of 1788 met in the Presbyterian Church in Hillsboro, and engravings of that church as such meeting place have been printed in books. As a matter of fact, the Presbyterian Church is not even on the site of old St. Matthew's, was erected long after the Convention of 1788, and no political meeting, convention or other has ever been held in it. Old St. Matthew's was of wood, the Presbyterian Church is of brick. Old St. Matthew's stood immediately on the corner, with its front entrance and tower to the south, while the Presbyterian Church stands 100 feet west of the corner and facing west. There was no Presbyterian church organization in Hillsboro until 1816, and the present church building was erected after that time, with the consent of the town authorities who owned the lot on which it is situated, it being the lot reserved, as above stated, for a church, a school-house and a graveyard.

Rev. George Meiklejohn came to Hillsboro to minister in charge of St. Matthew's Parish in 1767. He, also, was a school master and established an academy in Hillsboro. He was something of a Dominie Sampson in appearance, but was far from being so impractical, and is said to have been, though somewhat stern and harsh, a good teacher of the classics.

There were other schools and teachers in the county, outside of Hillsboro and these Presbyterian communities, but it is impossible to ascertain with any certainty how many there were, and where located. Rednap Howell, of Regulator fame, was a peripatetic schoolmaster, and William Few, in his Autobiography, an extract from which I give below, tells of one in his own experience. The Quakers on Cane Creek certainly had a school of their own, and it is quite probable that there were others in the more thickly settled communities, supported by the better class of farmers. William Few gives so graphic a picture of the times in his Autobiography (Magazine of American History, November, 1881, pages 343 et seq.) that I feel justified in extracting the following from it. William Few was a younger brother of James Few, also of Regulator fame, and himself, later attained great prominence in the State of Georgia, and, after removing to New York, also in that State:

"I was born in Maryland, in the county of Baltimore, on the 8th day of June, 1748. My father was a farmer, and having lost the greater part of two or three crops by frost, determined that he would seek for a country more favorable to agriculture, and, having conferred with his neighbors on the subject, two of them agreed to accompany him in search of a more fertile country and a milder climate. Having prepared for their journey, they set out southwardly, and, after traveling about three hundred miles, found themselves near the middle of the province of North Carolina. There they halted in order to explore the country, and being pleased with the soil and climate, purchased lands on the banks of the Eno River in the county of Orange (about six miles east of Hillsboro). These lands were in their natural state. Not a tree had been cut. The country was thinly inhabited, and the state of society was in the first stage of civilization. My father employed a man to build a house on his lands, and returned to remove his family. After selling his lands in Maryland and such of his goods and chattels as were not movable, the remainder was placed in a wagon drawn by four horses and in a cart drawn by two. In the Autumn of 1758 he set out for North Carolina with all his family and property. There a new scene opened to us. We found a mild and healthy climate and fertile lands, but our establishment was in the woods and our first employment was to cut down the timber and prepare the land for cultivation. My father had taken with him only four servants, who were set to work, and every exertion was made to prepare for the ensuing crop. Then it was that I commenced the occupation of farmer. An axe was put into my hands, and I was introduced to a hickory tree about twelve or fifteen inches in diameter, and was ordered to cut it down and to cut off its branches. There was novelty in the business with which I was at first pleased and I cheerfully began the operation, but soon found myself extremely fatigued. My hands blistered, and the business progressed very slowly; I thought my situation most deplorable, but I dared not to resist the order I had received to cut down the tree. I was obliged to proceed, and found that practice every day made the labor more agreeable, and I was gradually instructed in the arts of agriculture; for that was all I had to learn. In that country at that time there were no schools, no churches or parsons, or doctors or lawyers; no stores, groceries or taverns, nor do I recollect during the first two years any officer, ecclesiastical, civil or military, except a justice of the peace, a constable and two or three itinerant preachers. The justice took cognizance of their controversies to a small amount, and performed the sacerdotal functions of uniting by matrimony. There were no poor laws nor paupers. Of the necessities of life there was great plenty, but no luxuries. These people had few wants, and fewer temptations to vice than those who lived in more refined society, though ignorant. They were more virtuous and more happy. In the year 1760 a schoolmaster appeared and offered his services to teach the children of the neighborhood for twenty shillings each per year. He was employed, and about thirty scholars were collected and placed under his tuition. In that number I was enrolled. This was the second school I had been put to. When about six or seven years of age, I was sent to a country school of the lowest grade. The teacher was an ill-natured, arbitrary man, who punished with rigor, and enforced his precepts with terror. The man was to me the most dreadful of all mankind. I detested the man, the school and the books, and spent six or eight months at that school in terror and anxiety, with very little benefit. I was now more fortunate. This schoolmaster was a man of mild and amiable disposition. He governed his little school with judgment and propriety, wisely distinguishing the obedient, timid child from the obstinate and contumacious; judiciously applying the rod when necessary. He possessed the art of making his pupils fear, love and esteem him. At this school I spent one of the most happy years of my life. I had the highest respect for my preceptor, and delighted in his society and instruction, and learned with facility. With him I finished my education, the whole expense of which did not exceed five dollars. In that simple state of society money was but little known; the schoolmaster was the welcome guest of his pupil, fed at the bountiful table and clothed from the domestic loom.

"In 1764 my father purchased a farm and removed his family near to Hillsboro, which was the metropolis of the county, where the courts were held and all the public business was done. It was a small village, which contained thirty or forty inhabitants, with two or three small stores and two or three ordinary taverns, but it was an improving village. Several Scotch merchants were soon after induced to establish stores that contained a good assortment of European merchandise, which changed the state of things for the better. A church, court-house and jail were built, but there was no parson or physician. Two or three attorneys opened their offices and found employment. Superior and Inferior Courts of Justice were established, and a fair field was opened for the lawyers. It was to me the highest gratification to attend the courts and hear their pleadings, and my ambition was excited to acquire the knowledge and ascendancy they seemed to possess; but I had no other way or means of learning but by attending the courts and hearing the principles of law discussed and settled, until I had prevailed on a lawyer to lend me Jacobs' Law Dictionary, which I considered the greatest favor he could confer. I read the book attentively, but not with much benefit, for I was not sufficiently acquainted with the law terms to make much progress; notwithstanding it was believed that I had acquired some law knowledge, for my neighbors sometimes applied to me for my opinion on their matters of controversy, which was flattering to my vanity, and stimulated me to greater exertions. In that country at that time there was great scarcity of books. My father's whole library consisted of a folio Bible, Tillotson's Sermons, Barclay's Apology and a few other religious books, which I read over and over, for I was fond of every book I could get. About this time my father purchased Dyche's Dictionary and a set of the Spectators, with which I was greatly delighted, although I found the Spectators were wrote in a style different from those books I had been accustomed to, and contained many words I did not perfectly understand, which often made it necessary to apply to the dictionary for a definition. In this way I soon acquired a knowledge of these books and read them with additional pleasure and much improvement.

"About the year 1767 my father bought a farm seven miles distant, which was placed under my care, and it required my whole attention. It became my duty every Monday morning to go to the farm and remain until Saturday, and I was employed at the plow. It was my practice every Monday to take with me a book which I read at leisure hours, and took it with me to the fields, and when fatigued I retired to a shade and read. By those means labor became pleasant and agreeable, while the mind was amused and the understanding improved. Here I enjoyed the greatest part of one year in uninterrupted peace and tranquillity. I had only two objects in view: reading to acquire knowledge, and the cultivation of the soil, which alternately exercised my corporal and mental faculties. I now experienced that the proper and equal exercise of body and mind insures the greatest portion of human happiness. I was successful in my labor; the season was favorable and I raised a good crop."

This is, no doubt, an accurate account of William Few's life in Orange County as boy and youth. His father, though, belonged to the better class of farmers, had more means and a better education than the average settler. He had been a Quaker, but had severed his relations with his Meeting by marrying out of the connection in Maryland, and though known as a Quaker in his new home, he was not one in good standing, for that reason.

At this period there was no industrial life of the people, except that depicted by Few. Agriculture was their only calling, to which both men and boys were devoted, while the women and girls looked after household affairs, spun and wove the wool, or cotton, out of which their own clothing and that of the men was made. While no doubt there were artisans in Hillsboro, carpenters and blacksmiths, weavers and hatters, out in the sparsely settled country districts nearly every one was his own carpenter and his own blacksmith. Every eligible stream in the county had somewhere along its course a grist mill, some of them two or more, while in a few instances a sawmill was connected with it. A little later, about 1769, brick were made in and about Hillsboro, but they were used only for chimneys, even then. Out of the town chimneys continued to be built of stone, with a pen of sticks on top daubed with clay.* The coming of the Scotch merchants to Hillsboro, of which Few speaks, William Johnston, James Thackston and Ralph Macuair, was a double convenience to the inhabitants of the county. They could get from them necessary supplies of salt, or powder or lead or agricultural implements for themselves and the equally necessary articles of needles, cards, etc., for their wives and daughters, by the exchange of their products, or peltries, for them, when otherwise they would have no market, or at best a very distant one, for these products. They could get from them, too, many other articles, not so essential, but adding very much to their comfort and to that of their families. These merchants kept wagons almost constantly running from Hillsboro to Cross Creek or New Bern, taking down loads of the country's products and bringing back loads of goods for their stores.

*At this time there were two fulling mills on Deep River.

The amusements of the people were the usual rough sports of the frontier. As I have said elsewhere: "To it (the county seat) come the merchant, the lawyer, the tavern-keeper, the artisan and the court officials, adventurers all, in the perennial pursuit of gain. Rude in its beginnings, the town is, however, the emporium for the trade, and the head-quarters for the politics, the news and the fashions of all the country about it, and to it great crowds come at the quarterly courts for a holiday—a holiday that partakes of the strenuous character of the people themselves. The best shot of one community pits himself against the best shot of another; the cock of the walk of Haw River must try conclusions with him of Little, or Flat, River, while the friends of each look on, restrained from indulging in a free fight themselves only by their interest in the main event; and so on, wrestler with wrestler, runner with runner, race-horse with race-horse and game cock with game cock—a strong, free people as yet but half civilized, unconsciously preparing itself for a great career. Meantime the stock of drinkables at the various taverns is growing smaller and smaller, and the self-important Justices are sitting in the court-house trying minor offenses or settling minor disputes between man and man, and puzzled occasionally by some astute lawyer, referring, in hope of enlightenment but in a helpless way, to Nelson's Justice, Cary's Abridgement of the Statutes, Swinborn on Wills, Godolphin's Orphans' Legacy, Jacobs' Law Dictionary, or Wood's Institutes—books required by law to be upon the court table." These people had, too, their neighborhood amusements—house-raisings, corn-shuckings, shooting-matches, at which there was much drinking of strong drink, and the two first of which were followed (out of Quaker, Baptist and Presbyterian communities) by rustic dancing with the music furnished by a neighborhood fiddler. This was one side of the people's life; but there is another which I wish to treat somewhat fully, so will put it under a heading to itself, in which I will use freely what I have heretofore written.

THE REGULATORS.

The Regulator disturbance beautifully illustrates the effect of agitation against real grievances, but grievances which can be best redressed under forms of the law, upon an ignorant, headstrong, lawless populace.

Solon likened the people to the sea and their orators and counselors to the winds, for the sea would be calm and quiet if the winds did not trouble it. The illustration is none the less happy because it may be turned and viewed from another side. There would be stagnation and death in the sea were it not troubled by the winds. So there would be the torpidity of slavery among the people, could they not be aroused to action by their orators. Eternal vigilance is indeed the price of liberty, and the abiding place of that liberty is in the hearts of the people. So much so, that a people fit to be free has been, and always will be, free. Continuing the illustration however, as there are great tidal movements in the ocean, independent of winds or weather, so here and there in history are great popular uprisings not induced by the appeals of orators. They are caused by oppressive or disorderly government, and come not from a desire to attack, but from an impatience of suffering, as the Duke of Sully, one of the wisest of statesmen, said centuries ago. The French Revolution and the recent stir in Russia are instances. In a representative government, whether a constitutional monarchy or a republic, they have never occurred, and, from the nature of things can never occur. The people of our own country have never been aroused to determined action unless first stirred by their orators and organized by their leaders. A free people, conscious of their freedom, are inapt to see and, when seen, not prone to avenge by violence a minor infringement of their collective rights, sensitive though they are to any attack upon an individual right. It is the province of orators and agitators, those sentinels upon the watch towers of liberty, to warn the people of any approach of danger. This can be most effectively done, among a people volative or impulsive or ignorant or half educated, by a broad and misleading definition of their rights, an exaggerated and highly colored statement of their wrongs, and by vehement invectives against their alleged foes. In other words, such a people suffers from a species of political myopia, and things and persons and events must be magnified that they may see the better. Made thus to believe that they are oppressed, they, naturally inert, are aroused to action, not from an impatience of suffering but from a desire to attack. This was the method of Herman Husband, the agitator and organizer, of Rednap Howell, the orator and bard, and of James Hunter, the spokesman of the Regulators. It is not a new method. It is as old as freedom itself, and we see it exemplified in every presidential election to the present. Only the omnipresence of the law and its restraints and the greater sensitiveness of the people to these restraints prevent each hard-fought campaign from becoming a series of bloody riots, if not a civil war. The absence of these restraints, or their ineffectiveness, made the Regulator movement culminate in the Hillsboro riot and the battle of Alamance. And herein, too, is found the soundest basis for that complete and perfect education of all the people, which is the dream of the most advanced statesmen of the day. The State may take a small portion of the property of A to assist in the education of B's children by way of tribute for the protection of the rest of A's property. This universal education will not only make the people more sensitive to any encroachment on their rights, but it will make them more intelligent and more self-controlled in pursuit of remedies for such encroachment. In other words, they will cease to be facile instruments in the hands of demagogs and selfseekers.

In popular movements, such as the Regulator movement, it is the office of the agitator and orator to stimulate action, and of the leader to organize, guide and control the strength of the people so that it may become effective in action. In this sense the Regulators had no leader. Herman Husband, the ablest of them, was a great agitator and an excellent organizer, but there he stopped short. He lacked the bold determination and dauntless courage required of a leader of the people in such a crisis. Rednap Howell, the orator and bard of the movement, was an active, energetic and shrewd agitator, but there he stopped short. He had neither the ability of an organizer, nor the courage of a leader. James Hunter was intelligent, honest and intrepid, but in the rare qualities necessary to manage and control bodies of unruly men, he was wholly deficient.

That the people had just cause of complaint against the officials is true beyond doubt. A loosely drawn and ambiguous fee bill gave opportunity for each man to put his own construction upon it; and, as human nature was the same then, in general features, as it is now, the officials construed it liberally in their own favor and the agitators construed it strictly against them. Of course calculations made upon such a totally different basis resulted in a conflict which could not be reconciled. (8 C. R., pages 312, 322 and 388, and 23 S. R., 275 et seq.) If the act was ambiguous, it is manifest that the remedy therefor was to be found in an amendment by Assembly itself. If, however, the officers were using the ambiguity of the act as a cover for extortion, the remedy was by indictment in the courts. The Regulators went about securing this remedy, at first, in a perfectly legal way, and, if this method of securing redress had been pursued consistently, the evils would have been removed without the shedding of a drop of blood. These were their rules of conduct at first:

1st. Let us be careful to keep sober, nor to do nothing rashly, but to act with deliberation.

2d. Let us do nothing against the known, established laws of our land, that we appear not as a faction, endeavoring to subvert the laws and overturn the system of government; but let us take care to appear what we really are, free subjects by birth, endeavoring to recover our best native rights of reducing the malpractices of the officers of our courts down to the standard of law.

If then, in their subsequent career, they were not careful to keep sober and to do nothing rashly; if they disregarded the established laws of the land, they are convicted out of their own mouths of being factionists and subverters of the laws. Let us see how this was. Husband says that the organization of 1766 went to pieces, but was revived and made more efficient and strong the latter part of 1767. Some one informed them at that time, or the early part of 1768, that taxes were being paid to retire an issue of paper money after that object had already been accomplished. Soon after, too, they were informed that £15,000 had been appropriated for the erection of a Governor's House at New Bern. So to the Regulators it was made to appear that they were being robbed not only by their local officials, but by Governor Tryon himself. They determined to pay no taxes: "We are obliged to seek redress by denying paying any more taxes, until we have a full settlement for what is past, and have a true regulation with our officers." Now this was an attempt to apply a remedy to existing evils by violence and force, by illegal means, and Husband knew this very well, for he excuses himself and others by saying that they protested against and never agreed to this plan. He says also, "That not one-third man on the west side of Haw River had yet concerned themselves, yet they were afterwards forced to join as one man in defense of their lives." (See Husband's Book in Wheeler, pages 307 et seq.)

The determination not to pay any taxes at all was persisted in until the latter part of 1768. It is perfectly manifest that this was not a justifiable means to remedy the evil complained of. If the sheriff, when he comes to collect taxes, had to convince every citizen that every item was legal, every item legitimate, else no taxes should be paid, and if he attempted to levy, he should be beaten, if not killed with impunity, then anarchy necessarily ensues. Government itself, if it permitted this, would abdicate its functions to a mob. It could be a state no longer. It was tried in the Whiskey Rebellion in Pennsylvania, and General Harry Lee, under President Washington's orders, crushed that. Shay tried it in Massachusetts, and General Lincoln crushed that rebellion. So this second movement of the Regulators, being a combination between two or more to do an illegal act, was in law, a criminal conspiracy. Now it was on this ground that Husband was acquitted on his trial at the September

Term, 1768, while William Butler and others were convicted. There was proof that he had been a prime mover in the first plan, but this was legal, while on the other hand there was none that he had encouraged the second and illegal plan. The others had, and they were convicted, while he was acquitted. What, then, was the consequence of the refusal to pay taxes? The sheriff of the county, Tyree Harris, had charged against him all the general and county taxes that had been listed, amounting to 10 shillings and 8 pence per poll, proclamation money, or stated in another way, legally about $1.75, but for purposes of trade, about $1.40. His account could not be credited with any sum that he failed to collect, unless allowed by the County Court for the county, or by the Assembly, for the province at large. So there he stood between two fires: the law compelling him to collect this amount and the Regulators threatening him with castigation or death if he attempted to do so. (7 C. R., 491, 772, 798-9.)

The amounts specifically objected to by the Regulators were 3 shillings for the retirement of outstanding paper money and 8 pence for Tryon's palace. Those who insist on canonizing these factionists as patriots invariably forget that no power short of the Assembly could remit this three shillings, and that the representatives of the people, including the Regulators, had expressly authorized the erection of the palace and the levy of the eight pence. In other words, they forget that the government was representative and that the Assembly held the public purse in its hands, and held it as firmly as ever did a reformed Parliament, or does now the State Legislature. In no aspect of the case could either of these taxes have been illegal, though both may have been unjust. Nor was there any inequality in the poll tax system between the east and west. All slaves above 12 years of age and under 50, male and female, were taxed at the same rate as the whites, while the white males, only, between 18 and 50 were taxed. The polls, white and black, in Mecklenburg, Rowan, Orange, Granville, Bute, Johnston, Cumberland and Anson were, in 1767, 18,102, while in the rest of the province they were 32,942. (7 C. R., 539.) This poll tax was the only tax the people were compelled to pay, and it was in no sense oppressive, either in amount or in its method of collection. Whether an ad valorem property taxation would not have been better is outside of the discussion.

It is true that the currency of the province was inadequate for the business of the province, and this was peculiarly hard upon those in the back parts of the country. But that is a condition common to all new settlements away from markets and navigable streams, with these markets only to be reached by a long land carriage over almost impassable roads.

All these conditions, however, were but fuel to the agitators' flame, and the people, banded together in an illegal combination, were made to hate lawyers, public officials and merchants with an intense and bitter hatred, and taxes were to them a cruel imposition and tax collectors agents of a tyrannical power. Taxes, even now, in the twentieth century, are regarded as a necessary evil, and perhaps a majority of the people of the whole country are tax dodgers in some form. It is certain, then, that those who, in the eighteenth century were scattered, here and there, in lonely settlements throughout the backwoods of North Carolina, not needing the protection of the government and caring nothing for its benefits, paid out with grudging hand the hard-earned pittance that the government wrung from them.

In April, 1768, Tyree Harris, pressed by the law on one hand and by the Regulators on the other, seized a horse of one of them while he was in the town of Hillsboro. The man disappeared, but soon returned with a band of a hundred horsemen. The sheriff was seized and tied to a tree.

the horse rescued, the citizens of the town were terrorized and insulted, Fanning's house was fired into and the horsemen vanished. Sheriff Harris, in making this levy, was strictly within the law, which was the same then that it was after the Revolution. (Compare 7 C. R., 487, with Potter's Rev., 498.) If any taxpayer failed to attend at the time and place fixed for the payment of taxes, the sheriff might distrain at any time thereafter for the taxes. So the sheriff was doing a legal act in a legal way, while the Regulators were carrying into effect their illegal combination by doing an illegal act. Suppose such an outrage as this should be perpetrated in North Carolina to-day, what would be done? Governor Kitchin would be bound by his oath to call out the State Guard, if the power of the county should prove insufficient, that such flagrant contemners of the law might be brought to justice.

A warrant was sworn out against Herman Husband and William Butler on May 1st. They were arrested and brought to Hillsboro, the intention being to commit Husband to the New Bern or Wilmington jail, but this was frustrated by the collecting of a mob for their rescue, and both prisoners were admitted to bail. (7 C. R., 742 et seq.). The mob dispersed on May 3d, after being assured by Isaac Edwards, Secretary to the Governor, that if they should petition Governor Tryon he would do all he could to remedy their wrongs. Tryon reiterated these promises in his letter of June 20th, in answer to their petition presented by James Hunter and Rednap Howell, but impaired the effect of this, among the Regulators, by demanding that they conform to the law, quit their illegal association and pay their taxes. (Id., 792.) He, with his Council, was in Hillsboro, during August of that year, and then the Regulators handed him a letter. In answer he assured them that the officers should be prosecuted in the proper forum, the courts, and that their purpose to petition the Assembly met with his hearty approval, and that he would continue to do all he could to have their grievances remedied according to law, but warns them of the consequences of their illegal acts. Meantime they had refused to pay any taxes, and had sent Tyree Harris and Ransom Southerland back to town very thoroughly convinced that it was dangerous to distrain for them. (Id., 698.) Meantime thousand-tongued rumor was busy throughout the section. Tryon was to bring the Indians down upon their settlements. At the coming court their leaders were to be tried and executed while the officers were to go scot free. The Regulators, then, while professing full and hearty allegiance to King George and perfect satisfaction with their form of government, must maintain their organization and be ever ready at an instant's warning to run together and protect themselves. (Id., 810.) Tryon thought that they intended to rescue Husband and others at the coming court. He demanded that twelve of their leaders should execute a bond in the sum of £1,000, conditioned that no rescue should be attempted. At the same time he informed them that this was done to save the heavy expense of calling out the militia to defend the court. They replied that there was to be no rescue and refused to give the bond. The militia was called out, and the event justified the prevision of the Governor, for on the morning of the first day of court about 1,000 Regulators were encamped about a half mile north of Hillsboro. (Id., 819.) Governor Tryon's course, in this regard, was endorsed by the best people of the west as well as of the east. The army was composed largely of Mecklenburg and Rowan Presbyterians. Rev. Henry Patillo, always an ardent patriot, on Sunday, September 25th, preached a sermon before them, for which he was thanked in general orders. (Id., 835.) Nor was he alone among the preachers in condemning the Regulators and approving the Governor's course. (See address to the Governor, and letter to their congregations by the Rev. Hugh McAden, James Creswell and David Caldwell. Idem, 813 et seq.) It was at this court, thus protected, that Herman Husband was acquitted and William Butler, Samuel Deviney and John Philip Hartso were convicted of a rout and rescue. The convicts were sentenced to imprisonment and a fine, but the imprisonment was immediately remitted by the Governor and they were given six months within which to pay the fine. (Id., 885.) On October 3d they, with all other Regulators, with the exception of thirteen named, were pardoned of all offenses before that date. (Id., 850.) It must be remembered that, at this time, the law was exceedingly technical. Three separate bills were at this court sent against nine other Regulators, and were quashed by the court for an irregularity in the return of the grand jury. We can imagine the eloquent indignation of some writers had these been bills against officers. Indeed to the present day they lash themselves into indignation over William Butler's fine and imprisonment and Fanning's penny and costs, when the record shows that such was not the judgment in Fanning's case (Id., 844; 8 Id., 27, 33 and 323), and that William Butler and the others were never imprisoned after their conviction and paid not a cent of their fines (7 Id., 850), and that, indeed, on September 9th, 1769, the slate was wiped clean—all Regulator offenders, without exception, were pardoned. (8 Idem., 67.)

Now I will examine briefly, and at the risk of being tedious, what was done in the Assembly to remedy the grievances of the people. At the session of November, 1766, Governor Tryon recommended that a better class of sheriffs be secured by increasing the fees of the office, and that the treasurer's accounts be overhauled and better provision be made for the keeping of his books. (7 Idem, 294.) This the Assembly did, and also gave relief to debtors when executions were levied on land. (Id., 433.) At the session of November, 1767, the Governor recommended further legislation in regard to the office of sheriff, and stricter regulations for the security of the public funds. (Id., 551.) The House immediately appointed a committee on Public Accounts, with Cornelius Harnett, Chairman, and Thomas Person, Wiley Jones and Edmund Fanning among its members. (Id., 571.) Joseph Hewes was added to this committee, and it was continued to the end of the next session. (Id., 662.) At this session they legislated in regard to both sheriffs and the treasurer, and provided a method for appointing jurors. At the November session, 1768, the Governor again pledges himself to do all he could to remedy the grievances of the people, and in regard to the state of the public funds, he said: "It is not the labor of one session, but of many, to bring the public accounts into proper order"; and then he urged the Assembly to be persistent in the attempt. (Id., 862.) Many bills were introduced in answer to the demands of the people, but some failed because the state of the public accounts had not yet been ascertained, others for reasons that do not appear, and still others because contrary to the Governor's instructions. The scarcity of a circulating medium was the evil which seemed most to require a remedy; but the Assembly was not willing to emit paper money without making it legal tender for all debts, and this could not be done, because prohibited in England. They did, however, direct sheriffs how to levy executions and how to dispose of the property taken thereunder. (Id., 977.) This Assembly was dissolved and a new one elected in 1769. In this Herman Husband and John Prior, both Regulators, were the representatives from Orange. When it convened in October, Husband was placed upon the Committee on Public Accounts. (8 Id., 111.) It should be noted that pages 303 and 304, in this volume, should be where pages 106 and 107 are, and vice versa.

Governor Tryon's health had been very bad since the fall of 1768. He lost his only son soon afterward. (Haywood's Tryon, 203.) His health continued bad during 1769. He was anxious to return to England or to be transferred to New York. (8 C. R., 54, 169, 191 and 212.) In the summer of 1769 he visited Williamsburg and there obtained from the Virginia treasurer, Mr. Nicholas, a system of keeping accounts, which, he thought, would prove a complete check upon treasurers and sheriffs. This he urged the Assembly of 1769 to adopt. (Id., 94.) They, however, instead, resolved against taxation by Parliament and the removal of those charged with treason to England for trial and in favor of the right of petition. Tryon, then in a pet, which he afterwards explained was caused by his illness, dissolved that Assembly. (Id., 169.) Before the dissolution, though, it adopted other good resolutions against those resisting officers and against officers who took illegal fees. (Id., 139.)

The election for the new Assembly was held on March 12th, 1770, and Herman Husband and John Prior were again returned from Orange. The Assembly was to have met in New Bern in May, but on account of the heat of the summer and the unhealthfulness of the season it was prorogued to meet on November 30th. I have thus gone carefully over the Acts of the Assembly from the beginning of the Regulator agitation to the period immediately preceding the Hillsboro riot. It seems from this, that Governor Tryon, far from being deaf to the demands of the people, was doing what he could to meet them. (8 C. R., 140.) In the matter of stating the accounts of the public officers, Mr. Burgwin, the best accountant in the province, worked three years before he completed his work. That he had undertaken this work was perfectly well known to the Regulators, for Husband was a member of the Assembly at the time. (Id., 139.) The neglect of the Assembly to make the fee bill more definite and to divide the county of Orange into three counties sooner, is to be condemned. Bills to this effect were introduced two years before they became laws, but those were the two years in which conditions were most acute, and thus demanded prompt action. Legislative reform, however, is notoriously of slow growth, so slow indeed that two years is generally a very short period in which to perfect one, and there are very great practical difficulties in the way of revising a general fee bill.

Having stated thus what the Assembly did in answer to the people's demands, it remains to consider what the courts did in determining whether the officers had been guilty of extortion or not. We have already reviewed the proceedings of the Hillsboro Superior Court in September, 1768. At the ensuing term, March, 1769, nothing was done against the rioters at all. Husband said that bills of indictment were sent against the clerk, Francis Nash, but were ignored, the grand jury having been packed. That body taken from Orange and Granville counties, in ability and standing, seems certainly an average one. So far as can now be ascertained, no one seems ever to have been an officer, so there is no reason apparent why they should favor officers. At the following September term both juries were composed of excellent citizens, including at least two Regulators. (Id., 97.) At the Salisbury court, immediately preceding this, indictments had been sent against the Clerk of Rowan County, John Frohock. These also had been ignored. According to the Regulators this grand jury, too, had been packed. (Id., 68.) At the March Term, 1770, of the Hillsboro court, an action, James Hunter v. Edmund Fanning, was tried, with the verdict in favor of the defendant, and Husband's lawyers, at the September Term, 1768, obtained judgments against him for the fees earned at that term. His plea, duress, was found against him. Execution was afterwards issued upon James Milner's judgment for fifty pounds and levied upon Husband's land, but the sale thereunder was stopped by a mob. There is nothing in the constitution of the jury at this term to indicate that it was made of those who sympathized with the officers, and Regulators were of its number. (Id., 184.)

Jurors for the Superior Court were appointed by the County Courts of the counties within the district, and the County Courts were composed of all the justices in the county. This method of appointing jurors remained practically unchanged until 1806. (Compare 23 S. R., page 704, et seq., with Potter's Rev., 395 and 1055.) Under such a system it is possible to exclude all those obnoxious to the court itself, but it is not possible to select a jury with a view to packing it for a particular case. That presupposes collusion between the various County Courts of the district, as well as positive corruption in all these courts. Now they were composed of the best and most substantial men in the counties, appointed upon recommendation of the members of the Assembly, and John Lowe, Richard Cheek and Joab Brooks, all Regulators, were Justices in Orange. (Id., 149.) So we can put aside as incredible the assertion of the Regulators that the jurors at the Salisbury and Hillsboro Superior Courts for 1769 and 1770, were corrupt. Some, no doubt were prejudiced against, and some in favor of, the Regulators, just as jurors would be now in the midst of any public excitement, but the indifferent and impartial members of the jury would be, in some instances, at least, the balance of power.

Now as to the Judges who presided over these courts. The Chief Justice, Howard, seems to have had more of the confidence of the Regulators than either of the others, Henderson and Moore. He was a good lawyer, of mild disposition and inclined to mercy—not at all a tyrant, though something of a courtier. Henderson had great natural ability. He was a self-made man and, largely, a self-taught man. Of the people originally, he was the architect of his own fortunes, and there is nothing, so far as known, to cast any shadow upon his personal integrity. Maurice Moore, an aristocrat by birth, was politically a democrat. He was a man of culture and of strong character, though unquestionably an intriguer. There may have been, of course, individual miscarriages of justice in this court, just as there are in our courts now, but that the court was partial to officers, so as to make it its business to see that they were not convicted, is wholly disproven. All the established facts show this to be false and there is nothing to the contrary except the wild assertions of the Regulators, that is of one of the parties to a bitter controversy in the midst of a controversy, and that, too, without having adequate means of knowledge. Their charges against the court and juries may be utterly disregarded as not having any sufficient basis of probability. But smarting under their defeats, and as they conceived them, their wrongs, they came in force to the September, 1770, Superior Court to see that their sympathizers were placed upon the juries and they, themselves, should have justice administered to them. Their conception of justice, however, was that all the cases in which they were interested should be decided in their favor. The scenes at the riot which ensued are familiar to all readers, and I have not space to repeat the description. There was no immediate cause for it. Not a single Regulator had ever been punished for his illegal acts. There were no indictments pending in the court at that time against any of them. About one thousand of them in Orange and about seven hundred in Rowan were standing obdurate in their refusal to pay taxes, but no indictments had been found against them for this, and for their former offenses they had all been pardoned. There were suits pending against some of the officers, with individual Regulators as plaintiffs, who were endeavoring to recover fees that they claimed were extorted from them. Besides, they wished to force indictments against these officers. When it is remembered, then, that they already had the two members of the Assembly, it must be apparent to the most prejudiced mind that this outbreak was wholly personal, directed solely against the lawyers and officials.*

After the Hillsboro riot, Alamance or submission was the only alternative. When, then Governor Tryon marched west at the head of his little army, he was coming not as a tyrant to oppress, but as a ruler to suppress and punish defiant criminals. In this he acted as any executive officer of any State, however free, must have done under similar circumstances. The attack at Hillsboro was not upon the existing state, but upon government in any form. Even the most primitive peoples respect their judges and do not profane their courts. It is there that earthly power doth show likest God's, and man's intuitive recognition of this truth is itself testimony to His divine origin. When, excited by passion, he attacks his courts, he is then attempting to uproot the very fundamentals of society. The men who followed Tryon, afterwards, with one exception, the Whig leaders of the State, knew that so long as the mob spirit was abroad in the land any government was impossible. Their primary object in going then was to save government itself, and not its form, so they were as much patriots at Alamance as they afterwards were at Moore's Creek or Guilford Court House.

After these disturbances and their tragic ending many people removed from the county. More than half of its territory, too, was erected into new counties. I can find nowhere any data upon which to make any estimate of the population of the dismembered county of Orange. During the year 1772, Governor Martin, who had succeeded Tryon, transferred to New York, visited Orange and the Regulator settlements in Guilford, spending the month of August in Hillsboro. James Hunter gives such a naive account of this visit in a letter to William Butler, November 6th, 1772, (Morehead's James Hunter, pages 44 and 45), that I reproduce what he has to say:

*It must be noted, too, that Fanning had held no office in the county since Octobrer, 1768.

"Things have taken a mighty turn in our unfortunate country. This summer our new Governor has been up with us and given us every satisfaction we could expect, * * * and I think our officers hate him as bad as we hated Tryon, only they don't speak so free. He has turned Colonel McGee out of commission for making complaint against outlawed men, and he has turned out every officer that any complaint has been supported against. In short, I think he has determined to purge the country of them. We petitioned him as soon as he came, and when he received our petition, he came up among us and sent for all the outlawed men to meet him at William Fields; told us it was out of his power to pardon at that time because he had submitted it to the King, and the King's instructions was to leave it to the Governor, Council and Assembly to pardon whom they saw fit. But assured us he had given strict orders no man should be hurt or meddled with on that account, which made us wish for you all back again. Though some are of the opinion Harman will not be pardoned, I am of a different mind. * * * He came to see us the second time and advised for fear of ill-designing fellows, to go to Hillsboro and enter into recognizance till the Assembly met, which eleven of us did. He bemoaned our case and regretted that the indemnifying act had put it out of his power to give us full relief. Our enemies would, I believe, be glad to see you three pardoned, for some of them have gotten severely whipped about your being kept away, and I think the country is as much master now as ever. * * *

Morriss Moore and Abner Nash have been up to see me, to try to get me in favor again, and promised to do all they could for you."

It is evident from this letter that both the Governor, Martin, and the Whig leaders of the east had begun to realize that there was to be a contest between them, and each party was anxious to conciliate the Regulators. The Whigs could not afford to have at their back secret foes while they faced their open enemy in front, while Martin, looking about him for supporters in the coming contest and finding the Regulators already bitter foes of the leading Whigs, determined to attach them to his own service. It is believed that part of Maurice Moore's intrigue with these factionists was his publication of the Atticus letter, for, Ransom Southerland, who then lived in Guilford and was cognizant of the visit of Moore and Nash to James Hunter, thought Nash was the author of this letter, because he was with Moore on this trip into the Regulator settlements, and the letter was never credited to any one except these two, so far as is known. This courting of the Regulators by both sides continued until 1776, when the war was flagrant, with the advantage decidedly on Governor Martin's side. The name Regulator in 1776 had lost its old meaning and meant then a loyalist, or as they were afterwards called, a Tory. In that year the Cane Creek Quakers entered upon the minutes of their meeting that certain of the inhabitants of the province had approached them to ascertain how they were affected towards the colonists in the approaching struggle between them and the mother country, and that they had answered that the tenets of their faith required that they should remain neutral. A few pages afterwards they note that the Regulators had approached them with the same object, and they returned to them the same reply that they had returned to the inhabitants of the province. (Minutes at Graham.) Thus we see how completely the Regulators had become identified with the Loyalists in the minds of the people. In fact all the Loyalists in Orange County at that period, probably one-third of the population, with a few individual exceptions, had been Regulators. It is a perfectly safe conclusion, then, that had it not been for the Regulator troubles, Orange County when war was flagrant would have presented a united front to the enemy. Apologists say, in explanation of their position, that they felt bound by the stringent oath that Governor Tryon had imposed upon them. Every one who knows human nature and the springs of human action, knows how prone men are to substitute a fair-seeming and high-sounding motive for the real one, when they are called upon for an explanation of their acts. In this, so seductive is the temptation, they quite frequently deceive themselves. The truth is, that no large body of men in all history was ever restrained from revolution by any oath of allegiance that they had taken, as Edmund Burke, with his luminous common sense and glowing reason, shows in one of his great speeches in defense of the American colonists. No, the reason why the Regulators were Tories is found in the fact that their ancient enemies, the lawyers and officials, were Whigs, and Governor Martin and his emissaries made most effective use of this personal element in the situation.

The center of the Whig influence was, from the beginning, in Hillsboro. There under the leadership of Francis Nash, Thomas Hart, William Johnston and others, a Safety Committee was organized in late 1774 or early 1775. Unfortunately the record of its proceedings has been lost. We know only that, in 1776, John Hogan was its chairman and James Hogg, its secretary. As early as 1773 an independent company had been formed at Hillsboro, with a former sergeant in the British army as its drill master. After the departure of Edmund Fanning for New York in 1771, Francis Nash had been appointed colonel of the county, and he seems to have entered actively and efficiently into the discharge of the duties of that office. From the standpoint of military equipment and effectiveness this militia no doubt was almost a farce. Martin, writing to the Earl of Hillsboro in 1772, said (9 C. R., 349): "In the course of my journey through the interior country, I received the militia of the three counties of Guilford, Orange and Chatham. Considered in a military light nothing can be imagined more contemptible in all respects but numbers, than those assemblages of people in arms. They were truly such a burlesque representation of soldiers, such a mockery of my beloved profession of arms as did not fail to excite in me some silent, indignant and painful emotions." These indignant and painful emotions, they continued to excite in the breast of that susceptible man for the next ten years, reaching an acute stage in 1781, when in company with Lord Cornwallis and his army, harassed by them after the battle of Guilford Courthouse, he retreated across the State.

At the beginning of the war, the settlements in the county containing the pleasantest homes and the best cultivated farms, were those in which the Whig sentiment was strongest—Hawfields, Eno, Little River, Flat River, and New Hope. There was an occasional Loyalist family among them, at that time, and some neutrals, men who from timidity or constitutional conservatism, had not made up their minds, yet these communities constituted the fighting strength of the county during the whole war. In one of these settlements was a Tory family, which to the present day, shows the effect of the isolation and repression of that period, in their silent, almost stern, self-sufficiency.

The first general meeting of delegates from the province at large that occurred in Orange County was the Provincial Congress, which convened at Hillsboro, August 20, 1775. On that day, which was Sunday, a majority of the counties and towns not appearing, the Congress was adjourned until the next day. Then all the counties, 35, and all the towns, 9, were represented by 184 delegates. Probably never since in the history of North Carolina has a public body included in its membership so nearly all the prominent men of the State, as did this Congress. Its place of meeting was St. Matthew's Church, which never having been consecrated according to the ritual of the Episcopal Church, could be used for such purposes without desecration. Hillsboro at this time contained within its limits about seventy or eighty houses and three or four hundred inhabitants, while there were many farm houses in its immediate vicinity. Thomas Burke resided two miles northeast of the town, James Hogg just east of it and Ralph Macnair still further east on property formerly belonging to the Fews and now the Kirkland place. The well-to-do citizens had negro slaves and attendants; food supplies, including game, were abundant, and hospitality was a law of the period. It had then two taverns, one of which was described by Judge Iredell in 1778, as most elegant. Notwithstanding all this, it must have taxed the little town very heavily to entertain suitably fully two hundred visitors. Samuel Johnston, writing of this entertainment in a letter of August 22d, said: "The delegates are all in good health, and we are tolerably well provided with accommodations from the hospitality and obliging dispositions of the inhabitants of this town." After the organization of the Congress on the morning of the 21st, Rev. George Meiklejohn, upon request, attended and performed divine services. If the High Church, Tory, Parson had the courage of his convictions and a sense of humor, no doubt, he incorporated in his prayers the petition, "From all sedition, privy conspiracy and rebellion, good Lord deliver us." The Representatives of the county in this Congress were Thomas Burke, John Kinchen, Thomas Hart, John Atkinson and John Williams. Three companies of minute men were required to be raised within the county, of the battalion to be raised within the district of Hillsboro, and James Thackston was appointed colonel. A regiment of militia was also required to be raised within the county, with John Hogan, colonel; John Butler, lieutenant colonel; William Moore, first major, and Nathaniel Rochester, second major. Of these, John Butler became much the most useful officer. In 1777 he was made brigadier-general of the militia. For twenty years he had the confidence of the people to a great degree. He, however, had no special aptitude for military affairs, and his failure to accomplish results in two or three instances has with some occasioned a doubt of his personal courage, and with all a lack of faith in his military capacity. The affair at Lindley's Mill, when Governor Burke would have been rescued had General Butler's stanchness equaled his activity in raising the militia for the pursuit of McNeill and Fanning, impaired his reputation as an officer materially. His residence was at Mt. Pleasant, an elevation near Haw river, about 16 miles west of Hillsboro. In his civil employments, and they were many, he was a very valuable and useful citizen. He was a moderator of the fury of, and an intermediary between, the contending factions in the Regulator troubles. He was one of the first and most outspoken patriots, and he made and kept his whole immediate section a Whig stronghold throughout the war. He was constantly employed in the public service, and seemed to respond to any demand upon his time and energies with the utmost cheerfulness and alacrity. He was, too, peculiarly efficient in inducing the militia of the county to embody for a special emergency. John Hogan was an active patriot, son-in-law of Thomas Lloyd, and Senator from the county in 1779. Nathaniel Rochester was a merchant at Hillsboro, was made clerk of the county court in 1778, and at the end of the war removed to Maryland and still later to New York, where he was one of the founders of, and gave his name to, the city of Rochester.

The militia of the State was composed of all the effective men between the ages of sixteen and fifty. A brigade was composed of all the regiments within a judicial district, of which there were then six in the State. Counties, according to their size and population, had one or more regiments within their limits, and every regiment was divided into companies of fifty rank and file, at least, with two sergeants, two corporals, one drummer and one fifer. The companies were divided into four divisions, which were to draw lots for the first, second, third and fourth term to go on service, and were numbered accordingly. The accoutrements of individual militiaman were a good gun, shot bag, a powder horn and a cutlass or tomahawk. (24 S. R., 1.) In 1776 Orange was divided into two regiments, with John Cutler colonel of the Southern regiment, and James Saunders of the Northern. (10 C. R., 532.)

Besides innumerable skirmishes with the Tories in its own borders the Orange County militia participated in nearly all the important movements in the State and in South Carolina from Stono to Guilford Court House. After the surrender at Yorktown they were engaged solely in running down and capturing Tories, and in resisting the raids of the notorious partizan, David Fanning. The wise system under which the militia was called into active service, that is by turns in which only one-fourth of the working force of the people was diverted to military purposes at a time, enabled them after the disastrous drought of 1772, to make abundant harvests each year. This was the reason why

Hillsboro was made a concentration camp in 1779 and 1780 before and after Camden. This concentration of troops in their midst brought its own penalty to the people. There were many outrages committed upon them by these ill-disciplined troops in the way of illegal impressments and seizures. See Hillsboro, Colonial and Revolutionary, pages 75 and 76, for a description of these. After all the drafts thus made upon their patience by their own soldiery the people were to suffer still more from the coming of the enemy in February, 1781. The line of Cornwallis's retreat from the Dan was first southeast through Caswell, then almost due east, not far from what is now the Person county line, then southwest to Hillsboro. He entered that town February 20th, and made his headquarters there for six days. By the irony of fate he erected the King's standard in front of the court-house on February 22d, and the friends of Britain, most of them only nominally so, flocked into town to propitiate Cornwallis and his soldiers, and to see what was to be seen. A certain fearful looking for the judgment to come made nearly all of them content themselves with this and refuse to commit themselves further. Cornwallis soon found his position untenable. Greene had recrossed the Dan, Pickens had advanced from the west, and the British foragers were continually being harassed and cut off by parties of the Light Horse. Tarleton had failed in forming a junction with Colonel Pyle and his loyalists, and the latter's command had been cut to pieces by General Harry Lee at the famous Hacking Match. Besides the country about Hillsboro had been exhausted of supplies. Stedman, Cornwallis's Commissary, found some salt beef and pork and hogs in the town, upon which the army subsisted for a while, but he could get few cattle and those only by his cattle drivers going long distances. He was forced then to impress and kill the work oxen of the loyalists, and to make a house to house visit in the town and to take from the inhabitants stores provided for their own sustenance, "many of whom," said he, "were greatly distressed by this measure." Lord Cornwallis was thus forced to depart from Hillsboro on the 25th. His route was the same as that taken by Tryon in 1771, and his next position was on the banks of the Great Alamance.

The Revolutionary War in the destruction of life and property seems very small when compared with modern wars, but its stupendous results give it a dignity and interest which no other contest, so small, has. I have not space to enter more fully into the share that the people of Orange had in it. At its end the population of North Carolina was at least 30 per cent greater than in 1770. See Century of Population Growth (recently published by the Federal Government), page 10. Probably in Orange County the increase was even greater. This came almost wholly from the excess of births over deaths, notwithstanding the destruction of life in the war. Nor is this all, the people came from the contest stronger, more energetic, more purposeful than when they entered it. Industrially, they were more efficient, while intellectually they were brighter and more resourceful. The period of their ancient prosperity extended from the end of the war to about 1795 or 1796, when Tennessee and Kentucky seemed to be attracting many of its most valuable citizens, while the period of its greatest depression extended from 1830 to 1840.

I shall conclude this sketch of the early history of the people of Orange with some account of an institution, about which little is known.

Even when the war was in progress and its outcome was necessarily doubtful to the most sanguine the minds of the Founders of the State were busily engaged upon schemes to advance the educational interests of the people of the State.

Among others was the incorporation in January, 1779, of Science Hall, an academy to be located at Hillsboro. (24 S. R., 250-1.) "Whereas," says the prelude to the act, "the proper education of youth in this State is highly necessary, and would answer the most valuable and beneficial purposes to this State and the good people thereof; and, Whereas, the neighborhood of Hillsborough from the healthfulness of its situation and the great plenty of provisions with which it abounds, is a fit and proper place to erect a seminary; and, Whereas, a number of gentlemen have, in order to promote and encourage such a valuable and beneficial establishment as the erecting of a seminary at the place, aforesaid, subscribed very considerable sums, which together with such sums as may be subscribed, will be sufficient to answer all the expense attending the same, therefore, be it enacted, etc." William Hooper, Alexander Martin, John Kinchen, Thomas Burke, Thomas Hart, Nathaniel Rochester, James Hogg and William Johnston, Esq., and Rev. Mr. Frazier were appointed trustees. Notwithstanding the subscriptions which were probably not collected, nothing of any moment seems to have been done in pursuance of the act, until November, 1782, when another subscription was started. It seems that commissioners under the confiscation acts were about to sell certain lands in the neighborhood, the property of the Loyalist, Andrew Mitchell, and the object of the subscription was to provide funds for the Trustees to invest in this land and hold for the benefit of the Academy. This scheme seems not to have been effective, so the subscriptions were renewed a year later. The list was headed by Alexander Martin with 30 pounds. Others subscribing £30 were John Penn, Thomas Burke, William Courtney, William Hooper and James Thackston. The other subscriptions, 67 in number, ran from the £1 of Richard Gott, through the £25 of John Hay and Richard Dobbs Spaight, to the £40 of James Hogg and Joseph Hawkins, the grand total being £770 and 15 shillings. All of these subscriptions were payable on or before May 1, 1787. The following year, 1784, the charter of the Academy was amended. By section 6 of the amendatory act, old St. Matthew's Church was converted into a free church and academy. (24 S. R., 605-7): "By and with the consent of all persons having any right, title or interest in the church erected in the town of Hillsborough (already far gone to decay) such persons being of the Episcopal persuasion, and as such claiming an interest in the said church, such consent being first obtained by notice in writing promulgated in the most public part of the county, calling on such persons to object, if any objection they have upon such notice given, and no reasonable objection made, the said building with the ground upon which it stands shall be held and deemed to be invested in the said commissioners, for the uses and purposes following, to-wit: That the said church shall be, with as much economy and expedition as possible, put in decent repair; and so put in repair, shall on every Sunday in every year be open to the ministers of every sect and persuasion being Christians, there to inculcate the truths of their holy religion: Provided always, that every dispute relative to a preference to said church in officiating there by ministers of different, or the same, sects shall be determined by the said commissioners; and in any dispute between an Episcopalian and ministers of any other persuasion as to a preference to the pulpit, the former, circumstances being otherwise equal, shall be preferred, as the church was founded for the Episcopal persuasion, and to them by the constitution properly appertains." The surviving trustees or commissioners as they were called in the act of 1784, appointed in the act of 1779, were given authority to fill vacancies on account of death or removal. These survivors, James Hogg, William Hooper and William Johnston, met at the house of Mr. Hooper in the latter part of the year 1784 and organized by the election of Mr. Hogg as Chairman, and Alfred Moore and Jesse Benton were elected trustees to fill vacancies caused by the death of Governor Burke and the removal of Thomas Hart. Mr. Benton was elected secretary and treasurer. The repairs upon the church, including securing the steeple, cost £120 and seem to have been completed by May, 1785. Solomon Pinto and Benjamin Perkins, graduates of the College of New Haven, were the first teachers, and among the first scholars were Thomas and William Hooper, A. DeRossett, Richard Quince, Roger Hall, Charles Blount and Gavin Alves. The latter part of 1786, Benjamin Perkins, having an opportunity to improve his fortunes, removed elsewhere, and in the attempt to secure a suitable successor for him, Mr. Hooper wrote the following letter to Dr. John Witherspoon, of Princeton:

EDENTON, NOV. 7, 1786.

Reverend Sir:

Availing myself of the acquaintance with which you honoured me during the time we spent together formerly in Congress, and well aware of the very friendly disposition you entertain to every institution for the encouragement of literature, I take the liberty to call your attention to the Infant Academy of Hillsborough, in the State of North Carolina.

This Academy more than twelve months past was begun, and has hitherto been supported under the auspices, and by the private subscription, of several private gentlemen. Its progress has been equal to their utmost expectations and they are led to hope that the advantage which the State at large must soon derive from it will make it an object worthy the patronage and support of our Legislature. The tuition has been hitherto conducted by two young gentlemen of the College of New Haven, one of whom has lately left us in the pursuit of more active employment. It has been his proper business to teach mathematics in the various branches, English grammatically, natural and experimental Philosophy and Geography. The gentleman who continues with us teaches the Greek and Latin Classics. Upon this vacancy having taken place, the Trustees have empowered me to employ some gentleman to fill the place, and I now beg leave to commit this charge, in the most unreserved manner, to you after premising only that it would be agreeable to us that he should have passed that time of life which might lead him to idleness, levity or dissipation. I have in general terms described what was the line of his predecessor. There are other parts of academical instruction which will readily suggest themselves to you, and which we wish he might possess, a knowledge of the French language would make him an important acquisition to us. His salary will be one hundred pounds sterling per annum. He must find his own drink, meat, washing and lodging, which will cost him about twenty-five pounds, this currency, yearly. Hillsboro, where this Academy is situated, is in the western part of the State, about 110 miles from the Seacoast, and from a residence of several years in it, I believe it to be as healthy as any part of this continent. The Trustees of this Academy are Alfred Moore, Attorney-General of the State; Alexander Martin, late Governor; General John Butler, James Hogg, Esq. (whom you know); James Iredell, Esq., Jesse Benton and myself, and are all resident in Hillsboro, or near it, except Mr. Iredell. I would advise that the gentlemen whom you make choice of should be in Hillsboro some time in January next, as the school vacation will begin in the middle of December and end in the month of January. Should the gentleman take a water passage and land in Edenton, New Bern or Wilmington, he may easily transport himself from either of these to Hillsboro, by making his purpose known to Mr. Iredell or Mr. Samuel Johnston at Edenton, your son at

New Bern, or John Huske, Esq., at Wilmington. I have the subject of this letter devotedly at heart and beg leave most earnestly to press it upon your attention. In expectation of hearing from you by the earliest occasion, I am, Reverend Sir,

Your most obedient, humble servant,

Dr. Witherspoon. WILL. HOOPER.

There was considerable delay in securing the proper man on account of the difficulty of getting one to fill the specifications, and then after this difficulty was surmounted and one was selected and agreed to come, his salary was raised at Trenton, where he was, and he at the last moment declined the offer. At last, in February, 1787, Dr. Witherspoon secured a satisfactory young man and he was forwarded, via New York, care of Messrs. William Blount and Benjamin Hawkins, Members of Congress, to Judge Iredell at Edenton. Judge Iredell, upon the young man's arrival at the latter place, sent him on to Hillsboro, bearing the following letter to Mr. Hooper:

EDENTON, March 17, 1787.

My Dear Sir:

I congratulate you on the acquisition of the young gentleman to the Academy, who will deliver you this letter. His name is Squires, and besides the recommendations the inclosed letters give of him, he appears to me upon an acquaintance of a fortnight, during which I have seen him for the greatest part of every day, a very deserving young man—studious to a degree and though a little pedantic, as most young collegians are, lively and agreeable in his disposition, with (if I mistake not) a very excellent heart. I hope you will consider it a strong proof of my fidelity to the Hillsboro Academy that I have not attempted to intercept him. I am sure my whole family as well as myself will part with him with great regret. It has given me extreme concern that he could not be despatched earlier, but this country, which never abounded in good horses, seems now worse off than ever. Would to God I could have supplied him clear of expense, I should have been most happy in doing it. I have advanced him $15, two-thirds in hard money to pay for his passage, and £15 in paper. The double chair is hired at 3 shillings for the journey. Mr. Macnair furnishes him with a horse as high as Mr. John Johnston's, in which neighborhood Mr. Johnston thinks he can get another. I could not hire one for him either here or at Ryans. The inclosed letters of Witherspoon and the Delegates I only received yesterday and have not answered."

The remainder of the letter does not concern the School.

The new teacher, who was burdened with the not very euphonious name of Zadoc Squires, remained with the Academy until his death late in 1789. The routine of the day's work was fixed by the Trustees. From April 1st to November 1st in each and every year, open at 7 A. M., study until 9, recess for an hour, study from 10 to 12:30 P. M., recess until 3 P. M., study until 5 P. M. The rate of tuition was £3, 6 shillings and 8 pence at the beginning, the same in the middle, and the same at the end, of the term. Though the Trustees when they first took charge of the church had it repaired at a cost of £20, in 1786 they found it necessary to have the steeple taken down. It was at this time that the clock, which had been in the steeple of the church was removed to the cupola of the market house.

Besides the fees from students and private subscriptions the Academy had occasional gifts, which showed the interest of the public in it. William Johnston, who died in 1785, bequeathed it £100 in his will, and Jesse Benton, who had come in contact with that firebrand, Colonel William Shepperd, very much to his injury, devoted the damages he recovered in an action for the assault, £50, to the same good uses. It is quite probable, too, that both before and after his father's death Thomas Hart Benton attended this school. I have been unable to ascertain when it ceased to exist. It is probable that it did not long survive the death of Mr. Hooper in 1790 and that of Mr. Benton in 1791.

Having thus been dealing with the past, permit me for a moment, in conclusion, to say something of the present. If in this taking of stock we shall find that the past was more honest, more patriotic, more public-spirited than the present we shall know that there is something wrong at the core of our being. The present of a virile people is always better than its past. The people of North Carolina have nothing to fear from a comparison of their present with their past, great though that past is in some particulars. The public life of the State is freer from graft and from self-seeking, and is more singly directed towards securing the welfare of the people at large than it was in the Revolutionary or post-Revolutionary periods. Our public men, now, are as patriotic and wise as they were then, but, with a wider vision, they are much more sympathetic with the higher and nobler aspirations of the masses. To them equal opportunity for all is not a barren theory, but an ever-living, burning truth —an eternal principle that inspires all their acts. They are also cleaner, more sober, more moral, more honest, in their private life. And what a wonderful improvement there has been in the private life of the people themselves! Then, whole communities living in drunkenness and immorality and debauchery; now, the same communities, sitting clothed and in their right minds, regarding the future with calm and confident hope for themselves and their children, a church here and a schoolhouse yonder, and both open to them and to all of them, without money and without price. No, North Carolina has nothing to fear from a comparison of its present with its past.

INFROMATION

Concerning the Patriotic Society

"Daughters of the Revolution"

The General Society was founded October 11, 1890,—and organized August 20, 1891,—under the name of "Daughters of the American Revolution"; was incorporated under the laws of the State of New York as an organization national in its work and purpose. Some of the members of this organization becoming dissatisfied with the terms of entrance, withdrew from it and, in 1891, formed under the slightly differing name "Daughters of the Revolution," eligibility to which from the moment of its existence has been lineal descent from an ancestor who rendered patriotic service during the War of Independence.

"The North Carolina Society"

a subdivision of the General Society, was organized in October, 1896, and has continued to promote the purposes of its institution and to observe the Constitution and By-Laws.

Membership and Qualifications

Any woman shall be eligible who is above the age of eighteen years, of good character, and a lineal descendant of an ancestor who (1) was a signer of the Declaration of Independence, a member of the Continental Congress, Legislature or General Court, of any of the Colonies or States; or (2) rendered civil, military or naval service under the authority of any of the thirteen Colonies, or of the Continental Congress; or (3) by service rendered during the War of the Revolution became liable to the penalty of treason against the government of Great Britain: Provided, that such ancestor always remained loyal to the cause of American Independence.

The chief work of the North Carolina Society for the past eight years has been the publication of the "North Carolina Booklet," a quarterly publication on great events in North Carolina history—Colonial and Revolutionary. $1.00 per year. It will continue to extend its work and to spread the knowledge of its History and Biography in other States.

This Society has its headquarters in Raleigh, N. C., Room 411, Carolina Trust Company Building, 232 Fayetteville Street.

Vol. X JANUARY, 1911 No. 3

The North Carolina Booklet

"Carolina! Carolina! Heaven's blessings attend her!
While we live we will cherish, protect and defend her."

Published by
THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY
DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION

The object of the Booklet is to aid in developing and preserving North Carolina History. The proceeds arising from its publication will be devoted to patriotic purposes. Editor.

ADVISORY BOARD OF THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET.

MRS. HUBERT HAYWOOD.
MR. E. E. MOFFITT.
MRS. SPIER WHITAKER.
MR. R. D. W. CONNOR.
DR. D. H. HILL.
DR. E. W. SIKES.
MR. W. J. PEELE.
MISS MARTHA HELEN HAYWOOD.
DR. RICHARD DILLARD.
DR. KEMP P. BATTLE.
MR. JAMES SPRUNT.
MR. MARSHALL DELANCEY HAYWOOD.
CHIEF JUSTICE WALTER CLARK.
MAJOR W. A. GRAHAM.

EDITOR:
MISS MARY HILLIARD HINTON.

OFFICERS OF THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION 1910–1912.

REGENT:
MISS MARY HILLIARD HINTON.

VICE-REGENT:
MISS CATHERINE FAUNTLEROY SEYTON ALBERTSON.

HONORARY REGENTS:
MRS. SPIER WHITAKER.
MRS. E. E. MOFFITT.

RECORDING SECRETARY:
MRS. J. LEIGH SKINNER.

CORRESPONDING SECRETARY:
MRS. PAUL H. LEE.

TREASURER:
MRS. FRANK SHERWOOD.

REGISTRAR:
MRS. JOSEPH CHESHIRE WEBB.

GENEALOGIST AND HISTORIAN:
MRS. HELEN DEBERNIERE WILLS.

CUSTODIAN OF RELICS:
MRS. JOHN E. RAY.

CHAPTER REGENTS.

Bloomsbury Chapter.....MRS. HUBERT HAYWOOD, Regent.
Penelope Barker Chapter.....MRS. PATRICK MATTHEW, Regent.
Sir Walter Raleigh Chapter.....MRS. WALKER WALLER JOYNES, Regent.
DeGraffenried Chapter.....MRS. CHARLES SLOVER HOLLISTER, Regent.

FOUNDER OF THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY AND REGENT 1896-1902:
MRS. SPIER WHITAKER.

REGENT 1902:
MRS. D. H. HILL, SR.*

REGENT 1902-1906:
MRS. THOMAS K. BRUNER.

REGENT 1906-1910:
MRS. E. E. MOFFITT.

---

* Died December 12, 1904.

THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET

Vol. X JANUARY, 1911 No. 3

THE CROATANS

BY HAMILTON McMILLAN.

Geologists tell us that running through North Carolina is an ancient coast line, stretching from Northeast to Southwest and nearly parallel with the present Atlantic coast. West of this line is the hill country, gradually rising in elevation till we reach the mountains. Beginning at the Catawba River, this ancient coast line runs north of Cheraw and Bennettsville in South Carolina, east of Laurinburg, north of Maxton, east of Red Springs, west of Hope Mills and Fayetteville, crosses the Cape Fear River at Averasboro and trends in a northeast direction to the Virginia State line.

In the remote past there was a time when the ocean covered all that part of North Carolina east of this line, when the waves beat upon Haymount at Fayetteville and great whales sported in the shallow ocean. The survey of the Cape Fear and Yadkin Valley Railroad developed the fact that the roadbed at Fayetteville and Hope Mills was about 176 feet above sea level.

That this ocean bed was once elevated and again depressed is abundantly proven by the buried forests on Rockfish Creek, and in Pender County at Rocky Point, and by a brick building found buried under many feet of stratified earth at Cronly, in Brunswick County. We once saw a human skeleton exhumed at Hope Mills at a depth of sixteen feet beneath stratified earth.

The elevation of the land was not sudden, as the lowlands and second lands on the Cape Fear evidently mark great pauses in the elevation.

Along the beach of this ancient coast line runs what is known as the Lowrie Road. This road in the early settlement of this country was only a great Indian trail, which became the great route of travel towards the Southwest. This road was straightened in 1817 by General Bernard, who was employed by the United States to superintend the mail routes through North and South Carolina. The location of this road along the beach of this ancient coast line would indicate its great antiquity.

John Lederer, a German traveler in the employment of Governor Berkeley, of Virginia, after traveling across the western portion of our State and visiting the Saura Indians in South Carolina, on his return evidently traveled the Lowrie Road on his return to Virginia through the "pine barrens" of our State.

The Cherokee Indians, embracing numerous tribes, had their principal seats in the mountains, and various tribes, acknowledging their supremacy, occupied the eastern part of our State as hunting grounds, and in some instances made permanent settlements. These Indians had many roads leading from the mountains to the Atlantic coast. One of these roads extended from the mountains through the present counties of Buncombe, Lincoln, Mecklenburg, Union, Anson and Robeson, and uniting with the Great Lowrie Road at or near Fayetteville, and from its junction extending towards "Roanoke," the region adjacent to Pamlico Sound. Another great road led from the mountains and united with the Lowrie at Fayetteville, and now known as the Yadkin Road.

Commencing with the Saura Indians, and extending along this ancient trail leading to "Roanoke," there were the Cheraws, Chickoras, Mellattaws, Croatans and Tuscaroras.

All the tribes along this line, so far as we can ascertain, acknowledged the supremacy of the Cherokee nation, with the exception of the Tuscaroras. The Mellattaws had also a great trail leading from the mountains towards the Southeast, coming down through the present county of Randolph, where a branch road led towards the Roanoke River and another passed through Moore, Cumberland and Robeson counties, crossing the Lowrie trail near the present town of Maxton, and reaching the coast near Lockwoods Folly in Brunswick County. This Mellattaw tribe emigrated to the Southwest and gave our army serious trouble about the time of the Fort Mims massacre. (Vide Pickett's His. of Ala.)

From the earliest settlement in Robeson County the Croatans have occupied a large territory, principally along the Lumber River. They are evidently of Indian origin, possess Indian traits, and claim that their ancestors were originally Cherokees, who dwelt in Eastern Carolina, or, as they express it, in "Roanoke, in Virginia." It was first supposed that they lived on Roanoke Island, but later developments show that the region they call Roanoke embraces all the territory adjacent to Pamlico Sound. It is worthy of note that the chronicles of the tribe call the sound Pamteeco, with the accent on the penult syllable. These people were known in the 16th and 17th centuries as Croatans from their occupation of Croatan Island, now a part of Carteret County, and were so designated in the act of the North Carolina General Assembly in 1885. When first known to the early white settlers in this region they spoke English, and in many instances had English family names identical with those of the "lost colony" of Roanoke. They have in common use many English words which are now obsolete in English-speaking countries, but which were used in the days of Chaucer. In addressing a stranger they use the old Saxon word, Mon. They speak of houses as housen and use mension for measurement. They are familiar with the story of Virginia Dare, and they strenuously claim that the name was pronounced Darr; others claim that it was pronounced Dorr, and still others pronounce it Durr. The muster roll of a company from this tribe in the War of 1812 shows the name as Dorr. The Durrs of Lincoln County are claimed as descendants of Virginia Dare. The chroniclers who keep the traditions of the tribe speak of themselves as "Melungeans." This singular name is supposed to have been given them by the Swiss-French, who settled in the region adjacent to them, and as they were a mixed race they were called Melange, and the descendants of the Melange were called Melange-ans, and the change from Melange-an to Melungean would be easy.

The tribe in Robeson, according to the census of 1890, numbered 3,640. The census of 1910 will probably show an increased number.

The act of Assembly in 1885 gave this tribe separate schools and a separate school census, and in 1887 a Normal School for the education of teachers of their race was granted them, and this school, located at Pembroke, in Robeson County, is in a flourishing condition. A great change has occurred among these people during the past twenty years. Better farms, with better houses and with many improvements in their mode of living, are visible in all parts of their territory. Almost universally they are landowners, cultivate small farms, raise cotton, tobacco and corn principally, and give evidence of great improvement over their former modes of living. All their traditions point to the region west of Pamlico as the residence of their ancestors. They are very reticent as to their past history when approached by strangers, and it is only after persistent inquiry that desired information is obtained. They have traditions leading the inquirer to infer that they once had Christian churches at several points along the great roads leading from "Roanoke" towards the Southwest. One of these churches, according to tradition, was located near the Lowrie Road, near Rockfish Creek, in Cumberland County. An aged citizen of Cumberland remembered seeing the walls of this church, known as the "Indian Walls," from 1812 till 1837, when the material was used in building the basement of the Rockfish cotton factory. In 1865 the factory was burned by General Sherman, but the present building was erected on the rock basement, which was not injured. The material used in building this church was red sandstone, but the quarry whence the material was obtained has never been discovered.

Colonel Byrd describes the caravans that left the Roanoke region as consisting of 150 to 200 horses loaded with guns, ammunition, cloth, iron tomahawks and other merchandise to trade with the Indians to the Southwest in exchange for peltries of various kinds. Ministers of the gospel frequently attended these expeditions and preached at intervals along the route.

One of these ministers was a Frenchman named De Richebourge; and ex-Governor Swain, who investigated the tradition concerning him, found that he died during one of these expeditions on the Catawba River, and that some of his descendants were then living in Buncombe County.

During the past century large numbers of Croatans have emigrated to the Southwest. A colony, consisting of about forty families, attempted to settle in Indiana, but the laws of that State did not permit "free persons of color" to settle there, and many returned to Robeson County, while others joined a tribe of Indians near Lake Michigan. Descendants of these Indians often visit their relatives in Robeson. There is communication also with the Cherokees in the Indian Territory. We have found only three family names among this people that are Indian, all others being English and French.

Along the Lowrie Road are many mounds, generally circular and raised a few feet above the general surface. Several have been examined, and in every instance the skeletons are those of adults and the skulls are Caucasian in type. Stone hatchets and flint arrowpoints are found in various places, but there is no evidence, by tradition or otherwise, that these Indians ever used them. Flint arrowpoints are found all over the American continent, in the British Isles, in the bone caverns of France and Germany, in Canada, in Italy and in China, similar to those found here. Clay pottery found here is of more recent date and was probably used by these Indians in former times. The Cherokees were an agricultural people, and it is certain that their clay pottery was ornamented by rolling ears of corn over the material when in a plastic state.

The Croatans have given Hiram R. Revels to the United States Senate. John S. Leary graduated at Howard University, and represented Cumberland County in the General Assembly, and for several years was Dean of the Law School at Shaw University at Raleigh. He was considered an able lawyer. Two natives of the Croatan tribe are now wealthy merchants in Florida, while another, who invested in mining property in New Mexico, is reputed to be a millionaire.

In matters of religion they are divided into Baptists, Methodists and Presbyterians. They have a sect among them known as the Indian Mission. They have about twenty churches, which are supplied by their own ministers.

Up to the year 1835 the Croatans attended the schools with the whites, mustered in the militia and exercised the right of suffrage equally with white men, but to effect a political purpose it was contended that they were "free persons of color," and in Robeson County only they were disfranchised. They were not allowed to attend the schools, and in consequence hundreds of them grew to manhood and womanhood in perfect ignorance of books. In 1868 the public schools were opened, but they preferred ignorance to association with the colored race. Since they have had separate schools they have shown great interest in the education of their children. They retain many customs handed down from their English and Indian ancestors. In an old medical work, brought to America by someone of the early colonists, and still preserved, are found many singular remedies for various diseases, and these same remedies are used at this time by these people. They have the old English cross-bow, and old-fashioned handmills for grinding corn, which have evidently been used for many generations.

In view of the great improvement of this tribe during the past twenty years we predict a bright future for the Croatans.

STATE AID TO TRANSPORTATION IN NORTH CAROLINA

BY J. ALLEN MORGAN
Assistant Professor of Economics and Political Science in Trinity College.

The Pre-Railroad Era (1776-1835)

CHAPTER I

Antecedents of State Aid (1776-1815)

The development of both the internal and the foreign trade of North Carolina, and the growth of commercial centers within the State, were retarded in the years immediately following the separation from England, as in the colonial period, by the peculiar topography of the State. Of its four principal rivers which do not flow through South Carolina—the Roanoke, the Tar, the Neuse and the Cape Fear—only the last empties directly into the ocean. At this time the inlet at the mouth of the Cape Fear, although superior to Ocracoke Inlet, through which the maritime commerce of the other three rivers had to pass, was greatly limited in its usefulness by reason of the "flats" which obstructed navigation between Wilmington and the Atlantic. And the latter inlet was too shallow to admit any save the smaller sea-going vessels, while its location was most unfavorable to the trade of the northeastern part of the State. The other inlets worthy of consideration—Old Topsail, at Beaufort, and Bogue—could only become important in connection with artificial waterways or with land routes.[1] Moreover, the navigation of all the principal rivers being obstructed by the granite ledge which crosses the State almost parallel with the coast line, and about one hundred and fifty miles distant, the western part of the State was in a large measure cut off from all ports within and without North Carolina.

[1]Cf. A. D. Murphy, Memoir on the Internal Improvements contemplated by the Legislature of North Carolina; and on the Resources and Finances of the State, 1819, pp. 21-30.

It was evident, then, that the work of providing the necessary waterways in an efficient transportation system would be relatively expensive in any case, and to so relate the various trade routes as to confine the commerce of the State chiefly to home markets would be all the more costly.

Whether a task involving the expenditure of such large sums of money was to be left wholly to unaided private enterprise, or whether it would be undertaken by the State, either in co-operation with individuals and corporations or alone, was merely a question of expediency, there being no constitutional prohibition against the latter alternative.[1]

At first the State showed no disposition to make a radical departure from the policy which obtained before the Revolution. The colonial system of opening and repairing public roads, with only slight and unimportant modifications, was therefore retained.[2] Local overseers were appointed by the county courts of Pleas and Quarter Sessions, under whose direction the work in each locality was performed by the male citizens of certain ages; and under the same supervision was performed whatever work was undertaken for the purpose of keeping the rivers free from obstructions to navigation. All these were public highways.

Recognition of the inadequacy of this colonial system of providing transportation soon led to the demand for improved facilities. Scarcely was the independence of the State achieved when Governor Martin, in his message to the Legislature, declared: "The Trade and Navigation of this country is of lasting consequence, and requires your immediate interposition and patronage. It is necessary our rivers be rendered more navigable, our roads opened and supported."[3]

[1]Poore, Charters and Constitutions, Pt. 2, p. 1409.
[2]Laws, 1784, ch. 14 (State Records, Vol. XXIV, p. 674).
[3]House Journal, Apr. 20, 1784 (Ibid., Vol. XIX, p. 498).

* * * Just what was meant by the general terms legislative "interposition and patronage" may be a subject of dispute. But whatever their meaning, in his next message the Governor again presented trade and navigation as "great objects of legislative attention,"[1] while in his message of 1791 is found what is perhaps a more explicit statement of his views. "The internal Navigation of the State," he said, "still requires Legislative assistance, our sister states are emulous with each other in opening their rivers and cutting canals, while attempts of this kind are but feebly aided among us. Though laws are passed for this purpose, they are not properly executed."[2]

Although mention was made in this message of the need for competent superintendents, "with powers to draw forth the aid mentioned in the laws," it can scarcely be claimed that this was a reference to legislative appropriations.[3] The Governor's only unmistakable reference to public aid is found in his recommendation that criminals under capital condemnation and whose particular cases merited clemency might, with qualified pardons, be made to labor at the work contemplated.

For a decade thereafter, with a single exception,[4] the subject received but little, if any, definite recognition in the Governors' messages. But in 1802 Governor Williams again brought to the attention of the Legislature the need for better transportation, and this example was followed in nearly every message for the succeeding decade.[5] It was in 1806, about the middle of this latter period of renewed discussion, that the first definite recommendation of direct State aid to the cause was made by the executive, in these words: "The [1]House Journal, Oct. 26, 1784, Ibid., p. 726.

[2]House Journal, Dec. 6, 1791.
[3]The "aid mentioned in the laws" was the donations of individuals. Infra., p. 126, footnote.
[4]House Journal, Nov. 16, 1792.
[5]Ibid., Nov. 18, 1802; Nov. 22, 1803; Nov. 24, 1804; Nov. 19, 1805; Nov. 19, 1806; Nov. 18, 1807; Nov. 23, 1808; Nov. 22, 1809; Nov. 18, 1812.

natural situation of the State being unfavorable to commerce, it is of the greatest importance that liberal provision should be made for the internal improvements, particularly for the establishment of good public roads, and the extension of our inland navigation. Nothing can be more congenial to the spirit of a republican government than the application of the resources derived from all to the benefit of all." [1]

The frequency with which the need for more adequate transportation was called to the attention of the Legislature in this period shows clearly that the matter had become one of grave concern to many of the leading citizens of North Carolina. But that the State was unable at this time to make, in response to Governor Alexander's recommendation, any very considerable appropriations to internal improvement undertakings, without involving the public credit or increasing the taxes, can scarcely be questioned.[2] And whether the small amount which might have been so devoted would have been wisely expended, it would be useless here to surmise. The unwillingness of the Legislature to appropriate any part of the State's revenue for such purposes is clearly enough shown by the fact that prior to 1815 the work of internal improvement was left wholly to private enterprise.[3] Nevertheless the most liberal franchises were granted

[1]Governor Alexander's Message, House Journal, Nov. 19, 1806.

[2]The total receipts of the Treasury in 1801 were £20,324, and in 1814 they were about two and a half times as large.—Comptroller's statement appended to Laws of 1802; Treasurer's Report, House Journal, Dec. 7, 1814.

[3]Memoir, op. cit., p. 11. This statement is contradicted by C. C. Weaver, who has claimed that prior to 1815 the "State had given aid."—History of Internal Improvements in North Carolina previous to 1860, p. 1.

Cf. also, "The State * * * entered into co-partnership with individuals and with companies for the building of canals and the deepening of harbors, the improvement of public highways, and the advancement of public intercourse."—W. E. Dodd, Life of Nathaniel Macon, p. 52.

It is true that by an act of 1786 the Commissioners of Navigation and Pilotage of the Cape Fear River were authorized to prescribe fines for the violation of their regulations, which fines, when collected by the Commissioners, were to be expended on the improvement of the river.—Laws, 1786, ch. 50, sec. 2 (State Records, Vol. XXIV, p. 851). And fines imposed for the failure to perform on this river the work required of those whose duty it was to remove obstructions were similarly appropriated.—Laws, 1793, ch. 34, sec. 3. Somewhat similar fines were likewise appropriated in part to the improvement of the Neuse River.—Laws, 1811, ch. 26. And by the act of 1812 incorporating the Neuse River Navigation Company the State reserved till Jan. 1, 1814, the privilege of subscribing one-fifth of the authorized capital of $50,000.—Laws, ch. 89.

No records available to the writer show whether any fines were collected under these laws. But the authorized subscription of stock, it is well known, was not made.

to corporations, in an attempt thereby to make the construction of toll roads and canals and the improvement of river navigation attractive fields for the investment of private capital; and unstinted encouragement was extended to the numerous commissions appointed by the Legislature, whose duty it was to solicit and receive donations from public-spirited citizens, these gifts to be expended in the development of public highways.[1]

Just what were the results by 1815 of this early legislation it is impossible to say. Only a few of the companies seem to have succeeded in raising the subscriptions necessary for their incorporation. Of these the Neuse River Navigation Company, the Cape Fear Navigation Company, the Roanoke Company, and the Clubfoot and Harlowe's Creek and the Dismal Swamp Canal companies—the purpose of the former being to connect Neuse River with the harbor at Beaufort, the latter to connect Pasquotank River in North Carolina with Elizabeth River in Virginia—were the most important. The Dismal Swamp Canal had been opened, and one-fourth of the work to be done on the Clubfoot and Harlowe's Creek Canal was said to have been completed,[2] while the improve-

[1]There was an abundance of this private legislation. The construction of ten toll roads by individuals, in whom the property rights of the roads were vested for periods varying from twenty-five to ninety-nine years, was authorized.—Laws, 1784, ch. 66; 1787, ch. 25; 1792, ch. 46; 1794, ch. 77; 1804, ch. 4; 1807, ch. 28; 1809, ch. 34; 1812, ch. 27; 1813, chs. 21, 24.

Similar provisions were made for the building of toll bridges.—Laws 1782, ch. 33; 1784, chs. 64, 65; 1810, ch. 33; 1812, ch. 26.

Twelve canal companies were incorporated.—Laws, 1784, ch. 63; 1790, ch. 26; 1795, ch. 23; 1796, ch. 20; 1798, ch. 40; 1804, chs. 34, 39; 1805, ch. 23; 1808, ch. 33; 1810, chs. 25, 29; 1813, ch. 28. Eight Commissioners were appointed to receive donations for the purpose of constructing canals.—Laws, 1786, chs. 29, 70; 1792, ch. 27; 1800, ch. 31; 1810, chs. 29, 31; 1811, chs. 27, 29.

Fifteen charters were issued to navigation companies, in whom the property rights of the navigation concerned was vested.—Laws, 1787, ch. 37; 1788, ch. 16; 1790, ch. 32; 1796, chs. 13, 21, 26, 34; 1800, ch. 29; 1801, ch. 99; 1804, ch. 40; 1805, ch. 22; 1806, ch. 24; 1807, ch. 25; 1811, ch. 30. And a larger number of commissions were appointed for the purpose of improving the navigation of rivers. In some cases these were incorporated, but there was no vesting of property rights.—Laws, 1784, chs. 37, 38, 39, 42; 1788, ch. 22; 1791, ch. 40; 1794, ch. 94; 1796, ch 41; 1800, ch. 32; 1803, ch. 81; 1804, ch. 38; 1806, ch. 22; 1807, chs. 26, 31; 1810, ch. 28; 1811, ch. 23; 1812, chs. 90, 91, 92.

[2]Raleigh Star, May 19, 1815.

ments made in the navigation of the Catawba River, whatever these may have been, surpassed the achievements of any other company engaged in similar undertakings.[1]

CHAPTER II

Initiation of the Policy of State Aid (1815-1819)

The year 1815 marks the beginning of the abandonment of the policy of merely granting charters and relying on unaided private enterprise for the development of transportation. The principal reasons for this break with the past were: (1) The desire (a) to develop the resources of the State, and (b) to establish home markets; and (2) the failure of unaided private enterprise to achieve satisfactory results.

The joint select committee on inland navigation, in its report to the Legislature in 1815, said that to delay efficient provision for inland navigation was "to postpone that natural wealth, respectability and importance which follow only in the train of great internal improvements."[2] The committee estimated the number of persons emigrating from North Carolina to the West during the preceding twenty-five years to be more than two hundred thousand, and a member of the committee was of the opinion four years later that half a million North Carolinians had gone "to people the Wilderness of the West."[3] This notable emigration was attributed mainly to the lack of adequate transportation at home. "In this state of things," continued the committee, "our agriculture is at a stand; and * * * men are seeking the way to wealth through all the devious paths of speculation. * * * This perversion of things is gradually undermining our morality."

[1]Report of Committee on Inland Navigation, Senate Journal, Dec. 6, 1815.

[2]Ibid.

[3]Memoir, p. 5. These estimates cannot be verified. Not until 1850 did the census begin to present statistics relative to interstate migration. At this time thirty-one per cent of the free natives of North Carolina living in the United States were residents of other States. The corresponding percentages for Virginia and South Carolina were twenty-six and thirty-six respectively.—Report of the Superintendent of the Census, Dec. 1, 1852, p. 15.

The exact nature and extent of the resources of the State were, of course, unknown, but North Carolina was not keeping pace with many other States in developing the resources known to be available. The evil was a growing one—the more the industries of the State suffered because of inadequate transportation or for other reasons, the larger became the tide of emigrants, whose departure thinned the ranks of those left behind to overcome the depression. There was, very naturally, most anxiety concerning agricultural interests. But mining and manufacturing were not wholly overlooked,[1] and some even considered manufacturing of first importance—manufactures, being less bulky comparatively than the products of farms and mines, would, it was claimed, require less extensive transportation routes.[2]

The dependence of North Carolina so largely on Virginia and South Carolina, especially the former, for markets had long been a source of regret. The inevitable growth of commercial towns within the State, which would follow the proper development of transportation, was now presented as an important reason why the Legislature should begin at once to prosecute the work of internal improvement.[3] This jealousy of rival markets in neighboring States was not new; it had been clearly exemplified in 1786, when the proposed charter of the Dismal Swamp Canal Company, having been authorized by the Legislature of Virginia, was first considered by the Legislature of North Carolina. Governor Cas-

[1]An interesting attempt to take a census of North Carolina's manufactures was made in 1810. The results were recorded in a "Report of Manufactures within the State of North Carolina, according to the returns made to Beverly Daniel by the persons appointed to take the late census in the several counties."—Raleigh Register, Feb. 14, 1811. The total value of the manufactures was given as $4,811,319, cloth being the most important product, valued at $2,591,817. The output of whiskey and brandy was valued at $700,105, and the iron output at $150,000.

[2]Register, March 14, 1811.

[3]Report of Committee on Inland Navigation. Op. cit.

well told this body that its assent to the Virginia act would be advantageous to the sister State at the expense of North Carolina.[1] Influenced, doubtless, by this suggestion, the Legislature refused its assent[2]; and it was not until 1790, after repeated rejections of the proposed charter, that North Carolina co-operated with Virginia in authorizing the construction of the canal.[3] Nor was Caswell the only Governor in this period to lament the commercial dependence of North Carolina on neighboring States.[4]

If private enterprise, however, had succeeded in accomplishing the ends for which the companies were chartered, or had promised to succeed with reasonable promptness, there is little reason to think the State would have chosen to supplant it. But it did neither. And even had the prospect of immediate gain been sufficient to attract the necessary private capital into these undertakings, each enterprise would have been prosecuted with regard, primarily, to the interests of those furnishing the capital, and not with the purpose of so relating the separate routes to one another as to constitute an effective State system.

Moreover, the restoration of peace after a war that had been costly to North Carolina, the lessening of party strife,[5] the fact that the receipts of the public treasury had trebled since the beginning of the century,[6] and the example of other States which were supplementing private enterprise in various internal improvement undertakings[7]—all these, it seemed, helped to make this a fitting time for the State to adopt the policy of aiding the work of its internal development, hitherto so feebly prosecuted.

[1]House Journal, Nov. 20, 1786.
[2]State Records, Vol. XVIII, p. VIII.
[3]Laws, 1790, ch. 26.
[4]House Journal, Nov. 18, 1802.
[5]A. D. Murphey, Report on Education, 1817 (C. L. Coon, Documentary History of Education in North Carolina prior to 1840, Vol. I, p. 123). Cf. Memoir, p. 6.
[6]Comptroller's Statement, 1802; Treasurer's Report, House Journal, Nov. 29, 1815.
[7]Memoir, p. 11.

While the forces favoring a direct participation by the State in the efforts to provide more adequate transportation were quietly increasing in potency, the newspapers of the period voiced no demand on the part of the people for a change in policy; nor was there any unusual emphasis on transportation in Governor Miller's message in 1815—he merely repeated the time-worn appeal.[1] To some leaders in the Legislature, however, the time seemed ripe for the State to come to the rescue. The most active and untiring advocate of the proposed policy was Archibald D. Murphey, Senator from Orange. Very early in the session, on Murphey's motion, the Senate resolved, "that it is expedient to provide more efficiently for the inland navigation of this State," and that the resolution be referred to a joint select committee,[2] the House concurring.[3] In the report of this committee, of which Murphey was chairman, was embodied a plan which contemplated the incorporating of companies, with unlimited franchises, for the purpose of improving the navigation of the principal rivers, the tolls to be restricted so as to yield no more than fifteen per cent on the capital invested; the State was to subscribe one-third of the capital stock of each company; and a board of commissioners should superintend the work of the companies, employ civil engineers, direct surveys and make annual reports to the Legislature.[4] This report, together with a resolution "that it is expedient to provide by law for carrying into effect the plan proposed," was adopted by the Senate and sent to the House, where after a lengthy discussion it was rejected by a vote of 52 to 73.[5]

Although the temper of the House, as shown in its rejection of the report, was not favorable to a comprehensive

[1]House Journal, 1815, p. 5.
[2]Journal, Nov. 22, 1815.
[3]Journal, Nov. 27, 1815.
[4]Senate Journal, Dec. 6, 1815. Cf. Memoir, p. 12.
[5]Journal, Dec. 12, 1815.

policy of State aid, the friends of the proposed plan were not ready to abandon it wholly. Almost immediately, again on Murphey's motion, the Senate proposed the appointment of commissioners who should have surveys made, at the State's expense, of the Tar, the Neuse and the Yadkin rivers,[1] for the purpose of ascertaining what part of each might be made navigable, and also a survey of a canal route between the Yadkin and the Cape Fear rivers.[2] This resolution met little opposition in the House.[3]

The friends of the new policy proceeded next to secure amendments to the charters of the Roanoke and the Cape Fear Navigation Companies and pledges therewith of State subscriptions of stock. The Senate bill concerning the former company provided for an increase in the authorized capital from $100,000, as allowed by the charter of 1812,[4] to $300,000, one-third of which was to be subscribed by the State. The House at first rejected bodily the provision for the State subscription but later agreed to a subscription of one-fourth the number of shares originally proposed, or one-twelfth of the whole.[5]

The Senate bill, which was intended to authorize an increase in the capital of the Deep and Haw River Navigation Company from $8,000[6] to $100,000, one-fourth of which was to be subscribed by the State, and to change the name to the Cape Fear Navigation Company, met no less opposition in the House than had been encountered by the bill concerning the Roanoke Navigation Company, and it became a law providing for a State subscription of only $15,000.[7]

---

[1]Murphey includes also the Roanoke, the Cape Fear and the Catawba rivers.—Memori, p. 13.
[2]Journal, Dec. 16, 1815.
[3]Journal, Dec. 19. 1815.
[4]Laws, 1812, ch. 88.
[5]Journal, Dec. 19, 1815; Laws, 1815, ch. 13.
[6]Laws, 1796, ch. 21.
[7]House Journal, Dec. 19, 20, 1815; Senate Journal, Dec. 20, 1815; Laws, 1815, ch. 14. The section authorizing the State subscription was omitted by mistake from the printed laws of this session.—Senate Journal, Dec. 9, 1816.

By its rejection of the committee report the House had defeated the proposition for a general and systematic prosecution of the work of internal improvement under the direction of a State Board of Commissioners. But in the resolution authorizing surveys the committee secured perhaps all its plan had contemplated in this regard. Only two companies, however, were given the benefit of the proposed State subscriptions of stock, and the number of shares that might be subscribed was, in each case, much less than that originally proposed. Nevertheless, the Legislature of 1815 had made a beginning, and the advocates of State aid were encouraged, although their hardest work was in the future.

The report of the committee on inland navigation repeated, in 1816, the recommendation that a permanent supervisory board be appointed,[1] but nothing came of it at this session. State subscriptions of stock, however, to the amount of $65,000, in four other river navigation companies and one canal company, were authorized[2]; and the resolutions directing surveys at the State's expense were continued in force, only the surveys of the Tar and the Neuse rivers having been completed.[3]

When the Legislature reassembled in 1817 Governor Miller approved the policy of State aid,[4] but the Treasurer, in his annual report, gave an unfavorable account of the works already undertaken.[5] Nevertheless, the committee on internal improvement finding, it was claimed, "that the mere adoption of efficient measures by the Legislature for internal improvement (had) given to the lands of the State an additional value of more than $10,000,000," declared that every reason existed for proceeding with the work. "But the work will never proceed regularly," it continued, "until the State

[1] Senate Journal, Dec. 9, 1816.
[2] Laws, 1816, chs. 16, 23, 25, 35, 36.
[3] Senate Journal, Dec. 9, 1816; House Journal, Dec. 24, 1816. Cf. Memoir, p. 13.
[4] House Journal, Nov. 18, 1817.
[5] Ibid., Dec. 2, 1817.

shall adopt a regular system of execution. The basis of this system must be a suitable fund and the application of this fund by a permanent board of commissioners." The committee therefore recommended the creation of a fund to consist of the State's stock in the Bank of New Bern and the Cape Fear Bank,[1] and in the several navigation companies, the proceeds of which should be applied by a board of commissioners to the work of internal improvement.[2] Whereupon, a bill embodying the provisions of this recommendation was introduced in the Senate. It passed two readings, but was defeated in the House by a close vote.[3]

In the following summer the committee in charge of the surveys, although unsuccessful in its efforts to engage the services of a civil engineer, having "secured the best talents possible," proceeded with the duties assigned it and reported the results to the Legislature at its next session.[4] The encouraging reports of several surveyors and the eagerness of the companies to proceed with the work made it all the more imperative, it was thought, that a special fund for the development of transportation be established. A renewal of the efforts to secure the establishment of such a fund followed, a bill for this purpose being introduced in the Senate by Murphey, of the committee on internal improvement.[5] It, as did the similar bill of 1817, passed the second reading by a small majority,[6] but was lost in the House.[7] Besides the authorizing of State subscriptions of stock in two canal companies, amounting to $7,500,[8] no gains were made in the Legislature of 1818 for the policy of systematic State aid.

[1]The State owned 1,250 shares in each bank, of a total par value of $250,000.
[2]Senate Journal, Dec. 5, 1817.
[3]Ibid., Dec. 5, 12, 1817; House Journal, Dec. 12, 1817.
[4]Senate Journal, Nov. 28, 1818; Ibid., p. 119.
[5]Ibid., Dec. 3, 1818.
[6]Ibid., Dec. 17, 1818.
[7]Journal, Dec. 24, 1818. The details of this bill are unknown. It is not found in the files of "rejected bills."
[8]Laws, 1818, chs. 41, 50.

In the spring of 1819, after fruitless efforts to engage a civil engineer in this country, the commission in charge of the surveys, directed by the Legislature, employed Hamilton Fulton, an Englishman. In obedience to the instructions of this committee, Fulton and his assistant examined the principal rivers of the State and the works then in progress thereon. A detailed report of these observations was made to the commission, in which Fulton expressed the belief that efficient inland navigation could be obtained at comparatively small cost.[1] And it was now that the new policy began to be advocated by the press of the State.[2]

In the fall of this year, 1819, the committee on internal improvement again recommended the creation of a special fund and the appointment of a supervisory board.[3]

The bill embodying the provisions recommended in the committee report had, as was to be expected, a fairly safe majority in its favor in the Senate[4]; and at last the House, too, fell in line and the bill passed, but with amendments materially reducing the size of the proposed fund.[5]

This act provided that the proceeds of the sale of the State lands recently purchased from the Cherokee Indians should constitute the fund. A board, consisting of the Governor of the State and six other members elected annually by the Legislature, was authorized to employ an engineer and surveyors, the engineer to exercise general supervision of the public works. The board was charged also with the duty of making such disposition of the fund as the Legislature might from time to time direct, and annual reports of its operations were to be made to the Legislature.[6]

The fund thus provided was merely a prospective one; the [1] "Report of the Commission appo nted to have Sundry Surveys made," Dec. 1, 1819.

[2] Register, Oct. 1, 1819.
[3] Senate Journal, Dec. 1, 1819; House Journal, Dec. 2, 1819.
[4] Senate Journal, Dec. 21, 1819.
[5] House Journal, Dec. 20, 22, 1819.
[6] Laws, 1819, ch. 2.

lands to be sold contained about one million acres, although no accurate survey of them had been made, and their definite boundaries had not been established.[1] The act prescribing the mode of surveying and selling these lands fixed a minimum price of four, three and two dollars per acre, according to quality.[2] Even had this fund promised to be large—and it did not—no part of it was immediately available.

It may safely be assumed that the measure of success attained by the friends of State aid in the Legislature of 1819 was very largely due to the appearance of Murphey's Memoir in November of this year. Besides reviewing the internal improvement undertakings thitherto contemplated by the Legislature, the author presented a number of statistical tables designed to prove the ability of the State at that time to contribute liberally to the development of transportation. Altogether, the Memoir is the most significant contribution to the literature of our period in this field.

All that had been accomplished so far came as a result of compromise at every point. As a reward for their efforts the friends of the new movement could claim, at the close of the four years' struggle for a comprehensive policy of State aid, the creation of a small prospective fund and the appointment of a permanent board for its management. And State subscriptions to the stock of navigation and canal companies, amounting to $112,500, had been authorized. Was this inadequate provision? Was it the outcome of unwise counsel that would have involved the State more deeply in expensive undertakings which were perchance, after all, the peculiar and rightful province of private capital? These questions may be best answered in the light of developments yet to be studied.

[1] These lands had been purchased in 1817, and title was to pass to the State by Jan. 1, 1821.—Memoir, p. 75.

[2] Laws, 1819, ch. 10.

CHAPTER III

Early Execution of the Policy of State Aid (1815-1835)

It was found desirable, for administrative purposes, when the initiation of the policy of State aid was being effected, to make the charters of the several companies in which the State was to become a shareholder as nearly uniform as possible. Consequently, the charters of the principal companies that had been granted prior to 1815 were amended. The Roanoke Navigation Company's charter of 1812,[1] as modified in 1815,[2] became a model after which other charters were patterned.[3] The earlier act vested forever in the company the property right in the works, exempted them from taxation, and fixed maximum tolls to be charged on goods carried through any of the company's works. The act of 1815 provided that the tolls should be so regulated from time to time as to prevent a larger annual return than fifteen per cent on the capital invested, and authorized the State Treasurer to vote on behalf of the State in meetings of the stockholders. The limitations now placed on the earnings of the company and the State's interest as a stockholder necessitated a more complete supervision of the company's accounts. It was required, therefore, that annual reports of the receipts and expenditures be made to the Secretary of State.

Early in 1820 the newly-created Board of Internal Improvement assumed its duties, but not under the most favorable conditions. As was to be expected, the fight between the friends and the opponents of the new policy was not abandoned with the achievement of partial success by the former in the years from 1815 to 1819. To achieve significant results under the new system, an increase of the internal improvement fund was manifestly imperative; but for a time no general recognition of this fact, save by men in public positions, seems to have found expression. The Board of Internal Improvement, in its second annual report, recommended, since the fund was inadequate and not forthcoming, and since taxes were unpopular, that the State borrow a sum not exceeding $500,000, assigning productive funds for the interest and providing a sinking fund.[1] This recommendation only resulted in an act adding to the internal improvement fund the dividends from the State's stock in the Bank of New Bern and the Cape Fear Bank.[2] The same recommendation in substance was repeated four years later,[3] and a similar one in 1830,[4] while in 1833 the board recommended the borrowing of $6,000,000.[5] The Governors, too, repeatedly commended the policy of State aid after it had been in operation some years,[6] and even earlier the leading papers of the State gave it support, trying not only to encourage and to create in the public mind sentiments likewise favorable to the system, but to influence the Legislature as well.[7]

[1] Laws, 1812, ch. 88.
[2] Ibid., 1815, ch. 13.
[3] Ibid., chs. 14, 15, 23, 25, 35.

In the literature of the period favorable to State aid to transportation, the "Numbers of Carlton," by Dr. Joseph Caldwell, rank next in importance to Murphey's Memoir.[8]

The attitude of a few leaders towards such a question of State policy is less significant, however, than the popular interest which it arouses. Beginning in the late twenties and continuing through the rest of the period under discussion, in various parts of the State the advocates of a system of internal improvement met in conventions in which dis-

[1] Report of the Board, 1821, p. XXI.
[2] Laws, 1821, ch. 6.
[3] Report of the Board, 1825, p. 9.
[4] Ibid., 1830, p. 8.
[5] Ibid., 1833, p. 17.
[6] House Journal, Nov. 17, 1829; Nov. 22, 1831; Nov. 19, 1833; Nov. 18, 1834; Nov. 17, 1835.
[7] Register, Dec. 7, 1824; Dec. 10, 1824; June 13, 1826; Jan. 13, 1831; June 24, 1834; May 13, 1834; Dec. 9, 1834. Star, Feb. 21, 1833. Carolina Watchman, Aug. 31, 1833.
[8] A discussion of the "Numbers of Carlton" more properly belongs to a later chapter on railroads.

tricts, varying in size from a small rural community to an area embracing three-fourths of the State, were represented. Almost always these conventions commended the policy of State aid, in their resolutions or in their "addresses to the people." In 1833 it was claimed that all the numerous local meetings and the State conventions of the year advocated the proposed "two-fifths, three-fifths principle," whereby the State was to own forty per cent of the stock in the various companies engaged in the development of transportation.[1]

The more significant of these meetings were held towards the close of the pre-railroad era. In 1828, at a meeting in Chatham of delegates from four of the central counties, an address was issued in which, after noting the comparative backwardness of North Carolina in the provision for transportation, it was said: "To enter now the general market from our interior country, and cope with the prices, we must have railroads, or canals, or navigable rivers. * * * Cotton is now about the only article which bears transportation. But it is much to be apprehended that even cotton will not long remain a source of profit in our present manner of conveyance."[2] In January of the following year, at Raleigh, was held a meeting of members of the Legislature and others, the chief result of which was the appointment of a central committee, and an auxiliary committee in each county of the State, whose duty it was to organize the forces favorable to systematic internal improvement.[3] The next notable meeting was held also in Raleigh, July 4, 1833, twenty counties, none west of Orange, being represented. In the address issued by this convention it was the declared purpose to arouse the people, for, it was claimed, the Legislature would aid if the [1]Legislative Documents, 1833, No. 23, p. 7. For reports of conventions advocating State aid see: Register, June 23, 1829; Feb. 8, 1830; Sept. 9, 1830; Aug. 27, 1833; Sept. 3, 1833; Sept. 10, 1833; Dec. 9, 1834. Also, Star, Dec. 16, 23, 1831; Carolina Watchman, Oct. 26, 1833; Western Carolinian, Sept. 30, 1833; North Carolina Standard, July 17, 1834; Greensboro Patriot, Sept. 25, 1833.

[2]Xenodochy, Vol. IV.

[3]Register, Jan. 13, 30, 1829.

people demanded it.[1] In the following November delegates from forty-eight counties assembled in Raleigh, and with four dissenting delegations the convention adopted a memorial to the Legislature in which the construction, exclusively by the State, of four transportation lines, at an estimated cost of $5,000,000, was advocated.[2]

The opposition to the policy of State aid also continued active throughout the period. But it found little expression in the newspapers. An open letter by "X," directed against schools and internal improvements, stands almost alone among such expressions of the conviction that the State should aid neither.[3] But however few were the newspaper contributions directed against the policy, its opponents made effective opposition in the Legislature to the scheme, both as it was and as its friends hoped to make it. When the board had been in existence but a year the House would have abolished it and turned the fund into the general treasury, but, as earlier, the Senate gave loyal support to the new movement, defeating the bill to repeal the act of 1819 by a vote of 36 to 21.[4] In the debate on this bill in the Senate the burden of the argument produced by the opponents of the policy was that the works were too expensive, and that their beneficial results would accrue very largely to the people of Virginia and South Carolina.[5] Similar efforts to repeal the act of 1819 creating the fund, and that of 1821 increasing it, were repeated and were similarly defeated, usually by the Senate.[6] Although these acts were not repealed, no further increase of the fund was possible. As a direct result of the policy of the obstructionists the Board suffered a marked

[1] Ibid., July 30, 1833.
[2] Ibid., Apr. 29, 1834; Star, Dec. 6, 13, 1833; Legislative Documents, 1833, No. 4.
[3] Register, Nov. 9, 1829.
[4] Senate Journal, Dec. 8, 1820.
[5] Register, Dec. 29, 1820; Jan. 5, 1821.
[6] Senate Journal, Dec. 29, 1821; Dec. 21, 1822; Dec. 30, 1825; Jan. 1, 1828; House Journal, Dec. 22, 1824.

change in its constituency, being reduced in 1824 to the Governor and three directors,[1] and in 1831 to the Governor, the State Treasurer and one elected member, who was to be known as the Superintendent of Public Works, and who alone was to receive pay for his services.[2] Moreover, in 1833, when the fund was low, even a proposition to appropriate $1,500 for surveys of proposed railway routes was defeated.[3] The committee to whom the memorial of the November convention had been referred, in its report thereon, and in introducing the bill just mentioned, gave expression to the disappointment felt by the friends of State aid and for which the Legislature was held responsible.[4] Never before had the press of the State been so unanimous in its condemnation of the Legislature as in 1834 for this failure to obey what seemed so clearly the will of the people. The Elizabeth City Star, the Edenton Gazette, the North Carolina Journal, the Wilmington Free Press, the Fayetteville Observer, the Oxford Examiner, the Raleigh Register, the Hillsboro Recorder, the Salisbury Journal, the Western Carolinian—all voiced a protest against the refusal of the Legislature to meet the expectations of the people.[5]

We have seen something of the forces that kept so limited the sources from which the internal improvement fund was derived. The receipts from the two sources—the sale of lands, and bank dividends—as shown in the following table, amounted in the years prior to 1835 to $184,747.47½, and at the close of this year about $45,000 was due the fund.

[1]Laws, 1824, ch. 5.
[2]Ibid., 1831, ch. 21.
[3]House Journal, Jan. 8, 1834.
[4]Senate Journal, Dec. 24, 1833.
[5]Register, Jan. 11, 1834; Feb. 4, 1834.

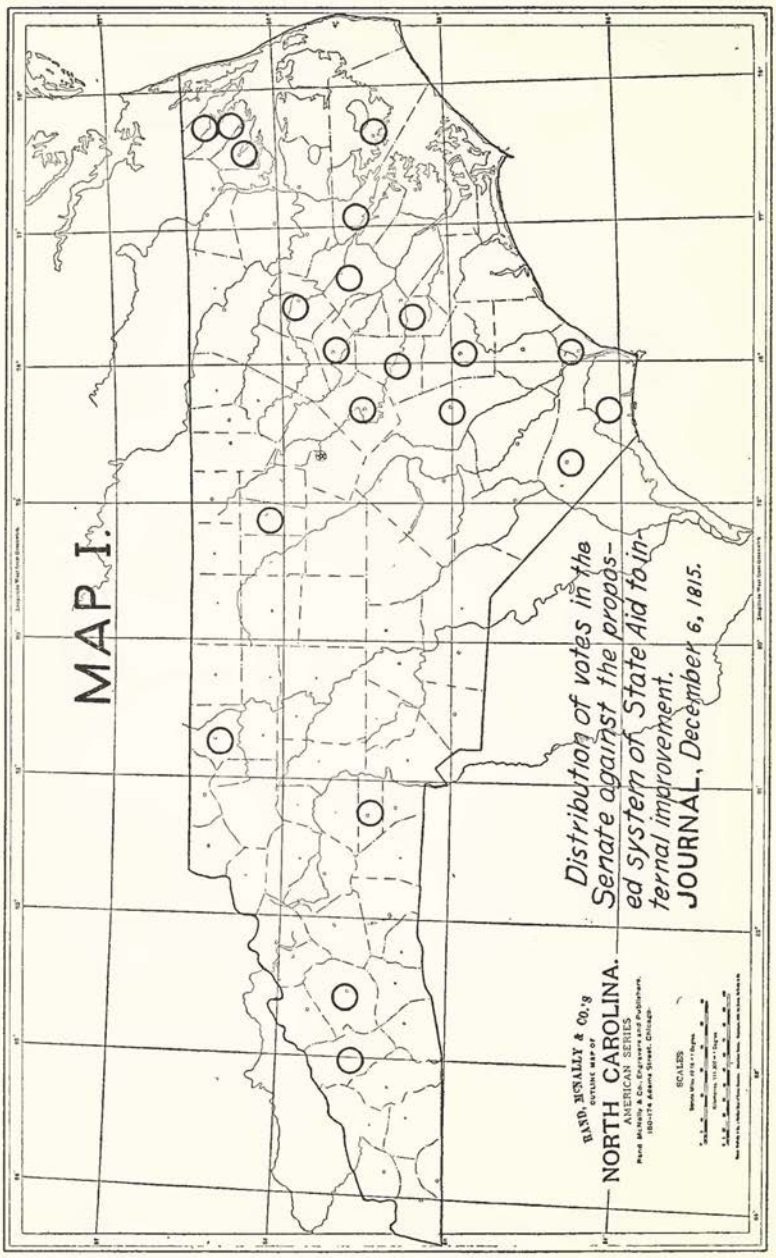
RECEIPTS OF THE INTERNAL IMPROVEMENT FUND, 1820-1835.[1]

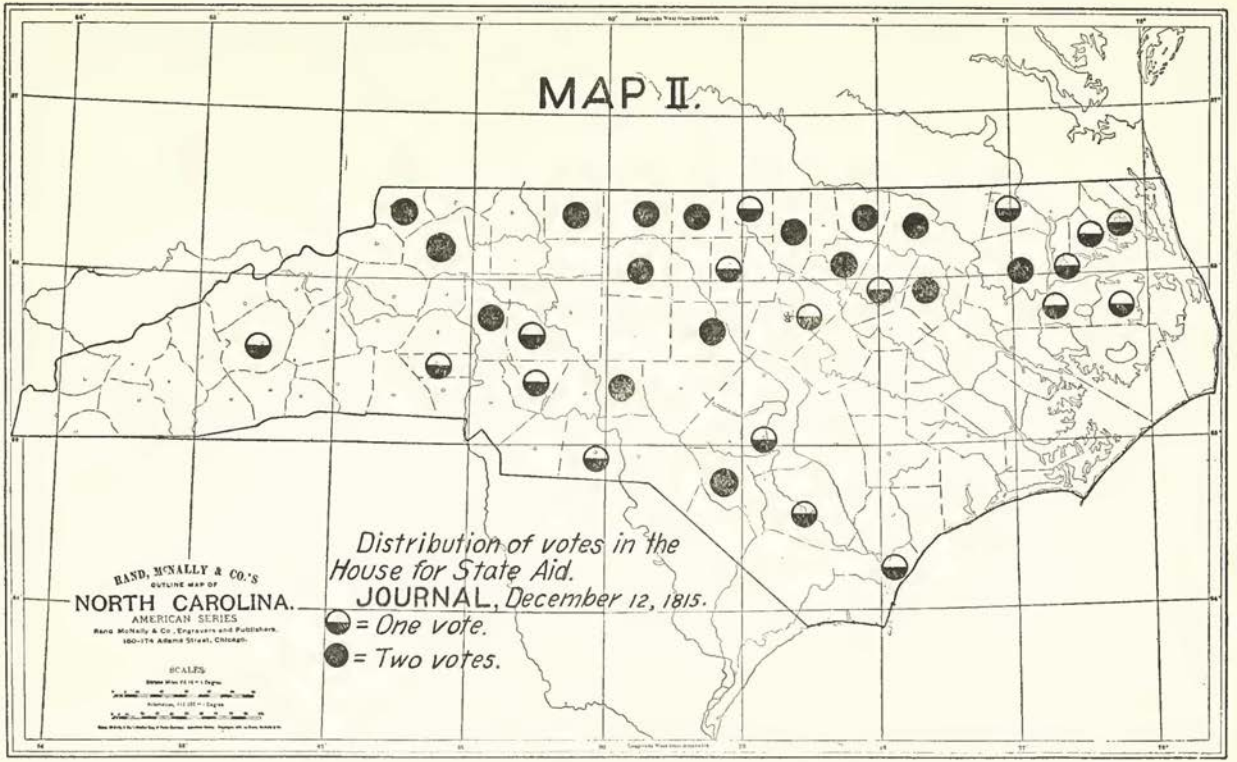
1820	$.....
1821	4,857.17
1822	1,519.41¼
1823	9,658.65¼
1824	25,614.03
1825	32,483.99
1826	15,657.47
1827	25,916.21½
1828	19,556.54½
1829	14,830.70½
1830	5,533.00½
1831	4,559.98
1832	2,601.36
1833	1,397.48
1834	5,807.23
1835	14,736.17
	$184,747.41½

An examination of the votes in both houses of the Legislature on the more important bills and resolutions already mentioned, in an effort to understand the reasons for such a determined and powerful opposition to State aid, reveals the fact that, in the main, the opposition to the policy was centered in the eastern half of the State, while its chief support was given by the members from the west. The distribution of the votes for or against a few typical measures is represented in the accompanying maps.

[1]The annual reports of the Treasurer and of the Board of Internal Improvement are relied on for the statement of receipts by years. For the years 1824 and 1825, however, the two sources do not agree. In the receipts for each of these two years, $18,580, which the Treasurer did not include but which the Board reported, is included in this table.



MAP I.
Distribution of votes in the Senate against the proposed system of State Aid to internal improvement.
JOURNAL, December 6, 1815.
RAND, McNALLY & CO.'S OUTLINE MAP OF
NORTH CAROLINA.
AMERICAN SERIES
SCALES



MAP II.
RAND, McNALLY & CO.'S
OUTLINE MAP OF
NORTH CAROLINA.
AMERICAN SERIES
Rand McNally & Co., Engravers and Publishers,
160-174 Adams Street, Chicago.
SCALES
Distribution of votes in the House for State Aid.
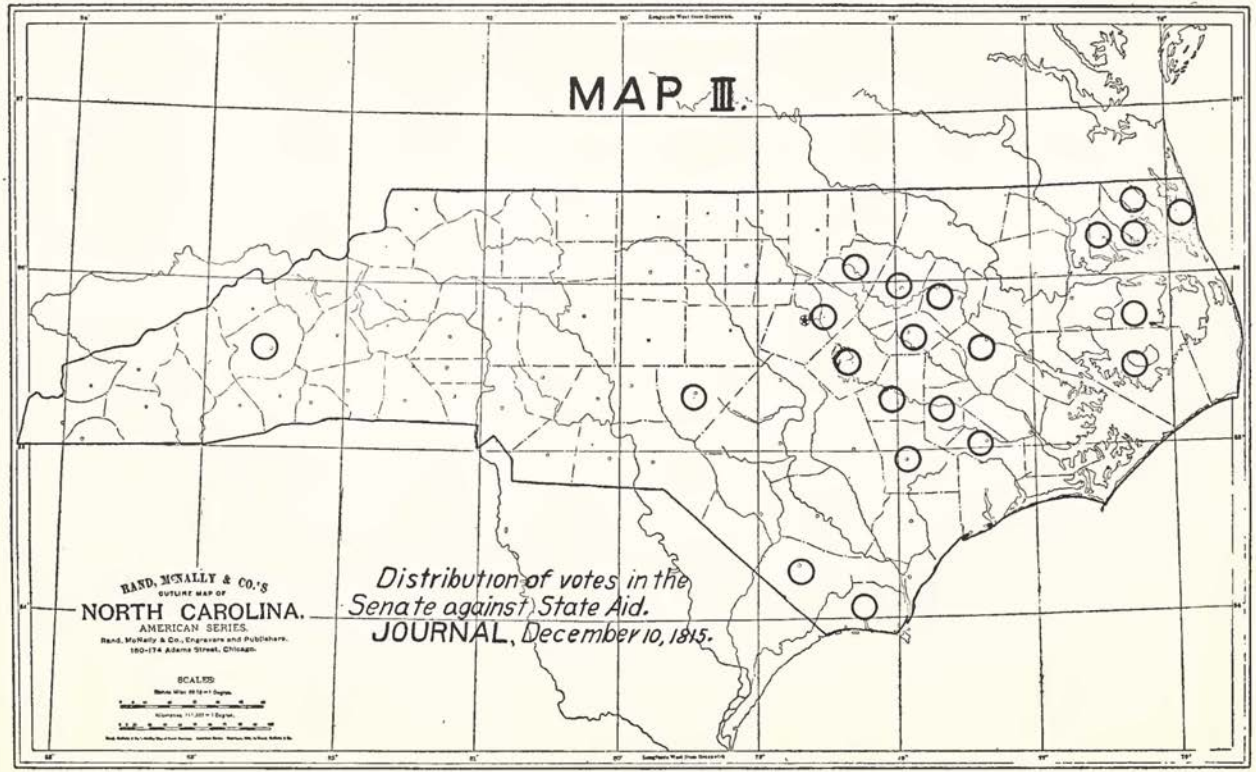
JOURNAL, December 12, 1815.
= One vote.
= Two votes.



MAP III.
RAND, McNALLY & CO.'S
OUTLINE MAP OF
NORTH CAROLINA.
AMERICAN SERIES.
Rand, McNally & Co., Engravers and Publishers.
160-174 Adams Street, Chicago.
SCALES
Distribution of votes in the Senate against State Aid.
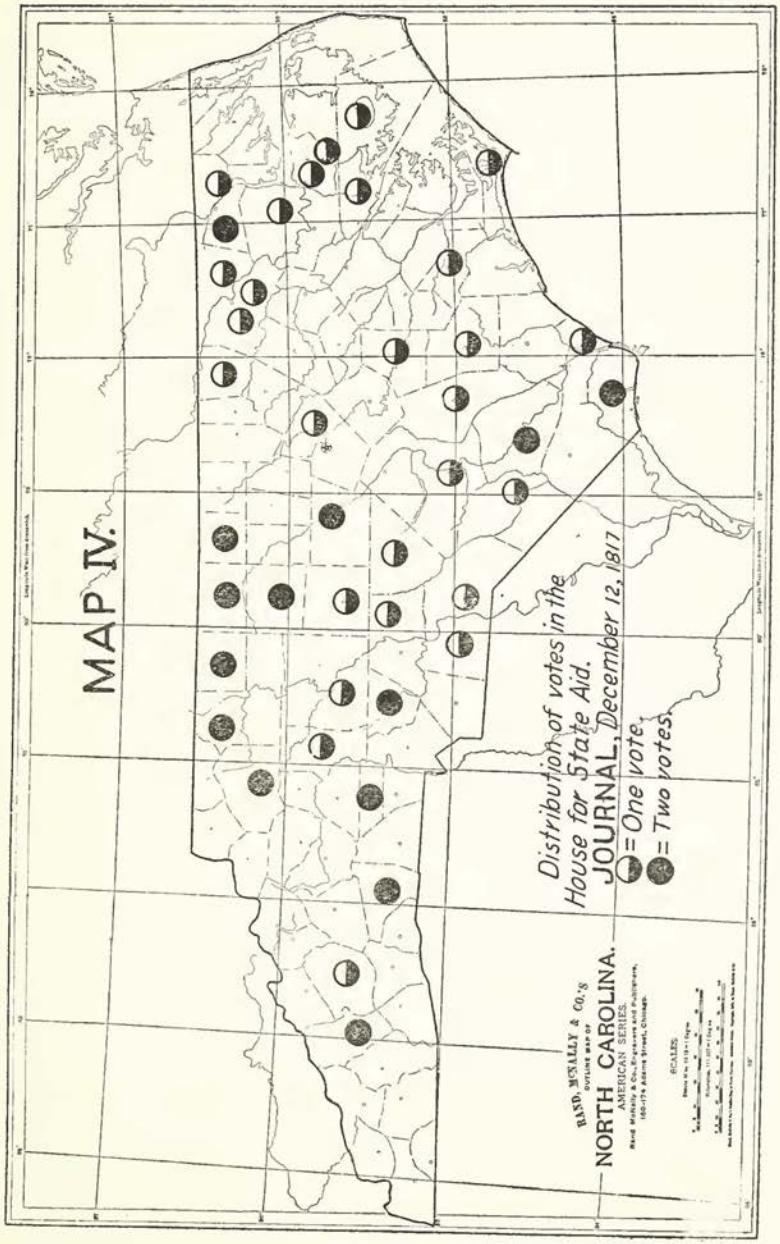
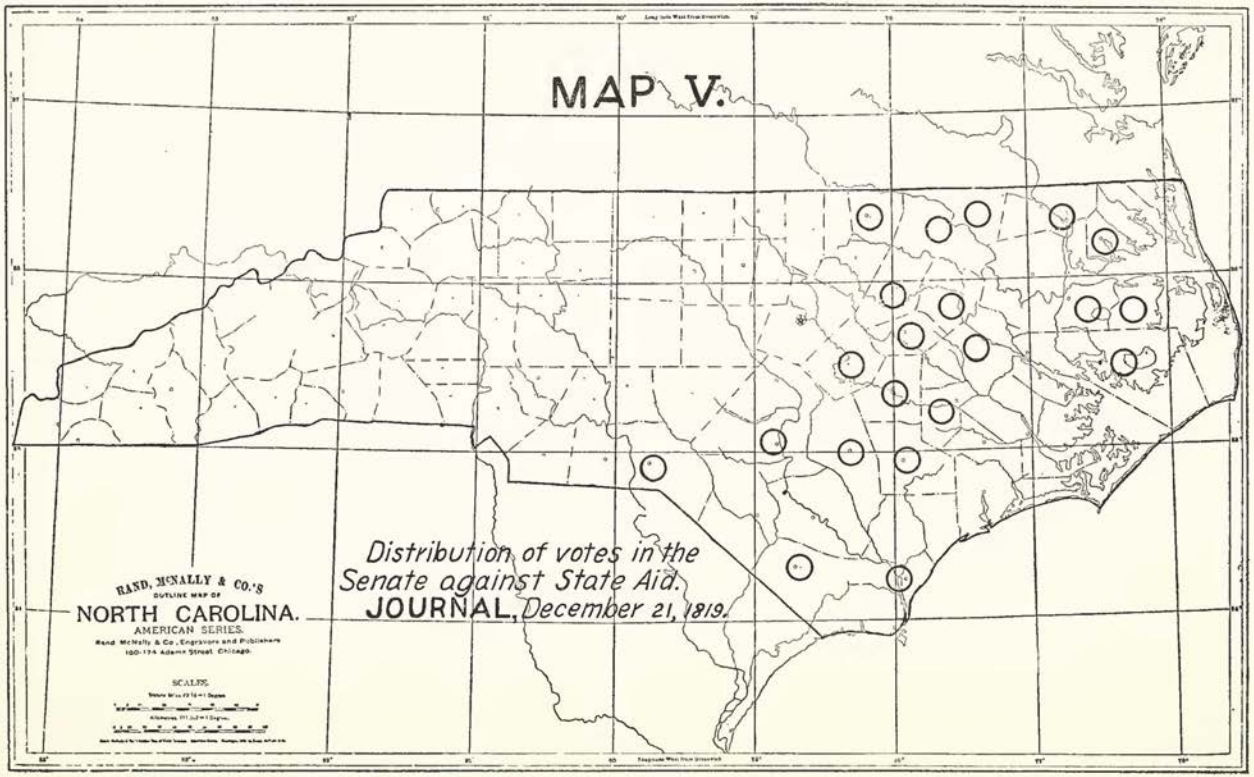
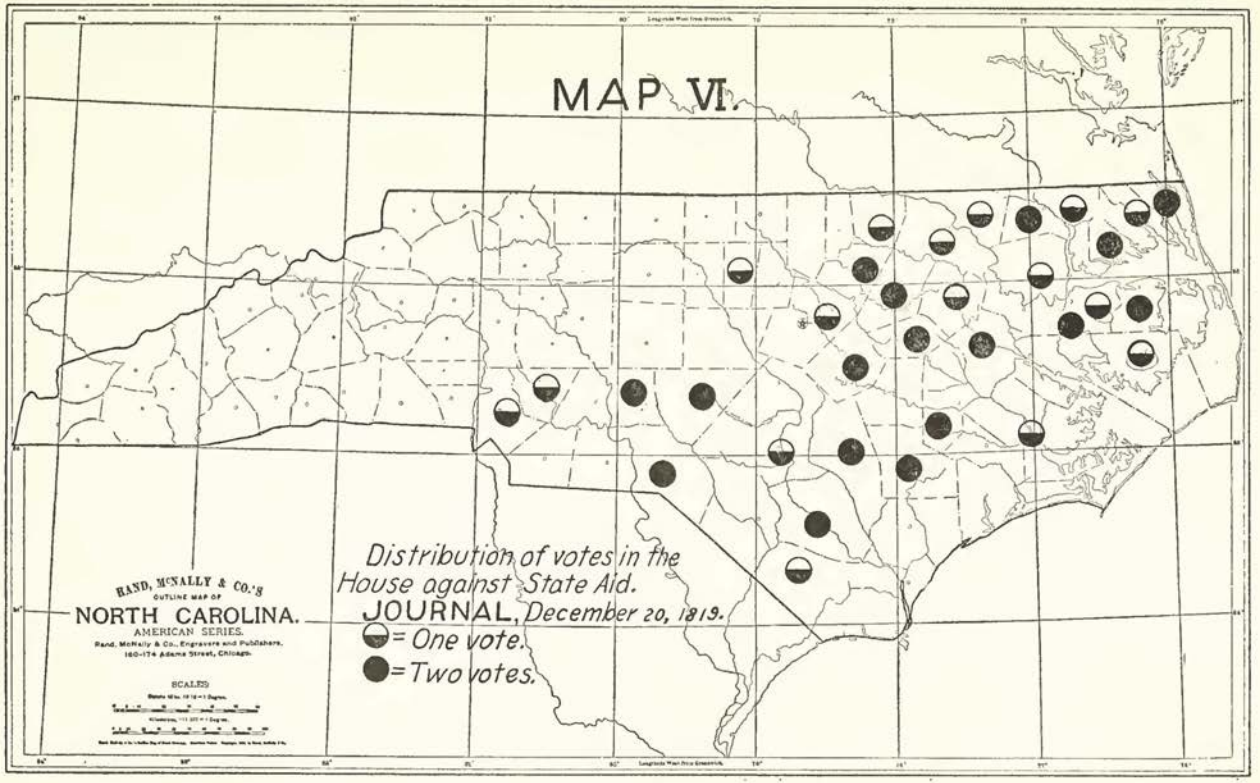
JOURNAL, December 10, 1815.



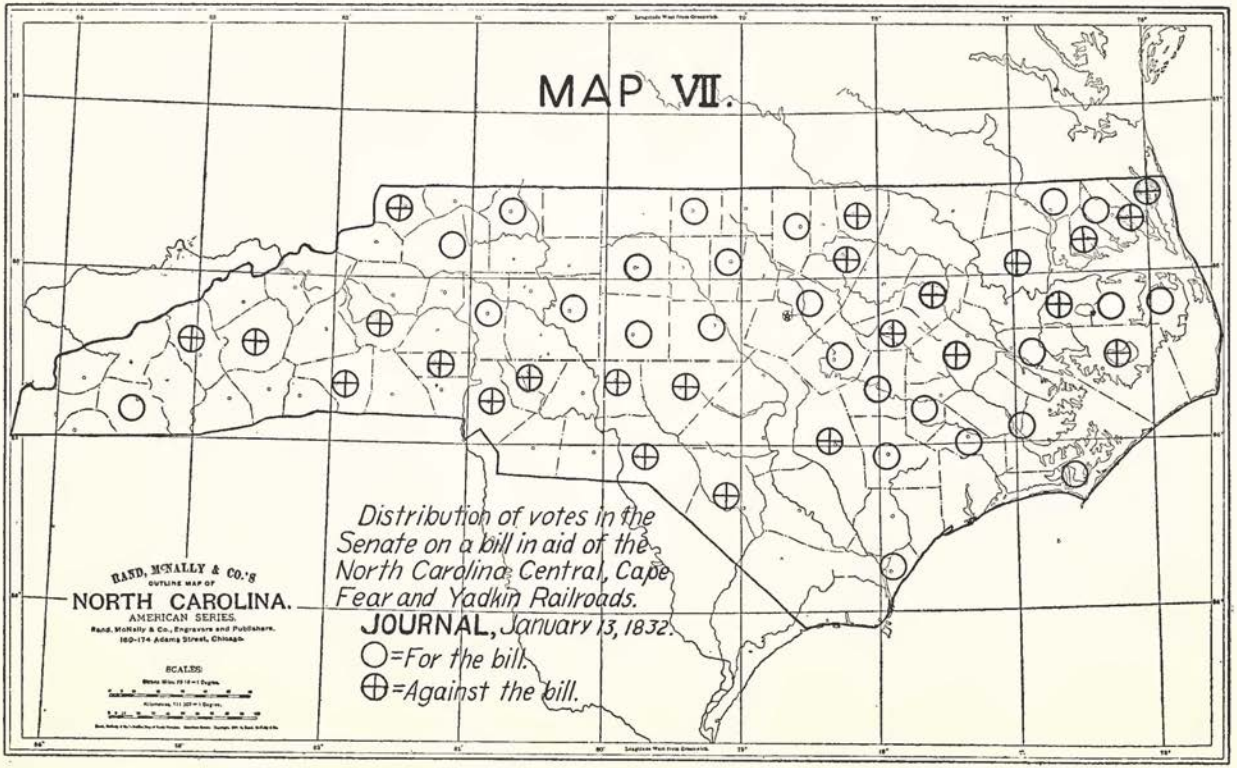
MAP IV.
Distribution of votes in the House for State Aid.
JOURNAL, December 12, 1817
= One vote.
= Two votes.
RAND, McNALLY & CO.'S
NORTH CAROLINA.
AMERICAN SERIES



MAP V.
Distribution of votes in the Senate against State Aid.
JOURNAL, December 21, 1819.
RAND, McNALLY & CO.'S
OUTLINE MAP OF
NORTH CAROLINA.
AMERICAN SERIES.
Rand McNally & Co., Engravers and Publishers
160-174 Adams Street, Chicago.
SCALES.



MAP VI.
Distribution of votes in the House against State Aid.
JOURNAL, December 20, 1819.
= One vote.
= Two votes.
RAND, McNALLY & CO.'S
OUTLINE MAP OF
NORTH CAROLINA.
AMERICAN SERIES.
Rand, McNally & Co., Engravers and Publishers,
160-174 Adams Street, Chicago.
SCALES



MAP VII.
RAND, McNALLY & CO.'S
OUTLINE MAP OF
NORTH CAROLINA.
AMERICAN SERIES.
Rand, McNally & Co., Engravers and Publishers,
160-174 Adams Street, Chicago.
SCALES
Distribution of votes in the Senate on a bill in aid of the North Carolina Central, Cape Fear and Yadkin Railroads.
JOURNAL, January 13, 1832.
◯=For the bill.
⊕=Against the bill.

Several explanations for such a sectional division may be adduced. First of all, the need for transportation was more nearly supplied in the east than in the west by natural inland waterways. Too, overland wagon routes were more cheaply constructed and maintained in the comparatively level east than in the hilly or mountainous west. Doubtless, also, many citizens of the east were unwilling that their section should bear half or a larger share of the burden of undertakings, the chief benefits of which would accrue to their neighbors of the west.

But such a motive was scarcely most responsible for the making of State aid a sectional issue. The system of representation in the Legislature, as fixed by the Constitution of 1776, soon resulted in a disproportionate representation of the two sections. If an imaginary line be drawn north and south across the State just west of Wake, the section to the west of this line embraced, in 1815, twenty-four counties and two boroughs, that to the east thirty-eight counties and four boroughs. Since these political divisions, without regard to population, constituted the basis of representation, there was a large majority of eastern men in the Legislature.[1]

When the question of State aid to transportation came up in 1815, the opposition of the west to the existing basis of representation had already become active.[2] And it was this system of representation that furnished the basis for the chief political issue in the State—the issue which overshadowed all others, and whose influence was manifest in the discussion of every question of general State policy—until the Constitution was revised in 1835. That the bitter struggle of the two sections over the constitutional issue should find expression in their division in a similar way on other issues, particularly one involving general State policy, is not surprising.

[1]Each county elected a senator and two representatives; each borough, a representative.
[2]W. K. Boyd, The Antecedents of the North Carolina Convention of 1835, South Atlantic Quarterly, April, 1910.

Perhaps, too, besides the broad sectional strife, the inability to agree on any large undertaking because of local jealousy and rivalry did more than all else to hinder the growth of sentiment in favor of State aid.[1] Again, towards the close of this period, the introduction in other States of the railroad, yet in the experimental stage, doubtless made men hesitate to involve the State in the expenditure of large sums of money either for the old forms of transportation which might be largely superseded by the new form, or for the new until it had been thoroughly tried elsewhere.

Whatever the cause or causes of the meagerness of the State's expenditures for transportation in this period, the total amount expended amounted to only $291,576.10. The following tabular statement shows in some detail the objects to which the money was devoted:

Engineering and incidentals[2]		$67,518.74
On rivers:
Shares of stock—
Roanoke Navigation Company[3]	$50,000.00
Cape Fear Navigation Company[4]	40,000.00
Yadkin Navigation Company[5]	25,000.00
Tar River Navigation Company[6]	1,200.00
Neuse River Navigation Company[7]	1,800.00
North Carolina Catawba Company[8]	2,400.00
		$120,400.00
Direct appropriations—
Broad[9]	$2,548.00
Cape Fear[10]	39,730.16
Lumber[11]	427.20
		$42,705.36
		$163,105.36

[1] See map VII, supra.

[2] In the Report of the Board, 1833, p. 4 ff., the expenditures for Internal Improvement to date are summarized.

The expenditures for surveys of swamp lands, amounting to $3,832.44, are not included here.

[3] Laws, 1815, ch. 13; 1823, ch. 17.

[4] Ibid., 1815, ch. 14; 1823, ch. 16.

[5] Ibid., 1816, ch. 35.

[6] Ibid., ch. 23.

[7] Ibid., ch. 16.

[8] Ibid., ch. 25.

[9] Ibid., 1820, ch. 38.

[10] Ibid., 1822, ch. 16; 1825, ch. 8; 1826, ch. 18; 1827, ch. 34; 1828, ch. 36.

[11] Ibid., 1822, ch. 28.

On Clubfoot and Harlowe's Creek Canal:
Shares of stock[1]	$15,000.00
Loan[2]	18,000.00
			$33,000.00
On roads:
Shares of stock—
Buncombe Turnpike Company[3]	$5,000.00
Plymouth Turnpike Company[4]	2,500.00
		$7,500.00
Direct appropriations—
Various highways[5]	$16,452.00	$16,452.00
Loans—
Commissioners of road Old Fort to Asheville[6]	2,000.00
Tennessee River Turnpike[7]	2,000.00
		$4,000.00
			$27,952.00
			$291,576.10

Within the limits of this paper no attempt can be made to discuss in detail the separate expenditures summarized above, or the specific object to which each was applied. It may be remarked in passing that at the close of the pre-railroad era, of the several navigation companies in which the State had become interested as a stockholder only the Roanoke and the Cape Fear companies remained active. The former, with which Virginia also co-operated through the holding of shares, was engaged throughout the period in attempts to improve the navigation of the Roanoke River and its tributaries in both States; and in 1835, having begun in 1831 to pay small dividends, the company was fairly prosperous.[8]

As early as 1819 the Cape Fear Navigation Company was

[1] Ibid., 1818, ch. 50; 1821, ch. 37; 1824, ch. 25.
[2] Ibid., 1826, ch. 24; 1828, ch. 37.
[3] Ibid., 1824, ch. 28.
[4] Ibid., 1823, ch. 20.
[5] Ibid., 1820, chs. 34, 37; 1821, ch. 22; 1822, ch. 35; 1823, chs. 25, 26; 1824, ch. 27; 1825, ch. 34; 1826, ch. 25.
[6] Ibid., 1829, ch. 14.
[7] Ibid., 1831, ch. 36.
[8] The total stock subscribed was $412,000, of which North Carolina owned $50,000, and Virginia, $80,000. The total expenditures to 1834 were $410,958.65, and the tolls for that year amounted to $4,301.65.—Report of the Board, 1834, p. 20.

able to pay a 7½ per cent dividend,[1] and steamboats were ascending to Fayetteville.[2] An inquiry into the affairs of the company by a legislative committee in 1832 revealed the fact that $42,761.76 had been expended on the river, and net tolls amounting to $28,846.74 had been collected. It was the opinion of the committee, however, that the money expended had "not been judiciously and profitably applied."[3] The aggregate of dividends paid by the company from 1819 to 1833, inclusive, amounted to 45 per cent.

The other navigation companies in which the State was a shareholder were short-lived. For several years prior to 1830 the Board of Internal Improvements had received no reports from them, and little is known of the small amounts actually expended on the several rivers.[4]

The Clubfoot and Harlowe's Creek Canal Company, organized under a charter of 1795,[5] had begun operations within less than two years after the charter was issued.[6] In 1815, when the State was beginning to aid other companies, it had completed one-fourth of the work to be done;[7] but not until 1827 did tolls begin to be collected, and these aggregated in the next six years only $2,722.05, and were dwindling each year, work on the canal having been suspended for lack of funds.[8] Of the two turnpike companies in which the State was a shareholder, only the Buncombe Turnpike Company made a conspicuous success of its undertaking. The road, from a point on the South Carolina line by way of Asheville to the Tennessee line, proved a profitable investment, and by 1835 the company was paying an annual dividend of 11 per cent.[9] [1] Report of the Treasurer, House Journal, Nov. 23, 1819.

---

[2] Memoir, p. 37.
[3] Legislative Documents, 1832, No. 20.
[4] Report of the Board, 1830, p. 5.
[5] Laws, 1795, ch. 23.
[6] Ibid., 1797, ch. 10.
[7] Star, May 19, 1815.
[8] Report of the Board, 1834, p. 7.
[9] Ibid., 1835.

The most significant work undertaken by the State alone was the dredging of the Cape Fear River below Wilmington. At first the operations here, beginning in 1822, were attended with signal success, it was thought.[1] But in 1829, after much loss of money and time in attempting to use an unwieldy dredging machine, the work on this part of the river was taken in charge by the Federal government.[2]

In its report of 1833, the Board of Internal Improvement declared that the money expended in procuring information concerning the topography of the State would prove profitable or not according to the use to be made of the information thereafter. The expenditures on roads were regarded as clearly profitable, and the same was true of the sums expended on the Roanoke and Cape Fear rivers; while the investment in the Clubfoot and Harlowe's Creek Canal was of doubtful expediency, and the money expended on the Yadkin, Tar, Catawba, Neuse and Broad rivers was regarded as a total loss.

The causes which led to the failure to make more profitable these investments by the State are to be found in the lack of skill and experience, which was responsible for many useless expenditures, and in the scattering of efforts in order to gratify local preferences and jealousies, resulting in many unfinished operations which a concentration of expenditures would have avoided. "These and other circumstances contributed to disappoint expectations, perhaps too sanguine, and produced doubts of the success of any attempts at internal improvement in our State. The Legislature, apparently unwilling to give up the long-cherished idea of improving the State and yet fearful to embark in any public work of magnitude (had) retained the Board and continued the fund for internal improvement, without providing the means or directing the undertaking of any new work, or the more vigorous prosecution of any which had been already commenced."[1] Therefore, had aid been more liberally given to transportation, it may be questioned whether the whole would not have been spent in equally fruitful or unfruitful undertakings. But without an increase in the taxes, or a curtailment of the ordinary government expenses, there remained only the credit of the State to be relied on for means sufficient for the completion of any works of significance, for the Literary Fund had been encroached upon repeatedly in the twenties in order to meet the general expenses of the State government.[2]

[1]Governor Holmes' message, House Journal, Nov. 17, 1824.
[2]Report of the Board, 1829, p. 3.

Whatever the causes of the failures of the early internal improvement policy, with the beginning of the next period it took on new life. In the succeeding chapters will be found some account of the zeal and enthusiasm with which the newly empowered west advanced the policy it had so long championed, and which found its fullest development in the building of important railways.

[1]Report of the Board, 1833, p. 7.
[2]Report of the Treasurer, 1834, p. 10 ff.

JOSEPH HEWES AND THE DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE.

BY R. D. W. CONNOR, SECRETARY OF THE NORTH CAROLINA HISTORICAL COMMISSION.

In his famous letter to John Adams, July 9, 1819, repudiating the "Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence," Thomas Jefferson paid his respects to the North Carolina delegates in the Continental Congress, declaring there was "not a greater Tory in Congress than Hooper; that Hughes [sic] was very wavering, sometimes firm, sometimes feeble, according as the day was clear or cloudy"; and that their line of conduct was very uncertain "until Penn came, who fixed Hughes [sic], and the vote of the State."[1] When this letter was made public, "Jo Seawell Jones," as Dr. Alderman says, "choking with rage, rushed to the rescue in his celebrated 'Defence of North Carolina' and with an uncommon mingling of invective, passion, partisanship, critical power and insight, effectually disposed of his great antagonist."[2] Jones, however, directed his defence to Hooper alone, and although he shows the statement in regard to him to be a libel, yet the accompanying assertion characterizing Hewes's position on independence has been accepted even in North Carolina, and by Hewes's biographers, without dissent.

Hewes's attitude toward independence, as depicted by Jefferson, is so entirely out of harmony with his whole course, throughout the Revolution, and with the attitude toward independence displayed in his official and personal correspondence, as at once to raise a question of the accuracy of Jefferson's memory. Let us then examine his statement critically, and ascertain, if possible, how much of truth there may be in it. We may dismiss at once any notion that he intentionally misrepresented Hewes. It would have been remarkable, indeed, if Jefferson, writing in a fit of anger forty-three years after the events he describes, should have been entirely accurate in his statement. Whether his memory was accurate as to the position of Joseph Hewes on the question of independence, is the subject of the present inquiry.

[1]Works. Memorial Edition. XV, 206.
[2]Life of William Hooper, p. 37.

Hewes was elected a delegate to the Continental Congress in August, 1774, and served in that body until the summer of 1777. He was, accordingly, in Congress during the period in which sentiment for independence was developing in the colonies, took part in the debates on Richard Henry Lee's motion for independence in June, being for most of the time the only delegate present from North Carolina, and signed the Declaration of Independence in July.

His attitude toward the Revolution during the year 1775 may be gathered from his letters written from Congress. In February of 1775, the two houses of Parliament presented an address to the king declaring the colonies in rebellion, and assuring his Majesty of their determination to support him in his efforts to suppress it; and the king returning his thanks for their loyal address, called for an increase of both the land and naval forces to be used in America. A few months later information reached the Americans that he was hiring Hessians for service against them; and in October came his proclamation declaring the colonists out of his protection. The effect of these measures on the development of sentiment for independence was marked. Writing, July 8, 1775, to Samuel Johnston, Hewes says:

"If the Governor attempts to do anything he ought to be seized and sent out of the colony; so should the judges; the powers of government must soon be superseded and taken into the hands of the people. * * * I hope by your influence and example you will drive every principle of Toryism out of all parts of your province. I consider myself now over head and ears in what the Ministry call rebellion. I feel no compunction for the part I have taken nor for the number of our enemies lately slain in the battle of Bunkers Hill. I wish to be in camp before Boston, though I fear I shall not be able to get there till next campaign."[3]

After the king's proclamation in October, Hewes declared:

"We have but little expectation of a reconciliation. I can assure you from all the accounts we have yet received from England we have scarcely a dawn of hope that it will take place"[4]; and he was of opinion that independence would certainly come soon "if the British Ministry pursue their diabolical schemes."[5]

These quotations reveal his attitude in 1775. During that year the policy of the colonies was to deprecate all discussion of independence, but Hewes's letters show that, consciously or unconsciously, he was moving calmly, steadily and continuously toward that goal. The events during the first half of 1776 served only to confirm him in his sentiments. There is no indication of wavering; there is no evidence of a fair weather politician who shrank from the storm which he knew his course would bring. On February 11, 1776, he wrote as follows to his friend Johnston:

"All accounts from England seem to agree that we shall have a dreadful storm bursting on our hands through all America in the spring. We must not shrink from it; we ought not to show any symptoms of fear; the nearer it approaches and the greater the sound, the more fortitude and calm, steady firmness we ought to possess. If we mean to defend our liberties, our dearest rights and privileges against the power of Britain to the last extremity, we ought to bring ourselves to such a temper of mind as to stand unmoved at the bursting of an earthquake. Although the storm thickens I feel myself quite composed. I have furnished myself with a good musket and bayonet, and when I can no longer be useful in council I hope I shall be willing to take the field. I think I had rather fall there than be carried off by a lingering illness. In this I am pretty much of the same opinion of the French general

[3]Colonial Records of North Carolina, X, p. 86.
[4]Ibid., p. 315.
[5]Hazleton: The Declaration of Independence; Its History, p. 31.

who, confined a long time by sickness to his bed, on hearing the Duke of Brunswick was killed by a cannon ball, exclaimed: 'Great God! How unfortunate I am! Brunswick was always a lucky fellow.' * * *

"It is hinted in the papers that persons will be sent from England to negotiate with the colonies; many people do not believe it; those who do have but little expectation from it. They are to treat under the influence of a mighty fleet and army. What are we to expect from the mouth of a cannon or the point of a bayonet? See Lord North's motion in the House of Commons the 20th of November. What have we to expect from Parliament? * * *

"The only pamphlet [Paine's 'Common Sense'] that has been published here for a long time, I now send you; it is a curiosity; we have not put up any to go by the wagon, not knowing how you might relish independency. The author is not yet known; some say Doctor Franklin had a hand in it; he denies it."[6]

On the 20th of March he wrote to Johnston as follows:

"The act of Parliament prohibiting all trade and commerce between Great Britain and the colonies has been lately brought here by a Mr. Temple from London. It makes all American property found on the sea liable to seizure and confiscation, and I fear it will make the breach between the two countries so wide as never more to be reconciled. * * * I see no prospect of a reconciliation. Nothing is left now but to fight it out. * * * Some among us urge strongly for independency and eternal separation; others wish to wait a little longer and to have the opinion of their constituents on that subject. You must give us the sentiments of your Province when your Convention meets."[7]

The Convention of North Carolina met in April, and on April 12th adopted a resolution authorizing the North Carolina delegates in the Continental Congress to vote for independence.[8] A copy of this resolution was dispatched by an express the next day to Hewes, who alone represented North

[6]Col. Rec., X, pp. 446-47.

[7]State Records, XI, pp. 288-89.

[8]This resolution, after reciting the grievances which moved the Convention to its course, was as follows:

"Resolved, That the delegates for this colony in the Continental Congress be impowered to concur with the delegates of the other colonies in declaring independency, and forming foreign alliances, reserving to this colony the sole and exclusive right of forming a Constitution and Laws for this colony, and of appointing delegates from time to time (under the direction of a general representation thereof) to meet the delegates of the other colonies for such purposes as shall be hereafter pointed out." Commenting on this resolution Bancroft declares: "North Carolina was the first colony to vote explicit sanction to independence."

Carolina at Philadelphia. In May, after he had received this resolution, Hewes wrote to James Iredell:

"We appear to have everything we want. We resolve to raise regiments, resolve to make cannon, resolve to make and import muskets, powder and clothing, but it is a melancholy fact that near half our men, cannon, muskets, powder, clothes, etc., is to be found nowhere but on paper. We are not discouraged at this; if our situation was ten times worse I could not agree to give up our cause."

And yet we are asked to believe that these are the words of a man who, on so momentous a question, knew not his own mind; that they proceeded from a spirit feeble, wavering, and uncertain; that they expressed the sentiment of a time-server and a trimmer!

But Penn, it is said, "fixed" Hewes, and the vote of the State on independence. When Jefferson wrote these words he was angry, and justly offended at being practically charged with plagiarism in the greatest act of his life, and he was chagrined that John Adams apparently believed him guilty. Moreover, he wrote from memory, forty-three years after the event under discussion. These circumstances were certainly not conducive to accurate historical statements; and in another connection, while engaged in the preparation of his "Autobiography," writing calmly in his study from notes taken contemporaneously with the events described, Jefferson refutes his own assertion. Writing to a grandson of Samuel Adams, Jefferson enclosed "some extracts from a written document" on the subject of independence,

"for the truth of which," he says, "I pledge myself to Heaven and Earth; having, while the question was under consideration before Congress, taken written notes, in my seat, of what was passing, and reduced them to form on the final conclusion."[9]

These notes were taken, June 8 and 10, 1776, during the debates on Richard Henry Lee's motion for independency.

"It appearing in the course of these debates," says Jefferson, on the authority of his notes, "that the colonies of New York, New Jersey, [9]Works. Memorial Ed., XV, pp. 195-6.

Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, and South Carolina, were not yet matured for falling from the parent stem, but that they were fast advancing to that state, it was thought most prudent to wait awhile for them, and to postpone the final decision to July 1st."[10]

North Carolina is here recorded as being favorable to independence, and yet Joseph Hewes was the only delegate present from that State, and had been the only one present since March. When, then, did Penn "fix" Hewes and the vote of the State? It must have been before he left Philadelphia in March. But up to that time Congress had never taken a vote on the question of independence, but had carefully avoided even the appearance of so doing. And Hewes, as shown by the letters quoted, was one of those "among us" who in private "urged strongly for independence."

Afterwards, in a letter to Madison, referring to certain statements that John Adams had made with regard to the debates on the subject, Jefferson said:

"In some of the particulars, Mr. Adams' memory has led him into unquestionable error. At the age of eighty-eight, and forty-seven years after the transaction of independence, this is not wonderful. Nor should I, at the age of eighty, on the small advantage of that difference only, venture to oppose my memory to his, were it not supported by written notes taken by myself at the moment and on the spot."[11]

Taking issue with Adams' statement that the question had been long under consideration by Congress before July, 1776, Jefferson appeals to history to say whether the statement was true, "or this dictum also of Mr. Adams be another slip of memory."[12]

It is therefore difficult to say just when John Penn "fixed" Hewes and the vote of the State, and the conviction grows upon one that the memory of the "Sage of Monticello," unsupported by his "written notes," is no more trustworthy than the memory of the "Colossus of Independence."

[10] Ibid., XV, pp. 196-7.
[11] Ibid., XV, p. 460.
[12] Ibid., XV, p. 462.

There are reasons, too, for believing that Adams suffered a "slip of memory" when, in reply to a question whether every member of Congress who signed the Declaration of Independence cordially approved of it, he wrote the following paragraph:

"The measure had been upon the carpet for months, and obstinately opposed from day to day. Majorities were constantly against it. For many days the majority depended on Mr. Hewes, of North Carolina. While a member, one day, was speaking, and reading documents from all the colonies, to prove that the public opinion, the general sense of all, was in favor of the measure, when he came to North Carolina, he produced letters and public proceedings which demonstrated that the majority of that colony were in favor of it, Mr. Hewes, who had hitherto constantly voted against it, started suddenly upright, and lifting up both his hands to heaven, as if he had been in a trance, cried out: 'It is done, and I will abide by it.' I would give more for a perfect painting of the terror and horror upon the faces of the old majority, at that critical moment, than for the best piece of Raphael. The question, however, was eluded by an immediate motion for adjourment."[13]

There are many interesting points about this account. "The measure," he says, "had been upon the carpet for months." Richard Henry Lee made his motion, the "measure" referred to, June 7; it was adopted July 1, less than one month later. Therefore it had not been "upon the carpet for months." It was "obstinately opposed from day to day," and "for many days" the majority depended on Hewes. But Jefferson says, on the strength of his contemporaneous notes, that the debate lasted only three days, June 8 and 10, and July 1; and shows that from the beginning Hewes was in favor of the measure. "Majorities," says Adams, "were constantly against it"; Jefferson, however, mentions only one vote, the one taken on July 1, and the measure was then carried by the votes of nine States out of thirteen. Then, too, these debates took place after the adoption of the Halifax Resolution, after Hewes had received a copy of it, and after he had laid it before Congress. We are, then, not only to believe, according to Adams, that some member of some other colony was more familiar with the sentiment of North Carolina than Hewes, but that Hewes deliberately violated the expressed declaration of his constituents officially given through their representatives in convention assembled. Would John Penn, who had "fixed" Hewes, have remained silent about such a breach of trust? Penn arrived at Philadelphia in the latter part of June. On June 28, writing to Samuel Johnston, President of the North Carolina Convention, he said: "I arrived here several days ago in good health and found Mr. Hewes well. * * * The first of July will be made remarkable. Then the question relative to independence will be agitated, and there is no doubt but a total separation from Britain will take place. This Province [Pennsylvania] is for it. Indeed, so are all[14] except Maryland and her people are coming over fast." [15] Not an intimation that he had found Hewes "wavering"! The same day Hewes himself wrote to James Iredell: "On Monday the great question of independence * * * will come on. It will be carried, I expect, by a great majority, and then, I suppose, we shall take upon us a new name." In all his letters he assumes as a matter of course that his position is known to be favorable to "the great question of independency." [16]

[13] Works. Ed. by Charles Francis Adams, Jr. Ed. 1856, X, p. 35.

There must, however, be some explanation of the recollections of Jefferson and Adams. The key to the statement of Adams is probably found by putting together two sentences of two different letters. The closing sentence of the account just quoted is: "The question, however, was eluded by an immediate motion for adjournment." In another [14]Italics mine. "All" included North Carolina, and Hewes for two months had been the only member present from that colony.

[15]Hazleton: The Declaration of Independence, p. 139.
[16]McRee: Life and Correspondence of James Iredell, I, p. 326.

letter, written to Jefferson, Adams says: "You know the unanimity of the States finally depended on the vote of Joseph Hewes, and was finally determined by him." [17] Let us note that here he uses the word "unanimity," while in the former letter he used the word "majority." Now, as has already been shown, during the first debates on Richard Henry Lee's motion, June 8 and 10, Hewes was among those ready to vote in the affirmative; and that the final decision was postponed because certain colonies, among them South Carolina, were not ready to take the final step. July 1, the debate was resumed and the motion, according to Jefferson's notes, was adopted by the votes of New Hampshire, Connecticut, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, New Jersey, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina and Georgia. Personally the New York delegates favored it and believed their constituents did also, but their hands were tied by an old, unrepealed instruction against independence passed the previous year; they, therefore, withdrew from Congress, declining to vote at all. Delaware's two delegates were divided, and the vote of the colony was lost. South Carolina and Pennsylvania alone voted against it. It was well known, however, that the New York Convention which was to meet at an early date would repeal the old instruction and declare for independence; and that certain delegates from Delaware and Pennsylvania, who favored it, but were not present when the vote was taken, would attend next day and carry their colonies for it. This left South Carolina alone in opposition. Therefore, when the Committee of the Whole rose and reported the resolution to the Congress, Edward Rutledge, the senior delegate from South Carolina, as Jefferson says,

"requested the determination might be put off to the next day, as he believed his colleagues, though they disapproved of the resolution, would then join in it for the sake of unanimity."[18]

[17] Works: X, p. 381.
[18] Works. Mem. Ed. XV, p. 199.

The request was granted, and this must have been the "immediate motion for adjournment" to which Adams refers.

"In the meantime," says Jefferson, "a third member came post from the Delaware counties, and turned the vote of that colony in favor of the motion. Members of a different sentiment attending that morning from Pennsylvania, also their vote was changed."[19]

New York still declined to take part in the proceedings, so that of the colonies authorized to vote at all South Carolina alone was in opposition when Congress convened on July 2. Thereupon "for the sake of unanimity," [20] says Jefferson, South Carolina changed her vote and joined her sisters in declaring the colonies "free and independent States." Edward Rutledge, of South Carolina, therefore, and not Joseph Hewes, of North Carolina, finally determined the "unanimity" of the States. It also seems probable that it was the former who figured in the dramatic scene described by Adams. It would be no matter for wonder that a man approaching his ninetieth birthday, writing from memory nearly fifty years after the scene described, should confuse Hewes, of North Carolina, with Rutledge, of South Carolina.

Another circumstance tending to confirm this view, and explaining Jefferson's assertion also, Hewes himself mentions in a letter written to Samuel Johnston after the adoption of the Declaration of Independence. On July 28, while Congress was debating the Articles of Confederation and the plan for forming Foreign Alliances, Hewes writes: "These two capital points ought to have been settled before our Declaration of Independence went forth to the world. This was my opinion long ago, and every day experience serves to confirm me in that opinion." If Hewes urged these views before Congress, as is not unlikely, the fact will explain how his attitude, years afterwards, should have been remembered and represented as opposing independence.

[19] Ibid.
[20] Ibid., XV, p. 198. Italics mine.

From Painting by Jaques Busbee.

THE SITE OF FORT RALEIGH

Vol. X APRIL, 1911 No. 4

The North Carolina Booklet

"Carolina! Carolina! Heaven's blessings attend her!
While we live we will cherish, protect and defend her."

Published by
THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY
DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION

The object of the Booklet is to aid in developing and preserving North Carolina History. The proceeds arising from its publication will be devoted to patriotic purposes. Editor.

ADVISORY BOARD OF THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET.

Mrs. Hubert Haywood.
Mr. E. E. Moffitt.
Mrs. Spier Whitaker.
Mr. R. D. W. Connor.
Dr. D. H. Hill.
Dr. E. W. Sikes.
Mr. W. J. Peele.
Miss Adelaide L. Fries.
Miss Martha Helen Haywood.
Dr. Richard Dillard.
Dr. Kemp P. Battle.
Mr. James Sprunt.
Mr. Marshall DeLancey Haywood.
Chief Justice Walter Clark.
Major W. A. Graham.
Dr. Charles Lee Smith.

EDITOR:
Miss Mary Hilliard Hinton.

OFFICERS OF THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION 1910–1912.

REGENT:
Miss MARY HILLIARD HINTON.

VICE-REGENT:
MISS DUNCAN CAMERON WINSTON.

HONORARY REGENTS:
Mrs. SPIER WHITAKER.
Mrs. E. E. MOFFITT.

RECORDING SECRETARY:
Mrs. J. LEIGH SKINNER.

CORRESPONDING SECRETARY:
Mrs. PAUL H. LEE.

TREASURER:
Mrs. FRANK SHERWOOD.

REGISTRAR:
Mrs. JOSEPH CHESHIRE WEBB, Jr.

GENEALOGIST AND HISTORIAN:
Mrs. HELEN DeBERNIERE WILLS.

CUSTODIAN OF RELICS:
Mrs. JOHN E. RAY.

CHAPTER REGENTS.

Bloomsbury Chapter.....Mrs. Hubert Haywood, Regent.
Penelope Barker Chapter.....Mrs. Patrick Matthew, Regent.
Sir Walter Raleigh Chapter,
Miss Catherine F. Seyton Albertson, Regent.
DeGraffenried Chapter.....Mrs. Charles Slover Hollister, Regent.

Founder of the North Carolina Society and Regent 1896-1902:
Mrs. SPIER WHITAKER.

Regent 1902:
Mrs. D. H. HILL, Sr.*

Regent 1902-1906:
Mrs. THOMAS K. BRUNER.

Regent 1906-1910:
Mrs. E. E. MOFFITT.

* Died December 12, 1904.

THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET

Vol. X APRIL, 1911 No. 4

BAPTISM OF VIRGINIA DARE*

Anniversary address, delivered on Roanoke Island by Rt. Rev. Joseph Blount Cheshire, D.D., August 18, 1910, under the auspices of the Roanoke Colony Memorial Association.

We have just sung our State song, "Carolina." We give to our native country a feminine designation. "Carolina" is derived from the masculine name Charles, in Latin "Carolus"; some say from the French King Charles IX. More probably it was so called in the first English charter, after Charles I of England, and then the name was repeated and permanently fixed by the two charters of Charles II. But whether from French or English Charleses, we find it always in the more beautiful feminine form, "Carolina." Grammatically it had to be feminine form, because it is an objective, and the noun with which it must agree is "terra." But I suppose that, after all, the reason why the old Latins, and the older Greeks before them, made the name of the earth to be of the feminine gender, was at bottom the same feeling which must always have made men in some sense recognize the earth as our common mother. Out of the dust of the earth did the power and the goodness of God form man; and so we speak of "Mother Earth," and we call our country, "Patria," which, though it be from the Latin for father, yet it has a feminine form. The German may translate it "Fatherland," but we say our "Mother Country."

*This address was in fact delivered at Roanoke Island, August 18, 1910, the anniversary (the 323d) of the birth of Virginia Dare. But by a misapprehension of the writer it had been prepared under the impression that the day of delivery was to be the anniversary of the baptism. It was written at Nag's Head without books or memoranda of any kind for the verification of any fact or date.

We are met today to celebrate what we may in a very proper sense call the birthday of our country, not only of our mother State of North Carolina, but of the greater country of which North Carolina forms a part, because here on Roanoke Island began that chapter of history which has gone on and developed into the history of the United States. For nearly one hundred years white men of Europe had been visiting this new found western world. First Spaniards, in 1492, under the great Italian, Christopher Columbus, discovered the West Indian Islands, and Spaniards also discovered South America. Then Englishmen, in 1497, under Cabot, a merchant of Bristol, though also an Italian by birth, first landed upon and claimed the Continent of North America. Far to the south cities and colonies had been formed by Spaniards and had grown and prospered, and the treasures of Mexico and Peru in the hands of Spain had so extended and increased the immense power of that Country in Europe that nothing seemed able to withstand the tide of its conquests. But here, on Roanoke Island, in the summer of 1587, was planted a seed, and here began to spring into being a life and power which in time wrested the supremacy from Spain, and built up the power of our English-speaking people, which covered the world with English colonies, developed this great empire of the West, and has given to our race the position which it now holds in the world. Roanoke Island was the first stone laid in the great structure of English colonization and expansion.

And to this anniversary we give the name, not of a man, but of a girl, Virginia Dare. This is "Virginia Dare Day." Englishmen had before come to these shores, to this very spot whereon we stand. In the summer of 1584 came Amidas and Barlow, two of Raleigh's captains, and in 1585 the valiant Sir Richard Grenville brought Ralph Lane and his hundred and seven pioneers, who for a year sailed these waters and traversed these forests, and wrote descriptions of the country and of its inhabitants, and drew for us those curious pictures of its people, their dress, dwellings and occupations, which adorn the narrative of Hariot. But a colony of men, however intelligent and hardy, can make no permanent settlement, and so Lane and his companions sailed away across the blue waters.

And then in the pleasant summer weather of the year 1587 came John White and his colony, sent out by the same wonderful man, Sir Walter Raleigh, and with White came not only men, but also men's wives and their little children, boys and girls. For on these shores Raleigh was determined that English colonies should be planted, because he saw that it was only by thus extending the bounds of their habitation that our people could reach that development and power necessary for their defense against the power of their European rivals and enemies, and for the accomplishment of their great destiny. And the birth of the first child of the English race in America was the prophecy and the earnest of that immense multiplication and expansion which now reckons its numbers by hundreds of millions of free, enlightened Christian people, sprung from the same sturdy stock who have established the institutions and the culture of the little island of Britain in every quarter of the habitable globe.

And you have well chosen as the day our celebration, not the anniversary of the birth, but the anniversary of the baptism of Virginia Dare.* It is not physical life which makes the greatness of a people. It is their spiritual life. It is not strength of body or of mind, it is strength of heart and of spirit. The England of the sixteenth century was weak in physical resources, and but a beginner in the arts and sciences. She had to bring her teachers of Greek and of the new learning from the Continent; her artists she imported from the low countries; her architecture she was learning from Italy. Her enemies were the mighty upon earth. The tramp of the Spanish infantry, the finest soldiers in Europe, had trodden down all resistance, except where they had been stopped by the cutting of the dykes in Holland, and by that silver thread of the Strait of Dover, and on the ocean how feeble seemed the little frigates and flyboats of the English seamen, beside the towering sea castles of the Spanish navy! But the Englishman of the sixteenth century was a free man, and of a free and aspiring spirit. He had not worked out his freedom into any consistent system either in church or in State. He had not learned that his own freedom could not be secure until he had learned to respect also the freedom of others. He was loyal to his ancient monarchy, and he loved his heroic queen, but as long as the queen and her government represented on the whole the interests, the aspirations and the efforts of the nation, they were free to exercise almost any degree of mediæval tyranny upon particular individuals or upon the reactionary elements of the poplation. At the reformation he had preserved in its integrity the ancient Church of England as no other Reformed or Protestant nation of Europe had done, and he loved its stately churches and cathedrals, and its dignified hierarchy, and its noble services, which had come down to him from his ancestors. But he was no longer a bondman to the church; he was Christ's free man in his Father's house. Baptism meant for him that he was "a member of Christ, a child of God, and an inheritor of the Kingdom of Heaven." And he gloried in this freedom. Nothing is a more striking feature in the character of the great Elizabethan soldiers and sailors than this confident profession of their Christian faith, their glorying in the Reformed religion of the ancient Catholic Church of England. And so we read, in the old chronicle of Roanoke Island, that it was by the especial command of Sir Walter Raleigh that Manteo, the first Christian among the North American Indians, was baptized; not in England where he might have been baptized in a royal minster or in an archiepiscopal cathedral, with nobles and princes for his sponsors, but here under the spreading branches of the American forests, the work of founding the first English colony was inaugurated by the baptism of the first Indian convert. This fact of itself proves the presence of a priest of the English Church among the colonists. Raleigh's charter required that the public institutions of religion should be in accordance with the Church of England, and in providing for the administration of a sacrament, an authorized administrator must have been included.

*See note at bottom of page 167.

And next, after the baptism of Manteo on Sunday, August 13, 1587, came the birth of Virginia Dare, August 18, and August 20 being the tenth Sunday after Trinity, she was baptized on this island, and the new life springing up in this strange and savage land was dedicated to God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Ghost; and in that solemn and significant rite that whole company saw repeated, their own dedication and new birth as "Members of Christ, children of God, and inheritors of the Kingdom of Heaven."

We know little about that fair young child whose name is now so familiar among the many millions of her kinsfolk. And it is not as an individual that she is important, but she is representative of a great and heroic age and of a tremendous and world-embracing vital movement. What amazing memories are called up by these rude forest surroundings, and by the flash of the blue waters between the living colonnades of these whispering pines! The spirits of mighty men of old haunt us along this storied shore. Philip Amidas and Arthur Barlow seem to be anchored out across yonder bar, while through the inlet which then pierced the sand banks, comes on to this wooded shore their little pinnace, flying the standard of St. George at its masthead, and a man in the prow hold out toward the new land the symbol of truth and light, the Cross.

And next after this we see that most valiant of all sixteenth century sailors, Sir Richard Grenville. "Admiral of Virginia" Raleigh named him, and with the stout captain, Ralph Lane, and learned Hariot, mathematician and historian, and John White, the pioneer artist of this expedition; and again in the offing rides the fleet of Drake. Draco, the Dragon, the frightened Spaniards called him, him who "singed the King of Spain's beard," sailing into the port of Cadiz, the strongest fortified harbor in Europe; and fighting both fleet and forts at the same time—as Lord Howard and Sir Walter Raleigh did again in 1596—burning the fleet and sacking the town. And back of all, though he never saw these shores, back of all these, the great figure of Sir Walter himself, the genius of English colonization, the hand that pointed out to England her path in the great future. All these seem to come to us here, and claim a part in the grateful memories of this hour. They were among real makers of England's greatness today, and the founders of Carolina and Virginia, and of all this great American nation.

It is the fashion with some to call these men free-booters and pirates. I repel the word and all that it implies. These men were the champions of the freedom of the sea and of commerce, and they claimed the world for those who could most worthily possess it. And if there was a taste of danger and a spice of romance and a golden profit now and then for their reward, it was all in the day's work. The King of Spain claimed all this western hemisphere as his own. And the Bishop of Rome had, by his pretended right as God's vice-gerent on earth, confirmed to the King of Spain all lands lying west of a north and south line drawn one hundred leagues west of the Azores. West of that line he claimed all as his own, and undertook to exclude by fire and sword all intruders. And with the riches of this new world he prepared to support his schemes of subjugating those little corners of Europe, England and Holland, and a scrap here and there, where freedom still reared her head. Do you think the worse of our fathers that they dared to dispute this stupendous claim, and to strike for a part of that great West which they needed, and especially of that Continent of North America which Englishmen, and not Spaniards, had discovered? It was that claim and those schemes of unbridled ambition which stirred the blood of every son of England who could get a ship under him and a dozen good hearts to help him strike a blow. And if these expeditions took the form of marauding expeditions against the ships and the settlements of Spain, how was that to be avoided? How else could they attack that greed and cruelty, which had remorselessly plundered and enslaved and butchered the simple people of the new world to glut the maw of Spanish avarice and to extend the bounds of tyranny and of the Spanish Inquisition?

> "Venturous Fortunio his farm hath sold,
> And gads to Guianne land to search for gold:
> Meeting, perchance, if Orinoque deny,
> Some straggling pinnace of Polonian rye.
> Then comes home floating with a silken sail,
> The Severn shaketh with his cannon peal."

Thus did a contemporary English poet deride these bold seamen, as others have done since. But, as a matter of fact, it was those "Venturous Fortunios" who taught England where and how her true destiny and greatness were to be accomplished in the distant future, as it was by those same daring seamen that she was delivered from the deadly peril of Philip's "Invincible Armada" in the then immediate present. And a poet of our own day has worthily sung the condensed Epic of those same Elizabethan seamen, and especially of our own Sir Richard Grenville—as we may call him since he was an American Admiral—our own Sir Richard Grenville, in that noble poem which stirs my blood as does no other poem by Tennyson or by any modern poet, "The Last Fight of the Revenge."

But I must make an end. And, in making an end, let me say a last word about Virginia Dare and that "Lost Colony." And that last word is this: Never let any one persuade you to believe for one moment that a colony of one hundred and eighteen Christian English people, men and women, husbands and wives, parents and children, an organized Christian community—your kinsmen and mine—were, within the short space of no more than twenty years, from 1587 to 1607 when the Jamestown settlement was made, swallowed up and amalgamated with half-naked heathen Indian savages, so that no remnant was left which could be recognized by their white brethren of Virginia. The Indians told the Jamestown settlers that the Roanoke Colony had been exterminated by the Indians, and so they were. The Indians knew what had become of them, and there was no reason for them to have made such a statement if it had been false. We can not degrade the memory of those early pioneers in the settlement of America by supposing that they at once forgot their Christian nature, and voluntarily and promptly sunk into heathen barbarism, within less than one generation. The descendants of those first Christian inhabitants of our land are not to be sought in the mongrel remnants, part Indian, part white, and part negro, of a decaying tribe of American savages. They, those early colonists, Ananias Dare, and Eleanor his wife, and their little girl Virginia, and their friends and companions, found a nobler fate. They perished in their heroic endeavor, buried in an eddy and back current of the great stream of our race progress; but they have left their spiritual descendants and kindred in us who are here assembled, and in every worthy and patriotic son and daughter of Carolina, Virginia, and the United States.

THE EARLY HISTORY OF CRAVEN COUNTY

BY S. M. BRINSON.

Craven County derives its name from William, Earl of Craven. It was part of the land originally granted the Lords Proprietors. Its settlement is clearly traceable to the religious persecution which induced the Palatines to brave the dangers and uncertainties of an ocean voyage in quest of a land which offered freedom of conscience.

Protestantism at this time was making some headway in Baden and Bavaria and its increasing power alarmed the Roman church, which caused the expulsion of all Protestants from those kingdoms. Thousands of them fled to England and there, penniless and in want, they became a charge upon the people of England.

When Lewis Michel had secured from the Lords Proprietors in the name of the Swiss Cantons of Bern, the "grant of ten thousand acres of land on or betwixt the Neuse or Cape Fear or their branches in North Carolina," provision was made for including a goodly number of these Palatines in the expedition. The people of England were glad to get them out of their country and the Queen herself contributed 4,000 pounds to assist the movement.

Christopher DeGraffenreidt, a Swiss nobleman, was associated with Lewis Michel in this movement to settle Carolina. Good title had been secured from the Lords Proprietors, ten pounds purchase money being paid for every thousand acres and five shillings yearly as a quit rent for every thousand acres.

DeGraffenreidt and Michel on October 10, 1709, entered into formal contract with the Commissioners and Trustees (who were charged with the care of these German Palatines), "for the transportation and settlement of 650 of the poor Palatines to North Carolina." A copy of this contract is filed in the office of the Secretary of State. The contract is between DeGraffenreidt and Michel, of the one part, and "seven of the Commissioners and Trustees nominated and appointed by her Majesty's late gracious letters patent under the great seal of Great Britain for the collecting, receiving and disposing of the money to be collected for the subsistence and settlement of the poor Palatines lately arrived in Great Britain," on the other part.

It is recited in the contract that DeGraffenreidt and Michel have purchased a large tract of land in America called "North Carolina," that this land lies waste and uncultivated for want of inhabitants and that they have applied to the Commissioner having in charge the poor Palatines that some of them may be settled in North Carolina (this as well for the benefit of DeGraffenreidt and Michel as for as the relief and support of the said poor Palatines); that whereas the said Commissioners have thought it well to dispose of for this purpose six hundred persons of the said Palatines (which may be ninety-two families more or less), and have given to each of said six hundred Palatines 20 shillings in clothes and have paid and secured to be paid to DeGraffenreidt and Lewis Michel the sum of 5 pounds 10 shillings for each of the said six hundred persons for their transportation to North Carolina and for their comfortable support there.

It is agreed in this contract that DeGraffenreidt and Michel, for the consideration aforesaid, shall at their own cost, within two days embark or cause to be embarked in two ships six hundred of such of said poor Palatines as designated by the Commissioners and cause them to be transported to North Carolina, providing them with food and other necessaries during their voyage. It is provided that upon their arrival in North Carolina DeGraffenreidt and Michel shall within three months survey and set out 250 acres of the said tract of land for each of the families (ninety-two, more or less), and that these allotments "be as contiguous as may be for the mutual love and assistance of the said poor Palatines one to another, as well with respect to the exercise of religion, as to the management of their temporal affairs."

To avoid disputes this land was divided out to the families by lot. For the first five years no rent was to be paid, but after that period two pence per acre was to be paid annually. For the first year after their arrival DeGraffenreidt and Michel were to provide for the Palatines sufficient quantities of grain and other provisions for their support, but account of this was to be kept and at the end of three years payment for same was to be made.

It is further provided that within four months after their arrival, DeGraffenreidt and Michel at their own expense shall provide for each family "two cows and two calves, two sows with their several last litter or number of pigs, two ewe sheep and two lambs, with a male of each of the said kind of cattle, to propagate and increase." It is agreed that at the expiration of seven years after delivery thereof "the value of said cattle so delivered, with a moiety of the increase thereof remaining in their hands from the original stock shall be given DeGraffenreidt and Michel."

Further provision is made in this contract that immediately after the division of this land into the two hundred and fifty-acre parts each family is to be supplied by DeGraffenreidt and Michel free of cost with "plantation tools and utensils for felling of wood and clearing of ground and for building of houses for their own proper use and behoof."

It is finally provided that this contract shall be construed in the sense most favorable to the poor Palatines and that "in cases of difficulty relating to the premises it shall be referred to the Governor of the said county or province of North Carolina for the time being, whose order and direction not contrary to the intention of these presents shall be binding and conclusive as well to the said Christopher DeGraffenreidt and Lewis Michel, their heirs, executors and administrators, as to the said poor Palatines."

This contract seems to have been entered into with a real disposition to safeguard the interests of the Palatines, however anxious the people of England were to rid themselves of an element of their population which was burdensome upon their treasury.

Six hundred and fifty of the strongest and healthiest of the Palatines were chosen by DeGraffenreidt for the expedition, and in vessels which had been inspected by a Committee of the Upper House of Parliament they made their start across the Atlantic with the Carolina coast as their objective. That these men were not an irresponsible band of adventurers, but a band of resolute men really zealous for noble achievement may be gathered from the preparation they made for a journey which was uncertain in its outcome and which held large possibility of disaster to them. The religious services held just prior to their embarkation show a degree of piety and seriousness not altogether common among explorers and early settlers.

Rigorous persecution had driven these people from homes that were once happy and contented to seek an asylum in other lands. No better class could be selected for a stern and perilous undertaking than those poor Palatines. No surer test of moral stability could be applied than the persecution to which these people were subjected. Their determined adherence to the principles approved by their conscience evidenced the heroic quality which was to stand them in need. They came from a land which had been desolated by cruel wars and where merciless persecution at the hands of the popish Elector had been their portion and that of their Protestant friends.

DeGraffenreidt was moved by selfish interest and with no thought of affording aid and comfort to the Palatines except as incidental to the development of the large emigration schemes in which he was interested. He was much of an adventurer, interested wholly in money making. He came from noble ancestry and his handsome features and pleasant manners made him a general favorite. Queen Anne of England was attracted by him and made him a Baron of England and Landgrave of Carolina. His presence in England was due to his determined purpose to rehabilitate his shattered fortune in the New World, and England offered the avenue to that end. Possibly the Duke of Albemarle had inspired him with some of his own faith in the abounding wealth of this new land. It is certain that these two were closely associated for some time, and it is altogether probable that his purpose to promote an expedition to America was strengthened by this association.

DeGraffenreidt himself could not accompany this expedition, as his purpose was to sail with the colonists he expected from Bern, so he appointed three men to have general supervision of the enterprise and direct its movement. It seems that these men were prominent Carolinians, who at that time happened to be in England. One of the three was probably Lawson, the Surveyor-General.

Solemn services, at which Degraffenreidt was present, were held just prior to the sailing at Gravesend on the Thames. A sermon was preached to the departing colonists, songs were sung and prayers offered—all appropriate to the solemn occasion. The weather was mild when they set sail in January, 1710. For awhile they had pleasant sailing, but encountering severe storms they were much delayed, and after thirteen weeks they landed greatly depleted in number and with vitality and enthusiasm considerably reduced. More than half their number died on this voyage. Much of their worldly store was taken from them by a plundering French navigator who ran across them in crippled condition in the Virginia waters, where they first entered.

Fear of pirates and uncertain information as to the perilous bars which run along the eastern coast of North Carolina determined them on the land expedition to North Carolina rather than the water, and so they moved southward from Virginia, coming by way of Colonel Pollock's place on the Chowan River. Crossing the sound they entered Bath County and continuing southward they finally reached the land lying between the Neuse and Trent rivers, called by the Indians "Chattawka."

Lawson's character seems to have been bad—very bad, as was developed early in the history of this colony. Thoroughly mercenary and unscrupulous, he seems only to have aimed at selfish aggrandizement. Without any right to it, he laid claim to the land between the Neuse and the Trent and sold it to his gullible fellow travelers at a high price, and upon the assurance that it was uninhabited. They soon found they had bought from this primitive land speculator the homes of Indians. King Taylor, the Indian chief, some time afterwards sold this land to DeGraffenreidt.

The condition of these colonists soon became desperate. These "poor Palatines," with perfect faith in him, had committed their money to DeGraffenreidt before leaving England. They were reduced to real want some time prior to the arrival of the Swiss and had disposed of most of their clothing and goods to obtain things necessary to life. The Swiss in the meantime had sailed to Newcastle in England, where they were joined by DeGraffenreidt and then had started on their voyage to America. This was early in the summer of 1710.

The movement of the Swiss this way was caused by an embarrassing situation in their country brought about by their own generous treatment of the persecuted Protestants during the Reformation. Switzerland during this period offered a refuge to them and in large numbers they fled there to escape persecution in England, France and the Netherlands. Knox and Calvin found an asylum here. Thousands found shelter from pitiless religious persecution in these friendly cantons. A powerful strain upon the generous accommodation of the Swiss resulted. By agreement Bern was to give succor to one-half of the refugees. The Protestant cantons opened wide their doors to the persecuted ones and soon found their ability to give aid considerably overtaxed.

In 1687 the Swiss confederation sent petitions to Brandenburg, Hesse and Holland, asking that aid be given Switzerland in taking care of the exiles of the Reformed church. In this year eight thousand Protestant refugees entered Geneva. Twenty-eight thousand had passed through in search of a place of safety. Dispite the aid received from the French Protestant Refugee Fund and amounts raised in various ways for their support, they became a heavy burden upon the Swiss. Religious wars added a most distressing feature.

Not only did the hospitable cantons begin to cast about for some place where these people might be settled to the advantage of the refugees as well as to their own comfort, but the unsatisfactory religious situation impelled many Swiss to leave their country and seek homes elsewhere. This offered then the field for the exercise of DeGraffenreidt's cunning, and afforded just the material he needed in the prosecution of his colonization scheme. We have seen how he had joined the band secured from Switzerland which came by way of Holland, and set sail with them in the summer of 1710 for the land across the sea. Probably the number was not large, as only one ship load is known to have come in this expedition. Their voyage was uneventful. Like the Palatines they landed in Virginia and following somewhat the same course as the former expedition, they came southward to Chattawka and found the colony in pitiful plight. Stricken with sickness and in dire need they had well nigh reached the point of desperation.

DeGraffenreidt says of them at that time: "I can not enough insist on the wretched and sorrowful state in which I found these poor people on my arrival—nearly all sick and at the last gasp, and the few who had kept their health despairing entirely." Sickness had not alone weakened their bodies, but had dispirited them.

One can well imagine the cheer and hope which repossessed them when DeGraffenreidt and his followers reached Chattawka. New life was infused into all. DeGraffenreidt assumed leadership and went vigorously to work to improve conditions. According to his statement they in eighteen months "managed to build homes and make themselves so comfortable that they made more progress in that length of time than the English inhabitants in several years."

Things were getting in fair condition for a reasonable degree of comfort for the colonists. The inventive genius of the colonists provided in somewhat crude fashion conveniences and establishments for the enjoyment of a fair degree of comfort and prosperity. Being a Landgrave, DeGraffenreidt had official distinction and influence in the colony, which he used to advantage in the laudable task which engaged him of building up a town with as many conveniences as those primitive times would afford. He named it New Bern.

During the early days affairs went smoothly enough.

Other settlers, mostly English, joined them, purchasing land and uniting with them in developing this land so fresh from the hands of savages.

It is not to be supposed that the Indians saw with entire complacency this beautiful land of theirs between the rivers taken over completely by the strangers. They waited an opportune time, and in September of the second year they fell upon the settlement with barbarous fury and nearly annihilated it. More than a hundred people of this New Bern district were tortured to death by the Indians. DeGraffenreidt and Lawson were not present at the massacre, but they did not escape its brutal influence.

In September of this year (1711) DeGraffenreidt and Lawson went up the Neuse River on a tour of exploration, carrying with them provisions to last them fifteen days. They had with them two negroes, who did the rowing, and two friendly Indians, one of whom spoke English. Information about the country was scant and it was to determine the navigability of the river, the distance of the mountains from them and the possibility of laying out a good road to Virginia that the expedition was undertaken.

No Indians lived along the banks of the river and no danger from them was anticipated. They were, however, captured by the Indians and taken to King Hencock, who was at Catechna, seated in state with his council about him. DeGraffenreidt's golden star, which he wore about his neck, on which was emblazoned his coat of arms, seems to have impressed the Indians with a superstitious dread, and making a friendly agreement with him, they sent him back to New Bern. Lawson had nothing with which to inspire their fears or induce their favor, and so after subjecting him to torture, he was put to death.

Lawson himself might have escaped death had he held his temper under control and avoided the quarrel with Cor Tom, the king of the village. Unheeding DeGraffenreidt's remonstrance he persisted in the quarrel until at last some of the Indians, thoroughly incensed, threw themselves upon the whites and condemned them to death. We have seen how DeGraffenreidt's golden star saved him, but no mystic influence came to the rescue of Lawson, and after horrible torture he was put to death. DeGraffenreidt's journal gives a graphic recital of this adventure. He says:

"One day when the weather was fine and there was good appearance that it would last, Surveyor General Lawson proposed to me to go up Neuse River hunting, that there were plenty of wild grapes there which we could gather for replenishing ourselves. We could see likewise whether the Neuse River could be navigated in its higher course and could visit besides the upper country. I had long been anxious to find how far it is from here to the mountains.

"I accordingly resolved to take the trip, being assured that no savages lived on that branch of the river. But to feel safer we took two Indians to guide, which we knew well, with two negroes to row. So we went peacefully on our way. We had already gone a good two days journey and were near the village of Coram when we met Indians armed as for hunting, and we had hardly turned backwards when such a number came out from the bushes and they overtook us so suddenly that it was impossible to defend ourselves They accordingly took us prisoners and led us away.

"Such a rare capture made them proud; indeed they took me for the Governor of the Province himself and we were compelled to run with them all night across thickets and swamps until we came to Catechna or Hencocks-towne where the King called Hencock was sitting in state.

"The King stood up, approaching us and speaking to us very civilly, and they discussed at last whether we were to be burned as criminals or not. They concluded negatively, inasmuch as we had not been heard as yet, and at midday the King himself brought us to eat a kind of bread called dumplings and venison.

"In the evening there came a great many Indians. The Assembly of the Great, as they called it (consisting of forty elders sitting on the ground around a fire, as is their custom) took place at ten o'clock in a beautiful open space.

"There was in the circle a place set apart with two mats for us, a mark of great deference and honor. We therefore sat upon them and on our left side our speaker, the Indian who had come with us. The speaker of the assembly made a long speech, and it was ordered that the youngest of the assembly should represent the Indian nation, the King putting the question. We were examined very strictly concerning our intentions and why we had come hither. Also they complained very much of the conduct of English colonists and particularly Mr. Lawson, charging him with being too severe and that he was the man who had their lands.

"After having discussed at length they concluded that we should be liberated, and the following day was appointed for our return home. The next morning we were again examined, but one, Cor Tom, being present, the King of Cor village, he reproached Mr. Lawson for something and they began to quarrel with great violence, which spoilt things entirely. Though I made every effort to get Lawson to quit quarreling, I did not succeed.

"All at once three or four Indians fell upon us in a furious manner. They took us violently by the arms and forced us to sit upon the ground before the whole of them there collected. No mats were spread for us. They took our hats and periwigs and threw them into the fire and a council of war being held we were immediately sentenced to death. On the day following we were taken to the place of execution. Before us a large fire was kindled. Whilst some acted the part of conjurers others made a ring around us which they strewed with flowers.

"Behind us lay my innocent negro, and in this miserable situation we remained that day and the subsequent night. I was wholly resolved to die and accordingly offered up fervent prayers during the whole day and night and called to mind as I could remember them even the least sins. I tried and recalled all what I had read in Holy Scripture, in short I prepared myself the best I could to a good and salutary death.

"I found in the meanwhile a great consolation in considering the miracles which our Lord Jesus had made and I addressed forthwith my ardent prayers to my Divine Saviour, not doubting that He would grant them and perhaps change these savage hearts harder than rocks so that they would pardon me—what indeed happened by God's miraculous Providence.

"On the morning of the next day on which we were to die a great multitude was collected to see the execution. Thus began our long tragedy which I would like to tell if it were not too long and dreadful—but—since I begun I will go on. In the center of that great place, we were seated on the ground, the Surveyor-General and myself, bound, and undressed with bare heads, and in front of us a great fire; near it was the conjurer or High Priest (an old grizzled Indian—the priests are generally magicians and can even conjure up the devil), a little further was an Indian savage standing.

"He did not move from the spot with a knife in one hand and an axe in the other. It was apparently the executioner. Around us sat the chiefs in two rows; behind them were the common people, upwards of three hundred in number—men, women and children with faces painted red, white and black, who were jumping and dancing like so many devils and cutting a variety of infernal capers.

"Behind us stood armed Indians as guards, who stimulated the dancers by stamping with their feet and firing their guns. Yes indeed, never was the devil represented with a more frightful appearance than these savages presented as they danced around the fire. I uncovered my soul to my Saviour Christ Jesus and my thoughts were wholly employed with death. At length, however, I recollected myself and turning to the council of chiefs made a short discourse, assuring them that the great Queen of England would avenge my death.

"I further stated whatever I thought fit to induce them to some mitigation. After I had done speaking I remarked that one of the notables (who was a relative of King Taylor, from whom I bought the land where New Bern now stands) that notable spoke earnestly, apparently in my favor, as it came out. Then it was forthwith resolved to send a few members to their neighbor, a certain King Tom Blunt of the Tuscaroras. The result was as will be seen that I was to live and that poor Surveyor-General Lawson was to be executed. Thus God in his mercy heard my prayers.

"I spent that whole night in great anguish awaiting my fate, in continuous prayers and sighs. Meanwhile I also examined my poor negro, exhorting him the best way I knew—and he gave me more satisfaction than I expected—but I left Surveyor-General Lawson to offer his own prayers as being a man of understanding and not over religious.

"Towards three or four o'clock in the morning the delegates came back from their mission and brought an answer, but very secretly. One or two of them came to unbind me; not knowing what this meant I submitted to the will of the Almighty, rose and followed him as a poor lamb to the slaughter. Alas! I was much astonished when the Indians whispered in my ear that I had nothing to fear but that Lawson would die, what affected me much.

"They also liberated my negro, but I never saw him since. I was forbidden to speak the least word to Mr. Lawson. He took accordingly leave of me and told me to say farewell in his name to his friends. Alas! It grieved me much to leave him thus. I tried to show my compassion by a few signs.

"Some time after the man who had spoken in my favor led me to his cabin, where I was to be kept awaiting further orders. In the meantime they executed the unfortunate Lawson. As to his death I know nothing. Some said he was hung, some said he was burnt. The Indians kept that execution very quiet. May God have mercy on his Soul!

"The next day the notables came to tell me of their design to make war in North Carolina. They advised me that no harm would come to Chattawka (the old name of New Bern), but that the people of the colony ought to go into the town or they could not answer for the evil that could happen. Good words enough, but how was I to let the people know, since none would take a message for me? A few days later the savages came back with their booty. Alas! what a sight for me to see, men women and children prisoners. The very Indian with whom I lodged happened to bring with him the boy of one of my tenants and much clothing and furniture, which I well knew. Alas! what was my apprehension that my whole colony was ruined, especially when I had privately questioned the boy. He cried bitterly and told me how this same Indian had savagely killed his father, mother and brother, yes his whole family. I had to remain six weeks a prisoner in this hateful place Catechna. I was once much perplexed. All men had gone to that plundering expedition, the women some to gather wild cherries, others to dig some kind of roots called 'potatoes,' which are yellow, very good and dainty. On that day I was alone by myself in that village. * * * I accordingly said my prayers and then examined the pro and con as to whether I should take flight or not, and found at last it was best to stay. Experience showed that I made a wise choice. * * * The barbarous expedition being ended, on the Sunday following their great Indian festival I having concluded a treaty of peace with these people, they brought me a horse. Two notables escorted me to Cor Village, gave me a piece of Indian bread and then left me.

"Thus have I escaped from the cruel hands of this barbarous nation, the Tuscaroras. Thence I had to foot it homeward. Quite lame, shivering with cold, nearly dead—my legs so stiff and swollen that I could not walk a step, but supported myself on two sticks, at last I arrived at my small home in New Bern.

"When my good people saw me coming from afar, tanned like an Indian, but on the other hand considered my blue jerkin and my figure—they knew not what to think—the men even took up their arms, but when I came nearer quite lame, walking with two sticks, they knew by my look that I was not a savage. When I saw them so puzzled I began to speak with them from afar. They hallowed to the others to come, that it was their Lord returned whom they thought to be dead. And so all came in crowds, men, women, and children, shouting and crying out, part of them weeping, others struck dumb with surprise. Thus I was at last at home and in my private room, gave ardent thanks to the Good God for my miraculous and gracious rescue."

DeGraffenreidt does not seem to have remained with the colony a great while after this. His experience in America saddened his life and this latest and most frightful adventure probably influenced his determination to return home. Whatever his personal shortcomings he seems to have labored earnestly from his first landing at New Bern with the Bernese in 1710 to build up a happy and prosperous community.

The spirits of the colonists, from drooping, became elated as their crops began to mature in 1711. Hope repossessed them and their early visions of peace and plenty seemed in fair way of being realized. This, as we have seen, was short lived, for the merciless savages massacred eighty of their number and carried off as prisoners quite a number. During the rest of the period of warfare New Bern escaped further trouble of a serious nature. The treaty which DeGraffenreidt had made with his Indian captors was respected and, the settlement remaining neutral, it escaped further harm during the four years the war continued.

DeGraffenreidt, tired of his labors here and probably disheartened at the prospect, sold his large interests to Thomas Pollock for eight hundred pounds and returned to Switzerland. He never again set foot on this soil, but some of his descendants remained in this country. There are some in Georgia who trace their ancestry to Christopher DeGraffenreidt.

While the town of New Bern, through DeGraffenreidt's treaty with the Indians, remained unmolested, the surrounding country came in for its share of the brutal incidents of Indian warfare. Concerted action was necessary to put an end to the war. The colonists were thoroughly aroused. Governor Hyde called out the militia of North Carolina and the Legislature of South Carolina raised six hundred militia and three hundred and sixty Indians (Wheeler's History) who, under the command of Colonel Barnwell, came through the forest from South Carolina and joined the North Carolina militia on the Neuse. The Indians were fortified on the banks of the Neuse, eighteen miles west of New Bern (1712). The Indians were defeated, more than three hundred of them killed and one hundred taken prisoners. The lines of the old fort can still be seen by the visitor to this spot, which is near the enterprising village which takes its name from the fort—Fort Barnwell.

When quiet came again and the colonists, relieved of the exacting requirements of Indian warfare, could turn their attention to the arts of peace prosperous times came and the spirit of real enterprise began to make itself felt. Emigration from the old world emptied frequently new comers into the town, ships found it a favorable harbor and it soon became a trade center of considerable importance. The town had been laid off in 1710 and grew up according to those lines. Settlements sprang up in the county adjacent to it.

A colony of Welsh Quakers, numbering among them some who afterwards attained prominence, settled below New Bern about midway between New Bern and what is now Morehead City. German immigrants came to New Bern in 1732, but moved up Trent River and established themselves in what is now Jones County, then a part of Craven.

Modern railroad development has made the crossing of Albemarle Sound a simple matter, but in those early days it offered a serious obstacle to the social, political and business intercourse between the different colonies, and in 1738 the General Assembly moved its place of meeting to New Bern, which was a change in the interest of convenience. With the increase of population and the mixture of nationalities the Palatines and Swiss became scattered (quite a number of them left the colony after the Indian massacre of 1711) and lost their distinctive organization.

In 1715 franchise was granted the town and in 1723 it was incorporated. It included then within its limits 250 acres. A provision of the law of incorporation, sec. 7th, reads:

"If any person or persons shall die possessed of any said lots without leaving heir or without making a will of the said lot, then and in such case the absolute fee to the same shall come and revert to the said Cullen Pollock, his heirs and assigns forever."

Authentic record of the period up to the Revolutionary War is deplorably scant, but enough is available to gain a fair idea of the customs which prevailed and the spirit of the times. The minute book of the Court of Quarter Sessions is preserved in the vault of the Clerk of the Court and from its pages some interesting facts are gathered and here reproduced. Some of the writing is as clear and distinct as when put upon its pages nearly two centuries ago. That a generous and kindly spirit toward the weak and unprotected animated our fathers is clearly shown by a reading of some of the minutes of that court. A Christian spirit, too, at times shows itself and the language of the Bible is sometimes followed. The close union of church and state is evidenced in some of the minutes.

The minutes of March 20, 1740, has the following: "Mr. Philip Trapnell appears and delivers up an infant boy named Joseph Waters to this court. Ordered that the constable next in that neighborhood take the said boy into his custody and bring him to the vestry next Easter morning."

Again another minute the same month reads: "An infant about 9 years of age is brought into court. The court thought fit to bind her out to William Charlton till she come to the age of 16 years and the said Charlton gives securities for his good performance during the time she shall remain with him as follows: that he is to do his endeavor to teach her or cause her to be taught to read the Bible."

Their jealous oversight of the orphans is shown again in the minute, September, 1742, as follows: "Ordered that every master or mistress of orphans within this County bring a certificate from a neighboring justice to satisfy the court of their welfare."

The tender quality does not seem to be betrayed in the following entry made September 19, 1740: "Mary Magee appears in court. Ordered that she be stripped her clothes to her waste and receive 12 lashes on her bare back at the public whipping post." The records do not show what the charge against her was. In the light of our present civilization this action seems inexcusable, but the consciences of the judges of that day approved the punishment as doing the will of God.

Undoubtedly, too, the repressive measures exercised against those who dissented from the established church had their foundation in the firm conviction that all who refused to worship God according to the prescribed form of the English church were doing evil and would do violence to the civil as well as the church government. The following minute, taken from the record of June 20, 1740, shows how dissenters were dealt with:

"A motion and petition made by a sect of decenting people called Baptists that they may have the liberty to build a house of worship and being duly examined by the court acknowledged to, all the articles of the church of England except part of the 27 and 36 they desiring to preach among themselves. Referred."

Just before the last word two words are partially obscured by a line drawn through them. Enough, however, is seen to read the words, "but rejected."

Another record, September 22, 1740, reads: "The following dissenting Protestants appeared viz: John Brooks, John James, Robert Spring, Nicholas Purefoy and Thos. Fulcher came into court and took the oath of allegiance and supremacy and subscribed the test the 39 articles of Religion being distinctly read to them the following of which they dissented from to wit: the 36th, and the latter part of the 27th."

The fact that the English church today as well as the other Protestant churches thoroughly discountenance such infringement of the liberty of the citizen evidences marked evolution of religious thought which seems to have kept pace with the progress of democratic ideas everywhere.

Progress in every line continued to the time of the Revolution. During this period New Bern was properly regarded as the center of culture as well as political power. In 1749 James Davis set up in New Bern the first printing establishment in North Carolina, and three years later the first book printed in North Carolina came from his press. This contained the revised laws of the State, and from the color of the binding became known generally as the "Yellow Jacket."

The writer could not within the necessarily limited compass of this article deal very much with detail. Those things which concern the State are recorded too meagerly for an extended writing and those matters of purely local interest would fill a bulky volume if the task of their recital was attempted. I have sought faithfully to give in general outline the early history of Craven County and have called from the store of local incidents just enough to give some idea of the life and thought of a people who have through the years held tenaciously to the principle of liberty and developed a quality of citizenship unexcelled by any people of any time.

JACOB MARLING, AN EARLY NORTH CAROLINA ARTIST

BY MARSHALL DeLANCEY HAYWOOD.

In the Old Cemetery in the city of Raleigh, North Carolina, where so many of the "rude forefathers of the hamlet sleep," there is an upright stone on which is a brief inscription as follows:

IN MEMORY OF
J. MARLING.
Died December 18th, 1833,
Aged 59 Years.

This marks the resting-place of an early citizen of Raleigh who enjoyed some local celebrity as a landscape and portrait painter at a period when North Carolina artists were even less numerous than now. Mr. Marling was born in the year 1774, but we are not informed as to the place of his birth. It is probable that the time of his coming to Raleigh was 1818; for, in August of that year, he announced (under the firm name of J. Marling & Co.) the opening of what he called "The North Carolina Museum." This institution stood on the northeastern corner of Fayetteville and Martin streets, about where the Citizens National Bank is now located. It was in reality a public library and reading room, as well as a museum, for his advertisement in the Raleigh Register, August 14, 1818, says:

"As the plan embraces a reading room, where most of the principal newspapers, literary works, reviews, etc., are regularly filed, it is confidently believed that it will afford an agreeable and useful place of resort. Natural and artificial curiosities, sketches, maps, drawings and paintings, rare coins and books, will be thankfully received and added to the collection, with the name of the liberal donor appended to them."

By way of a postscript to the above notice it is added: "General Calvin Jones has obligingly transferred the whole of his collection to this institution." This General Jones owned a plantation some miles north of Raleigh, on which Wake Forest College now stands, and he afterwards removed to Tennessee. He was a physician and scientist, a veteran of the War of 1812, and Grand Master of the Masonic Grand Lodge of North Carolina from December 8, 1817, till December 16, 1820. After the Museum in Raleigh had suspended operations, the collection of natural history specimens loaned to it by General Jones was donated by that gentleman to the University of North Carolina, of which institution he was a trustee for thirty years. In his History of the University of North Carolina, Doctor Battle refers to this collection, saying that some of the articles therein are probably still owned by the University, though they would be difficult to identify.

The price charged those who patronized Mr. Marling's museum and library was twenty-five cents for one admission, and five dollars for a season ticket. How long the institution remained in operation we are unable to ascertain, but it was abandoned prior to the year 1824, at which time Bishop Ravenscroft rented the hall for the congregation of Christ Church, which parish then had no house of worship of its own.

After settling in Raleigh, Mr. Marling became well known as an artist. Aside from his occupation as a painter, he seems also to have been an instructor in art at the old Raleigh Academy during a part of the time when that institution was presided over by the Reverend William McPheeters, D.D., an eminent Presbyterian divine, one of whose assistants then was George Washington Freeman, who later took orders in the Episcopal Church and eventually became Missionary Bishop of the Southwest.

The best known product of Mr. Marling's brush is a painting of the old State Capitol (a building burned in 1831), with the Bank of New Bern shown in the background. This painting is now in the North Carolina State Library, having been loaned by its present owner, Dr. Fabius J. Haywood, for whose grandfather (State Treasurer John Haywood) it was originally painted at some time prior to the year 1820. It may be that a copy of this painting, made in 1819 by one of the pupils of Mr. Marling, is still preserved somewhere in the State of Georgia, for the Raleigh Star, of June 18, 1819, in describing commencement exercises at the Raleigh Academy, said:

"Two views, one of the State House, Bank, and a part of Newbern Street in Raleigh, and one of a field, copse of wood, etc., in the neighborhood of this city, copied by Miss Lavinia Richardson, of Georgia, from the original paintings of Mr. Marling, are fine specimens of art which do equal credit to the genius and industry of the copyist. The other pupils are young artists who have not greatly improved their talents. However, two landscapes and a flower, by Jemima Powell, two landscapes and a sea piece by Mary Bell, one flower by Laura Wray, and three flowers by Catherine E. Clark, all painted, are favorable specimens of the skill of the respective artists. The dignity of landscape painting was probably assigned to superior attainments in this art."

One of the sins to which Mr. Marling was addicted was a fondness for playing cards when money was at stake; and an amusing anecdote has floated down the years, which have elapsed since that period, concerning a remark he made in excusing himself for leaving a game which was in progress. He and some of his friends had started playing early in the evening and sat at the table until after 4 o'clock the following morning, when Mr. Marling arose to leave just as day was breaking. Upon being urged to stay, he insisted that it was time for him to go home, remarking as he walked out: "Gentlemen, I must leave; Mrs. Marling will be waiting tea."

Mr. Marling died in Raleigh on the 18th of December, 1833. An obituary in the Raleigh Register, of December 24th, was as follows:

"DIED: In this city on the 18th instant, after a long and painful illness, Mr. Jacob Marling, whose fine taste and skill as a portrait and landscape painter are extensively known, aged about 60 years, leaving a widow and numerous friends to lament his loss."

A similar notice appeared in the Raleigh Star of December 27th. Mrs. Marling survived her husband quite a number of years, and is still remembered by some of the oldest citizens of Raleigh. At the time of her death, or shortly before that, she was the owner of a large painting called "The May Queen," and possibly other works of art produced by her husband, but I am not advised what became of them. Indeed, Mrs. Marling herself was a woman of some artistic talent and had a class which she taught painting upon silk, velvet, and glass. This proving unprofitable, she later went into the millinery business, and probably was so engaged until old age necessitated her retirement. She died soon after the close of the War between the States.

SOCIAL CONDITIONS IN NORTH CAROLINA IN 1783

BY S. A. ASHE.

(Being the opening chapter of the second volume of the History of North Carolina.)

Social conditions in North Carolina in the year 1783, the year of peace and independence, were Acadian in their simplicity. The commonwealth, extending far into the wilderness, numbered some 350,000 souls, slave and free, widely scattered, nearly one-tenth beyond the distant mountains; with no city—and indeed only a few villages whose population reached a thousand; as yet commerce, so long interrupted, had not revived; there were no manufactures, save the work of the men and women in their homes; no currency; poor markets and only bad highways; no newspapers, and not a single printing press; but few schools, and religious instruction but scantily supplied;—in a word, with nought but freedom and farm products, manhood and energy.

Nor were the people entirely united in the bonds of amity and friendship. Probably a full third of the white population had not espoused the cause of separation and independence. Early in the struggle a considerable number, unwilling to take the test oath, had, under the stringent laws of the state, been forced from their homes and had sought shelter abroad. Later, when Hamilton, a Scotch merchant, and MacLeod, a Scotch minister, arranged for the formation of a loyal regiment, many repaired to the King's standard. From time to time others joined this regiment; but between the suppression of the Royalists at Moore's Creek, followed quickly by the defeat of the British fleet at Charleston, and the appearance of Fanning on the upper Cape Fear in 1780, there was a period of comparative repose, during which the disaffected adjusted themselves to the prevailing conditions. The Assembly, session after session, postponed putting into full operation the confiscation acts, and, practicing tolerance and conciliation, allowed the Tories to remain unmolested, classing them, along with the Quakers, as "non-jurors," but imposing special taxes on them.

The bridge between a "non-juror" and a "good and true citizen" was opened and made easy to cross; and along with Rev. George Micklejohn, James Hunter, Dr. Pyle and many other conspicuous Tories who soon took the test oath, men of smaller consequence resumed association and fellowship with their Whig neighbors. But the harrowing events of 1781, when the malcontents under McNeil and Fanning, established a reign of terror in the Cape Fear region, put an end to toleration. The inhumanities and butcheries of the closing years of the long struggle left an indelible mark on the social conditions of the State. Fierce resentment and implacable hatred took possession of the contending factions; and when the British army withdrew many of the Tories departed, some going to Florida and some to Nova Scotia, where the negroes carried off by the British also were located, while others sought new homes in the distant west, even crossing the mountains and establishing themselves in the outskirts of the western settlements. It was in that period of rancorous animosity that the former policy of conciliation was abandoned and measures were taken to enforce the confiscation laws; and thus when blessed peace came there were mingled with the pæans of victory loud execrations of the hated Tories.

The waste of the war had not yet been overcome. Especially in the Cape Fear counties had the destruction been great; and so many families there were in dire need that by a general law they were to be exempt from the payment of taxes in the discretion of the county justices. Elsewhere the inhabitants were suffering because of the absence of markets and of facilities to dispose of the products of their industry, but the people were measurably inured to their situation and had been so long accustomed to their privations that they scarcely realized the hardships. They had known nothing better.

Life offered no field for activity but on the farm and in the forests; and clearing new land and making forest products were the only openings for energy and enterprise.

During the war to supply the necessities of the people as well as the needs of the army, bounties had been freely offered to stimulate manufactures, but when the occasion had passed the bounties ceased. Yet the looms were still busy, skins were tanned, and furs secured from otters and beavers, and shoemakers and hatters plied their trades.

At that period factories had not been erected anywhere in America; there were no power looms, and only the spinning jenny and hand weaving were in use, and nails were still made by hand. But so industrious were the people in their homes that many districts not only clothed themselves, but had a surplus of cotton, linen and woolen cloths for sale.

In the tidewater regions where naval stores abounded, men found profitable employment in making tar, pitch, and turpentine, of which the mercantile world stood in great need, while lumber and staves were always in demand for the West Indies. In Colonial days trade with the British Islands in the Caribbean sea had brought in a liberal supply of specie; but when the State separated herself from the British empire the restrictive navigation laws obstructed that commerce. Yet England soon fostered shipments to her own ports, and the London merchants hastened to send their goods to markets that were bare of foreign manufactures.

The great forests of the State, so rich in products, were virtually unbroken. While near the coast and in the Albemarle region there were some large plantations, in the interior the holdings were smaller, and the clearings were only such as were needed for cultivation. Generally every man owned his land, and, as there was no labor for hire, tilled his own fields. Back from the markets where there was a surplus of corn and grain, hogs and cattle were raised and driven on foot for sale. Also in some communities grain was converted into whiskey, and the fruits of the orchard into brandy.

Agriculture, the chief occupation of the inhabitants, had long received intelligent application, and despite adverse conditions presented examples of thrift and skill. At the east rice and indigo were grown, as well as flax and cotton; while along the water courses, lumber and staves and naval stores were produced. In the upper country where the soil and climate were suitable tobacco and the cereals were cultivated, and clover was not unknown. Mr. Hooper, a lawyer rather than a farmer, wrote to his merchant at Edenton, "Send me a barrel of clover seed."

But transportation facilities were sadly lacking; and back from the rivers the want of good roads was a serious drawback. Public highways had been laid out connecting the back country with the several market towns of the east, but they could not be maintained in good condition, and the Northwestern counties found it more convenient to trade with Virginia towns, and the Southwestern with Charleston. The exports were tobacco, tar, pitch, turpentine, potash, staves, lumber, rice, and provisions, all of these except alone tobacco being the products of the east. Indeed, transportation to market involved such an expense as to largely deprive the products of the distant interior of their value.

Necessarily all sales of products were made to merchants, who established themselves at convenient points in the interior, and setting their own prices, made great gains by their bargains.

Of money there was none; the State as well as the Continental currency had ceased to have value, and to express utter worthlessness the phrase was coined—"not worth a continental." Money is not only of value in itself, but it is the standard by which the value of other things is measured and the chief instrument of commerce by which exchanges are made, and the very foundation stone of credit. When the State and Continental paper fell, there was virtually no specie in circulation. Neither gold nor silver had been found in any of the colonies, and the entire country was dependent on such foreign coin as could be obtained for commodities, and there were but few commodities to send abroad. The people were indeed without a currency. In the extremity recourse was again had to an issue of State bills. At the April meeting of the Assembly a proposition to emit new bills, matured by William Blount, met with general concurrence. To give the issue a footing of substantial value a special tax was levied to redeem it, and its redemption was further secured by a pledge of all the confiscated property of the Tories held by the State. The currency of the Revolution had been dollars to distinguish it from Colonial issues; and now to emphasize that the new issue was on a distinct footing, it was in pounds and shillings, the pound being of the value of two and a half silver dollars. The shilling was the same as the Spanish "bit," later twelve and a half cents. The amount was conservatively limited to a hundred thousand pounds.

There were no buggies, but few coaches, and traveling was on horseback, men riding their own horses hundreds of miles, and the women seldom visiting out of their neighborhood. The assembly had established no mail facilities, but the post route opened at the beginning of the Revolution, along the coast, passing through Edenton and New Bern and Wilmington, had been continued by Congress and was still in operation, but there were no post ridings to the interior. Letters were sent by hand. Without means of communication, the dissemination of intelligence among the people was slow and unreliable. Information about current affairs was acquired by conversations at casual meetings, at religious gatherings and the sessions of the county courts. Indeed, these quarterly courts had no inconsiderable educational value. More than any other instrumentality they kept the people in touch with civilization. In every district of each county there were two or more justices of the peace, and constables, and often a deputy sheriff. The justices were men of responsibility and approved character, and around them centered a strong personal influence. They met quarterly at the court-house and administered the public affairs of the county. They laid taxes, appointed officers, provided for the poor, looked after the orphans, and the settlement of estates of deceased persons. They laid off roads, appointed the overseers and directed the construction of bridges. In a word they exercised all the powers of government in matters of local interest in the several neighborhoods of the county. Also, they tried offenses against the law and civil suits between litigants. Necessarily they were attended by many jurors, witnesses and parties interested in their proceedings. Others with no particular business likewise attended from a desire of intercourse with fellow-men; and so those occasions thus drew great crowds together, and at such times private accounts were settled, trades were made, and ordinarily there was much swapping of horses, and occasional trials of speed, for the people dearly loved a horse race; also, there were more or less drinking and carousing, and contests, friendly and otherwise, of personal prowess. It was always a field day when court met. But apart from the social side of such meetings, in addition to these opportunities of social intercourse, there was a distinct value in training the people in respect for law, and in educating them in local administration, in legal processes and in matters of public concern. Many a man who could read no word in a book knew well the common law of the land, knew private rights and wrongs, knew nice distinctions and could weigh with unerring judgment the value of evidence. As deficient in schooling as the Barons of Runnymede, they had intelligence trained by experience into practical wisdom.

Religion, the traditional inheritance of the race, measurably entered into the lives of the people who, however, were generally neither warmly attached to doctrine nor very demonstrative in their zeal. Francis Asbury noted in his Journal in April, 1780, that he preached in Halifax County to about five hundred persons—and "the people were solemnly attentive." A few days later, he found "people were for the ordinances, though not heated." At the Tabernacle, about four hundred attended:—"The people very insensible. I think these people must be awakened by judgment, for it appears the gospel will not do it"; on Sunday at Green Hill, Franklin County, O'Kelly "raised high, and was very affecting, but to little purpose. There are evils here,—the meeting not solemn: the women appeared to be full of dress; the men full of news. The people are gospel slighters: I fear some heavy stroke will come on them." Somewhat later Rev. Henry Patillo, a learned and observant Presbyterian minister, a man of great liberality and thoroughly imbued with a spirit of Christianity, wrote—"As to our young people, and others not well settled in their principles, joining with other professions, and particularly the Methodists, I would just observe that this seems to be the versatile season with America; and a change of religious profession has become almost as common and as little noted as the variations of the weather in this most changeable climate."

This zealous Presbyterian also mentioned having received warm, friendly letters from the Methodists—whose bias naturally was towards the church of England—"expressing their wishes to cultivate a nearer intercourse, and that bigotry might cease among Christians"; nor were the Baptists of a different mind, for he likewise pointed to "the friendly intercourse that subsists between the Baptists and us in all respects, except communion, known and acknowledged by all." Altogether, the picture he presents is free from the baneful spirit of religious intolerance. Indeed no zealous attachment to doctrine can be observed, but, rather, there was an expressed desire of Christian fellowship. Doubtless in those years when the denominations were unorganized and when there was an insuffcient number of ministers, there was a loosening of religious ties and an indisposition to adhere closely to doctrine; but the seeds of piety had been sown and were planted in a fruitful soil, even if they lay dormant for a season.

In colonial days the Church of England had in some measure been organized in the eastern counties, especially near the Virginia line, but, as constituted, upon the declaration of independence it was a solecism and out of place in the colonies. A portion of the National Church of England, with the rubric of the Book of Common Prayer requiring a prayer for the King, it did not fit the new conditions. Its members had been foremost in asserting their political rights, and under their leadership, chiefly, the Revolution had been begun and brought to a successful close. Notwithstanding the separation from England, by them it continued to be regarded as the Apostolic church, and they remained true to their faith and devotedly attached to the rites, ceremonies and practices of "the church." While the position of the laymen was thus peculiar, that of the ministers, being under the jurisdiction of the Bishop of London, was full of embarrassment. One of them, Rev. Mr. Wills, at Wilmington, withdrew from his charge in 1775, although he remained on the Cape Fear and performed the marriage service and perhaps other rites during the war. As the ordination of a new minister could be only by the Bishop of London, no other was then called, and twenty years elapsed before that pulpit was again filled.

At New Bern, Rev. Mr. Reed, although a loyalist, continued to officiate; while the Edenton congregation had the services of Rev. Charles Pettigrew, a warm patriot, in the place of the Rev. Mr. Earl, who, in 1775, retired to his farm in Bertie County, although his sympathies were with the people. Rev. George Micklejohn, the pastor at Hillsboro, who was taken at Moore's Creek, remained in the State and eventually took the test oath, and after peace was a minister in Virginia. The other incumbents are said to have been in sympathy with the Revolution and to have continued their services without interruption. But on the separation from their mother country, there being no method of procuring ordination, the power of the organization to perpetuate itself ceased. In addition to this drawback the association of the church with the English hierarchy and its theoretical connection with the British government were distinct influences adverse to its being regarded with favor by the struggling patriots. Its members were as sheep in a wilderness without a shepherd. The three orders of ministers were essential to its existence, and there was no bishop in America. Naturally it was engulfed in stagnant waters, and years elapsed before it revived. In 1783 in Maryland, it assumed the name of "The Protestant Episcopal Church in Maryland," and that name was adopted by a General Convention held three years later. About the same time the consecration of Bishops was secured; and that deficiency was supplied. But so weak were its adherents in North Carolina that year after year passed without any effort at organization, and when efforts were made, about 1790, they failed of success.

Nor were the other denominations, in the eastern counties, in a much more vigorous condition. Although there were a few Presbyterian congregations on the waters of the Cape Fear, in 1783 there seems to have been no minister of that faith east of Granville. The Baptists, however, were better settled, and there were Baptist ministers, especially in the northern counties, each congregation being separate and independent. Farther west the Baptists were still more flourishing; and there also the Presbyterians were well established, having at the end of the Revolution about a dozen pastors actively at work—men of high repute, and teachers as well as preachers to their flocks. In 1770 Orange Presbytery had been organized, and in 1788 the Synod of the Carolinas was formed. It was in that year that Rev. Mr. Patillo, who was located in Granville, published at Wilmington, Delaware, his volumes of sermons. He also published an interesting volume on geography.

The first Methodist Societies organized in North Carolina looked to Rev. Mr. Wesley as their head, and recognized the authority of the ministers of the Church of England; and, indeed, they were regarded as being within the folds of that church. Dr. Coke was of that communion, and the first Methodist to preach in the State, James Pilmoor, afterwards became an Episcopal minister in New York. Like the Church of England, the Methodists suffered some detriment because of the conflict with the mother country, whence had emanated the influences that established and controlled the societies; but in 1784, at a Conference held at Baltimore, a new, distinct and separate organization was adopted. Yet notwithstanding the Methodists thus severed connection with the Protestant Episcopal Church, Christian fellowship was still maintained.

In 1780 Francis Asbury had traveled through the northern central counties, visiting the societies that had been established, and the year after the new organization he and Dr. Coke held at Green Hill, Franklin County, the first Conference. But despite the zeal and activity of the ministers, the growth of the Methodists, like that of the other denominations, was slow in the State. The people in many communities of the center and east had lived so long without regular ministrations that they had become somewhat indifferent to the formalisms and doctrines of church organizations. The Quakers and Moravians being men of peace, had not suffered much during the war, but rather had reaped the reward of their steady habits and productive industry.

Unhappily, conditions in general were promotive of illiteracy, for educational facilities were meager and insufficient. The proposition to establish a public school in every county, made during Governor Dobbs' administration, had come to naught because some English merchants objected to the issue of currency proposed for that purpose; and Governor Dobbs having omitted to inform the assembly of the particular objection, the obstacle was never removed.

The subject thus passed out of view, and no further effort was made for general education at public expense. There were some private schools, but they were inadequate for the general education of the people. Yet the condition was not so bad but that it could be worse; and apparently it became worse. In 1826 Governor Burton urged on the Assembly: "Many enlightened persons believe that it is more difficult for an individual in ordinary circumstances to obtain for his child, at this time, the common rudiments of education than it was at the period when our constitution was adopted."

Although there was a constitutional provision requiring the establishment of public schools, and also of a university, yet the provision was long inoperative. No general system of public instruction had been introduced anywhere except alone in Massachusetts; and circumstances were adverse to its inauguration in North Carolina. Education by the State has been a development of a more recent period. It was not then demanded by the spirit of the times. The scarcity of money made it difficult to pay taxes, and there was a general reluctance to pay public dues; but more than all, the isolated lives of the separated farmers, residing in sparsely settled neighborhoods, led them to be indifferent to education. Indeed, as Dickson expressed it, "the genius of the people was not adapted to the study of learning and science. The objects they had in view were money and pleasure."

There were no magazines, no newspapers, or story books to stir the mind, to nourish the imagination, to exercise the mental faculties. Acquaintance with the art of reading and writing but little enlarged the horizon of life or added to the zest of living. In that primitive condition of existence, such education as could be obtained was of slight service in the daily routine of farm work, and was not felt to be indispensable, either for its usefulness or as contributing to recreation in the family circle. The labors of the day were not supplemented by intellectual pleasures. A considerable number of the poorer settlers probably had been without the rudiments of an education, and illiteracy was on the increase among that portion of the inhabitants. An essayist, writing of Caswell County, says: "Between 1775 and 1800 a common English education—to read, write and cypher, was obtained by only one-half of the people of that county." Elsewhere it was largely the same. The absence of public schools bore heavily on the social condition of the interior. Yet there were individual efforts to maintain primary schools and even academies. At every session of the Assembly some new academy was incorporated, and trustees appointed to manage its affairs; but necessarily the influence of these was limited largely to the vicinity of the villages where they were situated and to those more prosperous families that had always enjoyed the advantages of education, for in every county and settlement there were then as now, some families of education who knew its value and fully appreciated its beneficial influences, and no sacrifice was accounted too great to obtain it for the children.

In that period of isolation when there was so little room for intellectual effort, the art of letter writing was practiced by few, and, other than the public records, the memorials of the time are scant and meager. Nor has the small stock of what survived the uses of the day been carefully guarded. Williamson, Martin, Murphey, Hooper, and others sought, in succeeding generations, to gather up the scattered fragments for historical purposes, but their collections have all disappeared. McRee later performed a grateful service in publishing the correspondence of Iredell, and, if we may judge from the elegant diction and refined sentiments of that correspondence, even in the darkest hours there were circles here and there throughout the State, of a high order of social culture and literary merit.

Nor were there lacking the beneficial influences attending the order of the Masonic fraternity, which, established early in colonial life, was revived after the war. On the death in 1776, of Grand Master Joseph Montfort, who held under authority of a British commission, the Grand Lodge ceased for twenty years; but in 1787, representatives from ten lodges met at Tarborough, and, setting up an independent authority, elected Samuel Johnston Grand Master. Caswell, Davie and many of the other leading men of the day were members. Since then the Order has always been a factor in the life of the people.

The general tone of society was more democratic and less aristocratic than either in Virginia or in South Carolina. But the form of government, a representative republic, was somewhat calculated to foster a class distinction. The absence of great fortunes tended to suppress social pretensions based on wealth and not founded on personal worth, public service and popular applause; and there was a jealousy of other distinction. An indication of the prevailing sentiment may be gathered from the speedy dissolution of the patriotic order of the Cincinnati. This order was organized in the State by the Continental officers at Hillsborough in October, 1783, General Jethro Sumner being chosen President. In the Assembly, a year later, a petition was presented against the Order by General John Butler, who introduced a bill to render any member of it ineligible to a seat in the Assembly. His measure did not pass, but the opposition to the society was so strong as to control the action of the former Continental officers, to whom it was imputed that they designed to establish themselves as a peerage. On the death of General Sumner, he was succeeded by Colonel John B. Ashe; but after a few years the society informally dissolved. Notwithstanding this democratic tendency, the Assemblymen virtually formed a class of rulers. They were generally men of substance in their counties, who drew around themselves such strong influences that they were almost continuously reelected to their seats. They elected all the great officers, and determined the policy of the State. Doubtless they were not inattentive to public opinion, which, however, they exercised a great power in forming; and although advocates of a democracy, they were measurably the ruling class in the State. It is much to their credit that legislation was sound, liberal and judicious, and the Assembly always responded to suggestions tending to the general welfare. In addition, it may be said that the Assembly generally recognized merit, and there was a liberality of sentiment illustrated in the election to high office of men but recently settled in the State and unsupported by great family influence.

The need of a printing press was keenly felt, and in the summer of 1783 Robert Keith set up one at New Bern, and in August he issued the first number of the North Carolina Gazette. There had been no newspapers published in the State in several years and the advent of this was hailed with interest and satisfaction. The office was "near the church, where the subscriptions, essays and articles of intelligence are gratefully received." It was on a demy sheet, with clear type, and was offered for three Spanish milled dollars per annum. One of the printer lads was Francis Xavier Martin, a French boy, who had been stranded at New Bern. Connected with his printing office, Keith opened a book store and offered to the public Edwards on Original Sin, Baker on the Divine Attributes, a choice collections of Hymns; and, for the use of schools, Testaments, spelling books, primers and writing paper. Quills alone were used for writing. The opening of a print shop speedily led to publications. No longer was it necessary for the pamphleteers to circulate their manuscripts by sending them from town to town by trusty messengers to secure safe delivery and preservation.

In the fall, Judge Spencer, over the signature of Atticus, printed an article on the Constitution, probably discussing the Loyalist, and John Hay, as Tiberius Gracchus, put out in a six penny pamphlet an essay which in manuscript he had read to a coterie of admiring friends, ridiculing the Assembly and so violently assailing Judge Sitgreaves that Keith had to divulge the author's name, resulting in a personal altercation. Then Hay and the Bench drifted apart. There quickly followed a war in which Cusatti, Sully, The Citizen, and The True Citizen bore their parts; also Germanicus. The Citizen was imputed to Judge Williams and Richard Henderson, the polishing touches being given by Governor Martin.

But one printing office did not suffice, and in March, 1784, another weekly was begun at Halifax; and perhaps one, also, at Hillsboro;—and so disputants had several instruments of warfare. No one would have entered with greater zest and more caustic pen into these literary controversies than the brilliant Irishman, Dr. Burke; but his race was run. In December, 1784 that choice spirit passed away. His friend Hooper thus announced his melancholy fate: "Dr. Burke died about a fortnight since and fell, in some measure, a sacrifice to the obstinacy which marked his character through life. Laboring under a complication of disorders, oppressed with the most agonizing pains, which for months had deprived him of his natural rest; and to sum up his misery, no domestic prop to lean upon—no friend or companion at his home to soothe the anguish of his mind or mitigate the pain of his body—was not death to him a comforter, a friend and physician?"

At the peace, there were about a hundred thousand slaves in North Carolina and five thousand free negroes. The location of the colored element of population was an incident of settlement. The western counties were settled chiefly by immigrants coming overland from Pennsylvania. These were accompanied by no negroes; and so, few Africans, relatively, were to be found at the west. Near the northern line as far as Surry, the settlement was largely from Virginia and the planters brought their negroes with them. Along the coast, including Brunswick and New Hanover, negroes were comparatively numerous; but farther in the interior, where immigrants direct from Europe located, there were not so many. The free negroes were found chiefly in the older counties, where indeed there were more blacks than elsewhere. In 1790 Halifax returned 6,506 slaves and 446 free negroes. Northampton and Bertie together, 9,650 slaves and 751 free negroes. In New Hanover and four adjacent counties there were 10,116 slaves and 215 free negroes. In Iredell, 846 slaves and 3 free negroes. In colonial times free negroes paid taxes like the whites, but could not vote. They lived apart and were not allowed free intercourse with the slaves.

Slaves descended as other property. The master's right to rule was complete; but while he could punish, he could not take the life of a slave. Slaves could have no right to any property—but no one could interfere with them except the owner. They were amenable to the law for offenses, but the masters often protected them from punishment when charged with minor offenses; when one was executed, the owner was allowed his value, but in 1786 this practice was discontinued. They lived on their master's premises; and he was required to provide for their necessities; to care for them in sickness and in age.

Slaves generally were not allowed to use firearms, but the county court, on application of the owner, licensed one slave on each plantation to carry a gun for the purpose of protecting the property from depredations. The conduct of the farm, the administration and system of work and of living, was under the regulation of the master. Some slaves were taught to be carpenters, wheelwrights, blacksmiths, coopers and shoemakers, and the women to spin and weave. Often the farm raised its own wool and cotton, tanned its own leather, had its smithy and shop for wood work, and made its own shoes and clothing. In all this work, as well as in all farm work, some negroes were trained and skilled. Generally the farm or plantation was managed by the master, and in his absence one of the slaves, as "foreman," supervised the work with orderly precision.

There were but few great estates in North Carolina. In 1790, the largest slaveowner, Cullen Pollok, listed 204; the next largest was Willie Jones, with 120; then Mr. Collins, 113; Peter Mallet, 103; and Governor Samuel Johnson owned 96. Hardly two hundred persons had as many as 50. Largely more than half the people owned none at all, while hundreds possessed only one or two. On the larger plantations the negro families had their separate houses, with small gardens attached, some distance from the mansion; and had such pleasures and recreations as their masters chose to allow. When the number of slaves was small, they lived near the mansion, and were brought into very close association with the white family; and, in effect, all constituted a family. The men were "men of all work," and the women and children were employed about the domicile. This association had an educational advantage and tended distinctly to the elevation of the negro. Whatever there was of beneficence in the institution of African slavery thus had, perhaps, its best development in North Carolina, where the country negroes seem to have attained a somewhat more advanced condition than elsewhere.

Generally, slaves had such opportunities for religious instruction as the condition of the country afforded. Writing in 1788, Rev. Mr. Pattilo remarked that they composed a part of most congregations, and in those under his charge there were 150 negro communicants. Very ignorant, they were at first taken on trial before admitted to baptism or the communion. "In the meantime the black members are very diligent with them, instructing them, and narrowly inspecting their conduct." Most masters indulged their slaves in liberty of conscience, whether religious or otherwise, while "pious masters have great disquiet and vexation from the untractable and incorrigible temper of their slaves." "Of the religious negroes in my congregation some are entrusted with a kind of eldership, so far as to keep a watchful eye over the black members." "The great matter of scandal among the negroes arises from their marriages or matches. Masters are so often selling their slaves, or removing to a distance, that as the creatures generally belong to different masters, they are often parted, or their places of residence become so distant that they can seldom see each other. Many masters, however, will rather exchange or sell, than part husband and wife." "A few can read a plain book, and many more would learn on Lord's Day and sleeping time if they had spelling books, catechisms, Testaments and Watts' hymns, as they are peculiarly fond of singing." At that period there was no legal inhibition against teaching slaves to read and write.

Property right in the person of the African slave was the law of the New World at the time North Carolina was settled. It was a part of the institutions of every community. Incident to it was the slave trade, a commerce that came to be reprobated in America earlier than elsewhere. In every colony, from the earliest times, there were some individuals who were opposed both to slavery and the slave trade. In August, 1774, the Freeholders of Rowan County resolved that: "The African slave trade is injurious to this colony, obstructs the population of it by freemen, prevents manufacturers and other useful immigrants from Europe from settling among us, and occasions an annual increase in the balance of trade against the colony." This declaration was followed a few days later by a resolution of the first Provincial Convention, that "We will not import or purchase any slave brought into this province from any part of the world after the first day of November next." This resolve was observed by the people and enforced by the Committee of Safety. The next year Jefferson's declaration "that all men are created free——" received universal assent, but that evidently had reference to the right to modify governments, and had no bearing on the status of the African slaves in the colonies. Yet the thought was expressed and disseminated. Owners had the right of manumission, and apparently manumissions were multiplied, while the inconveniences of slavery became more pronounced when the struggle for independence began and the British sought to incite both the Indians and negroes to become their allies. At the very first session of the Assembly under the new constitution, "because of the evil and pernicious practice of freeing slaves, at this alarming and critical time, the personal right to manumit was taken away, a license from the County Court being made requisite, and the court was forbidden to grant the license except for 'meritorious services.' "

Notwithstanding the racial difference, the negroes were a part of the population, and could render service—both bond and free. During the war the latter were enrolled in the militia, and performed military service as other freemen. Slaves, like Indians, Hessian deserters and some others, were not to be accepted as substitutes for drafted men; but, with their master's consent, they could enlist; and some did enlist and rendered faithful service as soldiers in the Continental ranks as well as in the State troops. One slave, Ned Griffin, of Edgecombe, having under a promise of freedom served faithfully for twelve months as a Continental, a special act of the Assembly was passed to enfranchise him and "discharge him from the yoke of slavery," and he was declared "a freeman in every respect." As with him, so was it with others; after the Revolution free negroes became freemen in every respect. And thus it came about that they obtained the privilege of suffrage, which they enjoyed until the Constitution was amended in 1835. But their legal status, as well as that of the slave, was anomalous, and the Congress of the United States at its second session excluded them from being enrolled in the militia. Negroes could not give evidence against a white man, and in some respects they were not regarded as citizens. But free negroes had property rights, and generally speaking had all the benefits of the law. Many became men of substance, and they sometimes owned slaves. James Lowry, apparently the progenitor of the outlaw Henry Berry Lowry, was in 1790 the owner of several slaves. Many other free negroes likewise were slave owners. One who had served in the Revolution, John Chavis, not only was a slaveholder but was a school teacher, having among his pupils some boys who afterwards became men of renown. He was also a Presbyterian minister.

After commerce was reopened, slaves were again imported, but in 1786 their importation was declared productive of evil consequences and highly impolitic, and in order to arrest it a tax of ten pounds was laid on the importation of the most able-bodied, with a smaller duty on others. Some of the Northern States had already taken measures to abolish slavery, and their slaves were being sold to Southern planters. North Carolina did not propose to allow this transfer to her territory of negroes who in their own States had the hope of freedom, and by act of assembly it was forbidden to bring into North Carolina any slave from any State that had taken such a step, and should any be imported contrary to that act, they were to be immediately returned to the place from which they were brought. While the institution of negro slavery was thus perpetuated after the Revolution, yet the importation of slaves was regarded as injurious and North Carolina was not favorable to a continuance of the slave trade. The influence of the Quaker element of the population was distinctly against the institution of slavery, and perhaps the prevalence of such sentiments was a natural result of the war itself.

Indeed the Revolution not only called forth many virtues but developed much latent ability. When the war began, says Ramsay, the Americans were a mass of husbandmen, merchants, mechanics and fishermen; but the necessities of the country gave a spring to the active powers of the inhabitants, and set them thinking, speaking, and acting, in a line far beyond that to which they had been accustomed. It seemed as if the war not only required, but created talents. Men, whose minds were warmed with the love of liberty, and whose abilities were improved by daily exercise, and sharpened with a laudable ambition to serve their distressed country, spoke, wrote and acted with an energy far surpassing all expectation which could be reasonably founded on their previous acquirements.

The long years of the struggle had been a period of great intellectual activity, and the creation and administration of government had thoroughly awakened the people and vitalized their energies. Great writers were produced, great thoughts had penetrated the minds of the masses, and heart and soul, body and mind, alike, had been on the rack, and tens of thousands of men, bred in solitude, had moved over the face of the country, every faculty quickened and stimulated and every passion brought often into play. Thus, as in all long and arduous contests, the people emerged from the war, uplifted by the struggle, developed in all their faculties, broader in thought, stronger in action, more resourceful, and with higher powers and nobler aims than before they had suffered the fearful experience; and, besides, they were inspired with a great hope, a great confidence in the future of their country.

ROWAN COUNTY WILLS

COLLECTED BY MRS. M. G. McCUBBINS.

Henry Barkley (Book F, page 18), June 13, 1798. Sons: Robert, James, John, Thomas. Daughters: Mary. Granddaughter: Polly Barkley (the daughter of Thomas). Grandsons: Henry Barkley (son of Robert), James Cowan (son of Thomas Cowan), and Henry Barkley (son of John). Executors: Sons, James and John. Witnesses: William Kilpatrick and Robert Kilpatrick.

ROWAN COUNTY MARRIAGE BONDS.

Adam Mitchell to Elizabeth McMachen. Sept. 12, 1769. Test: Robert Mitchell. (Jno. Frohock).

Benjamin Miller to Mary Hays. Dec. 16, 1769. Test: Joseph Hays. (John Frohock).

Joseph McCammon to Dorcas Holmes. May 9, 1791. Test: George (his X mark) homes.

Barton (his X mark) Miller to ——— Rindleman. Aug. 13, 1766. Test: Chris (his X mark) Rindleman. (Clerk: Thomas Frohock).

Michael McMahan to Patsey Rogers. Jan. 3, 1795. Test: James McMahan.

John Moore to Mary Kinley. Nov. 10, 1795. Test: Francis Gardner. (J. Troy).

Angus McIntosh to Jean McCoy. Oct. 22, 1781. Test: Alexander (his X mark) McCoy. (J. H. McCaule).

Thomas (his X mark) Mace to Mary Bird. Aug. 2, 1796. Test: James Garner. (Ad. Osborn).

John Misenhammer to Catereena Bushard. June 24, 1783. Test: Nicholas Bringle.

Wm. Maffit to Jaynet Tait. Aug. 24, 1788. Test: John Teais.

John Morrison to Francis Wilson. Jan. 12, 1784. Test: Alexander Wilson.

Jesse Aytcheson to Charity Dever. Oct. 27, 1818. Test: Eli Watkins. (R. Powell).

David Miller to Elizabeth Pitts. Nov. 26, 1789. Test: Christian Shroat.

Thomas Mullican to Casig Myers. Dec. 12, 1812. Test: Zadook Jarvis. (Jno. Mark, Sr.).

William Micarn to Mary Garn. Nov. 12, 1812. Test: Abraham Pippinger. (Signed 2 papers). (Geo. Dunn).

Charles McKinzey to Polly Savage. Nov. 9, 1802. Test: Francis Marshall. (A. L. Osborne).

Abner Merrell to Ritter Jones. Oct. 22, 1802. Test: Thomas Gadbury. (Osborne).

Theophilus Morgan, Jr., to Ruth Owens. Aug. 6, 1784. Test: Theophilus Morgan, Sr. (Hugh ———).

Henry McHenry to Martha Morrison. June 21, 1794. Test: David Morrison. (J. Troy).

Robert McFarson to Nelly McNeely. April 7, 1800. Test: Isaac McNeely. (Jno. Chaffins).

Andrew Morrison to Hetty Dickey. Nov. 7, 1809. Test: Robert Morrison. (Geo. Dunn).

Boyd (his X mark) McCreary to Annah Cooper. March 28, 1792. Test: Samuel (his X mark) Lusk.

Neal McGill to Barbara Walk. Feb. 4, 1813. Test: Applin (his X mark) Uslam. (Geo. Dunn).

Isaac Moye to Nancy Bryant. June 9, 1798. Test: James Messer. (M. Troy).

Hugh McCreary to Mary Sluder. Aug. 6, 1787. Test: Reuben Pew. (Jno. Macay).

Hector McIntosh to Mary McCoy. April 10, 1782. Test: William McLeod. (——— Cauley).

John Maffit to Sarah Whitiker. April 13, 1790. Test: John (his X mark) Whitiker. (Basil Gaither).

Thomas (his X mark) Welch to Jane Thomson. Oct. 28, 1772. Test: Jno. (his X mark) Thomson. (Ad. Osborn).

Abednego (his X mark) McAtee to Nancy Moore. Nov. 12, 1796. Test: Rich'd Leach. (——— Rogers).

Benjamin Merrill to Elizabeth Garrett. March 3, 1795. Test: John Wiseman. (I. Troy).

Edward Macan to Mille Cotton. Oct. 10, 1791. Test: Michael (his X mark) Heisler. (Chs. Caldwell).

Mathias Mastin to Sarah Standley. Nov. 6, 1794. Test: Reuben Standley. (Freidrick Miller).

Jacob Misenhammer to Elizabeth Gress. May 3, 1779. Test: John Misenhimer. (Ad. Osborn).

George McCulloch to Elizabeth. Sept. 26, 1799. Test: John Hamton and E. Jay. Osborne.

Fergus McLaughlin to Elizabeth Caruthers. Oct. 22, 1827. Test: Fergus Graham.

INFORMATION

Concerning the Patriotic Society

"Daughters of the Revolution"

The General Society was founded October 11, 1890,—and organized August 20, 1891,—under the name of "Daughters of the American Revolution"; was incorporated under the laws of the State of New York as an organization national in its work and purpose. Some of the members of this organization becoming dissatisfied with the terms of entrance, withdrew from it and, in 1891, formed under the slightly differing name "Daughters of the Revolution," eligibility to which from the moment of its existence has been lineal descent from an ancestor who rendered patriotic service during the War of Independence.

"The North Carolina Society"

a subdivision of the General Society, was organized in October, 1896, and has continued to promote the purposes of its institution and to observe the Constitution and By-Laws.

Membership and Qualifications

Any woman shall be eligible who is above the age of eighteen years, of good character, and a lineal descendant of an ancestor who (1) was a signer of the Declaration of Independence, a member of the Continental Congress, Legislature or General Court, of any of the Colonies or States; or (2) rendered civil, military or naval service under the authority of any of the thirteen Colonies, or of the Continental Congress; or (3) by service rendered during the War of the Revolution became liable to the penalty of treason against the government of Great Britain: Provided, that such ancestor always remained loyal to the cause of American Independence.

The chief work of the North Carolina Society for the past eight years has been the publication of the "North Carolina Booklet," a quarterly publication on great events in North Carolina history—Colonial and Revolutionary. $1.00 per year. It will continue to extend its work and to spread the knowledge of its History and Biography in other States.

This Society has its headquarters in Raleigh, N. C., Room 411, Carolina Trust Company Building, 232 Fayetteville Street.

Some North Carolina Booklets for Sale

Address, EDITOR, Raleigh, N. C.

Vol. I

"Greene's Retreat," Dr. Daniel Harvey Hill.

Vol. II

"Our Own Pirates," Capt. S. A. Ashe.

"Indian Massacre and Tuscarora War," Judge Walter Clark.

"Moravian Settlement in North Carolina," Rev. J. E. Clewell.

"Whigs and Tories," Prof. W. C. Allen.

"The Revolutionary Congresses," Mr. T. M. Pittman.

"Raleigh and the Old Town of Bloomsbury," Dr. K. P. Battle.

"Historic Homes—Bath, Buncomb Hall, Hayes," Rodman, Blount, Dillard.

"County of Clarendon," Prof. John S. Bassett.

"Signal and Secret Service," Dr. Charles E. Taylor.

"Last Days of the War," Dr. Henry T. Bahnson.

Vol. III

"Volunteer State Tennessee as a Seceder," Miss Susie Gentry.

"Colony of Transylvania," Judge Walter Clark.

"Social Conditions in Colonial North Carolina," Col. Alexander Q. Holladay, LL.D.

"Battle of Moore's Creek Bridge, 1776," Prof. M. C. S. Noble.

"North Carolina and Georgia Boundary," Mr. Daniel Goodloe.

Vol. IV

"Battle Ramseur's Mill, 1780," Major Wm. A. Graham.

"Quaker Meadows," Judge A. C. Avery.

"Convention of 1788," Judge Henry Groves Connor.

"North Carolina Signers of Declaration of Independence, John Penn and Joseph Hewes," by T. M. Pittman and Dr. E. Walter Sikes.

"Expedition to Cartagena, 1740," Judge Walter Clark.

"Rutherford's Expedition Against the Indians," Capt. S. A. Ashe.

"Changes in Carolina Coast Since 1585," Prof. Collier Cobb.

"Highland Scotch Settlement in N. C.," Judge James C. MacRae.

"The Scotch-Irish Settlement," Rev. A. J. McKelway.

"Battle of Guilford Court-house and German Palatines in North Carolina," Major J. M. Morehead, Judge O. H. Allen.

Vol. V.—(Quarterly.)

No. 2.

"History of the Capitol," Colonel Charles Earl Johnson.

"Some Notes on Colonial North Carolina, 1700-1750," Colonel J. Bryan Grimes.

"North Carolina's Poets," Rev. Hight C. Moore.

No. 3.

"Cornelius Harnett," Mr. R. D. W. Connor.

"Celebration of the Anniversary of May 20, 1775," Major W. A. Graham.

"Edward Moseley," by Dr. D. H. Hill.

No. 4.

"Governor Thomas Pollok," Mrs. John W. Hinsdale.

"Battle of Cowan's Ford," Major W. A. Graham.

"First Settlers in North Carolina Not Religious Refugees," Rt. Rev. Joseph Blount Cheshire, D.D.

Vol. VI—(Quarterly.)

October, No. 2.

"The Borough Towns of North Carolina," Mr. Francis Nash.

"Governor Thomas Burke," J. G. de Roulhac Hamilton, Ph.D.

"Colonial and Revolutionary Relics in the Hall of History," Col. Fred. A. Olds.

"The North Carolina Society Daughters of the Revolution and its Objects."

Biographical Sketches: Dr. Richard Dillard, Mr. Francis Nash, Dr. J. G. de R. Hamilton and Col. Fred A. Olds, by Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

January, No. 3.

"State Library Building and Department of Archives and Records," Mr. R. D. W. Connor.

"The Battle of Rockfish Creek, 1781," Mr. James Owen Carr.

"Governor Jesse Franklin," Prof. J. T. Alderman.

"North Carolina's Historical Exhibit at Jamestown," Mrs. Lindsay Patterson, Miss Mary Hilliard Hinton.

Biographical Sketches: Mrs. S. B. Kenneday, R. D. W. Connor, James Owen Carr, and Prof. J. T. Alderman, by Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

April, No. 4.

"The White Pictures," Mr. W. J. Peele.

"North Carolina's Attitude Toward the Revolution," Mr. Robert Strong.

"Some Overlooked North Carolina History," J. T. Alderman.

Biographical Sketches: Richard Benbury Creecy, the D. R. Society and Its Objects, Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

Genealogical Sketches: Abstracts of Wills; Scolley, Sprott and Hunter, Mrs. Helen de B. Wells.

Vol. VII. (Quarterly.)

July, No. 1.

"North Carolina in the French and Indian War," Col. A. M. Waddell.

"Locke's Fundamental Constitutions," Mr. Junius Davis.

"Industrial Life in Colonial Carolina," Mr. Thomas M. Pittman.

Address: "Our Dearest Neighbor—The Old North State," Hon. James Alston Cabell.

Biographical Sketches: Col. A. M. Waddell, Junius Davis, Thomas M. Pittman, by Mrs. E. E. Moffitt; Hon. Jas. Alston Cabell, by Mary Hilliard Hinton.

Abstracts of Wills. Mrs. Helen DeB. Wills.

October, No. 2.

"Ode to North Carolina," Miss Pattie Williams Gee.

"The Finances of the North Carolina Colonists," Dr. Charles Lee Raper.

"Joseph Gales, Editor," Mr. Willis G. Briggs.

"Our First Constitution, 1776," Dr. E. W. Sikes.

"North Carolina's Historical Exhibit at Jamestown Exposition," Miss Mary Hilliard Hinton.

Biographical Sketches: Dr. Kemp P. Battle, Dr. Charles Lee Raper, Willis Grandy Briggs, Pattie Williams Gee. By Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

January, No. 3.

"General Robert Howe," Hon. John D. Bellamy.

"Early Relations of North Carolina and the West," Dr. William K. Boyd.

"Incidents of the Early and Permanent Settlement of the Cape Fear," Mr. W. B. McKoy.

Biographical Sketches: John Dillard Bellamy, William K. Boyd, William B. McKoy. By Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

April, No. 4.

"St. James's Churchyard" (Poem), Mrs. L. C. Markham.

"The Expedition Against the Row Galley 'General Arnold'—A Side Light on Colonial Edenton," Rev. Robt. B. Drane, D.D.

"The Quakers of Perquimans," Miss Julia S. White.

"Fayetteville Independent Light Infantry," Judge James C. MacRae.

Biographical Sketches: Mrs. L. C. Markham, Rev. R. B. Drane, Miss Julia S. White, Judge James C. MacRae. By Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

Vol. VIII.—(Quarterly.)

July, No. 1.

"John Harvey," Mr. R. D. W. Connor.

"Military Organizations of North Carolina During the American Revolution," Clyde L. King, A.M.

"A Sermon by Rev. George Micklejohn," edited by Mr. R. D. W. Connor.

Biographical and Genealogical Sketches: R. D. W. Connor, Clyde L. King, Marshall DeLancey Haywood, by Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

"Abstracts of Wills," Mrs. Helen DeB. Wills.

October, No. 2.

"Convention of 1835," Associate Justice Henry G. Connor.

"The Life and Services of Brigadier-General Jethro Sumner," Kemp P. Battle, LL.D.

"The Significance of the Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence," Prof. Bruce Craven.

Biographical and Genealogical Sketches: Judge Henry G. Connor, Kemp P. Battle, LL.D., Prof. Bruce Craven, by Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

January, No. 3.

"The Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence," Mr. A. S. Salley, Jr.

"The Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence," Prof. Bruce Craven.

"Mr. Salley's Reply."

"Mr. Craven's Rejoinder."

Biographical and Genealogical Sketches: Prof. Bruce Craven, Mr. Alexander S. Salley, Jr., by Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

"Patriotic Objects."

"Information Concerning the Patriotic Society D. R."

April, No. 4.

"Unveiling Ceremonies."

"Carolina," by Miss Bettie Freshwater Pool.

"The Battle of King's Mountain," by Dr. William K. Boyd.

"Schools and Education in Colonial Times," by Dr. Charles Lee Smith.

"North Carolina Heroines of the Revolution," by Richard Dillard, M.D.

Biographical and Genealogical Sketches: Bettie Freshwater Pool, William K. Boyd, Charles Lee Smith, Richard Dillard, by Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

Vol. IX.—(Quarterly.)

July, No. 1.

"Indians, Slaves and Tories: Our 18th Century Legislation Regarding Them," Clarence H. Poe.

"Thomas Person," Dr. Stephen B. Weeks.

"Sketch of Flora McDonald," Mrs. S. G. Ayr.

Biographical and Genealogical Memoranda: Clarence H. Poe, Dr. Stephen B. Weeks, Mrs. S. G. Ayr, Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

Abstracts of Wills: Shrouck, Stevens, Sanderson, Shirley, Stevenson, Sharee, Shearer, Shine, Smithson, Sitgreaves, by Mrs. Helen DeB. Wills.

October, No. 2.

"General Joseph Graham," Mrs. Walter Clark.

"State Rights in North Carolina Through Half a Century," Dr. H. M. Wagstaff.

"The Nag's Head Portrait of Theodosia Burr," Miss Bettie Freshwater Pool.

Biographical and Genealogical Memoranda: Mrs. Walter Clark, H. M. Wagstaff, by Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

Abstracts of Wills: Arnold, Ashell, Avelin, Adams, Battle, Burns, Boge, Bennett, by Mrs. Helen DeB. Wills.

January, No. 3.

"History of Lincoln County," Mr. Alfred Nixon.

"Our State Motto and Its Origin," Chief Justice Walter Clark.

"Work Done by the D. R. in Pasquotank County," C. F. S. A.

Biographical and Genealogical Memoranda: Alfred Nixon, Walter Clark, by Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

Abstracts of Wills: Clark, Evans, Fendall, Fort, Gorbe, Gambell, Grainger, Hill, White, by Mrs. Helen DeB. Wills.

April, No. 4.

"Der North Carolina Land und Colonie Etablissement," Miss Adelaide L. Fries.

"George Durant," Capt. S. A. Ashe.

"Hatorask," Mr. Jaques Busbee.

"The Truth about Jackson's Birthplace," Prof. Bruce Craven.

Biographical and Genealogical Memoranda: Miss Fries, Captain Ashe, Professor Craven, by Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

Vols. I, II, III, IV, 25 cents each number.

Vols. V, VI, VI, VIII, IX, 35 cents each number.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

VOLUME X.

		PAGE.
The Chase	By James Sprunt.	3
Art as a Handmaiden of History	By Jaques Busbee.	4-11
Sketch of Colonel Francis Locke	By George McCorkle.	12-21
Unveiling of Tablet at Nixonton, N. C.,	By Mrs. Walker Waller Joynes.	22-25
Address Delivered at Unveiling of Tablet at Nixonton, N. C.	By Former Lieutenant-Governor F. D. Winston.	26-39
A Glimpse of Historic Yorktown	By Mrs. Helen DeB. Wills.	40-42
Colonel Polk's Rebellion	By Capt. S. A. Ashe.	43-47
Was George Durant Originally a Quaker?	By William B. Phelps.	48-51
Illustrations:
From John White's Painting.
From DeBry's Engraving of White's Painting.
House Where Cornwallis Surrendered Yorktown, Virginia.
The History of Orange County, Part I	By Francis Nash.	55-113
The Croatans	By Hamilton McMillan.	115-121
State Aid to Transportation in North Carolina:
The Pre-Railroad Era	By J. Allen Morgan.	122-154
Joseph Hewes and the Declaration of Independence.	By R. D. W. Connor.	155-164
Maps:
Map I.—Distribution of votes in the Senate against the proposed system of State Aid to internal improvement. Journal, December 6, 1815.
Map II.—Distribution of votes in the House for State Aid. Journal, December 12, 1815.
Map III.—Distribution of votes in the Senate against State Aid. Journal, December 10, 1815.
Map IV.—Distribution of votes in the House for State Aid. Journal, December 12, 1817.
Map V.—Distribution of votes in the Senate against State Aid. Journal, December 21, 1819.
Map VI.—Distribution of votes in the House against State Aid. Journal, December 20, 1819.
Map VII.—Distribution of votes in the Senate on a bill in aid of the North Carolina Central, Cape Fear and Yadkin Railroads. Journal, January 13, 1832.

An Address for the Baptism of Virginia Dare,
By Rt. Rev. Joseph Blount Cheshire, D.D. .....
The Early History of Craven County.....By S. M. Brinson. .....
Jacob Marling, an Early North Carolina Artist,
By Marshall DeLancey Haywood. .....
The Social Condition of North Carolina in the Year
1783.....By Captain S. A. Ashe.....
Rowan County Wills and Marriage Bonds,
By Mrs. M. G. McCubbins. .....
Illustration:
Monument to Virginia Dare on Roanoke Island.

TYPEWRITERS

all makes at saving of 25 to 65 per cent from manufacturers' prices.

Our machines are rebuilt by skilled workmen in the largest and most complete typewriter rebuilding factory in the world.

We rent and repair all makes at reasonable prices.

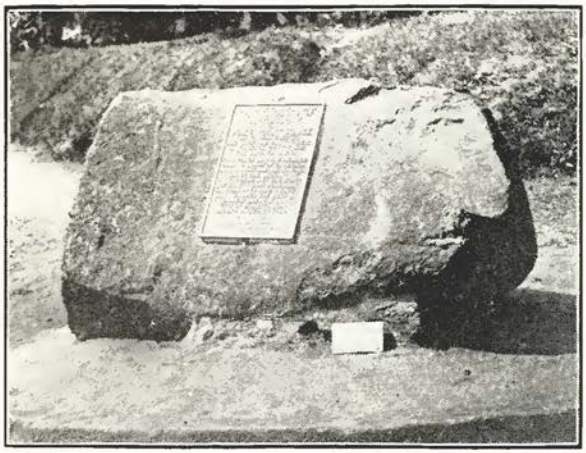
Write for catalogue and price list.

AMERICAN WRITING MACHINE CO.

Atlanta Sales Office

48 North Pryor Street

ATLANTA, - GEORGIA



Tablet and stone marking site of Old Town of Bloomsbury, now Raleigh, N. C., erected by Bloomsbury Chapter D. R. Unveiled April 26, 1911.

Vol. XI JULY, 1911 No. 1

The North Carolina Booklet

"Carolina! Carolina! Heaven's blessings attend her!
While we live we will cherish, protect and defend her."

Published by
THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY
DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION

The object of the Booklet is to aid in developing and preserving North Carolina History. The proceeds arising from its publication will be devoted to patriotic purposes. Editor.

ADVISORY BOARD OF THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET

Mrs Hubert Haywood.
Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.
Mrs. Spier Whitaker.
Mr. R. D. W. Connor.
Dr. D. H. Hill.
Dr. E. W. Sikes.
Mr. W. J. Peele.
Miss Adelaide L. Fries.
Miss Martha Helen Haywood.
Dr. Richard Dillard.
Dr. Kemp P. Battle.
Mr. James Sprunt.
Mr. Marshall DeLancey Haywood.
Chief Justice Walter Clark.
Major W. A. Graham.
Dr. Charles Lee Smith.

EDITOR:
Miss Mary Hilliard Hinton.

OFFICERS OF THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION 1910-1912

REGENT:
Miss MARY HILLIARD HINTON.

VICE-REGENT:
Miss DUNCAN CAMERON WINSTON.

HONORARY REGENTS:
Mrs. SPIER WHITAKER.
Mrs. E. E. MOFFITT.

RECORDING SECRETARY:
Mrs. J. LEIGH SKINNER.

CORRESPONDING SECRETARY:
Mrs. PAUL H. LEE.

TREASURER:
Mrs. FRANK SHERWOOD.

REGISTRAR:
Mrs. JOSEPH CHESHIRE WEBB, Jr.

GENEALOGIST AND HISTORIAN:
Mrs. HELEN DeBERNIERE WILLS.

CUSTODIAN OF RELICS:
Mrs. JOHN E. RAY.

CHAPTER REGENTS

Bloomsbury Chapter.....Mrs. Hubert Haywood, Regent.
Penelope Barker Chapter.....Mrs. Patrick Matthew, Regent.
Sir Walter Raleigh Chapter,
Miss Catherine F. Seyton Albertson, Regent.
DeGraffenried Chapter.....Mrs. Charles Slover Hollister, Regent.

Founder of the North Carolina Society and Regent 1896-1902:
Mrs. SPIER WHITAKER.

Regent 1902:
Mrs. D. H. HILL, Sr.*

Regent 1902-1906:
Mrs. THOMAS K. BRUNER.

Regent 1906-1910:
Mrs. E. E. MOFFITT.

*Died December 12, 1904.

THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET

Vol. XI JULY, 1911 No. 1

THE NORTH CAROLINA UNION MEN OF EIGHTEEN HUNDRED AND SIXTY-ONE

BY MAJOR WM. A. GRAHAM,

(COMMISSIONER OF AGRICULTURE.)

That only those who favored secession or entertained the doctrine of absolute State sovereignty and desired a dissolution of the Union were true and loyal Confederates would be a great historical error and injustice to two-thirds of the citizens of North Carolina. At that time there were four political tenets in the United States.

First, Nullification. That a State was sovereign to such a degree that it could remain in the Union but only comply with such laws as it approved, paying no attention to or nullifying the laws it did not sanction. This was Mr. Calhoun's idea, and in accordance with it he desired a perpetuation of the Union.

Second, Secession. That a State had voluntarily entered the Union, reserving the right to withdraw or secede at its own will, especially if it deemed any act of Congress unjust to its citizens.

These opinions were held respectively by the two wings of the original Republican, afterwards the Democratic party. Mr. Davis, upon his withdrawal from the United States Senate in December, 1860, upon the secession of Mississippi, in his address gives as clear an enunciation of each of these ideas as I have seen. He endorsed secession but not nullification.

Third. That when a State entered the Union by adopting the Federal Constitution, it did not reserve the right of secession at will, but consented to look for the preservation of its rights to the means and authority provided by the Constitution and laws made in conformity thereto; there was still the inherent right of revolution when these means were denied or failed to protect the rights or property of a State or of any of its citizens, but it was the duty of a State and in accordance with its agreement to exhaust the means provided by the government for redress of grievances before resorting to revolution or withdrawal from the Union. This was the tenet of the Whigs, and of its successor, the Constitutional Union party in 1860, and it was held at that time by a large majority of the voters of the State.

Fourth. That the States bore about the same relation to the general government that counties bore to a State. This was the opinion of the extreme Federalist in his day and of the extreme Republican of today.

George Fisher, in his books published several years since "Men, Women and Manners of Colonial Times," gives a history of the people who settled the respective colonies. Those who settled Massachusetts he denominates the Puritan; those in Virginia the Cavalier. These are really the types of the Northern and Southern people, and the student can discover the difference in character and temperament in their descendants to this day.

The Cavalier settled generally in the country upon a plantation and had no connection with his neighbors' affairs except as they related to public matters, local, State or National.

The Puritan settled in the village or hamlet, and interested himself in all his neighbors' business; was much concerned as to how he bemeaned himself or governed his family. This officiousness it was desired to extend to the county, the State and the Nation. To this may be added the advocates of a "higher law" that no matter what might have been the agreement in the past, if at any time one's conscience tells him the agreement is wrong, he can violate or repudiate it. This was the school of Wm. H. Seward, and might be justly entitled nullification by the individual. There was none of this in the South.

That slavery was recognized in the Federal Constitution is evident. A time was fixed for importation of slaves to cease. Provision was made for the return of fugitive slaves, and for reckoning slaves in the enumeration upon which Congressional representation was based. Any interference was a violation of the compact of the Constitution.

The Republican party favored the abolition of slavery, although its supporters differed in the manner in which it should be accomplished.

With the election of Mr. Lincoln to the Presidency and the triumph of the Republican party, matters came to a crisis. Some thought it was useless to longer continue in the Union, and that the slave States should withdraw; others that they should not do so until there was some overt act upon his part, while others had long desired a separation and hailed its apparent coming with demonstrations of joy and approval.

South Carolina seceded in December, 1860, and was followed within a month by seven other States. The proper course for North Carolina to pursue was much discussed in public meetings and in the Legislature, with warmth, vehemence and acrimony. An act was passed submitting the question of calling a convention to consider the question and determine the course the State would pursue, to the people, at an election to be held February 27, 1861. Before this, however, delegates in behalf of peace had been sent to a National Peace Conference at Washington, D. C., and to the Provisional Confederate Government at Montgomery, Ala.

In the presidential campaign in 1860 the rights of the States was ably and fully discussed in all phases. In the Convention campaign only the desirability and advisability of secession or the contrary action were considered.

The student who will examine the history of the canvass preceding this election, as recorded in the press of that period, will see that upon one side it was urged that there was no use of delay, the State should at once unite with the States that had seceded. There would be no war; the States had a right to secede, and union was no longer either desirable or advantageous. Others said they could wipe up all the blood that would be spilt with a pocket handkerchief. Foreign nations would at once recognize us, as they could not do without our cotton and would naturally desire to see the United States divided. Those who held opposite views were criticised in the harshest terms as untrue to the South, submissionists, abolitionists, etc. Men who had never owned a negro called men who owned hundreds, and one-half of whose property was of this class, abolitionists, on account of their devotion to the Union. The denunciation of carpet-baggers and scalawags in reconstruction times did not much exceed the abuse to which these were subjected, and in spite of which they stood for the right as they saw and dared maintain it. Many of these Union men afterwards entered the Confederate army and gave their lives to uphold the cause, while many of their calumniators, like Job's war horse, "snuffed the battle from afar," and when the time for action came, through sickness (frequently feigned), or political favoritism, kept his carcass out of the reach of Yankee bullets, the abuse of their neighbors being the only active service they rendered. The opponents of secession said:

(1) If slavery was the object it would be destroyed by secession, if that failed.

(2) If secession was successful, the border States would soon become free; the easy manner of escape, the care and expense to prevent it, and the impossibility to recover a fugitive slave would make this class of property undesirable. When a State became free it would naturally unite with the Northern government; we would have new border States that would go through the same process to freedom.

(3) That although Mr. Lincoln was President he could only execute the laws which Congress enacted, and so long as we had six Senators from the Northern States favorable to us, there could be no unfavorable legislation; that he could not appoint objectionable persons to office as judge, etc., or even members of his Cabinet, as the Senate would refuse to confirm their appointment.

(4) The Supreme Court, who held office for life and passed upon the constitutionality of all laws, was unanimously opposed to Republican ideas, and a majority in its favor was hardly probable in twenty-five years, while a new President would be elected in four. Mr. Lincoln had lacked nearly 900,000 votes of a majority of the popular vote; he had been elected on account of the division of his opponents, which would not probably occur to such an extent again, and the next President would be favorable to the Constitution.

(6) It was said the Confederate States Constitution was almost identical with that of the United States; then there was no need for another nation.

(7) That the seceding States could not be cut off or dismembered from the rest of the country and transported elsewhere, but must remain attached to it. That if the Confederacy was established there could be no Chinese wall between it and the North. Self-interest in trade and defense would render it necessary to have the most friendly relations, consequently it was best to be one nation.

(8) As to the Yankees not fighting, history proved the contrary. The men of the Northwest particularly were bone of our bone and flesh of our flesh, and we might expect a long and bloody war.

Many of the people of North Carolina loved the Union, whose independence had been won by the lives and sacrifices of their ancestors. The older men were the sons, and the middle aged and younger men the grandsons of those who served in the Revolutionary war. The old men had received the account direct from their fathers, the actors; they told it to their children. This kept alive a warm attachment to and admiration of their country, and they were unwilling to aid in its dismemberment or destruction.

My father, as his sons each became old enough to understand, told him of his father's service in the Revolutionary War; how near Charlotte he was left for dead on the field of battle, with three balls and six sabre wounds; how he recovered, returned to service and "whipped the British." His sons regarded this as their country whose independence was won by the blood of their grandsire.

The most glorious chapters in the history of the Union were those which recorded the results of acts of Southern men; then why surrender to the disloyal men of the North a country whose independence the South had helped to win and whose position among the nations had been achieved by the direction of Southern men, many of whom were living at that time and prominent in national affairs.

The election resulted in the choosing of two-thirds of the delegates who were opposed to separation at that time, and the call for a convention was defeated by a few hundred votes. Many who did not favor separation thought it well to have a convention in readiness for action, and so voted. The vote of Davie County decided the matter, the vote being otherwise about a tie. For some reason, Davie was a week late in making return of its vote.

The matter of secession, as far as North Carolina was concerned, was thought to be settled for a time, and it was hoped that the trouble could be averted without war. Mr. Seward, who was to be Secretary of State, had assured Judge Campbell of the U. S. Supreme Court, that no attempt would be made to reinforce Fort Sumter, and it was not thought that South Carolina would begin hostilities if this was not done.

But there was much uneasiness and unrest. Union men began to lose hope of reconciliation and declared for action. Those who had confidence in certain leading citizens seemed content to leave the matter to them for decision, and to act as they would indicate seemed best. The preacher in Alamance who told his congregation that "they were in times of darkness and trouble, it was hard to decide what was best; he could only commend his example to them, that he got his religion from the Bible and his politics from Governor Graham," was not an isolated case.

During a discussion in which disunion was a topic in 1841, Henry Clay, passing the desk of Governor Graham, at that time a U. S. Senator from North Carolina, stopped and remarked: "There are four States in this Union which in its conformation bear to it about the same position that the heart does to the human body; as long as they are quiet and contented there is no danger of disunion, but if they shall become dissatisfied and restless, trouble will not be far off; these States are Virginia, North Carolina, Tennessee and Kentucky." These were indeed prophetic words.

When Lincoln was inaugurated, matters began to assume a different aspect; while his messages might be satisfactory, yet his acts and sayings indicated that war was near. An attempt was to be made to reinforce Fort Sumter; South Carolina anticipated this and captured the fort. Mr. Lincoln called for 75,000 men to restore United States authority.

There was no longer any question as to what could be done to avert war. War was here, and the only question was, Which side will you take in the fight?

Many of the Northern States had passed laws forbidding the use of their jails and prisons to United States marshals to hold fugitive slaves; this, as far as possible, left him to mob violence and nullified the law as much as South Carolina had done the tariff act.

Mr. Lincoln, in his canvass for the United States Senate against Stephen A. Douglas in 1858, had said that this government could not exist half slave and half free, and must be all one or the other. He would, if elected, have to take the oath to support the Constitution of the United States; this indicated he would not obey this oath, and some said they would as well have used a spelling book as a Bible when administering the oath as President.

All the States to the South had seceded; Virginia on the north and Tennessee on the west were going; was there anything left for North Carolina to contend for or hope for in the Union?

The question had long been determined by the Union men of North Carolina. Nine-tenths of them cast in their lots with the South. "Blood is thicker than water." Here was his home, his kindred, his interests, and having done all he could to prevent disunion, the North had spurned his efforts, and now he desired to be rid of them. A convention was called which, on May 20th, unanimously adopted the ordinance of secession, but not until the Union men, who constituted more than one-third of its members, had entered upon the journal their vote for a measure prepared by Judge Badger, expressing their views as to the manner in which separation should be accomplished. This failing to be adopted, they voted for and signed the ordinance of secession. Some few good men in the State never yielded their allegiance to the Union, but were loyal to the end. With these few exceptions, men of all parties gave their allegiance to the Confederacy. The Secessionist and the Union Man, the Whig and the Democrat, stood side by side and shoulder to shoulder in all the hardships, suffering and death, and those who survived accepted together the results. The Union man did not criminate the Secessionists for unnecessarily beginning the conflict, for he knew, although late in entering the fight, he had done his best to make it a success, and that he was in no wise to blame that the independence of the Confederacy had not been gained. There was no sycophant cry that "the Secessionists tempted me and I did fight," but knowingly and willingly he entered into the contest and never regretted his action or made apology for so doing. In the days of vengeance he asked to have his share handed to him.

Furthermore, at the close of the war the term "Union man" was adopted by almost every man who was guilty of any kind of disgraceful misconduct, and it became synonymous with rascality of all descriptions. The Union men of 1860 had no lot or part with such cattle, and refused to be recognized by a common name with them or to plead his efforts in 1860 and '61 in exemption from the outrages heaped upon us by the National Government.

I have called your attention to this item in the history of the State in order that you may elucidate and preserve it. Many a gallant Tar Heel has always maintained that he did not fight the United States flag, but the man who was carrying it and endeavoring to use it to overturn the principles in support of which it gained a place among the ensigns of the nations.

These Union men, whether North or South, were the only truly loyal men in the Nation in 1860. The Secessionists of the South desired and advocated a division.

The Republican of the North endeavored to carry out his individual opinions, regardless of his constitutional obligations, maintaining there was a "higher law" than the Constitution, which being interpreted was the right to do as you pleased and make others do so too.

The Union man said, I will stand by the Union as long as the obligations under which it was formed are observed.

The following is an account of a political meeting held in Hillsboro on December 26, 1860, and of the resolutions adopted. These resolutions were also adopted by many other meetings held in the State at this time.

MASS-MEETING IN HILLSBORO.

In pursuance to an adjourned meeting, a large portion of the citizens of Orange County met at the court-house in this place, and the meeting was called to order by the Chairman, Wm. H. Brown, who in a few patriotic remarks explained the object which called us together for the second time.

The Secretary read the proceedings of the meeting of the 15th inst., and the Chairman, the Hon. Wm. A. Graham, of the Committee of Ten, reported the following resolutions:

The excited condition of the public mind, occasioned by the result of the recent Presidential election, requiring in the opinion of the citizens of Orange here assembled, a declaration of the sentiments of the people in relation to the course proper to be pursued in the present critical condition of our National affairs, it is therefore:

1. Resolved, That the measures in the course of adoption in certain States of the Union, since the election of Abraham Lincoln to the office of President of the United States, presents for the determination of the people of North Carolina the grave question, whether, so far as they are concerned, the Government established by the Constitution of the United States shall be permitted to continue in operation, or whether it shall be overthrown and annulled, leaving to an uncertain future the provision of new guards for all the great interests that Government was designed to secure.

2. Resolved, That while regretting the decision made in this election, in common with the people of all the Southern States, because of the sectional, and towards us, hostile spirit of the political organization which nominated and elected the successful candidate; and whilst we shall vigilantly observe his course of administration, and shall be prompt to make resistance to encroachments, if any shall be attempted by him, on the rights and interests of slavery as an established institution of the Southern States, protected by the Constitution of the Union, we perceive in the fact of his election no sufficient cause for the subversion and abandonment of the Government of our fathers, under which, in but two generations of men, the country has obtained a prosperity and power unsurpassed among the nations of the earth.

3. Resolved, That we are not insensible to the encouragement given to the hostile feeling of the North against slavery in the Southern States, by the result of this election, but it must not be forgotten that the Government of the United States is a practical Government, of but limited powers; that the President is not the Sovereign but the servant of the Republic, with authorities defined and restricted by the Constitution and laws, liable to be checked and restrained within his legitimate powers by Congress and by the Judiciary; that Mr. Lincoln was elected by but a plurality of votes, in consequence of divisions among the conservative voters arrayed against him—the majority against him in the whole popular vote being nearly nine hundred thousand. And when add to this that he will enter into office with a majority of both Houses of Congress opposed to him, and will not be able to appoint even his Cabinet counsellors without the aid of a conservative Senate, there is but a remote probability of a successful encroachment on our rights during the limited period of his administration, if there shall be the disposition to attempt it.

4. Resolved, That the enactment of laws in many of the non-slaveholding States, intended to obstruct the execution of the law of Congress, for the arrest and surrender of fugitive slaves, is in plain and palpable violation of the Constitution of the United States, and the repeal of those laws is demanded as a duty of justice and submission to the Constitution on the part of those States, and as indispensable to future union.

5. Resolved, That waiving the constitutional question of the power of a State to secede from the Union, such act of secession, if effected peacably, is not an appropriate and adequate remedy for the injuries under which the Southern States are now laboring. To depart from the Union, leaving behind in the hands of her supposed enemies all her interests in the national accumulations of eighty years, in which she had proportional rights, would be a sacrifice on the part of a State, except under the pressure of overruling necessity, as incompatible with her dignity as her interests.

6. Resolved, That we recognize in its full extent the right of resistance by force, to unauthorized injustice and oppression, and if the incoming administration shall pervert the powers of the Government to destroy or otherwise unlawfully interfere with the rights of slavery, none will be more ready than ourselves to recur to this extreme remedy; but in adopting measures on a subject of such vital interest to fifteen States of the Confederacy, we should deem it but just and wise to act if possible, in concert, and after consultation with the other slaveholding States, and more especially with the frontier States of Maryland, Virginia, Kentucky and Missouri, which are the greatest sufferers from existing grievances, and stand as a barrier between the rest of the Southern States and the enemies of their peace and safety beyond that frontier.

7. Resolved, That reasonable time should be allowed, and all remedies consistent with the continuance of the Union, should be exhausted before an abandonment of that Constitution established by Washington and its compatriots, which in its general operation has been the source of blessings innumerable to the American people.

8. Resolved, That it is recommended to the Legislature to make appropriations for the purchase of such supplies of arms as may be necessary as a preparation for any emergency that may arise.

9. Resolved, That the foregoing resolutions be published in the Hillsborough papers, and transmitted to the representatives from this county, to be laid before the General Assembly.

John W. Norwood, Esq., offered the following as an amendment:

Resolved, That we recommend to the present Legislature to provide for calling a Convention of the people, to take into consideration the alarming state of public affairs, and determine for North Carolina the time, mode and measure of redress for existing wrongs.

The question being taken upon Mr. Norwood's resolution, it was rejected.

No objections were made to the resolutions as reported by the committee, and they were passed by a large majority.

WM. H. BROWN,
Chairman.

DENNIS HEARTT,
C. E. PARISH,
Secretaries.

N. B.—Governor Graham was the acknowledged leader of the Whigs or Union men. The topics in the accounts of the opinion of the Whigs in the above paper are taken from the address which was made to the people in the convention campaign in February, 1861.

* * *

The paper which was presented to the Secession Convention, May 20, 1861, by Hon. George E. Badger:

AN ORDINANCE DECLARING THE SEPARATION OF NORTH CAROLINA FROM THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

WHEREAS, Abraham Lincoln, of Illinois, and Hannibal Hamlin, of Maine, were chosen President and Vice-President of the United States by a party in fact and avowedly entirely sectional in its organization, and hostile in its declared principles to the institutions of the Southern States of the Union, and thereupon, certain Southern States did separate themselves from the Union, and form another and independent government, under the name of "The Confederate States of America"; and,

WHEREAS, The people of North Carolina, though justly aggrieved by the evident tendency of this election, and of these principles, did, nevertheless, abstain from adopting any such measure of separation, and on the contrary, influenced by an ardent attachment to the Union and Constitution which their fathers had transmitted to them, did remain in the said Union, loyally discharging all their duties under the Constitution, in the hope that what was threatening in public affairs might yield to the united efforts of patriotic men from every part of the Nation, and by these efforts such guarantees for the security of our rights might be obtained as should restore confidence, renew alienated ties, and finally reunite all the States in a common bond of fraternal union; meantime cheerfully and faithfully exerting whatever influence they possessed for the accomplishment of this most desirable end; and,

WHEREAS, Things being in this condition, and the people of this State indulging this hope, the said Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, did, on the 16th day of April, by his proclamation, call upon the States of the Union to furnish large bodies of troops to enable him, under the false pretense of executing the laws, to march an army into the seceded States with a view to their subjection under an arbitrary military authority, there being no law of Congress authorizing such calling out of troops, and no constitutional right to use them, if called out, for the purpose intended by him; and,

WHEREAS, This call for troops has been answered throughout the northern, northwestern and middle non-slaveholding States with enthusiastic readiness, and it is evident from the tone of the entire press of those States, and the open avowal of their public men, that it is the fixed purpose of the Government and people of those States to wage a cruel war against the seceded States, to destroy utterly the fairest portion of this continent, and reduce its inhabitants to absolute subjection and abject slavery; and,

WHEREAS, In aid of these detestable plans and wicked measures, the said Lincoln, without any shadow of rightful authority, and in plain violation of the Constitution of the United States, has, by other proclamations, declared the ports of North Carolina, as well as all the other Atlantic and Gulf States under blockade, thus seeking to cut off our trade with all parts of the world; and,

WHEREAS, Since his accession to power, the whole conduct of the said Lincoln has been marked by a succession of false, disingenuous and treacherous acts and declarations, proving incontestably that he is, at least in his dealings with Southern States and Southern men, void of faith and honor; and,

WHEREAS, He is now governing by military rule alone, enlarging by new enlistments of men both the military and naval force, without any authority of law, having set aside all constitutional and legal restraints, and made all constitutional and legal rights dependent upon his mere pleasure, and that of his military subordinates; and,

WHEREAS, All his unconstitutional, illegal and oppressive acts, all his wicked and diabolical purposes, and, in his present position of usurper and military dictator, he has been and is encouraged and supported by the great body of the people of the non-slaveholding States:

THEREFORE, This Convention, now here assembled, in the name and with the sovereign power of the people of North Carolina, doth, for the reasons aforesaid, and others, and in order to preserve the undoubted rights and liberties of the said people, hereby declare all connection of government between this State and the United States of America dissolved and abrogated, and this State to be a free, sovereign and independent State, owing no subordination, obedience, support or other duty to the said United States, their Constitution, or authorities, anything in her ratification of said Constitution, or of any amendment or amendments thereto to the contrary notwithstanding; and having full power to levy war, conclude peace, contract alliances, and to do all other acts and things which independent States may of right do: and appealing to the Supreme Governor of the world for the justice of the cause and beseeching Him for His gracious help and blessing, we will, to the uttermost of our power, and to the last extremity, maintain, defend and uphold this declaration.

Mr. Craige offered the following as a substitute for the foregoing, which was adopted, ayes 72, noes 40:

AN ORDINANCE DISSOLVING THE UNION BETWEEN THE STATE OF NORTH CAROLINA AND THE OTHER STATES UNITED WITH HER UNDER THE COMPACT OF GOVERNMENT, ENTITLED, "THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES."

We, the people of the State of North Carolina in Convention assembled, do declare and ordain, and it is hereby declared and ordained:

That the ordinance adopted by the State of North Carolina in the Convention of 1789, whereby the Constitution of the United States was ratified and adopted; and also all acts and parts of acts of the General Assembly, ratifying and adopting amendments to the said Constitution, are hereby repealed, rescinded and abrogated.

We do further declare and ordain, that the union now subsisting between the State of North Carolina and the other States, under the title of "The United States of America," is hereby dissolved, and that the State of North Carolina is in full possession and exercise of all those rights of sovereignty which belong and appertain to a free and independent State.

SOME EARLY PHYSICIANS OF THE ALBEMARLE

BY RICHARD DILLARD, M.D.

At a vote taken by the Immortals of the French Academy some time ago, to determine the order in which the great men of France should be named, Louis Pasteur outranked Napoleon Bonaparte. It was decided that a man who ministered to "the healing of the nations" was infinitely greater than a warrior who won battles at the reckless sacrifice of human life. And the whole world admits this truth today, that,

> "A wise physician skilled in wounds to heal,
> Is more than armies to the public weal."

Few sections have had so many distinguished medical men as this. One was Governor, two wrote histories of the State, some have won honors in foreign lands, while others have served their country both in peace and war, and filled almost every position of honor and trust.

Undoubtedly the earliest physician of the Albemarle section was Dr. John King. Among the records of the courthouse at Edenton may be found his bill for services rendered Arter Workman, under date of July 26, 1694, to-wit:

1 Emetic & 1 dose pill Anodine at	8s.
To my visit & 1 dose pill Anodyne	15s.
To 8 days attendance at 10s. per day	4£.
My visit at Jno. Godfrey's, Jalep and attend	16s.
My visit at Madam Clark's	10s.

Dr. Godfrey Spruill located at Edenton about 1702, but nothing is known concerning him except that he was employed by the vestry of St. Paul's Church, Edenton, to attend one Elinor Adams. The record runs thus: "Information being made by Capt. Thos. Blount that Elinor Adams by of Infirmity and Indigence is in great danger of being lost for want of Assistance, Ordered that Capt. Thos Blount treat with Doctr. Godfrey Spruill in order to her cure, and that Doctor Godfrey Spruill be paid for his Physick and Cure by the Church Wardens five pounds, and that Capt Thos Blount is requested by Vestry to endeavor to oblige the said Elinor to Serve the Doctor for the use of his House and nursing."

The next member of the profession to locate here was "George Allen, Chyrurgeon." He is described in the Colonial Records as being "a man of vile character and lately condemned at Williamsburgh for cursing King George, and Mr. Drysdale who is Govr of Virginia." Not long after that, a bill of indictment was brought against him for going privately armed and assaulting our Governor.

He was a wicked and turbulent spirit, and seemed to be constantly at war with the public authorities. It was perhaps the reputation of this renegade that caused Thos. Iredell, of Jamaica, in after years to write his nephew, James Iredell, who had just located here: "You have without doubt physicians who understand to prescribe. But unfortunately for their patients, those gentlemen more commonly understand their trades better than their profession, and it is more for their interest (howsoever criminal it may be), to exercise the one, than practise the other. In short, if your doctor has not some friendship for you, you must pay severely, both in pocket and person." (Life and Correspondence of James Iredell.)

Probably the most interesting figure who located here in early times was Dr. John Brickell. He came here with Governor Burlington in 1724, and was appointed by him to make an exploration into the interior with the view of securing the friendship of the Cherokee Indians.

He left here in 1730 with ten men and two Indians, and traveled fifteen days without having seen a human being. At the foot of the mountains they met the Indians, who received them kindly and conducted them to the camp, where they spent two days with the chief, who reluctantly permitted them to return. They made the entire trip on horseback in thirty-two days.

He describes the trip very interestingly in the history which he wrote of North Carolina. They built large fires, and cooked the game which the two Indians killed, and served it upon pine-bark dishes; at night they tethered their horses, and slept upon the gray Spanish moss which hung from the trees. They lived in truly Robin Hood style, and the tour seems to have been more for romance and adventure than for scientific research. It is a counterpart in our history of the adventures of the "Knights of the Golden Horseshoe" to the Blue Ridge of Virginia under Governor Spotswood.

Dr. Brickell had a brother, who settled in Hertford County in 1739, the Rev. Matthias Brickell, from whom is descended some of the best families of that county.

Another prominent physician who lived here was Gabriel Johnston, a Governor of North Carolina. To write a sketch of his life would be to give a history of the Province during his term of office. He was a graduate of the University of St. Andrew's, Scotland, subsequently held a chair there, and was a contributor to that noted journal, "The Craftsman." The affairs of state so engrossed his time that it is doubtful if he ever practiced in America the profession in which he was so learned. He was the best of our Colonial Governors.

Dr. William Savage was another member of the profession here in early days, and was a man of character, position and great wealth. He owned John's Island, which subsequently belonged to Stephen Cabarrus, and is described on the records of the court as "that island opposite the town of Edenton called Strawberry Island, and containing about 140 acres." The water has so encroached upon this land that barely two acres now remain. Iredell mentions him several times in his diary as a very reliable man. He practised here about 1770, and died 1780, and must have been a gentleman of considerable professional attainments.

Beneath the shadow of the large cedar trees in Hayes graveyard is a moss-covered slab of red sandstone; the overhanging branches waving to and fro in the autumn sunshine cast strange silhouettes upon the grave, and put one to dreaming. The epitaph reads:

"Dr. Sylvester Hosmer,
Who departed this life in 1794,
Age 29 years."

Beyond this there is nothing known of his life, save that he married a Miss Blair, a niece of Governor Johnston; but the modesty and simplicity of his epitaph might be taken as the true index of his character. "The silver cord was loosed, and the pitcher broken at the fountain," ere life's ascending sun had scarcely risen upon his bright and useful life. All who knew him, or about him, have long since passed beyond the tide, and—

"The mossy marbles rest
On the lips that he has pressed
In their bloom;
And the names he loved to hear
Have been carved for many a year
On the tomb."

The broad daylight of medical science had not broken, with its rays of splendor, upon the world in his day. No science has progressed so rapidly as that of medicine; it flourished even in the dark ages, in the cloistered chambers of the monks. The rusty locks of the vast treasuries of knowledge have now yielded to the golden keys of scientific research, and medical science has worked out the endless combinations of the vaults of nature; but knowledge is labyrinthine, there are many winding passages and dark chambers still to be explored.

It does seem wonderful to us that the circulation of the blood was not discovered until 1628. Paracelsus, in 1526, taught cabalistic medicine, or the influence of the planets over diseases, and read their symptoms from the stars. The signs of the Zodiac are even to this day believed by the superstitious to influence wounds and operations upon different parts of the body. He believed that an abstract something, which he called Tartar, was the cause of all diseases.

In 460 B. C., Hippocrates of Cos gave forth his apothegm, that "Medicine consists in addition and subtraction, the addition of the things which are deficient, and the subtraction of those things which are redundant. He who practises this is the best physician, but he whose practice is farthest from it, is the farthest removed from knowledge of the art." Said he: "Life is short, the art is long, the occasion fleeting, experience fallacious, judgment difficult. The physician must not only be prepared to do what is right himself, but also to make the patient, the attendants, and externals co-operate." He was the father of what is now called the regular school of medicine, and stamped that dignity and honor upon the profession which it now bears. He required each neophyte to take an oath, and this every one is supposed to take now upon entering this profession. It has been beautifully transposed from Greek into verse by Dr. James Aitken Meigs, of Philadelphia. They swore:

"To wield the sword of knowledge in relief
Of sick and suffering ones, and those with grief
Bowed down, and overweighted with much care.
And further, you must solemnly declare
That you in purity and holiness
Will live, and exercise your art to bless

Mankind; from acts of mischief will abstain
And all seductive wiles; and will refrain
From giving drugs for deadly purposes
Or vile. And when some aching brain discloses
The secrets of a sad or guilty life,
Which best the world should never know, lest strife
And ill example follow, you will hide
Such secrets, whilst you counsel, whilst you chide."

This is the exalted Hippocratic oath, and forms the foundation stone to the present code of medical honor.

The earliest known physician of antiquity was Sekhet-Enach, chief physician to Pharoah Sahura of the fifth dynasty. The first known examination for license to practise medicine was conducted by Sinan Ben-Tsabet at Bagdad, A. D. 931. Dioscorides was the most famous herbalist of antiquity, and the Dioscorea, or wild yam, was named in honor of him. Rider Haggard, in his story of Cleopatra, features him as her court physician.

Shakespeare was fond of making thrusts at the profession, and especially does he make Timon of Athens exclaim:

"Trust not the physician,
His antidotes are poisons and he slays
More than you rob."

And Dryden says:

"Better search the fields for health unbought
Than pay the doctor for a nauseous draught."

I clip the following from the Edenton Gazette, published about 1810, and doubtless written by some member of the profession here:

"God and the doctor we alike adore,
Just on the brink of danger, not before;
The danger passed both are alike requited,
God is forgotten, and the doctor slighted."

An old doctor from a neighboring town used to declare that the malaria was so thick there that the frogs sang all night long, "Quinine, Quinine"; while the refrain of the bull frogs was "Calomel, Calomel."

Hugh Williamson, M.D., LL.D., though a native of Pennsylvania, practised here. His father and mother were captured at sea, while on their way to this country, by the celebrated Blackbeard, but were finally set free after having been despoiled of their property. Dr. Williamson first preached in Philadelphia two years, then was Professor of Mathematics in the University of Pennsylvania; and not finding either of these congenial occupations, finally studied medicine at Edinburg and Leyden, and was induced by his friends, in 1777, to locate in Edenton. Dr. Williamson represented Edenton in the Commons in 1782, was a delegate to the Convention which formed the Federal Constitution, and was a member of Congress 1790-92, and Jefferson was much impressed with his ability there. During the Revolution he was a member of Caswell's medical staff, and exhibited great bravery on the field. He was one of the first trustees of our University, and was requested by them, in 1795, to invest some money in books. This was the first step toward the foundation of that large and valuable library. Williamson wrote a good deal about the climate of Eastern Carolina, malarial diseases and the best methods for preventing them.

He was, no doubt, an apostle of the Hepatic creed, whose dogma was: "One organ, the liver; one disease, biliary derangement; one remedy, mercury." Blood letting was practised indiscriminately in his day, and the old-fashioned "ten and ten" was given to every patient. The doctors in those days did not have the elegant pharmaceutical preparations, or the skilled druggist, as, now, but compounded and dispensed their own medicines. The favorite prescription here in those days for the malarial fevers was "one pint of chamomile tea every morning on an empty stomach," and this was to be kept up through the entire malarial season. Quinine was unknown to the world then, though Peruvian bark had been introduced some time by the Jesuits.

Dr. Samuel Dickinson was born in Connecticut in 1743, and died in 1802. He graduated in medicine at some foreign school, most probably Edinburg, as that was the medical center of the world then, and located in Edenton.

About 1777 he bought the Cupola house, which is still occupied by his descendants. His arms and crest still hang upon the walls of that quaint old mansion, and from its breezy cupola, which seems to stare vacantly at the distant shore, the engagement between the Confederate ram Albemarle and the double enders under Capt. Melancthon Smith was watched by his granddaughters through a spy glass. Dr. Dickinson's office stood where the corner store on the lot now stands. He had associated with him young Dr. Beasley, whose portrait was found not long ago in a negro house down on the wharf, and was used as a cover to a meal barrel. Dr. Beasley's beautiful daughter, Miss Sallie, was engaged to the gallant and chivalrous Major Ringold, who fell covered with glory on the sanguine field of Palo Alto. This so affected her mind that she soon became hopelessly insane, and died.

Dr. Dickinson was a man of wealth, and engaged in some large land schemes across the sound. He was a distinguished physician, and was often called in consultation as far as Norfolk, and met his death from exposure in crossing the Albemarle Sound to see some member of the Armistead family.

Dr. Matthias E. Sawyer was an eminent practitioner of medicine here about 1825, and published a book about that time called "Fevers of Eastern North Carolina." In the treatment of fevers, Dr. Sawyer was at least fifty years in advance of his time. The University of North Carolina now possesses the only copy of this work in existence.

Dr. Collins Skinner was a very distinguished physician of Edenton. His office still stands upon the court-house green. About 1835 he performed an operation for cataract upon an old lady, a member of the Howcutt family, residing some five miles north of Edenton; this was the first successful operation for cataract ever performed in Eastern North Carolina, and perhaps in the State.

Among the most prominent physicians of a more recent date are the Warrens, and particularly the brilliant Edward Warren-Bey, whose genius shone upon three continents, and whose checkered life reads like some Eastern romance. To Dr. Edward Warren belongs the honor for the discovery of hypodermic medication, and in that he was four years in advance of the inventor of the hypodermic syringe. Dr. Warren, soon after graduating, had under his care a Miss Betty M. Jones (afterwards Mrs. George Parrish), and finding her stomach perfectly intolerant for a number of days to any form of nourishment or medicine, it occurred to him, as a last resort, to introduce his medicine under the skin; the suggestion at once met with the approval of the suffering patient. Dr. Warren then with a lancet made a small incision in her arm, and through it injected his remedies by means of an ordinary Annels syringe, giving almost instant relief to all the distressing symptoms. Many years afterwards this patient became mine, and she frequently related to me Dr. Warren's wonderful experiment, with the greatest minuteness and enthusiasm.

Then there are to be added the Norcoms, Dr. Richard Dillard, Sr., Dr. William R. Capehart, Dr. R. H. Winborne, and a host of others too numerous for this short sketch, who have passed over the waste fields of death into the land of the hereafter—men who forgot themselves to bless mankind.

SOME BALLADS OF NORTH CAROLINA

BY PROFESSOR JOHN A. LOMAX,

(SECRETARY UNIVERSITY OF TEXAS AND ASSISTANT DIRECTOR OF THE DEPARTMENT OF EXTENSION.)

During a ballad-collecting experience of a number of years, it has come about that no few have fallen into my hands from North Carolina, in my belief one of the richest localities in ballad material of any section of the United States. A small number of these ballads I am printing at the earnest solicitation of the editor of this journal, in the hope that the article will awaken the interest of others in preserving for posterity the floating folk songs that abound in some districts of North Carolina.

I should say in the beginning that no collector in the field of balladry should pursue his work on the Carolina coast without first talking with Professor Collier Cobb, of the University of North Carolina, and, if possible, getting a look at his valuable collection. Professor Cobb, although a well-known scientist, has a genuine interest in ballad material that he imbibed from the greatest of the balladists, perhaps, in the entire history of letters, Professor Child, of Harvard University. As a student of Professor Child, Professor Cobb learned to love the native song of the out-of-doors people, while he was at the same time being wedded to the field of geology through the teaching of the great Southern educator, long eminent at Harvard University—Professor N. S. Shaler. To Professor Cobb, therefore, I must make due apology for presuming to invade a field already possessed so thoroughly by him.

The songs I am printing, however, may, in time, lead many people to confide their treasures into the competent hands of Professor Cobb or of other collectors, and therefore be of direct benefit to ballad collecting throughout America. In addition to Professor Cobb, there are other persons in North Carolina who have done good work in this field. Among them is Miss Adelaide Fries, of Winston-Salem. Miss Fries has made an interesting collection of Moravian songs, which, I am told, are all religious in tone and of German origin. Mr. Cobb's collection consists chiefly of songs that he has picked up along the coast. Indeed, these are probably the most interesting of all the North Carolina ballads. Through Miss S. O'H. Dickson, of Winston-Salem, has come information of mountain corn-husking songs, similar in spirit to the negro corn-husking songs; and also mention of the negro tobacco stripping songs. Unfortunately, I have not been able to secure examples of either of these classes.

The material that has been sent to me from other sources in North Carolina may be grouped somewhat as follows: First, traditional songs; second, war songs; third, negro songs; fourth, mountain songs; fifth, the coast songs, collected by Professor Collier Cobb. The songs in Professor Cobb's collection are not available for publication, inasmuch as he perhaps will issue them at some time himself. He has, however, consented to furnish the library at Harvard University copies of all of his collection. At Harvard the collection will become available to all students of the ballad.

Before quoting any of the songs, I should like to ask the readers of this article to furnish me with copies of the following songs:

1. "Morgan's War Song."
2. "Run, Nigger, Run."
3. "Sal's in de Garden Siftin' San'."
4. "When Lillington Fought for Caswell's Glory."

I should also appreciate complete copies of what the following seem to be fragments. In some instances the fragment may be the entire song, but I should like any information whatever about any one of the songs. These fragments all came from my North Carolina correspondents.

Cold, frosty morning, nigger mighty good;
Axe on his shoulder, gwine to cut some wood.
Little piece of corn bread, little piece of fat,
And de white folks grumble if you eat much of dat.

* * * *

Frog he sot and watched the alligator,
Hopped on a log and offered him a 'tater;
The alligator grinned and tried to blush,
Frog he laughed and said, "Oh, hush!"

* * * *

Sam stuck a needle in his heel, in his heel,
Sam stuck a needle in his heel.
A one-eyed black snake run thu the fence,
What a funny chicken a terrapin air,
And Sam stuck a needle in his heel.

* * * *

Harness up yo hosses,
Hey, oh hey!
Harness up yo hosses,
Hey, oh hey!
We'll show you how to drive 'em;
Hurrah for Uncle Sam.

* * * *

I've wondered and wondered
All the days of my life,
Where you're goin', Mr. Mooney,
To get yourself a wife,
Where you're goin', where you're goin'
To get yourself a wife.

I'm goin' to ————,
An' that will be the place
To get Miss Laura,
If God'll give me grace—etc.

Out came Miss Laura
All dressed in silk,
With a rose in her hair
And white as milk—etc.

Johnstown's a mighty flood,
Johnstown's a mighty flood,
Johnstown's a mighty flood,
For the dam was bound to break.

Fifty thousand souls were lost,
Fifty thousand souls were lost,
Fifty thousand souls were lost,
For the dam was bound to break.

* * * *

There was a lady, skin and bone;
Such a thing before had ne'er been known.

She walked out one night to pray,
She walked but a little way.

She walked up, she walked down,
She saw a ghost lying on the ground.

The lady to the spirit said,
"Shall I look so when I am dead?"

The spirit to the lady said—!!! Wah! Ah! Eh!

By traditional songs is meant such songs as were familiar to the old generation—songs that were sung by our grandmothers in their childhood and have been handed down from generation to generation chiefly by oral transmission. Good examples of these songs are:

"Suzana, Don't You Cry."
"Old Dan Tucker."
"Jim Crack Corn."
"A Frog He Would a-Wooing Go."

Of these songs I have full copies. The two traditional songs quoted hereafter were perhaps chiefly serviceable for the entertainment of children. The first one, so far as I know, has no title. The second, as I happen to know, was as popular in Massachusetts as it was in early days in North Carolina.

Oh who will wear my castor boots, castor boots,
Oh who will wear my castor boots?
Oh who will wear my castor boots, castor boots,
When I am far away?

Oh who will ride the old black mule, old black mule?
Oh who will ride the old black mule, old black mule,
When I am far away?

Oh who will smoke my rusty pipe, rusty pipe,
Oh who will smoke my rusty pipe, rusty pipe?
Oh who will smoke my rusty pipe,
When I am far away?

Oh who will shoe my pretty feet, my pretty little feet,
Oh who will shoe my pretty little feet, my pretty little feet?
Oh who will shoe my pretty little feet,
When I'm in a far away land?

Oh who will glove my pretty little hand? etc.

Oh I will shoe your pretty little feet, etc.,
When you're in a far distant land.

Oh I will glove your pretty little hand, etc.,
When you're in a far distant land.

* * * *

BILLY BOY.

Where have you been, Billy Boy, Billy Boy,
Where have you been, charming Billy?
I have been to seek a wife for the comfort of my life;
She's a young thing and can not leave her mother.

Did she ask you in, Billy Boy, Billy Boy?
Yes, she asked me in with a dimple in her chin.

Did she take your hat, Billy Boy, Billy Boy?
Yes, she took my hat and she threw it at the cat.

Did she set you a chair, Billy Boy, Billy Boy?
Yes, she set me a chair, with a ribbon in her hair.

Can she make a cherry pie, Billy Boy? etc.
Yes, she can make a cherry pie quick as a cat can wink his eye.

How old is she, Billy Boy? etc.
Three times seven, twice twenty, and eleven.

Can she make a pudding well, Billy Boy, Billy Boy?
Can she make a pudding well, charming Billy?
She can make a pudding well, I can tell it by the smell,
She's a young thing and can not leave her mother.

Can she make up a bed neat? etc.
She can make a bed up neat from the head to the feet, etc.

Another version:

Where have you been, Billy Boy, Billy Boy?
Where have you been, charming Billy?
Oh, I've been down the lane for to see my Betsey Jane,
She's a young thing and wants to leave her mammy.

Hold old is she, Billy Boy, Billy Boy? etc.
Three times six, four times seven, twenty-eight and eleven, etc.

How tall is she? etc.
She's as tall as a pine and as straight as a pumpkin vine.

Twice six, twice seven, three times twenty, and eleven.

Naturally, the three American wars produced a considerable amount of popular ballad material. A partial collection has already been made of this material, but many of the most vital and interesting of the songs are still floating among the people, especially the folk who live in the back country and on the frontier. For example, take a single stanza from a Confederate song of the Civil War, which mentions the Louisiana Tigers and the Bucktail Rangers of Pennsylvania, whose name grew out of the bucktails on their caps:

The Louisiana Tigers
  They charged with a yell;
They charged the Bucktail Rangers,
  Damn their souls to hell.

Another popular Confederate song was an adaptation of "Wait for the Wagon," the chorus of which ran:

Wait for the wagon,
  The Confederate wagon;
O wait for the wagon,
  And we'll all take a ride.

Other similar parodies, more completely worked out, for which single stanzas will serve for illustrative purposes, are:

Yankee Doodle had a mind
  To whip the Southern traitors,
Because they didn't choose to live
  On codfish and pertaters.

Yankee Doodle, fa so la,
  Yankee Doodle Dandy;
And to keep his courage up
  He took a drink of brandy.

* * * * *

King Abraham is very weak,
  Old Scott has got the measles;
Manassas is now off at last,
  Pop go the weasels.

I came from old Manassas
  With a pocketful of fun;
I killed forty Yankees
  With a single-barrel gun.

It don't make a nif-o-sniference
  To either you or I,
Big Yank, little Yank,
  All run or die.

The two parodies are taken from a book of Southern war songs published by M. T. Richardson & Co. in 1890. There are, of course, many similar ones written from the point of view of the North, all of which should now be given wide publication as interesting human mementoes of those troublous days.

The negro songs that have come to me from North Carolina are mainly religious. A number of interesting fragments of secular songs were, however, given to my wife by Mr. Fred A. Olds of Raleigh, N. C. These fragments are fairly illustrative.

Turkey buzzard, turkey buzzard,
  Take me on your wing;
Carry me cross de ribber
  To see Sally King.

Buzzard no answer,
  Keep on flyin';
Sally, she's a-waitin',
  Fairly dyin'.

I'll never marry an old maid,
  Tell you de reason why:
Neck so long and stringy
  'Fraid she'll never die.
    Git along home, Cindy, Cindy,
    Git along my Cindy gal,
    Way down in Yallerbam.

I'll never marry a po' gal,
  Tell you de reason why:
She'll eat up all yo' rations,
  An' fool you on de sly.
    Git along, etc.

* * * *

I don't like a nigger no how,
I don't like a nigger no how;
  A nigger and a mule
  Is a mighty big fool—
Don't like a nigger no how.

I don't like a po' white man no how,
I don't like a po' white man no how;
  Put him on a hoss,
  Thinks he's a boss—
Don't like a po' white man no how.

* * * *

Hush, you sinner,
  Don't you cry,
Devil's gwine ter git you
  By and by.

You needn't shout,
  You needn't laugh,
For you is only
  Just de chaff—
    For a few days.

Of the same nature is a small fragment sent in by Miss Dickson, of Winston-Salem. This, she says, was a favorite of Charleston, South Carolina, darkies before the war, and was current in other localities:

I gone down town wid my pocket full o' tin,
  Dooda! dooda!
I come back home wid my hat cave in,
  Dooda, dooda, day!

I boun' ter run all night, an' I boun' ter run all day,
I bet my money on de bob-tail hoss,
Dooda, dooda, day!

Still another, which was sung to my wife by a cook in Raleigh, is described by the negro woman as "awful pitiful."

Poor Joseph been sick pinin' for you,
Dear father, dear father, come home;
This is the message I heard him say—
Come home, the work is all done.

Refrain:

Come home, come home,
Dear father, dear father, come home,
This is the message I heard him say—
Come home, the work is all done.

My mother is too,
Dear father, dear father, won't that do?
My mother is sick and wantin' you too—
Dear father, dear father, come home.

Mother said her love was true,
O father, O father, won't that do?
Mother said her love was just as true—
O father, won't that do?

It is difficult to choose among the large body of religious songs known by the oldtime darkies of North Carolina. Miss Dickson says, in a letter enclosing several, some of which I quote later: "The songs enclosed are those I can fully recall. They are some of those sung by the members of my father's two negro congregations in Orangeburg and Barnwell. They are so entirely different from those sung elsewhere that I can not help thinking that there was some unknown minstrel who sung and whose songs spread among them."

1. Oh, come home, come home, come home, my Fader's children;
Come home, come home, an' He ain't got weary yet.

Refrain:

Oh, He call you by de lightnin',
An' He call you by de t'under,
An' He call you by de middle night cry.
Oh, come home, etc.

2. Oh, come home, come home, come home to my Fader's kingdom, etc.
3. Oh, come home, come home, come home to de cross of Jesus.
4. Oh, come home, come home, come home to de Saviour's bosom.

* * * *

Refrain:

PATIENCE.

It's good fuh to hab some patience, patience, patience,
It's good fuh to hab some patience fuh to wait upon de Lawd.

My brudder, won't you come and go wid me,
My brudder, won't you come and go wid me,
Fuh to wait upon de Lawd?

Refrain:

It's good to hab some patience, etc.

My sister, won't you come and go wid me? etc.
My fader, won't you come and go wid me? etc.
My muddah, won't you come and go wid me? etc.

(Last verse):

De ship is in de ha'bor, ha'bor, ha'bor,
De ship is in de ha'bor, ha'bor, ha'bor,
An I'se a-gwine home.

* * * *

O section, don't ring that bell no mo' [to be sung three times].
In that mornin', my Lord, in that mornin', my Lord,
In that mornin' when the Lord says hurry.

2. O Lord, I'se done what you tole me to do, etc.
3. O Raphael, don't stop that shinin' sun, etc.
4. O Gambler, you can't ride this train, etc.
5. O Gambler, no money won't pay your fare, etc.
6. O Micah goin' strike dat 'vidin' line, etc.
7. O Liar, you can't ride this train, etc.
8. O Lord, I feel like a motherless child, etc.
9. O Lord, I wish I never been born, etc.
10. O Drinker, you can't ride this train, etc.

Another fragment:

O my Lord, you promised to come by here [three times],
In de mornin' when de Lord says hurry.

O my Lord, I want to be yo' chile [three times],
In de mornin' when de Lord says hurry.

When de sun fail to shine [three times]
I'll go to God a-shoutin'.

Refrain:

You may have all dis worl' [three times],
But glory be to God.

When de moon turn to blood [three times]
I'll go to God a-shoutin'.

* * * *

Lord's goin' set dis worl' on fire,
Lord's goin' set dis worl' on fire some o' dese days,
Lord's goin' set dis worl' on fire,
Lord's goin' set dis worl' on fire some o' dese days.

Lord don't want no coward soldiers,
Lord don't want no coward soldiers in His band,
Lord don't want no coward soldiers,
Lord don't want no coward soldiers in His band.

God's goin' ride on whistlin' chariot [repeat as first verse].

I'm goin' tell my Jesus howdy.
I'm goin' kneel roun' de union table.
I'm goin' walk an' talk wid angels.
I'm goin' ride on de whistlin' chariot.
We're all goin' kneel 'roun' de union table.
We'll all be asleep, yes Lord, in glory.
We all shall bow our heads in glory.
We all goin' drink wine, drink wine in glory.

Precisely similar in spirit and imagery are the religious songs yet popular among the darkies of the Brazos River bottom cotton plantations of Texas. One of the most moving of a large number of these songs in my possession, I heard sung not long ago with powerful effect by a negro congregation hid among the trees, just on the edge of one of the big fields of cotton in Brazos County, Texas.

I got a mother in de Beulah Land,
Outshine the sun, outshine the sun, outshine the sun;
I got a mother in de Beulah Land,
Outshine the sun, far beyond the sun.

Do Lord, do Lord,
Do remember me;
Do Lord, do Lord,
Do remember me;
Do Lord, do Lord,
Do remember me, do remember me.

When my blood run chilly and cold
I got to go, I got to go, I got to go;
When my blood run chilly and cold
I got to go, way beyond the sun.—Chorus.

Right under de cross, dere lies your crown,
Dere lies your crown, dere lies your crown;
Right under de cross, dere lies your crown,
Way beyond de sun.—Chorus.

The melody, the pathos, the vivid phrasing, and the touching faith of these old songs will finally win a place for them, in my judgment, in the future history of American literature.

The most valuable of the mountain songs from North Carolina are probably those that have come from Miss Edith B. Fisk, of White Rock, North Carolina. Many of these are survivors of the old English and Scottish ballads yet held in cherished possession by the direct lineal descendants of the men and women who chanted the ballads in the old country centuries ago. Such ballads as "Fair Eleanor," "Lord Thomas," "Sweet Margaret," and "Barbara Allen," are widely known and yet sung to the old tunes by the modern people. Other songs popular among them are local songs of historic interest, or local songs recounting late events, usually tragedy. Moreover, among the mountains are found many of the frontier ballads of America that have drifted back east. Such songs as "The Buffalo Skinners," "The Cowboy's Lament," and "The Dying Cowboy," picked up in Texas, and printed in my volume of Cowboy Songs, are often found among the mountaineers in the Asheville district. Miss Fisk, in writing of an old woman from whom she secured numerous songs, says: "She says she has always known them. When she was a girl that 'is all they studied about,' and if she heard a song once she knew it. There was an old man who used to sing many a song when he 'got drunk,' and all gathered about him eagerly. She assured me that she knows 'one hundred love songs,' and 'one hundred songs of devilment.' She gave me Brothers and Sisters and Pretty Sarah, playing and singing them for me."

From this "old woman" Miss Fisk copied the following interesting songs of the Civil War:

It was our hard general's false treachery
Which caused our destruction in that great day.
Oh, he is a traitor, his conduct does show;
He was seen in the French fort six hours ago.

And to be marked by the French, I am sure,
There round his hat, a white handkerchief he wore;
And one of our bold soldiers he stood by a tree,
And there he slew many till him he did see.

"Would you be like an Indian, to stand by a tree?"
And with his broad sword, cut him down instantly.
His brother stood by him, and saw he was slain,
His passion grew on him, he could not refrain.

"Although you're a general, brave Braddock," said he,
"Revenged for the death of my brother I'll be."
When Washington saw that, he quickly drew nigh,
Said, "Oh, my bold soldier, I'd have you forbear."

"No, I will take his life, if it ruins us all."
And Washington turned round to not see him fall.
He up with his musket, and there shot him down.
Then Braddock replied, "I received a wound."

"If here in this place, my life I should yield, Pray carry your general, boys, out of the field."

Then General Gatefore, he took the command,
And fought like a hero for old Eng-e-land.
He fled through the ranks, like a cat to her game,
But alas, and alack, he was short-i-ly slain.

Then General Gates, he took the command,
And fought like a hero for old Eng-e-land.
He wished that the river had never been crossed
And so many Englishmen shamefully lost.

We had for to cross, it was at the very last,
And crossing over the river they killed us so fast.
Men fell in the river till they stopped up the flood,
And the streams of that river ran down red with blood.

* * * *

Brave Washington he led the way to victory and renown,
Planted the tree of liberty Great Britain can't pull down.
The roots they spread from shore to shore,
The branches reach the sky;
The cause of freedom we adore,
We'll conquer, boys, or die.

Brave Tennessee has sent a band
To fight at New Orleans;
With British blood we'll wash the land,
The Tories cord the sea.

And with a shout our eagle roared,
And fluttered as she flew;
Her arms are like a lion grown,
Her arms are ever true.

There's Iowa and Kentucky,
New knights with heart and hand;
There's several, too, the North we'll fight,
Our Union to defend.

"Pretty Sarah" and "Owen's Confession" are fairly illustrative of the songs of local origin.

When I came to this country, in 1829,
I saw many lovyers, but I didn't see mine.

I looked all around me and saw I was alone,
And me a poor stranger, a long way from home.

It's not this long journey I'm dreading to go,
Nor leaving my country, nor the debts that I owe.

There's nothing to pester, nor trouble my mind,
Like leaving pretty Sarah, my darling, behind.

My love, she won't have me, as I do understand,
She wants a freeholder, and I have no land.

But I can maintain her with silver and gold,
And it's many pretty fine things my love's house can hold.

I wish I was a poet, and could write a fine hand,
I'd write my love a letter that she could understand.
I'd send it by the waters when the water overflows,
I think of pretty Sarah wherever she goes.

I wish I was a dove, and had wings and could fly,
About my love's dwelling this night I'd draw nigh.
And in her lily white arms all night I would lay,
And watch some little window for the dawning of day.

As pretty Sarah, pretty Sarah, pretty Sarah, I know,
How much I love you, I never can show.
At the foot of old Coey, on the mountain's sad brow,
I used to love you dearly—and I don't hate you now.

* * * *

OWEN'S CONFESSION.

Come, all ye good people, far and near,
That has come here this day to see my body put to death—
Oh, for my soul do pray!

I would have you take warning from what you now do see;
I pray you trust in honesty, and shun bad company.

December past, in ninety-eight, as you may understand,
That was the time we set out upon this cruel plan.

Lewis Collins was a man that enticed me to go,
To my eternal ruin, to my reproaching woe.

It was our intention, a fortune for to make,
Though, poor and happy men, we were met with a mistake.

I went so far against the will of my poor wife so dear,
The night before I left her my shirt she bathed in tears.

Then down to Mr. Irlen's, Ohe therefore I was bent;
To do any murder it was not my intent,
Though, making for his money, he made toward his gun—
And to save my own life, Ohe then I shot him down.

And to get his money we quickly did prepare,
As it was well ordered, we got but little there.

It being the first crime of the sort that ever I had done,
My guilty conscience checked me so that from the house I run.

Then to quit my company, Ohe therefore I was bent,
To go to Wilkes among my friends, for that was my intent.

But, ohe, his sad deluding he prest on me so hard,
"As for the crime that we have done, why should you it regard?"

By his insinuation some comfort I did take,
And freely went along with him to my unhappy fate.

The poor and unhappy rich I was to go on such a cause,
And now I am condemned to die by justice and by law.

I hear the carriage coming my body for to bear
To the place of execution, death to encounter there.

So fare you well, my loving wife, likewise my children dear,
William Owen is my name, all ye that want to hear.

Farewell to sun, moon, stars, all things that in them be,
Farewell to earth with all her fruits—I have no need for thee.

Come, sweet Lord, I humbly pray, and wash me in Thy blood,
And in Thy praise continually my tongue shall sound aloud.

The limits of this article forbid a detailed discussion of any of the songs, and I submit as the concluding one a song sung to my wife by Mrs. Davis of Britton's Cove:

There was a Romish lady brought up in Popery;
Her mother always taught her the priest she must obey.
"O pardon me, dear mother, I humbly pray thee now,
For unto these false idols I can no longer bow."

Assisted by her handmaid, a Bible she concealed,
And then she gained instruction till God His love revealed.
No more she prostrates herself to pictures decked with gold,
But soon she was betrayed, and her Bible from her stole.

"I'll bow to my dear Jesus, I'll worship God unseen,
I'll live by faith forever—the works of men are vain.
I can not worship angels nor pictures made by men;
Dear mother, use your pleasure, but pardon if you can."

With grief and great vexation, her mother straight did go
To inform the Roman clergy the cause of all her woe.
The priests were soon assembled and for the maid did call,
And forced her in the dungeon to fright her soul withal.

The more they strove to fright her, the more she did endure;
Although her age was tender, her faith was strong and sure.
The chains of gold so costly they from this lady took,
And she, with all her spirits, the pride of life forsook.

Before the Pope they brought her in hopes of her return,
And then she was condemned in horrid flames to burn.
Before the place of torment they brought her speedily;
With lifted hands to heaven she then agreed to die.

There being many ladies assembled at the place,
She raised her eyes to heaven and begged supplying grace.
"Weep not, ye tender ladies, shed not a tear for me,
While my poor body's burning, my soul the Lord shall see.

"Yourselves ye need to pity, and Zion's deep decay,
Dear ladies, turn to Jesus, no longer make delay."
In comes her raving mother, her daughter to behold,
And in her hand she brought her pictures all decked with gold.

"O take from me these idols, remove them from my sight,
Restore to me my Bible wherein I take delight.
Alas, my aged mother! Why on my ruin bent?
'Twas you who did betray me, but I am innocent.

"Tormentors, use your pleasure, and do as you think best,
I hope my blessed Jesus will take my soul to rest."
Soon as these words were spoken, up steps the man of death,
And kindled up the fire to stop her mortal breath.

Instead of golden bracelets, with chains they bound her fast.
She cried, "My God, give power—now must I die at last?
With Jesus and His angels forever I shall dwell;
God, pardon priests and people, and so I bid farewell."

North Carolina collectors, who value this material properly, will see to it, I feel sure, that not many years elapse before all this interesting material is taken down and deposited in the libraries of the universities, where, in after years, it will be invaluable to students of humanity. These songs, coming straight from the heart of the folk, simple and direct, reflecting the social and intimate emotional life of the people, will eventually become priceless historical documents.

A PAINTING OF THE BAPTISM OF VIRGINIA DARE

At the annual meeting of the North Carolina Society Daughters of the Revolution, held in Raleigh at the home of the Corresponding Secretary, Mrs. Paul H. Lee, in January, 1911, a most important resolution, and one that should arouse the interest of all patriotic North Carolinians, was introduced by Mrs. E. E. Moffitt, who was the guest of honor on that occasion.

This resolution was to raise funds sufficient to place in the Nation's Capitol at Washington a painting of the baptism of the first white child born on American soil, the best known of all children whose names are recorded in the annals of American history—the ill-fated Virginia Dare. It is needless to state that the North Carolina Society, Daughters of the Revolution, which is ever keenly alive to the necessity of guarding and preserving our State's noble past, unanimously adopted this resolution.

Below is given the resolve in full:

FOREWORD.

Among all the incidents of the early history of this nation, no one thing should stand out in bolder relief, more pathetic, or more significant of mighty and holy purpose than the baptism of Virginia Dare, which took place on Roanoke Island, on the shores of North Carolina, August 18, 1587.

WHEREAS, In consideration of this great historic event which took place within the limits of North Carolina, and as no great public recognition has yet been made to bring before the world the great intention of our great colonizer, Sir Walter Raleigh, therefore be it

Resolved, That as this, the "North Carolina Society of the Daughters of the Revolution," which has for its object the perpetuating and commemorating great events in North Carolina history, take steps to have a painting executed of such merit as to entitle it to a place among the other notable paintings depicting great scenes in the history of this nation, which now adorn the Capitol at Washington.

Second, That this Society raise sufficient funds for the picture, through its own efforts and by petition to the Congress of the United States, for the completion of this object. Respectfully submitted,

MRS. E. E. MOFFITT,
Honorary Vice-Regent.

Raleigh, N. C., January, 1911.

Committee signed by Miss Mary Hilliard Hinton of the Regent of the North Carolina Society of the Daughters of the Revolution.

Mrs. Louise Pittenger Skinner, Recording-Secretary, N. C. S. D. R.
Mrs. Paul Hinton Lee, Corresponding-Secretary, N. C. S. D. R.
Mrs. Mary Bates Sherwood, Treasurer, N. C. S. D. R.
Miss Grace Bates, Librarian, N. C. S. D. R.
Mrs. John E. Ray, Custodian of Relics, N. C. S. D. R.
Mrs. Annie Moore Parker.
Mrs. John Cross.
Mrs. Hubert Haywood, Regent of the Bloomsbury Chapter, D. R.

At the annual meeting of the General Society, held in Baltimore in May, it received the endorsement as a State Society work.

On May 26, 1911, Hon. Lee S. Overman, Senior Senator from North Carolina, introduced this bill:

A BILL FOR THE EXECUTION OF A SUITABLE AND CREDITABLE PAINTING DEPICTING AND PERPETUATING THE BAPTISM OF VIRGINIA DARE, THE FIRST KNOWN CELEBRATION OF A CHRISTIAN SACRAMENT ON AMERICAN SOIL.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the sum of ten thousand dollars, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the execution of a suitable and creditable painting depicting the scene of the baptism of Virginia Dare, which took place on Roanoke Island, on the shores of North Carolina, on the eighteenth day of August, fifteen hundred and eighty-seven; said painting to be of such merit as to entitle it to a place among the notable paintings depicting and perpetuating other historic scenes of national interest which now adorn the walls of our National Capitol.

It is indeed a gratification to be able to report that the said bill has passed two committees and been referred to the Committee on the Library. There also comes the news that there is hope of its passage. Both Senator Overman and Senator Simmons are working hard for this noble cause, which has been far too long unnoticed.

MARKING THE SITE OF THE OLD TOWN OF BLOOMSBURY, OR WAKE COURT HOUSE

PRESENTATION OF TABLET TO THE CITY OF RALEIGH

The morning of April 26, 1911, was fair and bright, and it seemed that Nature herself smiled approval on the Bloomsbury Chapter, Daughters of the Revolution, and their gift to the city, that should mark for future generations the location of the old town of Bloomsbury, the remembrance of which was fast fading from the mind of the oldest inhabitant and becoming an uncertain tradition.

Bloomsbury had but a short life—about twenty years—but it was nevertheless during that time a social and political center. The home of Colonel Joel Lane was here, and the probabilities are, though history does not so state, that it was through his influence that it was chosen the county seat, as it was also through his influence that Raleigh was chosen our State capital. Colonel Lane was noted for his hospitality and fondness for social life, as well as for his influence in politics. Here great hunting parties assembled from all the country-side, and there is still standing today, in our Capitol Square, a tree but a short distance removed from Fayetteville street which was in those days a favorite deer stand. To accommodate the crowds which assembled here, Colonel Lane had a tavern built, which was situated just across the road from his own residence. It was here that Tryon rested in 1771 from the 5th to the 8th of May, when he was gathering his forces to march against the Regulators, and when the army returned from Alamance, Colonel John Hinton disbanded his detachment here.

It was at Bloomsbury, in Colonel Lane's residence, that the Legislature was held in 1781, during the Revolution, and at this time and in this place Thomas Burke was elected Governor.

The Bloomsbury Chapter, Daughters of the Revolution, celebrated their first anniversary by this gift to the city. It was a happy and joyous occasion to them, to which all were invited, and many responded. It was the first occasion upon which a local historical spot had been marked in Raleigh. Mr. John W. Hinsdale, Jr., a descendant of Joel Lane, was marshal for the day, and he most gracefully introduced the various speakers.

The services were opened by the Rev. W. McC. White, D.D., with an invocation, which was as follows:

A PRAYER AT THE ESTABLISHMENT OF A MEMORIAL STONE IN RALEIGH, APRIL 26, 1911.

O Thou Eternal One, we bow our heads in lowly adoration before Thee. Thou art God—even from everlasting to everlasting, Thou art God.

From everlasting, from the beginning, or ever the earth was—Thou wast. In the beginning Thou didst create the heaven and the earth. Thou laidest the foundations thereof, when the morning stars sang together and all the sons of God shouted for joy. All things were made by Thee, and without Thee was not anything made that was made.

As Thou hast been from everlasting, so Thou wilt be. Heaven and earth shall pass away—they shall perish—but Thou remainest; they shall wax old as doth a garment, and as a vesture shalt Thou fold them up, and they shall be changed; but Thou art the same and Thy years fail not.

But, oh, Thou ever-living God, our days on earth are but as a shadow that passeth away—but as an evanishing cloud—as a watch in the night—as a tale that is told—as the grass; in the morning it groweth up and flourisheth, in the evening it is cut down, and withereth. As for man his days are as grass; as the flower of the field, so he flourisheth. For the wind passeth over it, and it is gone, and the place thereof shall know it no more forever.

Yet, oh, Lord, we children of men long for immortality, and would perpetuate the memory of our deeds on earth, and of our history hitherto. And we have come now to set up this memorial stone to mark the beginnings of our city—lest we forget. Let it be unto us, we pray Thee, and unto them that come after us, a reminder of our origin, that from it we may measure, and rightly estimate and appreciate, Thy great goodness unto us in Thy providence over us all, the plentitude of Thy loving-kindness and the multitude of Thy tender mercies unto us. As we, or our children, or our children's children, look upon this stone, may we or they be moved to say with the patriarch of old: I am not worthy of the least of all Thy mercies which Thou hast showed unto Thy servant; with my staff I passed over, and now I am become two bands! With the pious Israelite may we stand to praise Thee, saying: A Syrian ready to perish was my father; and he went down into Egypt with a few, and became there a nation, great and mighty and populous. So, oh, Lord, as we look back upon our humble beginnings and then turn to contemplate this imperial city in all its beauty and riches and power and glory, may our hearts fill up with grateful, loving adoration of Thee, our fathers' God, and our God. For Thou, Lord, art good, and Thy mercy endureth forever.

Not unto us, not unto us, oh, Lord, but unto Thee do we give the glory. And if ever in the pride of our hearts we are found saying, Is not this great Babylon, that I have built by the might of my power and for the honor of my majesty—forgive us, we pray.

Oh, Lord, keep watch over this stone. And if it please Thee, let it remain in its place until that day when the elements shall melt with fervent heat, when the earth and the works that are therein shall be burned up. Nevertheless, we, according to Thy promise, look for a new heaven and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness. And grant it of Thy mercy, oh, Lord, that we may inherit the new earth and dwell therein forever. And oh, that we may then, in eternal leisure, revisit in memory, or in spirit, or even in our own person, the scenes of our earthly history, and be permitted to trace out all Thy dealings with man from the beginning to the end. And as then with unclouded vision we see, no longer as through a glass darkly, but face to face; as we know, not in part, but the whole—we shall behold and admire and join with the saints of all ages in the song of Moses and the Lamb, saying, Great and marvellous are Thy works, oh, Lord God Almighty; just and true are Thy ways, Thou King of Saints.

And now, God of our fathers, be Thou still a God unto us. Here we raise this Ebenezer; hitherto hast Thou helped us. And unto Thee do we look in faith for the unknown future. Guide Thou, govern Thou us all the days. This we pray in the name and for the sake of our Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

Mr. William B. Snow, who is the great-grandson of William Boylan, who in 1818 purchased the estate of Bloomsbury shortly after it passed from the possession of the Lane family, and whose children and grandchildren have continuously owned the property until now, made the next address. Mr. John W. Hinsdale, Jr., introduced Mr. Snow.

Ladies and Gentlemen:

In North Carolina we have heretofore paid too little attention to the past and to keeping our records straight. We have been content with doing, but have considered the remembrance of the deed accomplished as of minor importance. This was wrong, for a heroic deed forgotten had almost as well never have taken place. It is the remembrance of past glories that stimulates the youth of coming ages, and it requires a knowledge of the past to give those who live in the present a proper outlook.

It is true that the founding of a town is not a heroic act, but the same spirit that produced the Regimental Histories of North Carolina, stimulates the activities of the North Carolina Historical Society and that originated the NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET and a score of other tokens of our new view of the past, is responsible for our presence here today to commemorate the founding of the old and almost forgotten town of Bloomsbury.

I take pleasure in introducing to you Mr. Wm. B. Snow, who will make the address of the day.

MR. SNOW'S ADDRESS.

Ladies and Gentlemen:

It is truly an honor, and no less a pleasure, which has been conferred upon me by the Bloomsbury Chapter of the Daughters of the Revolution, to address you upon an occasion so inspiring as the dedication and unveiling of the monument to commemorate this historic spot.

While the people of a busy world are so engaged and absorbed by the daily affairs of life, the patriotic and self-sacrificing order of the Daughters of the Revolution, composed of the descendants of those who fought in the war of the Revolution for American independence, and created the greatest nation of the world, are industriously and nobly engaged in perpetuating the memory of those now historic times and events and in preserving the identity of the places which formed a setting for these scenes. Much does the present, and more will the future owe to these good women for their high-minded purpose. And so, today, they have erected here a monument to commemorate and identify the historic place of "Bloomsbury," the original County Seat of Wake County.

In the year 1771, during the strenuous period of the reign of George III, Wake County was created by act of the Colonial Assembly, out of portions of the older counties of Cumberland, Orange and Johnston; the origin of its name is disputed, as are other things and events pertaining to that period of our State's history, some ascribing it to the name of Royal Governor Tryon's wife, and others to that of his wife's sister.

Seven commissioners appointed by the Legislature located the county seat at Wake Cross Roads, as the place had been theretofore called, because it formed the junction of two or more of the important highways of the State leading to and from the then seat of the government at New Bern and the towns of Hillsboro and Salisbury. The seven commissioners were Joel Lane, Theophilus Hunter, Hardy Sanders, Joseph Lane, John Hinton, Thomas Hines and Thomas Crawford. But as fitted the newly acquired dignity of the place, the name became changed to "Bloomsbury," which was the name of the home of Colonel Joel Lane. There still stands, in quiet beauty and imposing grace, the one object which has remained to mark the location of the historic place, the old Colonial home, at that time the stately mansion, of Colonel Joel Lane, one of the great men of his day. Upon a gentle slope, it overlooked the surrounding lands, the only residence for distances around, the gathering place for the commanding men and fair women of its times, to whom its open doors offered the pleasures afforded in those days by a people noted for their Southern hospitality. There, too, occurred many of the important gatherings and meetings which formed eventful epochs in those days when men's minds were filled and their hearts throbbed with the pulsations of war. There, too, met, on June 23, 1781, the General Assembly of the Colony, and elected Thomas Burke, Governor of the Colony. There, too, oftentimes, went the Governor to seek advice and assistance from Colonel Lane. It was at Bloomsbury that the Governor and the officers in command of the King's soldiers assembled, and from there proceeded on their march to Hillsboro to meet the Regulators, and to further advance to the battle of the Alamance.

When the county seat was established, the Wake court house and jail were built, their location being probably to the south of the Lane residence and near the present railway tracks, where they remained for more than twenty years and until after the town of Raleigh had been created. In 1818, Bloomsbury and the large tract of surrounding land, extending to the present grounds of the Central Hospital on the south, to Hillsboro street on the north, to the Seaboard Air Line on the east, and Pullen Park and Rocky Branch on the west, became the property of William Boylan, in whose family it has constantly remained, descending to his namesake and grandson, who is its present owner. At the time of its acquirement by the Boylan family, Bloomsbury was the only residence within the limits of the tract of land, and for many years, until the modern city of Raleigh arose, and its open areas became traversed by streets and modern residences sprung up, it still overlooked, in all its historic grandeur and importance, the broad domain of which it had been the central figure. The loving care bestowed upon it by those who have cherished its history has kept it in a remarkable state of preservation, and may the result of these exercises today be to sustain the interest of the public in its noble past.

The living descendants of Colonel Joel Lane are numerous in the city of Raleigh, and well known and distinguished as befits the descendants of so eminent a character in the history of Bloomsbury and of their county and State.

Colonel Lane had six sons and six daughters, and time forbids that I should attempt to mention the names of the numerous descendants. Among them, however, are the Mordecais and the Devereux, of whom the accomplished and esteemed John W. Hinsdale, Jr., adds to the success and enjoyment of these ceremonies by his services as Chief Marshal of the occasion; and the two handsome and attractive young boys, William and Gavin Dortch, who will by unveiling the monument thus contribute their part towards the success of the occasion.

So much for the history of Bloomsbury. As we stand in the midst of surroundings hallowed by memories so dear to the hearts of a patriotic people, and look through the vista of the past, we marvel at the changes which have come with time. No longer is the scene one bright with the movements of Revolutionary troops, and Bloomsbury stands surrounded with modern homes, its once solitary grandeur gone. In the years which are to come, future generations will no longer have the pleasure which is ours today, to look upon the home that was once so intimately associated with an eventful past. But when that time shall come this imposing monument shall speak to them a story they may never read in books, and they will be the better for it. They will know of the patriotism of a people who loved their past and loved to honor it. And they will think with increased admiration of the splendid work of that band of noble hearted women who devoted their efforts to the task of making immemorial those things so often soon forgotten, the Daughters of the Revolution.

After Mr. Snow's address, Miss Mary Hilliard Hinton, State Regent of the North Carolina Society, Daughters of the Revolution, in behalf of the Bloomsbury Chapter, presented the memorial to the city, in the following graceful manner.

MISS HINTON'S ADDRESS.

Today we stand upon Wake's most historic ground, and in placing this memorial do reverence the brave men and noble women who have gone before, the fruits of whose labors later generations have enjoyed.

The various periods of our history are here combined; therefore naturally an onlooker becomes retrospective. His thoughts revert to the days when these acres formed a part of a vast wilderness, untouched by civilization save at energy-stirring distances, when conveniences were a dream of a future that was yet to dawn. Gradually it became the center of a large county, later its seat of government. Next, the horrors of a civil war overshadowed the Province, and Governor Tryon here gathered together his army, loyal subjects of a British sovereign, and marched hence to meet the Regulators on the field of Alamance. In a short space the men who defended the crown's rights were asserting their own. In the midst of that long struggle for independence, the General Assembly honored Colonel Lane with its presence, and in yonder Colonial home, the oldest we can claim, the brilliant Thomas Burke was elected Governor of North Carolina. Then came the efforts to locate the State's capital permanently, and Colonel Lane won, selling one thousand acres and donating five lots for the new town. Lastly, the selection of a name that should be a source of pride to every English-speaking individual, carries us back to the time of the "Lost Colony" and the beginning of England's power.

In marking this site, the Bloomsbury Chapter, in celebration of its first birthday, imparts information known only to the minority.

Monuments and tablets are regarded by a majority of our countrymen as an utterly useless expenditure of money. To the thoughtful they are an essential means of teaching history, of arousing that national love without which a man can claim no country. It is a pronounced characteristic of the Anglo-Saxons to revere the deeds and memories of their antecedents and to lose no opportunity of preserving their records beyond the archives of state, even though centuries may elapse without some achievement. From this line of progenitors we are visibly inheriting this excellent trait.

The flame of patriotism which is adorning our land, by perpetuating its glorious past in bronze, stone, marble and on canvas, is not the passing fad of an hour; it is the safeguard of progress, preventing the vandalic supremacy of materialism that threatens the life of the New World.

To the aldermen and officials of the city, who by their generous assistance have made this event possible, we extend our heartfelt gratitude.

On behalf of the Bloomsbury Chapter, North Carolina Society Daughters of the Revolution, and at the request of our Regent, Mrs. Hubert Haywood, it affords me infinite pleasure to present this tablet and stone to our city of Raleigh, through her most highly esteemed Mayor, the Honorable J. S. Wynne, asking that the said memorial receive their care and trusting that it may serve to arouse a proper sense of State and national pride in the citizens of this county.

The Hon. J. S. Wynne, Mayor of the city, accepted the memorial for the city, in a brief address.

HON. J. S. WYNNE'S ADDRESS.

Daughters of the Revolution.

LADIES:—It gives me peculiar pleasure to accept, on behalf of the city of Raleigh, this tablet, which your public spirit and your pride in history have caused you to place on this spot, for it is the first tablet set up to mark any point in Raleigh which has a bearing upon local events or places. The time has come to take up this work of thus placing memorials of this character, for Raleigh, though it has only a little more than a hundred years of history behind it as the capital of the great Commonwealth of North Carolina, yet long before that honor was conferred, this locality was the scene of incidents which bear upon our colonial history. In accepting this enduring bronze memorial to mark the site of old "Bloomsbury," I take pleasure in making the highest public acknowledgment of the appreciation of Raleigh and of Wake for the thoughtful care which has caused you to take this very proper step, and I thank you for what is but an added evidence of your high purpose to instill pride in the memories of the great past in the minds of our people.

At the close of Mayor Wynne's address, Mr. Hinsdale announced that the tablet would be unveiled by Masters William and Gavin Dortch, descendants to the seventh generation from Joel Lane, and whose silver knee buckles were used to clasp the regalias which these little boys wore on this occasion, when they had come to do honor to their ancestor.

The benediction by Dr. White closed the services.

The Daughters of the Revolution are under many obligations to the Board of Aldermen, Mr. R. B. Seawell, city engineer, and Mr. W. A. Cooper, alderman and city street commissioner; also Mr. Marshall DeLancey Haywood, without whose advice, kindness and co-operation this memorial would not have been possible.

The tablet is placed on a natural boulder of Wake County granite, which is located at the corner of Boylan Avenue and Morgan street. It is of bronze, and bears the following inscription:

ON AND AROUND THIS SPOT STOOD THE OLD TOWN OF BLOOMSBURY OR
WAKE COURT HOUSE

WHICH WAS ERECTED AND MADE THE COUNTY-SEAT
WHEN WAKE COUNTY WAS ESTABLISHED IN 1771.

THIS PLACE WAS THE RENDEZVOUS OF A PART OF GOVERNOR TRYON'S ARMY WHEN HE MARCHED AGAINST THE REGULATORS IN 1771; HERE MET THE STATE REVOLUTIONARY ASSEMBLY IN 1781; AND TO THIS VICINITY WAS REMOVED THE SEAT OF GOVERNMENT WHEN THE CAPITAL CITY OF RALEIGH WAS INCORPORATED IN 1792.

THIS MEMORIAL PLACED BY BLOOMSBURY CHAPTER
DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION
A. D. 1911.

EMILY BENBURY HAYWOOD,
Regent Bloomsbury Chapter, D. R.

REFERENCES:

Haywood's Joel Lane, Pioneer and Patriot.
Amis's Historical Raleigh.

BIOGRAPHICAL, GENEALOGICAL AND HISTORICAL MEMORANDA

COMPILED AND EDITED BY MRS. E. E. MOFFITT.

MAJOR WILLIAM ALEXANDER GRAHAM

The subject of this sketch, and the author of the article in this number of THE BOOKLET entitled "The North Carolina Union Men of Eighteen Hundred and Sixty-one," is a native of Hillsboro, North Carolina. His home residence is at Machpelah, Lincoln County, N. C., one of the oldest communities in the State and first settled by his forefathers.

Major Graham is the grandson of General Joseph Graham (1759-1836), the distinguished Revolutionary patriot, whose life is conspicuous in the annals of North Carolina.

Major Graham is the son of Governor William A. Graham (1804-1875), of Hillsboro, North Carolina, and Susan (Washington) Graham, his wife. Of the large family left by Governor Graham, many have already made their mark, among them his son, Major Wm. A. Graham. He was born in Hillsboro on December 26, 1839; educated at the University of North Carolina and at Princeton, where he graduated in 1860.

He entered the Confederate army as a first lieutenant of Company K, Second North Carolina Cavalry, and on May 1, 1862, was promoted to a captaincy, and was at Gettysburg, July 30, 1863, where he was wounded. After this he was Assistant Adjutant General, in which capacity he served during the war. In 1874, he was elected to the State Senate from Lincoln and Catawba counties, and was re-elected from same district, 1876.

Major Graham married (1864) Julia, daughter of John W. Lane, of Amelia County, Virginia, by whom he has an interesting family.

Major Graham has always been a devoted student of history, and has made valuable contributions in its preservation. In 1904 he published a history of his grandfather, General Joseph Graham, in which is published his Revolutionary papers, with an epitome of North Carolina's military services in the Revolutionary war and of the laws enacted for raising troops. This is a most valuable work, and which required the most extensive research for the facts contained therein, dating from the settlement in 1750 of the Scotch-Irish emigration, to the year 1782, inclusive. They are authentic and based on manuscripts and original records.

The Booklet is indebted to Major Graham for several articles on great events in North Carolina history. Vol. IV, June, 1904, he wrote on the "Battle of Ramsaur's Mill," a battle which is little known in general history, yet one of the most important in results and best fought of the Revolution. It destroyed Toryism in that section. In this fight with Cornwallis, forty were killed and one hundred wounded out of four hundred engaged. The defeat and rout of three times their number is certainly worthy of note. This battle field is now within the limits of Lincolnton, and yet remains to be marked by a patriotic people.

Vol. V, January, 1906, contains another article by Major Graham, on "The Celebration of the Anniversary of May 20, 1775." This was the first celebration of the anniversary of the Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence, Charlotte, N. C., May 20, 1835. The attendance was estimated to be at least five thousand, participated in by many distinguished citizens of the State. At the dinner many speeches were made on the political questions of the day. General Joseph Graham was there and responded to the toast, "Our guest, General Joseph Graham, the living witness of the scene we have met to commemorate, and the bold and intrepid defender of its principles."

General Graham replied, giving his individual experience relative to that event. He was personally acquainted with those venerable fathers, and had heard the discussion on those resolutions, and believed that the signers were actuated by pure patriotism, governed by no motive but the country's welfare, etc. The account of this celebration is from the Miners and Farmers Journal, Charlotte, N. C., May 22, 1835. The address of General Graham is from the Western Carolinian, Salisbury, N. C., June 20, 1835.

Again, in Vol. V, April BOOKLET (1905), Major Graham contributed another interesting article, entitled, "The Battle of Cowan's Ford, N. C.—The Passage of the Catawba River by Lord Cornwallis, February 1, 1781." In this article the patriots of Rowan, Mecklenburg and Lincoln counties are given due credit for valor and readiness for the service in the struggle for Independence. They were in fact soldiers cantoned upon their own families, ready to immediately respond to a call for service, and to provide for their own findings, in clothes, arms and ammunition. Their swords and scabbards were made principally by the smiths and shoemakers of the vicinity in which the men lived. Geographically, this was the storm center of the Revolution, and with the crudest of accoutrements, such as present warfare demands, these men, undaunted by fear and with unflinching determination, stood ever ready to defend their homes and firesides against the invasion of a foe that had wantonly trampled on their rights. Well worthy to be kept in remembrance by a loyal people! It was recorded in "Tarleton's Campaigns" that the counties of Mecklenburg and Rowan were more hostile than any other in America.

The declaration made by Tarleton to Cornwallis that "he had gotten into a hornet's nest," has become a classic, as it were. This epithet was gloried in by the patriots of that day and is yet held as a badge of honor and is emblazoned on the monument that stands in a public square of Charlotte, N. C., which was erected to the patriots of Mecklenburg of 1775.

Major Graham, after filling many positions of honor and trust, was chosen some years ago as the head of the North Carolina Department of Agriculture, and still continues in that office and makes his business home in the city of Raleigh. His experience as an active and successful farmer won for him a place not easily filled. In this position he has the confidence of the people, and the Department is to be congratulated that one so efficient and up to date in methods of agriculture, is at the forefront to lead and advise. Major Graham's activities in his county and State have led to many important improvements in methods of agriculture and the administration of law, and always with no spirit of self-aggrandizement, but for the good of the whole.

The North Carolina Booklet has been enriched by his historical articles, and hopes for others, that its readers may become more familiar with events in our State's history which have had less prominent attention than they deserve.

PROFESSOR JOHN A. LOMAX

John A. Lomax writes for this issue of The Booklet "Some Ballads of North Carolina," and though not a native of this State, he is a Southerner and takes unusual interest in all that concerns this section of the United States. He was born in Mississippi and his parents removed to Texas when he was but one year old. He was educated at the University of Texas, where he took both the A.B. and M.A. degrees. He afterwards studied in Harvard University, where he was awarded the degree of Master of Arts.

During his residence in West Texas he lived near one of the old cattle trails, and naturally became interested in cowboy songs, which finally resulted in a collection of these songs, published in 1910. His work in ballad collecting has received the recognition of Harvard University, by his appointment for two successive years as Sheldon Fellow for the investigation of American ballads.

After graduating from the University of Texas, Mr. Lomax served for six years as Registrar, and then became Instructor in English in the Agricultural and Mechanical College of Texas, and afterwards Associate Professor of English in that institution. He is at present again connected with the University of Texas as Secretary of the University and Assistant Director of the Department of Extension. He expects eventually to issue a series of volumes, possibly as many as six, covering the whole field of the American ballad.

The pages of THE BOOKLET are ever open to literary productions of this nature, and especially to such as relate to North Carolina and her people.

DR. RICHARD DILLARD

A biographical sketch of Dr. Dillard was published in the July BOOKLET, October, 1906.*

Dr. Dillard was one of the first contributors, his leading article, "The Edenton Tea Party of October 25, 1774," and which was commented on in the biographical sketch. Since that time Dr. Dillard has contributed five other interesting articles, a list of which we append:

(2) "Hayes, and Its Builder," Vol. II, December, 1902.

(3) "The Indian Tribes of Eastern North Carolina."

(4) "St. Paul's Church, Edenton, N. C., and Its Associations," Vol. V, July, 1905.

(5) "Some Heroines of the Revolution in North Carolina," Vol. VIII, April, 1909.

(6) "Some Early Physicians of the Albemarle," Vol. XI, July, 1911.

*This was the first year, beginning in July, 1906, that the Biographical and Genealogical Memoranda was introduced as a feature of this publication.

ROWAN COUNTY WILLS

COMPILED BY MRS. M. G. McCUBBINS.

Alexander Clingerman, a farmer (Book C, page 234), June 19, 1803. Wife: Elizabeth. Sons: Michael (land on Second Creek), Jacob (the youngest and not of age), George (the eldest), Peter, Henry. Daughters: Esther and Catherine. Executors: Sons Michael and Peter and friend Fredrick Fisher. Test: David Woodson and Martha Woodson.

Augustine Davenpord (Book E, page 238), September 30, 1799. Wife: Mary "Davenport." Daughters: Sary, Detphy, Susanna Jane, Anna, Mary, Elizabeth. Sons: Augustine, James, David, Joel and Jesse. Executors: Wife Mary, son Augustine, and son-in-law Thomas Jackson. Test: William Jackson and Geremias Arnold.

Thomas Allison (Book E, page 272), February 12, 1780. Wife: Martha. Sons: Richard and Thomas. Daughters: Naomi and Ann (there may be other children). Executors: Adam and Theophilus Allison. Test: James Tinley and Theophilus Simonton.

Robert Wilson (Book D, page 239), June, 1797. Wife: Elizabeth. Daughters: Mary Davis, Rachel Parke and Elizbeth Ennox (this may have been his wife[?]). Step-grandson: Wilson Jones. Witnesses: Richard Wilson and John Wilson, Jr.

John Wilson (Book D, page 242), May 10, 1800. Sons: John (all of the land to him and his son Andrew), James, Samuel. Daughters: Elizabeth Frost, Mary Boon, Sarah Harper. Executors: Son John and Spruce Macay. Test: Elizabeth Macay, Jacob Wiseman, Jurat(?) and Spruce Macay.

Elizabeth Wilson (Book E, page 10), February 19, 1799. (She was from county of York, in South Carolina.) Niece:

Mary Thomson. Umprey Williams. Test: Thaddeus Shurley, Moses Thomson and Francis Whitney.

Thomas Bell (Book D, page 147), November 15, 1792, and probated in 1800. Wife: Catharina. Daughters: Agnes Reed and Elizabeth Carradine. Sons: William (the eldest), Thomas, James. Grandson: John (son of James). Son-in-law: Patrick Sloan. Witnesses: David McNeely, Archibald McNeely, Jr., and James Brandon.

MARRIAGE BONDS* OF ROWAN COUNTY, N. C.

James Andrews to Martha Niblock. May 14, 1762. James Andrews, Richard King and Henry Horah, Robert Johnston. (Will Reed.)

David Alexander to Margaret Davison. April 1, 1762. David Alexander, Henry Lively and John Johnston, Will Morrison. (Will Reed.)

William Archibald to Martha McCorkell. January 8, 1765. William Archbald, Alexr. M. Corkle and John Archbald. (John Frohock.)

Thomas Archbald to Martha Edmont. March 23, 1765. Thomas Archbald and John Edmont. (Thomas Frohock.)

William Adams to Elizth Edmond. January 25(?), 1766. William (his X mark) Adams, David Black and Joseph (his X mark) Erwin. (Thomas Frohock.)

John Ashurst to Judith Johnson. October 22, 1767. John (his X mark) Ashurst and William Frohock. (Thos. Frohock.) A note enclosed from bride's father, Gideon Johnson.

John Adams to Winne Bussell. August 15, 1768. John Addams and Edward Turner. (Thomas Frohock.) The following note from the bride's father: "Cornall frohock Sir please to grant John Addams Lisons to mary my daughter Winne and you will oblige your friend Given from under my hand on this 15 day of August 1768 Farnsed(?) Bussell, Elizabeth Bussell."

*Some are almost illegible and some have the same name spelt in two ways. When possible I have copied the signatures.

William Armstrong to Margaret Woods. August 23, 1768. William Armstrong, William Temple Cole and John Brandon. (Tho. Frohock.)

Abel Armstrong to Margret Cowan. September 16, 1768. Abel Armstrong, James Dobbin and Jas. Brandon. (Thomas Frohock.)

William Alexander to Mary Brandon. January 21, 1769. William Alexander and John Dunn. (Tho. Frohock.)

Adam Allison to Mary Barr. January 6, 1770. Adam Allison and Andrew Allison. (Thomas Frohock.) A note from bride's mother, "Ceatherin Barr."

Gabriel Alexander to Jane Black. January 19, 1770. Gabriel Alexander, David Black and Max: Chambers. (Thomas Frohock.)

Thomas Allison to Martha Gillespy. January 20, 1770. Thomas Allison, Benj.[d] Milner and Thomas Frohock. (John Frohock.)

Timothy Anderson to Elizabeth Sloan. March 20, 1770. Timothy Anderson and William Moore. (Thomas Frohock.) A note from bride's father, Scot(?) Henry Sloan, giving permission for "Bettey" to be married on Thursday.

William Aldridge to Hannah Bell. December 18, 1772. William (his W mark) Aldridge and John Littel. (Ad. Osborn.) A note from John Irvin saying that Hannah Bell was a "free woman" who lived in his home. Dated from Hunting Creek, December 16, 1772.

Robert Adams to Elizabeth Fleming. February 19, 1773. Robert Adams and Alexander Endsley. (Max: Chambers.)

Robert Arthurs (Arteres?) to Sarah Allen, a widow. March 1, 1773. Robert Arteres, Adam Terrence (Tarance?) and Moses Winsley. (Ad. Osborn.)

James Alexander to Margaret Ireland. May 7, 1773. James Alexander and James Ireland. (Ad. Osborn.)

Henry Aggenger(?) to Maria Mothllena Kircher(?),

June 15, 1774. Henry Aggenger(?) and Philip Virvill(?). (Ad Osborn.)

Richard Armstrong to Margaret Osborn. December 27, 1774. Richard Armstrong and Ad Osborn. (No name.)

Christopher Aesan to Margaret Smith. September 4, 1775. Christopher (his X mark) Aesan and Daniel Smith and John Lowrance. (D[d] Flowers.)

Henry Aggner(?) to Elizabeth Erry(?). September 30, 1775. Henry Aggner(?) and Anthony Soett. (D[d] Flowers.)

William Adams to Mary Baker. December 6, 1775. William (his a mark) Adams and Charles (his C mark) Baker. (Max: Chambers.)

John Andrews to Jean McCuan(?). March 28, 1776. John Andrews and James McKenn(?), (Ad. Osborn.)

Jacob Adams to Mar Touson(?). January 7, 1777. Jacob (his X mark) Adams and Spencer (his X mark) Adams. (No name.)

John Alexander to Susanna Alexander. November 7, 1778. John Alexander and Samuel Hogsed. (Ad. Osborn.)

William Anderson to Elizabeth Homes. August 6, 1779. William Anderson and Francis (his X mark) Homes. (Jo. Brevard.)

Benjamin Abbott to Mary Hudgins. March 16, 1781. Benjamin Abbott and Ad. Osborn. A note from bride's father, William Hudgens.

Daniel Adams to Sarah Irvin. November 7, 1780(?). Daniel (his X mark) Adams and Walter Irvin(?). (H. Giffard?).

William Abbot (a planter) to Lydia Grist (a spinster). February 28, 1780. William (his X mark) Abbot and Benjamin (his X mark) Grist. (B. Booth Boote?).

Matthew Adams to Anne Howsley. February 20, 1780. Matthew (his X mark) Adams and Robert (his X mark) Howsley. (B. Booth Boote?)

Peter Albright to Mary Dillon. February 5, 1780(?). Peter (his X mark) Albright and Michael Albright. (No name.)

John Avitts to Sarah Rimmonton. October 18, 1779. John (his J mark) Avitts and John (his X mark) Huntsman. (Jo. Brevard.)

Benjamin Albenny to Sarah Gracy(?). January 7, 1782. Benjamin Albenny and John Greacey. (No name.)

James Andrew to Mary Scott. February 22, 1782. James Andrew and Robert Scott. (Ad. Osborn.)

George Admire to Ruth Jones. (No date.) 1781 (?) George Admire, James (his X mark) Jones. (No name.)

John Andrews to Margaret Andrews. March 4, 1783. John Andrews and John Andrews. (Will[m] Crawford.)

Joseph Arthur to Sarah Duncan. June 17, 1783. Joseph Arthur and Thos. Duncan. (Ad. Osborn.)

Richard Allison(?) to Lettice(?) Niel. July 26, 1785(?) Richard Allison and William Niell. (H. Magoune.)

Joseph Andrews to Zephiah Barnes. May 5, 1786. Joseph (his X mark) Andrews and W. Moore. (John Macay.)

John Alexander to June (?) Lackey. February 2, 1786. John Alexander and George Leckey (Luckey or Leekey). (No name.)

Theophilus Allison to Elizabeth Niel. January 10, 1786. Theophilus Allison and Andrew Snopdey(?). (Wm. Erwin.)

Frederick Allimong to Hughley Shersate. December 19, 1786. Frederick (his X mark) Allimong and Daniel Allemong. (Jno. Macay.)

Thomas Adams to Mary Lynon(?). February 22, 1787. Thomas (his X mark) Adams and William Scudder. (Edm Gamble.)

James Adkins to Anne Johnston. April 2, 1787. James Atkinson and Obadiah Smith. (Jno Macay.)

Ephrame Adams to Eleonor Brian. September 25, 1789. Ephrame (his X mark) and Daniel (his X mark) Adams.

Daniel Allemong to Elizabeth Bartlett. February 7, 1788. Daniel Allemong and Nicholas Bringle. (J. McCunn.)

Thomas Allen to Marjira Brion. May 26, 1789. Thomas Allen and William huey (?). (W.[?] J. L. Alexander.)

Silvester Adams to Hannah Stineen. July 8, 1790. Silvester (his X mark) and Ephram (his X mark) Adams. (Basil Gaither.)

James Aytcherson, Jr., to Cristina Miller. February 25, 1791. James (his X mark) Aytcherson, Jr., and Stephen (his X mark) Noland, Senior. (Basil Gaither.)

Isaac Adams to Hannah Fillips. June 25, 1791. Isaac (his X mark) Adams and Edmond (his X mark) Adams. (Basil Gaither.

Abraham Adams, Jr., to (a blank) Howard. August 25, 1791. Abraham (his X mark) Adams, Jr., and John Ball. (Basil Gaither.)

Abel Armstrong to Mary Roseborough. December 7(?), 1791. Abel Armstrong and Chas. Harris. (Chs. Caldwell.)

Isaac Adams to Margaret Winford. May 22, 1792. Isaac (his X mark) Adams and Daniel (his X mark) Adams. (G. Enochs?).

Richard Armstrong to Elizabeth Gibson. Aug. 8, 1792. Richard Armstrong and Henry Hughey. (Chas. Caldwell.)

Thomas Anderson to Martha Dickey. October 8, 1792. Thomas Anderson and Mick Troy(?). (Jo. Chambers.)

Hugh Allen to Martha Swan. November 10, 1792. Hugh Allen and Richard Trotter. (Jo. Chambers.)

John Adams to Mary Hunt. February 15, 1793. John Adams and William Lucky. (Jo^{s} Chambers.)

John Aldridge(?) to (no name). February 26, 1793. John Aldrige and G. Wood. (Jo^{s} Chambers.)

Alexander Auston to Anna Braly. March 23, 1793. Alexander Aston and John Braly. (Max Chambers.)

Nicholas Aldrege to Sarah Knock. August 9, 1793. Nicholas Aldrege and Fredrick (his X mark) Allimong. (Jo^{s} Chambers.)

Jeremiah Allen to Susanah Spoon. October 2, 1794. Jeremiah (his X mark) Allen and Evan X Davis. (John Eccles, Esqr.)

Peter Adams to Ann Smith (or Sneth?). December 29, 1794. Peter Adams and Leonard Crider. (M—Troy.)

Killian Jarrett to Eliz. Clingerman. January 2, 1795. Killian Jarrett and John ——(?) (No name.)

James Anderson to Mary Graham. May 27, 1795. James Anderson and Andrew Irwine. (I Troy, D. C.)

William Adams to Elenor Simpson. March 18, 1795. William (his X mark) and Ross Simson. (I. Troy, D. C.)

John Adams to Esther Hawkins. October 3, 1795(?). John Adams and Isaac Jones. (I. Troy.)

Thomas Avery to Peggy Buck. May 12, 1797. Thomas (his A mark) Avery and John (his A mark) Avery. (—— Rogers?)

John Adams to Betsy Reed. January 30, 1797. John Adams and Wm. (his X mark) Adams. (No name.)

George Andrews to Catharine Barr. December 8, 1798. George Andrews and John Barr. (Edwin J. Osborn, D. C.)

Samuel Anderson to Anna Knox(?). January 24, 1800. Samuel Anderson and Robert Johnton. (Edwin J. Osborn.)

Isaac Anderson to Elizabeth Hunter. March 14, 1801. Isaac Anderson and John (H) Howard. (John Brem [?], D. C.)

James Anderson to Nelly Miller. October 3, 1801. James Anderson and William Wood. (Jno. Brem [?], D.) C.

Daniel Agener to Resina(?) Basinger. July 12, 1802. Daniel Agener and Jacob Ribeler (?). (Jno. Brem, D.) C.

George Agle to Susanah Huldemer(?). October 15(?), 1802. George Agle(?) and John (his X mark) Agle. (A. Osborn, D. C.)

Thomas Adams to Polly Michel. April 19, 1803. Thomas (his X mark) Adams and William Harwood. (John Marsh?)

Samuel Austin to Lyda Railsback. Jan. 24, 1803. Samuel Austin and Wilson Russum(?). (J. Hunt.)

William Aderton to Charity Daniel. February 9, 1804. William Aderton and James Daniel. (A. L. Osborn.)

Jesse Adams to Mary Noland. August 6, 1804. Jesse (his X mark) Adams and William Whitaker. (No name.)

John Andrews to Ruth Delow. October 13, 1805. John Andrews and Bat. Williams. (Jno. Monroe?)

Nelson Anderson to Margret Smoot. May 24, 1806. Nelson Anderson and Frederick thompson. (John Marsh, Sr.)

Josiah Albertson to Alie Ruddack. July 7, 1805. Josiah (his X mark) Albertson and James Cunnaday (Kenaday?). (William Peggott.)

John Andrews to Catharine Bell. May 23, 1807. John Andrews and William Bell. (A. L. Osborne.)

Charles Anderson to Eleander Smoot. December 5, 1808. Charles Anderson and James Smott (Smoot?). (Jno. Marsh, Sr.)

Henry Arnhard to Susanna Hartlin. October 27, 1808. Henry (his X mark) Arnhard and George (his X mark) Hartline. (A. L. Osborne.)

Peter Agenor to Catharine Rough. October 21, 1809. Peter (his X mark) and John Smathers(?). (No name.)

James Atkinson to Polly Hartley. December 13, 1809. James Atkinson and Peter (his X mark) Winkler. (Jno. Giles.)

Peter Albright, Jr., to Catharine Albright. January 17, 1810. Peter Albright(?) and Peter Albright, Sr. (Geo. Dunn.)

Jesse Alberson(?) to Ann Baily(?). August 22, 1810. Jesse Alberson(?) and Joseph Albertson. (Jno. Giles.)

John Armsworthy to Susannah Bates. December 15, 1810. John C. Armsworthy and Aquillar Cheshier(?). (Jno. Marsh.)

Henry Allemong to Nancy Todd. April 25, 1811. Henry Allemong and George Betz. (Jno. Giles.)

John Albright to Peggy Lamb. April 24, 1811. John Albright and Peter Albright. (Ezra Allemong.)

Joseph Adams to Jensy Tussey. May 22, 1811. Joseph Adams and James welling. (Geo. Dunn.)

John Aulford to Polly Markland. September 20 (8 ?), 1811. John Alford and John Markland. (W. Ellis.)

Abraham Arey to Catharine Clingerman. November 23, 1811. Abraham Arey and John Airy. (Jno. Giles.)

Abraham Allen to Mary Allender Nailer. December 13, 1811. Abraham Allen and Jacob Allen. (Jno. Marsh, Sr.)

Benjamin Agenor to Caty Bullon. December 17, 1811. Benjamin (X) Agenor and John Trexeller(?) (Geo. Dunn.)

Abraham Alston and John Roe(?) to Winny Daniel. January 16, 1812. Abraham (his X mark) Alstin and John (his X mark) Roe(?). (J. Willson.) (The above is very faulty, but the family may know.)

Peter Albright to Mary Correll. March 9, 1812. Peter Albright and Phillip Correll. (Geo. Dunn.)

William Abbott to Hannah Myres. December 23, 1812. William Abbott and Abraham Jacobs. (Jno. Giles.)

Henry Adams to Betsy Baleman(?). February 8, 1813. Henry Adams and James Walling. (Geo. Dunn.)

Joseph Abbott to Lucy Myers. February 17, 1813. Joseph Abbott and Abraham Jacobs. (Jno. Giles.)

Isaac Allen to Sally Hawkins. August 31, 1813. Isaac Allen and Ebenezer Frost. (R. Powell.)

Lewis Aplen to Mary Bannerfut. September 28, 1813. Lewis (his X mark) Aplen and Peter Younce. (I. Willson.)

Michael Akel to Polly Flemmon. December 12, 1813. Michael Akel and George Lowry. (John Hanes.)

Peter Agle to Peggy Stirwalt. April 30, 1814. Peter Eagle and Joseph Basinger. (Jno. Giles.)

Michael Anderson to Jensy Hartley. October 29, 1814. Michael Anderson and Henry Allemong. (Geo. Dunn.)

Isaac Aley to Sally Setlif(?). May 4, 1815. Isaac (his X mark) Aley and Samuel X Nedding (?). (Jno. Giles.)

Garland Anderson to Sally Frost. July 15, 1815. Garland Anderson and R. Powell. (R. Powell.)

Thomas Archibald to Sarah F. Luckey. January 30, 1816. Thomas Archibald and William Potts. (Jno. Giles.)

Samuel Agenor to Polly Grubb. April 15, 1816. Samuel (his X mark) Agenor and Samuel Lemly. (Geo. Dunn.)

Peter Ader to Betsy Rickett. April 28, 1816. Peter (his X mark) Ader and Samuel (his X mark) Bird. (J. Willson.)

James Atkinson to Mary Berry. May 1, 1816. James Atkinson and William (his X mark) Adams. (Henry Giles.)

James Austin to Margaret S. Gambal. May 27, 1816. J. L. Austin and Bennet Austin. (R. Powell.)

Daniel Airy to Rebecca Rttman(?). August 29, 1816. Daniel (his X mark) Airy and Adam Kauble (Cauble?). (Jno. Giles.)

Starling Abbott to Nancy Mervil. September 7, 1816. Starling (his X mark) Abbott and William Mervil (Merrel?). (Henry Giles.)

Peter Adams to Sally Walton. October 17, 1816. Peter Adams and Ezra Allemong.

Gabil Aery to Prissy Parker. October 23, 1816. Gabriel Avery and Daniel (his X mark) Aery. (Milo A. Giles.)

Bennet Austin to Margaret Carson. February 9, 1817. Bennet Austin and Basil G. Jones. (R. Powell.)

Peter Albright to Betsey Fink. December 12, 1817. Peter (his X mark) Albright and John Albright(?). (Milo A. Giles.)

Shadrach Aytcheson to Lydia O'rel. January 6, 1818. Shadrach Aytcheson and Wm. Aytcheson. (R. Powell.)

Riley Aytcheson to Mary Black. January 22, 1814 (or '18). Riley (his X mark) Aytcheson and Silas (his X mark) Aytcheson. (Jno. R. Palmer, Saml. Jones.)

Jacob Agner to Betsey Waller. January 28, 1818. Jacob (his X mark) Agner and george Waller (?). (Jno. Giles.)

Jacob Allen to Barbary Balance. October 31, 1818. Jacob Allen and Robert McClamrock. (R. Powell.)

Jeremiah Airey to Christena Eller. March 25, 1819. Jeremiah Airy and Abraham Airey(?). (Jno. Giles.)

Wm. Adams to Elizabeth Hall. September 2, 1819. Wm. Adams and John Tomlinson. (R. Powell.)

Stephen Allen to Sally Deever. December 26, 1819. Stephen Allen and Samuel Smith. (R. Powell.)

John Area to Mary Redwine. March 23, 1820. John Area and Peter Arey. (No name.)

Andrew Allison to Jane Knox. February 4, 1820. Andrew Allison and Richard Gillespie. (Jno. Giles.)

William Albertson to Margaret Elliott. January 16, 1820. William Albertson and Shadrack M. Gevandan. (L. Hunt.)

Henry Albright to Christena Kesler. April 24, 1820. Henry Albright and John Albright. (Hy [?] Giles.)

Lazerus Apling to Susana Hill. May 8, 1820. Lazerus (his X mark) Apling and Reuben Johnson. (J. Willson.)

Jeremiah Akels to Elizabeth Johnson. August 3, 1820. Jeremiah eakels and James (his X mark) Johnson. (No name.)

James Adderton to Martha Parker. August 15, 1820. James Adderton and Barham Parker. (Jno. Giles.)

INFORMATION

Concerning the Patriotic Society

"Daughters of the Revolution"

The General Society was founded October 11, 1890,—and organized August 20, 1891,—under the name of "Daughters of the American Revolution"; was incorporated under the laws of the State of New York as an organization national in its work and purpose. Some of the members of this organization becoming dissatisfied with the terms of entrance, withdrew from it and, in 1891, formed under the slightly differing name "Daughters of the Revolution," eligibility to which from the moment of its existence has been lineal descent from an ancestor who rendered patriotic service during the War of Independence.

"The North Carolina Society"

a subdivision of the General Society, was organized in October, 1896, and has continued to promote the purposes of its institution and to observe the Constitution and By-Laws.

Membership and Qualifications

Any woman shall be eligible who is above the age of eighteen years, of good character, and a lineal descendant of an ancestor who (1) was a signer of the Declaration of Independence, a member of the Continental Congress, Legislature or General Court, of any of the Colonies or States; or (2) rendered civil, military or naval service under the authority of any of the thirteen Colonies, or of the Continental Congress; or (3) by service rendered during the War of the Revolution became liable to the penalty of treason against the government of Great Britain: Provided, that such ancestor always remained loyal to the cause of American Independence.

The chief work of the North Carolina Society for the past eight years has been the publication of the "North Carolina Booklet," a quarterly publication on great events in North Carolina history—Colonial and Revolutionary. $1.00 per year. It will continue to extend its work and to spread the knowledge of its History and Biography in other States.

This Society has its headquarters in Raleigh, N. C., Room 411, Carolina Trust Company Building, 232 Fayetteville Street.

Vol. XI OCTOBER, 1911 No. 2

The North Carolina Booklet

"Carolina! Carolina! Heaven's blessings attend her!
While we live we will cherish, protect and defend her."

Published by
THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY
DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION

The object of the Booklet is to aid in developing and preserving North Carolina History. The proceeds arising from its publication will be devoted to patriotic purposes. Editor.

ADVISORY BOARD OF THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET

Mrs. Hubert Haywood.
Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.
Mrs. Spier Whitaker.
Mr. R. D. W. Connor.
Dr. D. H. Hill.
Dr. E. W. Sikes.
Mr. W. J. Peele.
Miss Adelaide L. Fries.
Miss Martha Helen Haywood.
Dr. Richard Dillard.
Dr. Kemp P. Battle.
Mr. James Sprunt.
Mr. Marshall DeLancey Haywood.
Chief Justice Walter Clark.
Major W. A. Graham.
Dr. Charles Lee Smith.

EDITOR:
Miss Mary Hilliard Hinton.

OFFICERS OF THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION 1910-1912

REGENT:
Miss MARY HILLIARD HINTON.

VICE-REGENT:
Miss DUNCAN CAMERON WINSTON.

HONORARY REGENTS:
Mrs. SPIER WHITAKER.
Mrs. E. E. MOFFITT.

RECORDING SECRETARY:
Mrs. CLARENCE JOHNSON.

CORRESPONDING SECRETARY:
Mrs. PAUL H. LEE.

TREASURER:
Mrs. FRANK SHERWOOD.

REGISTRAR:
Mrs. JOSEPH CHESHIRE WEBB, Jr.

CUSTODIAN OF RELICS:
Mrs. JOHN E. RAY.

CHAPTER REGENTS

Bloomsbury Chapter.....Mrs. Hubert Haywood, Regent.
Penelope Barker Chapter.....Mrs. Patrick Matthew, Regent.
Sir Walter Raleigh Chapter,
Miss Catherine F. Seyton Albertson, Regent.
DeGraffenried Chapter.....Mrs. Charles Slover Hollister, Regent.

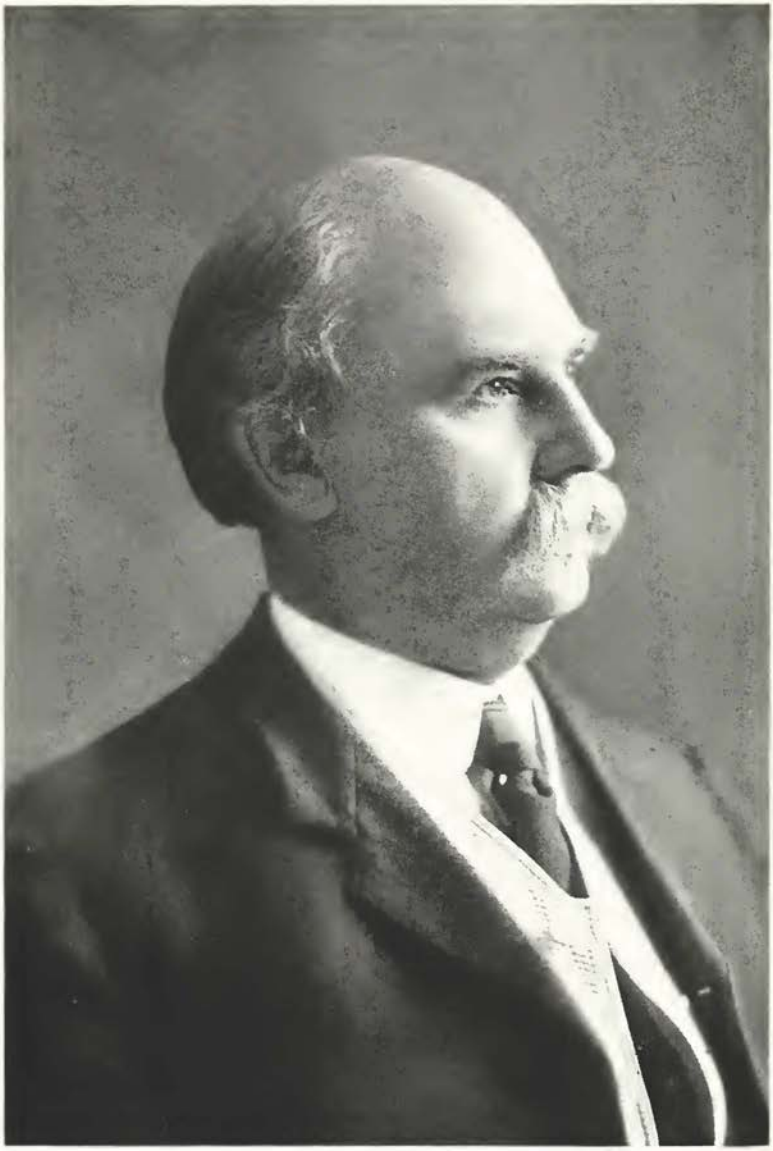
Founder of the North Carolina Society and Regent 1896-1902:
Mrs. SPIER WHITAKER.

Regent 1902:
Mrs. D. H. HILL, Sr.*

Regent 1902-1906:
Mrs. THOMAS K. BRUNER.

Regent 1906-1910:
Mrs. E. E. MOFFITT.

*Died December 12, 1904.



Walter Clark

CHIEF JUSTICE OF THE SUPREME COURT OF NORTH CAROLINA

THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET

Vol. XI OCTOBER, 1911 No. 2

ROANOKE ISLAND*

Standing on the Aventine hill, by the banks of the Tiber, we can still behold the cradle of the great Roman people, the beginning of that imperial race which for centuries held in its control the entire civilized world of their day and whose laws, whose feat of arms, whose thought, have profoundly impressed all succeeding ages.

HERE BEGAN THE GREATEST MOVEMENT OF THE AGES.

Standing here we see the spot where first began on this continent the great race which in the New World in three hundred years has far surpassed in extent of dominion, in population and power the greatest race known to the Old. Farther than the imperial eagles ever flew, over more men than its dominion ever swayed, with wealth which dwarfs its boasted treasures, and intelligence and capacity unknown to its rulers, this new race in three centuries has covered a continent, crossed great rivers, built great cities, tunneled mountains, traversed great plains, scaled mountain ranges and halting but for a moment on the shores of a vaster ocean, has already annexed a thousand islands and faces the shores of a Western continent so distant that we call it the East.

We do well to come here to visit the spot where this great movement began. It was one of the great epochs of all history. Here, 36 years before the landing of the Pilgrims at Plymouth Rock; here, 23 years before John Smith and Jamestown, in the year 1584, the first English keel grated on the shores of what is now the United States. Here the greatest movement of the ages began, which has completed the circuit of the globe. For thousands of years, God in His wisdom had hidden this land behind the billows till His appointed time, and in Europe and Asia millions had fought and perished for the possession of narrow lands. The human intellect had been dwarfed with the dimensions of its prison house. In due season Copernicus gauged the heavens, revealing countless worlds beyond our grasp, and Columbus almost at the same time unveiled this tangible world beyond the Atlantic. Stunned, dazed, the mind of man slowly realized the broadened vision unrolled before it. Since then the energies of the human intellect have steadily expanded, and thought has widened with the process of every sun.

*Address of Judge Walter Clark at meeting inaugurated by the State Literary and Historical Association, Manteo, N. C., 24 July, 1902.

Here broke the spray of the first wave of Saxon population and now westward across the continent to the utmost verge and beyond it, there rolls a human sea. Three centuries have done this.

About this very date Amidas and Barlowe landed here, for on July 4, a day doubly memorable on these shores, they descried land and sailing up the coast 120 miles they entered with their two small vessels through an inlet, probably now closed. Proceeding further they came abreast of this island, where they landed and were hospitably received.

WHAT WONDROUS CHANGES.

Nature remains unaltered. As on that July day, of the long ago, earth, air and sky and sea remain the same. The same blue arch bends above us. The same restless ocean rolls. The same sun shines brightly down. The same balmy breezes breathe soft and low. The same headlands jut out to meet the waves. The same bays lie open to shelter the coming vessels. The trees, the foliage, the landmarks, would all be recognized by the sea-worn wanderers of that memorable day. But as to what is due to man, how altered!

To the westward, where the Indian paddled his light canoe on great rivers, innumerable vessels, moved by the energies of steam, plow the waters, freighted with the product of every industry and the produce of every clime. Where the smoke of the lonely wigwam rose, now the roar of great cities fills the ear and the blaze of electric lights reddens the sky. Where then amid vast solitudes the war-whoop resounded, boding death and torture, now rise a thousand steeples and anthems to the Prince of Peace float upon the air. Where the plumed and painted warrior stealthily trod the narrow war path, mighty engines rush. Where a few thousand naked savages miserably starved and fought and perished, near one hundred millions of the foremost people of all the world live and prosper. Three short centuries have seen this done.

OUR CONTRIBUTION TO EUROPE.

Looking eastward the ocean rolls unchanged, but not as then to be crossed only after two or three months of voyage. Already a week suffices for its passage and across its waves even now messages flash without the medium of wires. Beyond its shores is also a new world. When the first expedition landed here, the Turk was threatening Vienna, and the Spaniard was asserting his right to burn and pillage in Holland. The fires of the Inquisition burned in Spain and Belgium. France, sunk to a second-class power, grovelled beneath the rule of one of the most worthless of its many worthless kings, the third Henry—while England, the England of Drake and Raleigh, of Shakespeare and Bacon, and of Elizabeth, already lay beneath the growing shadow of the Armada, whose success threatened the extinction of English liberty and of the Protestant religion. Russia was then a small collection of barbarous tribes, and Germany and Italy, not yet nations, were mere geographical expressions. Contrast that with the Europe of today. The change is barely less startling there than on this side of the water.

The change has been greatly due to the reflex action from this side. Civilization has been and is on the steady increase in the betterment of the masses. The leaders of thought, Shakespeare, Bacon, Michael Angelo, Dante, Petrarch, the painters, the sculptors, the statesmen, were as great then as since. The difference is in the masses. Then they were degraded, disregarded, beaten with many stripes, dying like animals after living like brutes; today they have a voice in every government and are beginning more fully to perceive that they have unlimited power which they can use for their own advancement and the betterment of their material surroundings.

The change started here when a new race began, without feudal burdens and amid the breadth and freedom of untrammeled nature. With new paths to tread, new roads to make, new rivers to travel, new cities to build, men began to think new thoughts and to add to the freedom of nature the liberty of speech and of action.

WHERE THE SHACKLES OF THE AGES WERE BROKEN.

Well do we come here to visit the spot where the shackles of the ages were broken, precedents forgotten and where man first began to stand upright in the likeness in which God had made him.

Naught tells more forcibly the depression in which the minds of the men of that day were held than the fact that the hardy English mariners, the descendants of the Vikings of old, delayed nearly a century after Columbus had discovered the New World before the foot of an Anglo-Saxon had trod the shores of North America. From the discovery in 1492 to the first landing here in 1584 and the first permanent but feeble settlement at Jamestown in 1607 was a long time. Could another new continent such as this be discovered in 3,000 miles of London today, not as many hours would elapse as our ancestors of three centuries ago permitted years to pass, before the English race would land on its shores. In 1520 Cortez led the Spaniards to the Plateau of Mexico and subverted an empire. Yet 65 years more passed before Amidas and Barlowe led the first English expedition to land on this continent.

Not only were men's minds enthralled by governments which existed solely for the benefit of the few, but the condition of the upper classes was only in degree better than that of the poorer. Coffee, sugar, tobacco, potatoes and other articles of common use by the poorest today were unknown. Queen Elizabeth herself lived on beer and beef, and forks being unknown that haughty lady ate with her fingers, as did Shakespeare, Raleigh and Bacon. Articles of the commonest use and necessity in the dwellings of the poorest now, were then not to be obtained in the palaces of kings. Carpets were absent in the proudest palaces and on the fresh strewn rushes beneath their tables princes and kings threw the bones and broken meats from their feasts. Religion was to most a gross superstition, law was a jargon and barbarous, and medicine the vilest quackery. Just in proportion as the masses have been educated, as freedom has been won by them, as their rights have been considered, the world has advanced in civilization and in material well being.

Unlike the founding of Rome, where the seat of Empire abode by its cradle, no great cities arose here at Roanoke Island, at Jamestown nor at Plymouth. The new movement begun here was not for empire but for the people, and it has advanced and spread in all directions.

THE GREAT DANGER TODAY.

In 1820 Daniel Webster delivered a memorable oration at the anniversary of the landing at Plymouth Rock. In that speech he prophesied that our free government could stand only so long as there was a tolerable equality in the division of property. What would he say could he stand here today and count over the names of those possessed of $20,000,000, of $50,000,000, of $100,000,000, even of more than $200,000,000 and name over the great trusts and corporations who levy taxes and contributions at their own will, greater than those exacted for all the purposes of government? He instances that when the great monasteries and other church corporations under the Tudors threatened English prosperity the eighth Henry confiscated their property (as has been done in our day by Mexico and other Latin countries) and redistributed their accumulations. He might have added that when the new commercial monopolies under his daughter Elizabeth bade fair to take the place of the suppressed ecclesiastical foundations in recreating inequality, the Commons called on her to pause and that haughty, unbending sovereign had the common sense to save her throne by yielding.

Mr. Webster also utilized the occasion to point to the fact that in France by her exemption of nobles and priests from taxation, property had gravitated into their hands till the wild orgy of revolution had retransferred it to the people and he prophesied that the new law in that country which by restricting the right to will property had prevented its accumulation into a few hands would inevitably destroy the restored monarchy and rebuild the republic. His prophecy has come true.

The great expounder of the constitution was right. Power goes with those who own the property of the country. When property is widely distributed and a fair share of the comforts of life are equally in the reach of all, a country will remain a republic. When property, by whatever agency, becomes concentrated in a few hands, a change is impending. Either the few holders will bring in, as he stated, an army that will change the government to a monarchy, or revolution will force a redistribution as in England and France. That has been the lesson of history.

SIR WALTER RALEIGH

In this day, of wider intelligence and general education, let us hope and believe that there is a third way, hitherto unknown in practice, and that by the operation of just and wiser laws enacted by the sovereignty of the people, a more just and equal distribution of wealth will follow and the enjoyment of material well being will be more generally diffused among the masses. All power is derived from and belongs to the people and should be used solely for their good. This is the fundamental teaching of the institutions which begin their record from the landing of the Anglo-Saxon race on these shores, a landing which was first made at this spot.

Had I the ability of Mr. Webster, could I speak with his authority, I might point out as he did the great danger of the accumulation of wealth in a few hands, and might foresee and foretell the remedies which a great, a wise and an all-powerful people will apply. But I shall not follow in the path which he has trod, haud passibus equis.

Let us not forget on this occasion that to this island belongs the distinguished honor of being the birthplace of the first American girl. It is the Eden from which she sprung. She had no predecessor and remains without a model and without a rival. In that first Eden man was the first arrival and the garden was a failure. Here the girl was the first arrival and the boys have followed her ever since. Appropriately she bore the name of Dare, and daring, delightful, her successors have been ever since. We do well, were we to come here solely to do honor to the memory of the first American girl, this finished, superlative product of her sex and of these later ages.

NORTH CAROLINA'S FUTURE.

When the first expedition landed here there were, it is estimated, in the bounds of the present State of North Carolina, 20,000 Indians, earning a precarious living by fishing and hunting and spending their miserable lives in slaying and torturing one another. Today we have near 2,000,000 of the foremost race of all the world, living in peace and order. Could I, like Mr. Webster in his Plymouth Rock oration, prophesy as to the future—100 years hence—I should predict a still greater change. I should say that with the same rate of increase North Carolina will then have 6,000,000 of people and that cities of 100,000 inhabitants will be numbered by the score; that every village will be connected with its neighbor by electric roads, for steam will have ceased to be a motive power; that education will be universal and poverty unknown; that every swamp will have been drained to become the seat of happy homes; that every river will be deepened and straightened; that public works operated for the benefit of the people and not for the enrichment of a few, will bring comforts and conveniences, now unknown, to the most distant fireside; that the hours of labor will be shortened; that the toil of agriculture will be done by machinery and that irrigation will have banished droughts; that the advance of medicine, already the most progressive science among us, will have practically abolished all diseases save that of old age; that simpler laws and an elevated and all powerful public opinion will have minimized crime and reduced the volume of litigation; that religion less sectarian and disputatious about creeds and forms will be a practical exemplification of that love of fellow man which was typified by its divine founder; that every toiler with brains or with hand will prosper and that under juster laws the only inequality in wealth or condition will be that due to the difference in the energy, efforts and natural gifts of each possessor.

This is but the first of many successive celebrations of the landing here and if these feeble, fugitive words shall be preserved to that distant day the speaker who shall read them to a vast audience gathered here will either justify the prophecy or at least he will say, "In the interest of the happiness of the human race, they ought to have come true."

HOW CAN INTEREST BE AROUSED IN THE STUDY OF THE HISTORY OF NORTH CAROLINA?*

Those of you who at dawn have rocked on the restless deep know that when the great sun lifts himself upon the horizon a breeze always springs up and with the new light a new breath from heaven walks upon the face of the waters. So in North Carolina as the doors swing wide open to the coming Twentieth Century, we feel that a new spirit is moving upon the face of the land. A new epoch is at hand. Universal education must soon come and with it will come the untold development of our resources and of the energies of our people. We feel that farther west than the fabled island of Atlantis, this land of North Carolina is rising into the sunlight of a grander and a more perfect day.

To no other agency is so much credit due for this great movement as to this Association. Though I believe this is only the eighteenth annual meeting of your body, you have in these seventeen years completely revolutionized public sentiment in this State upon the subject of public schools. The beautiful words of Barry Yelverton, Lord Avonmore, on another subject, can with justice be applied to you in connection with the public school system of this State: "You found it a skeleton and you have clothed it with life, color and complexion; you have embraced the cold statue and at your touch it has grown into youth, beauty and vigor." Instead of being barely tolerated, our public schools are now deemed of the first necessity and no public man and no respectable section of society dare oppose them. They are becoming our pride and the only real question is so to readjust taxation that a sum adequate to their just and proper support shall be laid upon those best able to bear it.

*Address by Judge Walter Clark, President of N. C. Literary and Historical Society, before the Teachers' Assembly, Wrightsville, N. C., 12 June, 1901.

You are to be congratulated upon the $200,000 appropriated from the general fund, which is due to your efforts. Though inadequate, it is an installment upon the pledges made for the education of the children. It is also significant of the growth in public sentiment that every election this spring upon the subject of graded schools has been favorable and indeed in some places unanimous.

The North Carolina Literary and Historical Association, though organized only last fall, has been, I am proud to say, as I have the honor to be its president, of some assistance to you in this great work. It was in one of our meetings that the plan of public school libraries was formulated. The draft of the bill as originally suggested by Professor Grimsley was with some amendments adopted by the General Assembly, having been ably and eloquently championed by Senator H. S. Ward and other progressive and public spirited members.

Though now limited to six school districts in each county with a library of $30 each, this is a good beginning. It will not be long before the library will be extended to every school district in the State, and the appropriation for each library will be increased.

The subject you have assigned me, "How to Encourage the Study of the History of North Carolina," struck me with surprise. It is related of the great Hannibal that a certain philosopher undertook to point out to him the defects in his system of strategy, with possibly some criticism of his lingering so long around Capua. The old warrior listened with such interest that some one ventured to ask him afterwards what he thought of the philosopher. "Why," he said, "he had such cheek I was bound to listen to see what he would say next." I do not understand why I have been selected to talk of war in the presence of so many Hannibals—if some one present who is skilled in the Punic tongue will tell me the feminine for Hannibal—I will add in the presence of so many Hannibals and lady Hannibals. I can only account for it upon the popular superstition, which is entirely unfounded, that a lawyer's cheek is equal to anything. It is so hard for a superstition to die out!

The first requisite for the encouragement of the study of history is a sufficient school term and suitable school houses in which it may be taught. First "catch your rabbit" precedes all directions as to how to cook him. With the present school term of little over three months there is not much time for more than the "three R's." All declamation and oratory in favor of longer terms, and all pledges of "education for all the children," are worse than idle unless there is sufficient revenue for the support of the schools.

Your Association has created and directed the public sentiment which is now almost unanimously in favor of an efficient system of public schools. What is needed now is the financial ability which shall draft and enact a modern up-to-date system of taxation which shall raise the necessary funds by the readjustment of the burdens in accordance with modern conditions. It is idle to talk about a nine months' term with the appropriations now available. More money must be had, and a great deal more. It can not be raised by increasing the tax upon land and merchandise, the crude mediæval system which is still so largely in vogue among us. The farmer's business is not prosperous. You can not add to his burdens. Nor can the merchant, who now pays not only a double tax but a threefold or fourfold tax, bear a heavier burden. In the classic language of the day, "the proposition is up to you."

Your able secretary, who for four years has been the efficient superintendent of public schools, has in two reports called the attention of the Legislature to a new source of revenue, hitherto untouched, which he thought could most easily contribute to the support of the public schools. The railroads of this State collect as North Carolina's proportion of their earnings annually over $16,000,000 of which more than $6,000,00 is net profit. Not one dollar of this immense revenue pays one cent of tribute to God nor Cæsar. As they are owned almost entirely by nonresidents, these great net revenues are carried out of the State, never to return, and thus to our permanent impoverishment.

Not in a spirit of hostility to them but in justice to all other taxpayers, Mr. Mebane has called attention to the fact that many other States were raising a large share of their revenue from a tax on the gross earnings of corporations. Illinois lays a tax of eight per cent upon the gross earnings of the Illinois Central, and Governor Odell, of New York, has recommended that all the revenues of that State should be derived from that source alone, leaving the tax upon real and personal property for county purposes. It has been suggested that a tax of five per cent levied upon the $16,000,000 of railroad earnings in this State would raise $800,000 from that source alone which should be a sacred fund devoted solely to school purposes. The tax on the earnings of other great corporations would raise this additional revenue for school purposes to more than $1,000,000 annually. It would not be seriously felt by the subjects of it, for while a tax of five per cent on the $16,000,000 of gross earnings is $800,000 yet as the net earnings of the railroads in North Carolina are over $6,000,000 there would still be left them $5,200,000 net revenue, which is thirteen per cent. net interest upon the $40,000,000 on which they are assessed as the fair value of all their real and personal property in this State. It would seem that they can well afford to pay $800,000 tax on gross earnings when after such payment there will still be left them thirteen per cent net earnings upon the actual value of their property. Every dollar of this sum will be needed before you can have an adequate school fund. As Mr. Mebane said, where else can you get it from parties who can so easily and justly pay it? If there is any better source let us find it. The schools must be supported by taxation.

In making this recommendation Mr. Mebane was but following the examples set us by so many other States. Think what $1,000,000 added to your school fund annually in North Carolina can do! What a real impetus it would give to the cause of education!

Mr. Mebane's recommendation was eminently just, even if it had required a constitutional amendment, but as long as the franchise of the railroads was practically untaxed his recommendation was not open to the objection that "no income can be taxed when the property from which the income is derived is taxed." Another provision to which lobbyists favoring the exemption of the most profitable business in the State did not call attention is in the same clause of the Constitution and requires "all real and personal property to be taxed according to its true value in money." This did not, however, escape the General Assembly of 1901, which has now provided (Ch. 7, Secs. 50 and 43) that the intangible property, the franchise, shall be assessed by taking the aggregate of the market value of the bonds and stocks of any railroad as its true value (which is necessarily so) and that deducting therefrom the valuation of its assessed tangible property, the difference is the value of the franchise. This is as simple and unanswerable as a proposition in Euclid, and is the method recognized by courts, financiers and "the public" (as the statute says). As the market value of the bonds and stocks of the portion of the railroads lying in this State is known to be considerably over $150,000,000 and the assessment of their other property to this time is only $42,000,000, it follows that over $108,000,000 is now added from this hitherto untaxed source, which, on the ad valorem basis, provided in the same statute, will add $720,000 annual revenue. The act provides that it shall be in force from its ratification. If the operation of the act had been postponed, it would have been an exemption of this vast value from taxation which the Legislature could not grant.

The same statute applies to other corporations and thus the franchise tax will appropriate $800,000, the very sum which Mr. Mebane proposed to raise by his tax on gross earnings, but which is now to be raised in a method which is beyond constitutional objection. The requirements of this law are too plain to be misunderstood and we can not presume that there will be any failure to execute it.

Now, it is for you to procure the General Assembly to appropriate this tax on franchises (in lieu of the proposed tax on gross earnings) to the public schools. The watchfulness of those interested in public education will thus be a check upon the influences which by every device and subtlety will endeavor to repeal or evade this tax.

Declamation is cheap. Words butter no parsnips. If this people is to become an educated people it must be done by levying an adequate tax which shall raise a school fund sufficient for the purpose. Your assembly having started the public sentiment which is now so overwhelmingly in favor of public schools, you must now find the means—you must indicate the source from which can be most justly and easily raised by taxation a sum sufficient to educate all the children of this State. If you mean to build up a really efficient school system and not merely declaim about it; if, in short, you mean business, you can not rest till an all powerful public sentiment shall be aroused which shall send to Raleigh a Legislature to vote the money, without which an adequate school system is impossible.

The suggestion that the already underpaid public school teachers shall each contribute two months', or one month's, additional instruction without charge is unjust and unprecedented. They have no greater interest than others in public instruction and have already done far more for it by working at inadequate wages. Suppose the suggestion were made equitable and democratic, that all others should contribute two months' work to the schools, that farmers, merchants, doctors, preachers, lawyers, office-holders and great corporations should contribute each their earnings for two months' work! If the teachers are to be called on let all others contribute in the same proportion.

Instruction in history can of course be had in the University, in Trinity College, Wake Forest, Davidson, Elon, Whitsett, Oak Ridge, Guilford College, and many another whose equipment would do honor to larger and wealthier States. The shortage is not there, but with those less fortunate whose opportunities in life are to be found in the public schools alone.

You must first catch your rabbit—you must first get sufficient school terms and school houses and school teachers whereby something more than the "three R's" can be taught —then we reach the secondary stage—how to encourage the study of the history of North Carolina.

The first consideration when you have the schools and the leisure to teach history is, you must make it interesting to the pupils. Articles, brief and striking, should be written upon the most salient points of our history—cameos of history, so to speak. Something in that line has been done by Mr. Creecy and Mr. W. C. Allen and some others. Such gems well set will attract the boy or girl when grave compilations like those of Dr. Hawks, Colonel Wheeler and others will repel.

Then, if possible, the eye should be appealed to by paintings and engravings. In every Massachusetts school book, in every Massachusetts library and public building, you will find engravings of the notable events in her history and of the great men who have led her people on all great occasions.

There you will find placed before the eye of childhood the representation of the landing from the Mayflower upon that rock bound coast in the depth of winter, the flight of the British from Lexington, the death of Warren, the scenes in her Indian wars, the pictures of Adams, of Hancock, and Webster. What Massachusetts child ever forgets the native land which produced such men or the spots where such events occurred?

They have the landing of the Pilgrims in 1520. What North Carolina school room or public building impresses upon the mind of childhood that other scene thirty-six years earlier, when the first English settlement on this continent was made upon our own shores at Roanoke Island? Not amid the snows on a barren coast, as at Plymouth Rock, but in the middle of a semi-tropical summer, with the great cypresses, hung with moss, as sentinels of the historic scene, and the odors of Araby the blest wafted to the sea-worn wanderers from the shores of this new land of hope and of plenty.

In Massachusetts' books every striking scene in King Phillip's war and in the Pequot war is not only recorded by the pens of facile writers, but the painter's brush and the engraver's tool have faithfully preserved the features of each locality and imagination has restored the features, the arms and the dress of the actors in each stirring scene.

What pen or pencil or engraving or brush brings to the plastic mind of our children the scenes of our own Indian wars? There is that expedition by Governor Lane up the Roanoke in search of the gold supposed to lie at its source.

Between Hamilton and Williamston he was suddenly assailed by flights of arrows and driven back. Had that happened on the headwaters of the Connecticut what vivid reproductions we should have both by pen and engraving. From above Hamilton to the mouth of the river the aspect of the Roanoke flowing through an almost unbroken forest is nearly the same today as it was on the day of the defeat of that hardy expedition. The writer or painter who wishes to portray that scene has today but to visit some stretches of the lordly river as it flows amid eternal silence and through unbroken forests to its mouth. He has but to draw true to nature. There are the great trees, and the same solemn silence unbroken save by the rippling of the river, the deer on the banks, the startled water fowl, the wild flowers, the same riotous magnificence of primeval nature. Let him evoke from history and imagination the picture of the great canoes filled with Englishmen slowly toiling up the stream, their habits as they wore, their arms, their standards, the savages half concealed on shore, the sudden flight of arrows. This and more, faithfully written or sketched on the spot and reproduced by printing press and the engraving stone, would give the children of North Carolina an interest in that event in the history of their State and a conception of the conditions then existing here which they have never had.

Then there are the terrible scenes of massacre of our own great Indian war of 1711, the march of the South Carolina troops hundreds of miles through the trackless forest to our aid and the storm and sack of the Indian fort at Nahucke in 1713, which finally broke the Indian power. Could our children ever forget such scenes or fail to feel an interest in them if presented to their minds by a graphic pen or appropriate engraving?

In Northern school books, so largely used among us, are stirring narratives of the expedition to Louisburg and to Canada, but where is the book which contains a reference, much less a picturesque description or engraving, of the earlier expedition of 1740 to South America, or the capture of Havana in 1762, in both of which North Carolina had a share?

Massachusetts books and Massachusetts school rooms bear many an engraving of the stirring times when Patriots, disguised as Indians, threw the tea into Boston harbor in 1773. But where are the engravers or the writers who have impressed upon the minds of our children that scene when the brave men under Waddell and Ashe, unmasked and bravely in broad daylight in a few miles of this spot, in 1765, eight years before the Boston tea party, forbade Great Britain to put her stamp act into execution in this Province or even to land her stamps?

In painting and in bronze Massachusetts has preserved the memory of the Attucks riot in Boston on the eve of the Revolution. On Boston Common the great memorial stands. But where is our statuary, or our painting, or our engraving of the battle of Alamance in 1771?

They have Paul Revere's midnight ride to fame. Why leave unsung that other ride from Charlotte to Philadelphia?

Where, indeed is our painting of that grand scene for which Massachusetts has no parallel—the meeting which issued the immortal declaration of independence at Mecklenburg on the 20th of May, 1775?

They have immortalized by pen and pencil the defeat of the Americans at Bunker Hill. Where and how have we placed before admiring eyes the first victory for the American arms, which was achieved at Moore's Creek in February, 1776, that striking scene when the planks of the bridge being taken up, brave men crossed on the stringers amid the fires of battle, as the Moslems tell us souls pass to paradise over Al Sirat's arch, spanning by a single hair the flames of hell?

Pencil and brush and pen love to linger on the grand scene when, on the 4th of July, 1776, the thirteen colonies declared that they ought to be and were sovereign and independent. But has anyone ever seen a similar picture of that meeting of the Provincial Congress at Halifax on the 12th of April, 1776, when the first resolution was passed by any State instructing that other Congress at Philadelphia to do what was done nearly three months later? Had we impressed that by story, by statue or by stipple plate upon the minds of our own people would a scholar like Senator Lodge have forgotten it or ignored it in his study of those times?

Brave men lived before Agamemnon, and brave men and great men have lived, at least they did live in those times, south of the Virginia line, but what have we done to perpetuate their memories? In nearly every home in Massachusetts hangs a portrait of John Hancock, or one of the Adams; where is our Cornelius Harnett or Richard Caswell? They have Warren, dying in defeat at Bunker Hill. Where is our engraving of Nash, falling on the field of Germantown?

Like a silhouette the heroic figure of Hardy Murfree, leading his forlorn hope of North Carolinians to the capture of Stony Point on the Hudson, stands out against the sky line of all history. But who has preserved the names of those brave followers; what engraving presents their immortal action to our children; what graphic pen has made this scene a living one to our people? What North Carolinian can claim that he is descended from those stormy petrels of victory, who piloted Anthony Wayne to eternal fame on the summit of that ridge?

What has been said or sung or engraved as to the North Carolina line, steady as the Old Guard of Napoleon itself, at Germantown, at Monmouth, at Eutaw Springs, and on many other fields?

What school room in North Carolina has an engraving of that event, unprecedented in history, when the volunteers of a day, springing, like the clansmen of Roderick Dhu, from our mountain sides, self-organized, without muster rolls, without impulse other than the defense of their little homes, moved down like an avalanche upon the foe led by one of the enemy's best officers and bursting over the fiery crest of King's Mountain broke forever Cornwallis' hopes of success?

And at a later date, where are our engravings of other patriotic sons of North Carolina who would have been an honor to any people?

It was Themistocles who declared that the trophies of Miltiades would not allow him to sleep. The Israelites, when they had passed over Jordan built twelve pillars that their children's children might ask, "What mean these stones?" that posterity being told the story of Israel's greatness in war and the unity of the twelve tribes might bear it in remembrance for all ages. Where are our trophies, the proud memorials of the great deeds of our ancestors, whose aspect shall stir the hearts of aspiring youth to emulate them and to repeat our Marathons on future fields? The tall shaft on Bunker Hill still rises to greet the sun in his coming, and on its summit the genius of Webster's grand oration will linger as a halo forevermore. On every heroic spot in all that land shaft, or sculpture, or inscribed tablet, records that there man has died for man. But what of us?

Of recent years, we have made a small beginning. A crumbling monument to Governor Caswell, blasted by fire, stands in the streets of Kinston; a monument in the Capitol square, facing the setting sun, recalls the already fading tradition of the 125,000 soldiers who belted North Carolina like a living wall in the grand days of 1861-'5; a bronze statue of our great tribune of the people stands on the same square, appropriately facing the East, for, ever hopeful of the progress and prosperity of the people he loved so well and served so faithfully, he ever stood praying and hoping for the dawn of a brighter day.

You are arousing this people as they have never been aroused before to the needs of education. You propose to educate them to the last boy and girl.

You propose to give them the increased capacity for learning, for enjoyment, for usefulness, which comes from education. But what then? Shall you lay before them histories wherein Massachusetts, with some aid from one or two great Virginians, conquered the British lion—books which represent no North Carolina historical event, and the features of no great North Carolinian, in which our revolutionary history is a desert, with, perhaps a mild reference to the militia at Guilford Court House, and in which our ante-revolutionary stone is a mere table of names? Can you excite an interest in the study of North Carolina's history by such books as those? Can you inspire any young Themistocles to emulate the deeds of Miltiades when the story of those deeds is left untold?

I will not touch upon the ground of the misrepresentations of the events of 1861-'5. Public attention has been drawn to that and probably a true story of those eventful years will be laid before our children. But will it be interesting? Shall you give them the bare facts and a barren list of names? Where can better subjects be found for painter, for sculptor, for graphic writing?

Take among so many a single incident. At New Bern the battle* had gone sore against us. Four hundred soldiers are cut off, with a pursuing enemy in the rear and an unfordable stream in front, the men in despair throwing their arms into the water to prevent the enemy from getting them. A single canoe is found carrying only eighteen men, there is danger of its being swamped in the mad rush, two young officers,* both fresh from college, neither yet 21 years of age, instead of saving themselves and pushing off to safety, take their stand and count off from time to time eighteen men who pass beneath their crossed sabres, till boat load after boat load is ferried across. With immediate peril of Yankee bullets and Yankee prison, they resolutely keep their guard till every man is over and those two, the last to enter, float across to friends and to freedom. What a picture for a painter, for poet, for instructor! How it would have been emblazoned if told in Roman story by Livy, or by Macaulay to match his stirring lines which tell

*14 Mar., 1862.

> "How well Horatius did keep the bridge
> In the brave days of old."

But what audience in North Carolina this day can name these two beardless boys who came of the race of heroes?

And this incident is but one of hundreds showing that this people of North Carolina is one which produces heroes and men fit to command. If we do not sufficiently honor them it is possibly because such deeds are not rare among us.

What pen or pencil can portray to the life the heroism of the men whom Tyler Bennett, Frank Parker and George B. Anderson were proud to stand beside in that "Bloody Lane" at Sharpsburg; of the men under Pettigrew, Lowrance and Lane, who fell farthest in the front of the Southern line at Gettysburg; the men, many of them fresh from the plow and without a thought of heroism or fame, who, like an averaging flame, swept down the broken lines at the Salient, retaking and holding it against fearful odds; and of those North Carolinians in the Seven Days' Fight Around Richmond who left more than twice as many of their dead and wounded upon the field as Virginia herself or any other Southern State; the heroism of those brave men, from our mountains to the sea, who, with no other motive than their duty, were first at Bethel and last at Appomattox, and who at all times during those four long eventful years proved themselves the peers of any troops that came against them or that fought by their side?

*W. A. Graham and H. K. Burgwyn, at that time respectively, Capt. Co. K, 2 N. C. Cavalry, and Lieut.-Col. 26 N. C. Reg't.

If you wish to encourage the study of the history of our State, can you do better than to tell the deeds of such men, plainly and simply, as befits the men who did them? Can the story be more needed; can the teaching come better than in these days, when worship of the dollar is growing and when youths are taught that the greatest among men is not he who sheds his life's blood for his fellow men at the call of his country and duty, but rather he who gathers, by whatever device, the greatest quantity of the product of the labor of others into his own keeping?

"Ill fares the land to hastening ills a prey
Where wealth accumulates and men decay."

The State has a great history. Its people have shown themselves equal to every call upon them and equal to every occasion. But that history has not yet been presented as it should be. To excite interest in its study we must make it interesting. Tell it as it happened, its grand deeds, its heroic sufferings, its unvaunting performance of duty in the face of every danger, its uncomplaining endurance of every hardship. Paint its striking historical incidents by brush as well as by pen; engrave them, hang them on the walls of your school rooms, your libraries and your public buildings, put them in your school books. Painter and historian have recorded for the admiration of future ages that Sir Philip Sidney, when wounded at Zutphen, refused a cup of water for which he was perishing till a wounded private soldier who needed it more than he could be supplied. But that incident, and even greater self-denial, can be related of many an unlettered North Carolina soldier who had never heard of Sir Philip or of Zutphen, but in whose veins ran the blood of heroes and whose courage is an inheritance from centuries of brave ancestors of the purest Anglo-Saxon stock on the continent.

To sum up, ladies and gentlemen, North Carolina has a history that is worth the telling and which, when truly told, will interest. It is a brave story of a people who from the first founding of the colony would brook no tyranny and who intended from the first that no one should govern them but themselves; the story of a brave, self-relying, liberty loving people.

Then tell the story in an interesting manner. Let the pens of your best writers record it in their most entertaining manner, but plainly and simply as accords with the character of our people, whose unpretentious nature is summed up in their proud motto: "Esse Quam Videri," for in very truth no people can better say in the words of the great Dictator to Sir Peter Lely, "Paint me as I am." Like a beautiful woman, their story, when unadorned, is adorned the most.

Then, with an interesting history interestingly told, what more is needed? You need a wider audience. Educate the masses. Create in them an intelligent interest in their surroundings and in their history. Make it attractive by short stories attractively told. Appeal to the eye by paintings and engravings. Let the State add, when it can, sculpture and statuary.

This Rome, Greece, England, France have done. This the States north of us have done, preëminently the great educational State of Massachusetts. The means by which other States and countries have created an interest in their history are the means to which we must resort for the like purpose.

And none of them have a better foundation upon which to build.

In the language of the poet-priest of the South:

"Give me the land that is blessed by the dust,
And bright with the deeds of the down-trodden just.
Yes, give me the land where the battle's red blast
Has flashed to the future the fame of the past;
Yes, give me the land that hath legends and lays
That tell of the memories of long vanished days;
Yes, give me the land that hath story and song!
Enshrine the strife of the right with the wrong!
Yes, give me the land with a grave in each spot,
And names in the graves that shall not be forgot."

KILL DEVIL HILL

BY JAQUES BUSBEE

At sunrise it floats in the mist like the diaphanous pink ghost of a hill. To stand upon it in the blinding glare of noon it is vastly more illusive—the luminous sands under your feet seeming more unreal than the remote edges cutting sharp against the deep blue sky. Even on stillest days upon the beach, the sand on the summit is ever blowing, blurring the edges with a film like heat radiations—piling up the hill in a great crescent with horns outstretched to leeward from the prevailing northeast winds.

And this vast pile of sand, hard on the windward, soft on the leeward side, is ever moving towards the southwest at the rate of two or three feet a year.

From the summit the view thrills with its far-stretched beauty. Three quarters of a mile to the east, across the coarse beach grass, is the boundless Atlantic; north, on the trembling distance is another great sand hill fifteen miles away—Paul Gamel's Hill; south, the view is splendid with the gleaming expanse of the fresh pond (a scant mile from the surf) hemmed in on its western shore by the dark mysterious Nagshead woods and the Nagshead sand hills beyond. But to the west unfolds the view of views.

The north end of Roanoke Island, on which stands Fort Raleigh, stretches across the southwest. Roanoke Sound is divided from Kitty Hawk Bay by Collington Island (named for Lord Colleton, one of the Lords Proprietors), and far to the northwest on the dim horizon is Powell's Point. Between Powell's Point and Kitty Hawk is the entrance to Currituck Sound.

Three hundred and twenty odd years ago this same view burst upon the astonished sight of Amidas and Barlowe. For after anchoring in the inlet, which was Kitty Hawk Bay extended through the banks to the ocean, afterwards closed by the great storm of 1696, named Trinity Harbor by these first English to set foot in North Carolina, they ran to the top of the nearest sand hill on the south of the inlet to view the country. They beheld the sea on both sides "finding no end any of both ways." They shot off their harquebus shots "and such a flock of cranes for the most part white" arose under them "with such a cry redoubled by many echoes, as if an army of men had shouted all together."

Standing on the top of Kill Devil Hill today, the same view unfolds itself; the green-blue Atlantic to the east; the violet-blue sounds to the west; the brilliant marsh grasses, the golden sand hills, the dark dense woods, and flocks of herons "for the most part white"; the whole vast panorama blue—vivid blue from sky and sea and the reflections of myriad pools upon the beach.

Just where Amidas and Barlowe landed is an always disputed point. Barlowe's narrative, with its quaint old English wording, leaves the inquirer in greater doubt than if he took the word of any one of the many historians each of whom chose for himself the inlet which suited him best. But language, says Talleyrand, is a gloriously uncertain vehicle, invented to conceal thought.

So turn to John White's map, or rather, bird's eye view of this "coming of the English." Now a picture can mean only one thing. This picture shows a boat with eight men in it, sailing towards Roanoke Island from the northeast. The distance from the inlet where the two vessels were anchored to Roanoke was recorded by them as seven leagues. Although the distance by water from Kitty Hawk Bay to Roanoke is not as much as seven leagues, old Currituck inlet is much too far north and old Roanoke inlet is not far enough north—for who can believe those early explorers were very accurate measures of distance? An inlet through the banks at Kitty Hawk Bay comes much nearer fitting both the account and picture than any other inlet indicated.

One thing, however, is certain and that is, an inlet once pierced the banks nearly opposite the pressure of Albemarle Sound waters. Along the shores of Kitty Hawk and the opposite shores of Collington Islands are undeniable evidences that the present fresh waters of the bay were once salt. Great mounds of oyster shells or "Indian Kitchens" line the shores. Indian relics are scattered here and there and are often "blowing out." Within the memory of living men the ocean beach curved in at a point opposite the bay to such an extent that small vessels could find in it a partial haven.

The fresh pond, a mile to the southward, was once connected with this inlet; for old men remember their fathers' statements that boats could be taken from the bay into this land-locked harbor.

Kill Devil Hill stands a natural monument to mark this old inlet of Trinity Harbor. Its sands have moved and shifted and wasted away, but other sands have blown and made up in their stead. Is it too much to hazard the belief that the first English feet to climb its yielding slope were the sailors' from Sir Walter Raleigh's two little vessels anchored in the offing, and that upon its summit Amidas and Barlowe unfurled the English flag?

Kill Devil Hill claims a present interest for two reasons; first, that from its crown (125 feet high) the Wright brothers learned to fly; and second on account of the legend of its name.

Hidden from the world at Kill Devil Hill the Wright brothers labored secretly at the most wonderful success that man has yet achieved. Over at Kitty Hawk, Mrs. W. J.

Tate shows with pride her sewing machine on which she stitched up the sails for this biplane, and at the foot of Kill Devil Hill stands the "flying shed" which sheltered that mysterious bird. How Nagshead and Kitty Hawk woods swarmed with reporters and kodaks when the Wrights' experiments had reached the point of success, is all too recent in the newspapers to need repetition.

But the legend of the name "Kill Devil" is too characteristic of the banks, as they were long ago, to be lost; and apocryphal though it may be, it deserves preservation. "In days of yore and in times long gone before" there dwelt upon the banks in the thick tangled woods of Nagshead and to the northward, a rude and primitive race of wreckers and beach combers whose living came largely from the sea.

When God in His bounty was slow to drive vessels upon the treacherous quicksands of the coast, the natives, in promising, stormy weather would hobble a bank pony, tie a lantern about his neck and turn him out upon the beach. The light bobbing up and down as the nag grazed, closely simulated the lights on a vessel at sea. Long before the days of light houses or life saving stations, when vessels cleared some port never to be heard from again, the bankers along this coast could have given information in many instances had they chosen. The mystery of Theodosia Burr Alston and the portrait of an aristocratic lady which hung for many years in a Nagshead shanty, and which was but recently identified, held a tragedy of the banks which many writers have essayed.

But that is not the story of Kill Devil. Like most stories of the banks, it begins with a wreck. A coastwise merchantman, laden with a valuable cargo, was driven upon the reef and wrecked. The crew succeeded in reaching the beach alive, and next day, the storm having much abated.

most of the cargo was gotten through the surf and piled upon the sand with a guard to watch it.

Towards midnight the guard sprang forward in wide awake terror, to find the bale of goods upon which he was sleeping detach itself from the pile and amble away across the beach, to disappear in the woods beyond the big sand hill. In a moment all hands were awake and regarding with stupified horror the spot where a moment before the bale had rested. No power but the Devil was capable of such a thing, they all declared, and they cursed the fate which had cast them upon such a coast. Two men were ordered to watch for the remainder of the night.

It was just before dawn. Both men saw it with wide open eyes. A large bale of goods broke loose from the pile and went bounding over the sand, to disappear in the direction of the big sand hill. This was no night "head notion." Daylight, however, restored quiet and these superstitious sailors held a council. Of course it was the Devil. That went without argument. But then, who could circumvent, capture, or kill, the Devil? Men were not inclined to watch or even sleep near such a diabolical spot. At length one old grizzly seadog offered to watch—alone if none had nerve enough to watch with him. He feared not man, God, nor Devil; and if it was the Devil, he swore he'd kill him.

Until midnight this fearless one patrolled the beach alone, keeping a close eye on the bales of goods so mysteriously diminished the night before. Finally he sat down for a moment just to rest his legs. With a shock to consciousness, he was startled to see a large bale of goods break loose from the pile and start across the beach towards the big hill. In an instant his gun was levelled on it, but what was there to shoot? So he ran after it as hard as he could, but it bounded along just ahead with increasing speed. Then with a desperate effort he dashed forward between the fleeing bale and the sand hill, when he tripped and fell over a taut rope. In an instant he was on his feet, and, taking aim along the rope, he fired. The bale of goods stood still. Running along by the rope, he saw, dimly silhouetted against the faintly gleaming sand, a large black object with what he took to be two horns and a tail.

While he was reloading his gun this devilish thing began again to move. He pulled the trigger. Immediately the night was filled with a fearful noise, as the black object sank to the ground and began to kick up the sand. Rushing up to the foot of the hill, there he saw lying—the Devil, weltering in blood?—an old beach pony with a rope tied to his harness—the other end hooked to the bale of goods. But he had in truth killed the Devil, for the pile of goods remained untouched upon the beach till finally boated away. And so that grandiose sand hill standing near the site of the old inlet was ever after known as "Kill the Devil Hill."

Now as Shahrazad, perceiving the dawn of day, would remark, "Whether this be true or only legend is past finding out, but Allah is all-knowing."

CAREER OF GENERAL JAMES HOGUN, ONE OF NORTH CAROLINA'S REVOLUTIONARY OFFICERS.

BY CHIEF JUSTICE WALTER CLARK.

North Carolina in the Revolution furnished ten regiments to the regular service—the Continental line. Five of the Colonels of these became general officers, the only Generals North Carolina had in the regular service. They were General Robert Howe, who rose to be Major-General—our sole Major-General—and four Brigadiers—General James Moore, who died early in the war; General Francis Nash, killed at Germantown and buried near the field of battle—a brother of Governor Abner Nash; General Jethro Sumner, and General James Hogun.

The lives and careers of the first three named are well known. For some reason the data as to the last two have been neglected. The Hon. Kemp P. Battle, by diligent search in many quarters, was able to restore to us much information as to General Jethro Sumner, of Warren County, and, indeed, to rehabilitate his memory. As to General James Hogun, of Halifax County, the task was more difficult. Little has been known beyond the fact that he was probably from Halifax County, and that he was a Brigadier-General. The late Colonel William L. Saunders requested the writer to investigate and preserve to posterity whatever could now be rediscovered as to this brave officer.

It may be noted that North Carolina has not named a county, or township, or village, in honor of either of the four generals—Howe, Moore, Sumner, or Hogun. Moore County was named in honor of Judge Alfred Moore, of the United States Supreme Court. General Nash was the only one of the five thus honored, the county of Nash having been formed in 1777, the year of General Nash's death at Germantown.

General James Hogun was born in Ireland, but the year and place of his birth are unknown. The name is spelt Hogun, though usually in Ireland, where the name is not uncommon, it is written Hogan—with an a. He removed to Halifax County, in this State, and to the Scotland Neck section of it. He married, October 3, 1751, Miss Ruth Norfleet, of the well known family of that name. In the Provincial Congress, which met at Halifax, April 4, 1776, and which framed our first State Constitution, James Hogun was one of the delegates for Halifax County. He was appointed Paymaster in the Third Regiment (Sumner's), but on 26 November, 1776, he was elected Colonel of the Seventh North Carolina Regiment, and 6 December of that year an election was ordered to fill the vacancy in Congress caused thereby. Colonel Hogun marched northward with the Seventh and Colonel Armstrong with the Eighth, and both regiments arrived in time to take part in the battles of Brandywine and Germantown. Colonel Sumner was appointed to fill the vacancy caused by the death of General Francis Nash. For the vacancy caused by the promotion of General Howe from Brigadier-General to Major-General, our Legislature recommended Colonel Thomas Clark, of the First Regiment; but General Washington stated that, while not undervaluing Colonel Clark's services, Colonel Hogun by his distinguished gallantry at Germantown, had earned the promotion, and he was therefore elected and commissioned a Brigadier-General 9 January, 1779, and continued to serve with the army at the north. When Charleston was threatened, all of the North Carolina line which had not previously gone south with General Lincoln, under Sumner, was ordered to that point. Owing to losses, the North Carolina regiments then North were consolidated into four, and General Hogun was placed in command. At the head of his brigade he passed through Halifax and Wilmington in February, 1780, and took part in the memorable defense of Charleston. When General Lincoln surrendered that city on 12 May 1780, though he surrendered five thousand men, only one thousand eight hundred of them were regular troops, and the larger part of these were General Hogun's North Carolina brigade. General Sumner, our other Brigadier, who had commanded that part of the North Carolina line which was at Charleston before General Hogun's arrival, was home on furlough, as were many officers that had lost employment by the consolidation of the depleted companies and regiments. With that exception, North Carolina's entire force was lost to her at this critical time. The surrendered militia were paroled, but the regular troops, headed by General Hogun, were conveyed to Hadrell's Point, in rear of Sullivan's Island, near Charleston. There they underwent the greatest privations of all kinds. They were nearly starved, but even a petition to fish, in order to add to their supply of food, was refused by the British. These troops were also threatened with deportation to the West Indies. General Hogun himself was offered leave to return home on parole. Tempting as was the offer, he felt that his departure would be unjust to his men, whose privations he had promised to share. He also knew that his absence would aid the efforts of the British, who were seeking recruits among these half-starved prisoners. He fell a victim to his sense of duty 4 January, 1781, and fills the unmarked grave of a hero. History affords no more striking incident of devotion to duty, and North Carolina should erect a tablet to his memory, and that of those who perished there with him. Of the one thousand eight hundred regulars who went into captivity on Sullivan's Island with him, only seven hundred survived when they were paroled.

We do not know General Hogun's age, but as he had married in 1751 he was probably beyond middle life. In this short recital is found all that careful research has so far disclosed of a life whose outline proves it worthy of fuller commemoration. Could his last resting place be found, the tablet might well bear the Lacedæmonian inscription, *"Siste viator. Heroa calcas."

General Hogun left only one child, Lemuel Hogun, who married Mary Smith, of Halifax County. To Lemuel Hogun, March 14, 1786, North Carolina issued a grant for twelve thousand acres of land in Davidson County, Tennessee, near Nashville, as "the heir of Brigadier-General Hogun." In October, 1792, the United States paid him five thousand two hundred and fifty dollars, being the seven years' half pay voted by Congress to the heirs of Brigadier-Generals who had died in service. In 1814 Lemuel Hogun died, and is probably buried at the family burial ground. General Hogun resided in Halifax County, North Carolina, about one mile from the present village of Hobgood. In 1818 the widow of Lemuel Hogun, with her children, moved to Tuscumbia, Alabama. Numerous descendants are to be found in that State, and in Tennessee and Mississippi. In the late war General Hogun's papers, which might have furnished materials for history, were seized by the Federal troops and presumably destroyed, though it is barely possible they may be yet preserved in some Northern historical collection. It is known that among these papers was at least one letter from Washington to General Hogun.

These five heroes—Howe, Moore, Nash, Sumner, and Hogun—were, as has been said, the only Generals from this State in the regular service.

We had several Generals who commanded militia, ordered out on three months' tour or on special service, at sundry times, such as General Griffith Rutherford and General Davidson, for whom those counties have been named; Generals Butler and Eaton, and others. General Davidson had been a Major in the Continental line, but was a Brigadier-General of militia when killed, 1 October, 1780, at Cowan's Ford. There were others, as Colonel Davie, Major Joseph Graham (who commanded the brigade sent to Jackson's aid against the Creeks in 1812), and several who acquired the rank of General after the Revolution.

* "Pause, traveler. A hero's dust sleeps below."

The militia figured more prominently in that day than since. The important victories of King's Mountain and Ramsour's Mills were won solely by militia, and Cowpens and Moore's Creek by their aid. Rutherford and Gregory commanded militia brigades at Camden, as Butler and Eaton did at Guilford Court House, and as General John Ashe did at Brier Creek.

It may be of interest to name here the Colonels of the ten North Carolina regiments of the Continental line:

First Regiment, James Moore. On his promotion to Brigadier-General, Francis Nash. After his promotion, Thomas Clark. Alfred Moore, afterwards Judge of the United States Supreme Court, was one of the Captains.

Second Regiment, Robert Howe. After his promotion to Major-General, Alexander Martin. He being elected Governor, John Patton became Colonel. In this regiment Hardy Murfree, from whom Murfreesboro, in North Carolina and Tennessee, are named, rose from Captain to Lieutenant-Colonel; and Benjamin Williams, afterwards Governor, was one of the Captains. David Vance, grandfather of Governor Vance, was a Lieutenant.

Third Regiment, Jethro Sumner. After his promotion it was consolidated with the First Regiment. In this regiment Hal Dixon was Lieutenant-Colonel and Pinketham Eaton was Major, both distinguished soldiers; and William Blount, afterwards United States Senator, was Paymaster.

Fourth Regiment, Thomas Polk. General William Davidson, killed at Cowan's Ford, was Major of this regiment, and William Williams, afterwards prominent, was Adjutant.

Fifth Regiment, Edward Buncombe, who died of wounds received at Germantown, and for whom Buncombe County is named.

Sixth Regiment, Alexander Lillington, afterwards Gideon Lamb. John Baptista Ashe, of Halifax, who was elected Governor in 1802 but died before qualifying, was Lieutenant-Colonel of this regiment.

Seventh Regiment, James Hogun. After his promotion, Robert Mebane. In this regiment, Nathaniel Macon, afterwards Speaker of Congress and United States Senator, and James Turner, afterwards Governor, served together as privates in the same company.

Eighth Regiment, James Armstrong.

Ninth Regiment, John P. Williams. Of this regiment William Polk was Major.

Tenth Regiment, Abraham Shephard.

The State had in the Continental line a battery of artillery commanded by John Kingsbury, and three companies of cavalry, led, respectively, by Samuel Ashe, Martin Phifer, and Cosmo de Medici.

My object in writing has been to give the few details which, after laborious research, I have been able to exhume as to General Hogun, his origin, his services, and his descendants. I trust others may be able to bring to light further information, so that an adequate memoir may be prepared of so distinguished an officer.

A FORGOTTEN LAW

BY CHIEF JUSTICE WALTER CLARK.

PETIT TREASON—DEATH BY BURNING.

Blackstone tells us (4 Com., 75 and 203) that for a servant to kill his master, a woman her husband, or an ecclesiastical person his superior was petit treason, and that this offence was punished more severely than murder, a man being drawn as well as hanged, and a woman being drawn and burnt. It is said that the records of Iredell County show that this barbarous punishment was inflicted upon a woman in that county for the murder of her husband. This law has since been changed in England.

It has doubtless been forgotten by most that the offence of petit treason continued in this State after the adoption of our republican form of government, as to slaves at least, and that the punishment usually inflicted was to be burnt at the stake. "History," said a very wise man, "is philosophy teaching by example." It is well to consider closely the doings of our ancestors. When those acts were wise and just, honest and patriotic they should serve as examples to excite our emulation and shame us against departing therefrom. When the deeds of our forebears are not such as to be cause of pride and imitation, we should rejoice that we live in happier times, in the noonday splendor of greater enlightenment, and measure the progress we have made by our distance from the evil precedent.

Your magazine has been a depository of much curious as well as useful historical data, which but for it would long since have passed beyond proof and beyond recall. I therefore send you a copy of one of the few remaining records of the judicial executions by burning at the stake which have taken place since the adoption of the Constitution of 1776.

The Act of 1741, which continued in force till 1793, provided that if any negroes or other slaves (and there were other slaves in those days), should conspire to make an insurrection or to murder any one they should suffer death. It was further provided that any slave committing such offence or any other crime or misdemeanor should be tried by two or more Justices of the Peace and by four freeholders (who should also be owners of slaves), "without the solemnity of a jury; and if the offender shall be found guilty they shall pass such judgment upon him, according to their discretion, as the nature of the crime or offence shall require, and on such judgment to award execution." It further provided that this commission should assess the value of any slave executed by them and report to the next Legislature, who should award the owner of such slave the compensation assessed.

The following is a verbatim copy of one of the certificates made to the Legislature to procure pay for a slave executed under said act:

STATE OF NO. CAROLINA: Brunswick County. March 5th, 1778.

At a Court held for the tryal of a negro man slave for the murder of Henry Williams, said fellow being the property of Mrs. Sarah Dupree.

Justices of the Peace present.	Freeholders:
William Paine	John Stanton
John Bell	James Ludlow
Thomas Sessions	Needham Gause
	Aaron Roberts.

According to law valued said negro James at eighty pounds Procklamation Money.

The Court proceeded on said tryall and the said fellow James confessed himself to be One that had a hand in the murdering of said Henry Williams in concurrence with the evidence of four other mallefactors that were Executed for Being Concerned in said murder on the 18th. day of March 1777.

Ordered that the Sheriff take the said Jimmy from hence to the Place of execution where he shall be tyed to a stake and Burnt Alive, Given under our hands this 5th. day of March 1778.

Justice of the Peace:	Freeholders:
William Gause	Aaron Roberts
John Bell	John Stanton
Thos. Sessions	Needham Gause
	Jas. × Ludlow (his mark)

STATE OF NO. CAROLINA—Brunswick County.

We, the undernamed persons being summoned as Justices of the Peace and freeholders of the County aforesaid to hold a court for the Tryall of a negro man slave named James the property of Mrs. Sarah Dupre for the murder of Mr. Henry Williams of Lockwood Folly do value the said slave James at the sum of Eighty pounds Procklamation Money. Given under our hands this 5th. day of March 1778.

Justices of the Peace	Freeholders:
William Gause	Aaron Roberts
John Bell	John Stanton
Thos. Sessions	Needham Gause
	Jas. Ludlow (his) × (mark)

The Journals of the Legislature show that the assessed compensation, "eighty pounds proclamation money," was voted to Mrs. Sarah Dupree, the owner of said slave.

There is a similar record in Granville County, showing that on 21 October, 1773, Robert Harris, Jonathan Kittrell and Sherwood Harris, Justices; and Thomas Critcher, Christopher Harris, Samuel Walker and William Hunt, freeholders, tried and convicted Sanders, a negro slave of Joseph McDaniel, for the murder of William Bryant, and he was sentenced to be burnt alive on the 23d—two days thereafter.

Doubtless there are records of similar proceeding in other counties, if not destroyed in the lapse of time, but these two will serve as a curious reminder of a by-gone age. After 1793, the slave charged with murder became entitled to a trial by a jury of freeholders, and one of the most splendid efforts of the late Hon. B. F. Moore was in behalf of a slave tried for murder. His brief in that case and the opinon of the Court, delivered by Judge Gaston, will remain enduring monuments of the claim of both to abiding fame. The opinion and brief will be found reported in State v. Will, 18 N. C. 121-172.

While the circumstance I have attempted to rescue from oblivion may not seem to the credit of the men of that day, it is an historical, social and legal fact which will serve to "show the age, its very form and pressure." It is to the credit of the next generation that the statute was repealed by a more humane and just one in 1793, and that the latter act was afterwards illustrated by the learning and impartial justice displayed by Court and counsel in State v. Will.

It is true of the generations of men as of individuals that we "rise on stepping-stones of our dead selves to higher things."

HISTORIC HOMES. PART V: WELCOME

BY ANNIE LANE DEVEREUX.

"Welcome," the summer home of Willie Jones, stood near the eastern boundary of Raleigh on the spot where some of the buildings of St. Augustine Institute, a college for negroes, now stand. The tract adjoining was given by Col. Joel Lane, to his friend, Willie Jones, of Halifax, to be enclosed as a new park in the hope of inducing him to spend the hot months near "Bloomsbury," Col. Lane's residence.

At that time Wake County abounded in large game, as the names of some of its localities prove. Mr. Jones probably enclosed his park. He certainly built a cottage at the foot of a gentle hill, and near a spring of clear, cool water, and in this cottage he spent part of every year.

He was a man of mark in his day, and besides filling other important offices was Commissioner for the State at large on the committee which chose the site of the new Capitol, Raleigh. In spite of his splendid abilities he was very eccentric, and some of his "fads,"—for the thing is as old as human nature, though the word is modern—were displayed in the plan of his house. It was a one-story building, but the rooms were in the form of cubes, twenty-two and a half feet every way, it is believed; the effect of the very lofty ceiling in comparatively small rooms was bad. The proportion being destroyed the windows seemed extremely long and narrow, and the tallest furniture was dwarfed. The manner of his burial was also most unusual. By his own direction he was buried in the garden at "Welcome," the grave being dug northeast and southwest; as this was supposed to be a practical expression of his disbelief in the Resurrection, it excited much painful feeling, and the conviction became general that "Old Northeast and Southwest" could not rest in his grave, and that his uneasy spirit visited the place formerly familiar to the body. Heavy steps were heard in the hall, strange voices sounded through the rooms, an old disused spinet in the cellar was played by unseen hands; in short, for many years "Welcome" had the eerie name of a haunted house.

After the death of Willie Jones the place was purchased by Judge Henry Seawell, a nephew of Nathaniel Macon, who had married a daughter of Maj. John Hinton, of "Clay Hill"; he enlarged the house, adding a second story, and making other improvements, and here he lived for many years in peace and prosperity quite undisturbed by ghostly visitants. While still a young man Judge Seawell deemed it wise to select and enclose a spot as a burial place for his family, and taking with him his favorite body servant, Brittain, he went into the deep woods far from any human habitation, chose a spot that seemed to him peculiarly retired, and had built a heavy stone wall enclosing a space of the sixteenth of an acre or less, hoping that he and his would here rest in the silence of nature, hidden in the wild and lovely woods. But by a strange irony of fate the woods have long since been cleared away, the whole estate having passed into the hands of strangers, and a public road now runs within a few feet of the wall of the old burial place.

After the death of Judge Seawell his widow sold the place and moved into town. It then changed hands rapidly, having many owners, and standing for long periods shut up and deserted. Its last possessor fled in terror at the approach of Sherman's bummers in 1865, the empty house was occupied by negroes, and later in the same year it was burned to the ground.

ROWAN COUNTY WILLS

COMPILED BY MRS. M. G. McCUBBINS.

Thomas Gillespie (Book G, page 3), November 15, 1796. Wife: Naomi. Sons: Thomas, David, Isaac, Robert, Alexander the home place, George, John and James. Daughters: Martha Allison (widow) and Lydia Knox. Grandsons: Thomas (James' son) Thomas (Isaacs' son), Thomas and Jacob (George's sons). Others: Thomas Allison, Thomas Knox. Ex: Sons Thomas and Robert. Witnesses: Thomas Irwin and Philip Patner.

William Gilbert (Book G, page 46), August 12, 1787. Son: Eleazer. Daughters: Huldah (or "Huldreth day"), Mary. Granddaughter: Rachel Backer. Executor: Friend John Gross. Witnesses: Thomas Pinkston, John Cress and Ediff (her X mark) Cress.

George (his X mark) Gentle (Book G, page 45), April 10, 1795. Wife: Firlender (or Felender). Sons: Thomas and Joseph. "Other children" (not named). Executor: Wife, Felender. Test: Nathan (his N mark) Sap (?) and Ralph Ford.

Christina (her D mark) Getchen (Book G, page 48), March 8, 1790. Sons: John and Frederick. Daughter: Elizabeth. Grandchildren: Christina and Elizabeth (children of Jacob Eller), Elizabeth (daughter of Jacob Getchen) and Christina (daughter of John Getchen). Executor: Friend John Getohen (?). Test: Michael Brown, Jr., and John Stranger.

John Graham, a planter (Book G, page 66), February 1, 1795 (of Third Creek). Wife: Sarah. Children: Sarah, Mary, James, Richard, Moses, Margaret, William Armstrong Serah John and Samuel. Executors: Brothers Richard and James Graham. Test: Benjamin Brandon, John Dickey and John Graham.

James Graham, "old and infirm" (Book G, page 67), September 2, 1788. Sons: Richard, John and James. Daughter: Jane Graham. Grandson: James (son of John). Executor: Son, James. Test: John Lowrance, Jr., John Carrigan and Samuel Young.

Edward (his X mark) Gates (Book G, page 69), September 28, 1799. Wife: Esther. Sons: Joseph. Daughters: Mary (wife of Walter Odaniel), Elizabeth (wife of Lenerd Jones) and Dorothea (wife of Samuel Smith), Rachel (the wife of Richard Lanim. Others mentioned: Daniel Cosgrove. Executors: Wife Esther and son Joseph. Test: George Niblock, John Hembree and Lyddy (her X mark) Hembree.

James Gheen, a cabinet maker, Senior (Book G, page 71), April 26, 1796. Wife: Elizabeth. Sons: James, Joseph (the youngest son). Sons-in-law: John Roberts, Silas Dunn. Daughters: Hannah, Elizabeth, Elenor and Rachel. Grandson: James (son of Thomas Gheen). Executors: Wife Elizabeth and son-in-law Siles Dunn. Test: James Kincaid, Sr., James Kincaid, Jr., and George Dunn.

Ellonor (or Eleonor) Graham (Book G, page 75), May 10, 1782. Sisters: Else, Jane, Agnes. Mother: Agnes Graham. Cousin: Agnes ("daughter of my brother James"), Mary ("daughter of my brother Richard"), Eleanor ("daughter of my brother Joseph"), Elizabeth Gilespey ("my loving sister Janes' daughter"). Executors: Mother Agnes Graham and "brother Richard." No witnesses.

John Gardiner, a miller (Book G, page 77), March 11, 1791. Sons: James, John, Robert and Francis. Daughter: Martha Vikers. Grandson: David (son of Francis). Granddaughter: Francis (daughter of my son Francis Gardner). Executor: Son John. Test: James McCullock, John Brown and Peter Frieze.

John Garret (Book G, page 81), May 18, 1793. Wife: Mary. Children: Elizabeth, Mary, John, Daniel, William, Wiley and James. Executors: Wife Mary and Daniel Wood. Test: John Baily, Jr., John Wood and Moses Daty.

Henry (his X mark) Gussey (Book G, page 83), August 18, 1794. Wife: Marget Guffey. Sons: John and Henry. Daughters: Jean Luckey, Elizabeth Hughes, Mary Guffey. Executors: Wife Marget and sons John and Henry Guffey. Test: John Evans, Jr., and Samuel Hughes.

William (his X mark) Graham, a farmer (Book G, page 86), December 12, 1787. Wife: Is probably Jean (see Book G, page 64, where this will is unfinished). Sons: John (the home place), James, William (the youngest son). Executors: John Hall and Richard Graham. Witnesses: Robert Love, William Law and Mary Graham.

John Gill (Book G, page 91), April 1, 1796, a noncupative will proven by Mary Dowdy April 5, 1796 and in Goochean County, May 16, 1796, by Molly Dowdy and Willy Gill. Wife: Agnes. Daughter: Witty Gill. Executor (?): Joseph Wattaus. Test: Wm. Miller, C. S. C.

ROWAN MARRIAGE BONDS.

Henry Bakor, James Bowers (both names used, but James signs) to Barbara Bowers. May 10, 1758. James Bowers and Thos. Fosne or Forster? (Both may be carpenters.)

William Bost to Catharine Goodhart. January 19, 1762. William (his WB mark) Best, William Williams and John Johnston. William Carson (Will Reed). This bond is made in Anson County.

Robert Black to Elenor Russell. March 5, 1762. Robert Black, Henry Horah and John Cussens. (Will Reed.)

Thomas Butner to Sarah Elrode. July 11, 1762(?) 1764.

Thomas Butner, Adam Retner(?) and Adam (his X mark) Butner. (Thomas Frohock.)

John Bibby to Jane Ruth. July 28, 1762. John (his X mark) Bibby, Mark Whiteaker and Joshua Whiteaker. (John Frohock and Thos. Frohock.)

James Buntin to (no name). June 23 (or 28?), 1763. James J. Buntin, Jos. Erwin and John Buntin. (John Frohock.)

James Bell to Margret (or Marget?) Denny. March 25, 1764. James Bell, William Denny and John McKnight. (Thos. Donnell.)

William Baley to Mary Jones. April 3, 1764. William (his B mark) Baley, Wm. Napery (or Nassery) and Matt. Lang. (Thomas Frohock and Will Ca en.)

A note enclosed "April ye 2th Day, 1764, mester John frake Esquer Wee humly in tret yo to let ye berer William Bile have a lisons of mereg we the per have Agred John iany(?). Daved Bale his mark B."

Charles Bussey to (no name). March 28, 1765. Charles (his X mark) Bussey, James Whittier(?), Francis (his E mark) Taylor. (John Frohock.)

George Black to Rachal Wethrow. September 24, 1766. George Black, John Carson and Samuel Withrow. (Thomas Frohock.)

Joseph Burk to Margret Granl (Grant?). December 29, 1766. Joseph (his B mark), Burk, John England and James (his B mark) Burk. ([?]idon Wright.)

Walter Bell (or Bill?) to Margret Duncan. January 3, 1767. Walter Bell and Thomas hill. (John Frohock.)

John Buntin, Jr., to Mary McClun. January 16, 1767. Johny Buntin, John Bonten, Sr., and George Senley. (Thos. Frohock.)

Philip Byer to Mary Somison. February 9, 1767.

Phillip (his X mark) Byer, Fredrick (his X mark) Somison and Gaspar Smith. (Thos. Frohock.)

John Beeman to Margret Hunler (Hunter [?]). May 19, 1767. John beeman, George Smiley, Oliver Wallis and Junius (?) Quick. (Thos. Frohock.)

Henery Ressand Bussle to Sophiah Layle(?). June 10, 1767. Henery Ressand Bussle and Christopher Rindleman. (These are written in Dutch(?) and translated.) (Thos. Frohock.)

Rudome Bussell to Charity Smith. September 4, 1767. Rudome (his R mark) Bussell, John Turner and —— ——? (in Dutch?). (John Frohock.)

Richard Berry to Ribna(?) Hawkins. September 24, 1767. Richard (his X mark) Berry and William Simpson. (Thom. Frohock.)

John Hawkins and wife send note of consent, September 22, 1767, for their daughter's marriage with Richard Berry.

William Brown to (no name). January 4, 1768. William Brown, Shadreck (his S mark) Williams and William (his P mark) Williams. (Thomas Frohock.)

William Brown to Eliz. Huff. January 4, 1768. William Brown, Jonathan huff and Andrew Endsvoorth. (Thomas Frohock.)

David Butner to Mary Crane. April 9, 1768. David (his D mark) Butner and Wm. Nassery (or Napery?). (Thos. Frohock.)

John Boone to Martha Quin. October(?) 19, 1768. John (his X mark) Boone and Jas. Cooper. (Thos. Frohock.)

Jacob Bringer to Mary Prock. December 5, 1768. Jacob (his i mark) Bringer, Mathias Prock and William Brown. (John Frohock.)

"Thease(?) are to sertify that I Marget apock(?) Doe

Give my face conssent to this marriage of my Daughter Mary to Jacob Brvinger Given from under my hand

MarGert ysock(?)

this 5 Day of Dasember 1768

Wm. Charles Riles."

"This is to Certify That Barringer

William Alexander"

Daniel Brown to Mary Miller. (No other date), 1768. Daniel Brown and William Patton. (H. ? M. Goune.)

Abraham Brown to Mary Hardmon. January 27, 1769. Abraham Brown, Joseph (his X mark) Hartmon and Michael Waller. (These men may be Dutch.) (Thos. Frohock.)

Thomas Bestow(?) to Elizabeth Murphy. June 7, 1769. Thomas (his X mark) Bestow and Zac(?) Craige.

("Cllo ? be kind Enough To Let Thos. Betzer have Lisons Jas. Craige will be Security Ile Be Over and pay you Fryday Pray Let him have thim and you will Greatly Oblige

Sir your Humble Servant

To Cllo(?) John Frohock. Geo. Magonne"

James Bell to Issabell S lorry(?). June 22, 1769. James Bell, thomas Hill and John Frohock.

"Mr. Cornall frohack I desir the favour of you to Let the Bearer James Bell have the Licence for it is By Concent of all pertys and in so doing you will obledg your humble sir William White this given from under my hand this twenteeth day of June in the ye year of our Lord—1769 witness present Samuel Hughey

Margret (her X mark) Mcknight

Martin Beffell to Barbary Roadlap(?). June 28, 1769. Martin (his X mark) Beffell, Paul (his X mark) Beffell and Dan[l] Little.

Joseph Biles to Ann Johnson. November 16, 1769. Joseph Biles, William Frohock and Moses (his M mark) Pearsen. (Thomas Frohock.)

George Bullon (Bullin?) to Hester Stroser. January 28, 1772. George Bullon, Jacob Brown and Conrad Bullon. (These may be in Dutch?)

A letter to Frohock:

"Sir this is to inform you that the Bearer(?) —— ——? has made shute to my Daughter Jean Brown in purpose of marig and these are to Certify that we are agread there with.

Sir I Remain your hu[l] ser[t] Margret Brown.

December the 1, 1769."

There are few "ts" crossed in the above note.

William Brown to Dianna Davis. May 6, 1772. William (his X mark) Brown, Jno. Blaloc (lry[?]) and Henry Strange. (John Frohock.)

Benjamin Burgin to Lear Man (or Mar?). November 18, 1772. Benjamin Burgin and Dan[l] Little. (Ad. Osborn.)

A note to Mr. Osborn (Clerk) from George Davison(?) November 18, 1772.

Joseph Bryan to Easther Hampton. November 30, 1772. Joseph Bryan and John Bryan. (Ad: Osborn.)

William Bailey to Isbell Berson (or Benson?). August 10, 1774. William Bailey, Andrew Reed. (Ad: Osborn.)

John Bryant to Rebenah Orten. August 26, 1774. John Bryan and John orten. (Ad Osborn.)

Jacob Brown to Elizabeth Artmire. August 29, 1774. Jacob (his X mark) Brown and Dan[l]. Little. (Ad Osborn.)

Thomas Blackmore to Anne Cornelison ("Spinster"). September 6, 1774. Thomas Blackemere and Garritt (his X mark) Cornelison. (Ad Osborn.)

James Barr to Elizabeth McCorkle. December 18, 1774. James Barre and Matt: Troy. (Ad Osborn.)

Robert Buntain to Sarah Renshaw. January 18, 1775. Robert Buntain and Elijah Renshaw. (James Robinson.)

Joshua Baldwin to Elizabeth Wells. January 28, 1775.

Joshua Baldwin and William (his X mark) Wells. (Jam^{s}. Robinson.)

Valentine Beard to Obediance Giles. February 14, 1775. Valentine Beard and John Lewis Beard. (Ad Osborn.)

Harmon Butner to Jemima Merrill. February 28 (20?), 1775. Hermon Butner and Jonathan Conger. (No name.)

Andrew Boston to Sarah Hunehparier. May 25, 1775. Andrew Boston and George Savadge. (These above may be Dutchmen.) (David Flowers.)

Peter Butner to Betty Bussell. August 3, 1775. Peter butner and Pressley Bussell. (Ad Osborn.)

William Brandon to Hannah Erwin. September 6, 1775. William Brandon and David Woodson. (D. Flowers.)

Daniel Biles to Jean Conger. December 30, 1775. Daniel Biles and Jonathan Conger. (Ad: Osborn.)

Ruliff(?) Booe to Mary Bushellson. March 9, 1776. Ruliff (his R mark) Booe and John Hunter ("huter.") (Ad: Osborn.)

John Barr to Mary King. March 28, 1776. John Barr and Thos. King. (Ad Osborn.)

William Bell to Margaret McNeely. April 1, 1776. William Bell and James Brandon. (Ad: Osborn.)

James Benson to Margret Kerr. December 1, 1777. James Benson and Joseph Kerr. (Ad. Osborn.)

Samuel Brace to Dorothy Davis. February 4, 1778. Samuel Brace and William Brandon.

Henry Bullinger to Mary Savits. December 20 (28?), 1778. Henry bollinger(?) and George Savits(?). (These are in Dutch?) (William B. Davie.)

George Brown to Barbara Wasnbouoy(?). January 2, 1779. George Brown and Jacob Brown. (William R. Davie.)

John Barry to Susanna(?) Patterson(?). February 5,

1779. John (his X mark) Barry and Caleb (his X mark) Bedwel. (William R. Davie.)

John Brinneger to Lucretia Linville. February 9, 1779. John Brinneger and Samuel Bryan. (William R. Davie.)

Harbert Blackburn to Martha Brandon(?). March 4, 1779. Harbert Blackburn and John Brandon. (William R. Davie.)

Samuel Bryan to Rachael Jacks. March 10, 1779. Samuel Bryan and Rudolf March. (Ad: Osborn.)

Samuel Burns(?) (Barns? or Busner?) to Rachel Turner. March 20 28(?), 1779. Samuel Burns (?) (Barns? or Busner?) and James Turner. (Wm. R. Davie.)

George Brandon to Rebena or Rebecca(?) Neely(?). March 22, 1779. George Brandon and Wm. Temple Coles. (Ad Osborn.)

Archibald Bready to Margret Ervin. May 28, 1779. Archabil Breadey and Samuel Irwin. (Ad Osborn.)

A note of consent from Margret's father, George Irwin, "May ye 27, 1779."

Samuel Bryson to Martha Bogle. June 14, 1776(?), 1779(?). Samuel Brysou and Samuel Bogel. (Ad: Osborn.)

Nathan Baddy to Anne Brice. September 9, 1779. Nathan Baddy and John (his X mark) Baddy. (Ad: Osborn.)

James Ballendine (a carpenter) to Ann Burke. December 4, 1779. James Ballantine and James (his i mark) Townsley (a silversmith). (B. Booth Boote.)

Aquilla Barns to Hannah Lee. September 20, 1779. Aquilla D. Barns and Shadrack Barnes. (Ad: Osborne.)

Benjamin Baker to Comfort Sewel. October 8, 1779. Benjamin Baker(?) and Samuel Sewell. (Jo. Brevard.)

Nathan Briggs to Mary Scriviner. September 29, 1779. Nathan Briggs and Thomas (his X mark) Briggs. (Jo. Brevard.)

Patrick Barr to Agness Killpatrick. November 17, 19(?), 1779. Patrick Barr and John Killpatrick. (Ad: Osborn.)

William Buham(?) to Sarah Patterson (a spinster). January 29, 1780. William Batram(?) and William Patterson. (B. Booth Boote.)

Elijah Bank to Effy Gordon. March 15, 1780. X and Willian(?) McKay. (B. Booth Boote.)

Benjamin Biggs and Abigail Trayer(?). May 15, 1780. Benjamin Bigs and Daniel Clary. (B. Booth Boote.)

Elias Baker to Sarah Holbrook (a "spinster"). May 20, 1780. Elias Baker and Beal Baker.

John Beard to Margret Wood. December 4, 1780. John Beard and James McEwen. (Ad Osborn.)

Daniel Bentley to Nancy Lewis. February 8, 1782. Daniel Bentley and Peter (his X mark) Lewis. (Ad: Osborn.)

James Bunch to Hanna Walks. February 7, 1782. James Bunch and Samuel Van Ellen.

Robert Bell to Jane Miller. November 30, 1782. Robert Beel and John Miller. (William Crawford.)

Hugh Boyd to Jean Boyd. December 13, 1782. Hugh Boyd and Thos. Anderson. (William Crawford.)

John Baldridge to Margaret Poston. July 29, 1782. John Baldridge and Dorunton(?) Poston. (J. H. C. Caule.)

Obediah Baker to Patience Roberts. December 20, 1782. Obediah (his X mark) Baker and David Woodson.

William Bone to Margret Lansden. February 25, 1783. William Bone and Robert Lansden. (Ad: Osborn.)

Thomas Bolph to Mary Harison. January 20, 1783. Thomas Boolph and Abener (his X mark) Schetor. (William Crawford.)

Benjamin Boone to Mary Wilson. February 25, 1783. Benjamin Boone and Ebenezer frost.

Thomas Biles to Tabithah Marburry. March 5, 1783. Thomas Biles and Charles Biles.

Thomas Brotherton to Mary McLeland. March 17, 1783. Thomas Brotherton and John Bons. (T. H. McCaule.)

John Braley to Mary Beatie. May 5, 1783. John Braley (no other witness.)

Christopher Baker to Agnes Forster. May 13, 1783. Christopher Baker and Conrad Brem.

George Burkehard to Mary Kipley. June 24, 1783. George (his X mark) Burkehard and Henry Winkler.

Isaiah Brown to Jean McKee. July 22, 1783. Isaiah Brown and Alex McKee. (Ad: Osborn.)

William Brown to Eliz. Hughey. October 15, 1783. William Brown and James Houston.

William Beard to Elizabeth Brevard. November 17(?), 1783. William Beard and Zebulon Bravard. (Ad: Osborn.)

Andy Brison to Agness Naill. Dec. 17, 1783. Andy Bryson and Pamall(?) Nail? (Moses "? ylie.)

John Brevard, junior, to Hannah Thompson. December 22, 1783. John Brevard and Ad. Brevard. (T. H. Mc Caule.)

Jacob Bullinger to Caty Savits. June 15, 1784. Jacob Bollinger and George Savits. Hugh Magoune.

Samuel Berkley to Mary Davis. July 5(?), 1784. Samuel (his X mark) Barkley and Henry Davis. Hugh Magoune.

Daniel Beem to Mary Neely. October 1784. Daniel Beem and Elijah Renshaw. (H. Magoune.)

Abraham Brown to Cathrine Bonorher Borrorhey(?). October 18, 1784. Abraham (his X mark) Brown and Charles Dunn. (H. Magoune.)

James Barr to Elizabeth McCaule. January 24, 1785. James Barr and Harris. (No name.)

Lewis Beard to Susan Dunn. January 27, 1785. Lewis Beard. (No witnesses.)

Geo. H. Berger to Cathrine Casper. March 23, 1785. Geo. H. Burger(?) and Ad: Osborn.

Martin Basinger to Mary Braun. June 11, 1785. Martin Basinger and Martin Beffle. (Hu. Magonne.)

James Brown to Fanny Johnston. August 29, 1785. James Brown and Moses Linster.

John Bartly to Jean Knox. November 3, 1785. John Bartly and Samuel Knox. (Margret Chambers.)

John Bowers to Mary Moore. December 23, 1785. John Bowers and Val: Beard.

William Brown to Phoebee Gillom. January 12(?), 1786. William Brown and Philip Fishburn. (W. W. Erwin.)

Henry Bryan to Elizabeth Sparks. February 11, 1786. henry Bryan and Thos. Enochs. (W. W. Erwin.)

Joseph Brown to Susannah Whitaker February 23, 1785 1786(?). George Davidson.

Samuel Bellah to Jean Morgan. July 15, 1786. Samuel Bellah and Mo.^{s} Bellah. (Jno. Macay.)

John Buckner to Lucretia Tatom. July 22, 1786. John (his X mark) Buckner and henry Whiteaker.

Thomas Bailey to Jean Bailey. August 29, 1786. Thomas Bailey and Jno. Bailey. (Jno. Macay.)

Jadock Bell to Nancy Begerly. September 16, 1786. Jadock Beall and Evan Bealle. (Jno. Macay.)

Thomas Beatey to Margaret Harden. September 30, 1886. Thomas Beaty and William Harden. (Jno. Macay.)

Michael Beard to Margaret Zevelly. January 9, 1787. Michael Beard and J. L. Beard.

Corbin Bevins to Katerine West. February 12, 1787. Corbin (his X mark) Bevins and William (his X mark) West. (Wm. Cupples.)

James Barkley to Sarah Knox. April 14, 1787. Henry (his O mark) and William knox. (Max Chambers.)

William Bowman to Elizabeth McFarson. May 14, 1785. William Bowman and John Mcpherson. (Ad. Osborn.)

Charles Beąley to Mary Gibson. May 26, 1787. Charles Beaty and John (his X mark) Albright. (Jno. Macay.)

John Bone to Rebecca Potts. October 24, 1787. John Bone and Henry Potts. (D[d]. Caldwell.)

James Bell to Ellinor McNeely. November 15, 1787. James Bell and Alexander McNeely. (J. McEwen.)

John Ball to Agness Adams. January 5, 1788. John Ball and Abraham Adams. (J. McEwen.)

Benjamin Brandon to Mary Knox. February 4, 1788. Benjamin Brandon and James Wilson. (Dav Crawford.)

John Boyd to Hannah Boyd. February 16, 1788. John Boyd and Thomas Thompson. (Ad. Osborn.)

William Braley to Honour Carson. February 21, 1788. W. L. B. Y.(?) and Hugh Carson(?). (J. McEwen.)

Humphrey Brooks to Lettice Boleware? February 24, 1788. Humphrey Brooks and William (his X mark) Wammock. (J. McEwen.)

Thomas Bracken to Mary Brenonger. March 21, 1788. Thomas (his X mark) Bracken and William Button (or Butter?) (J. McEwen.)

David Blaze to Elizabeth Wenkler. May 31, 1788. David Blace ? Winkler (in Dutch?) (William Alexander.)

John Brown to Elizabeth Brown. July 21, 1788. John Braun(?) and Hugh Gray. (Ad. Osborn.)

John Brown to Mary McCulloch. November 26, 1788. John Brown and John Bowman. (? Yarbrough.)

Arron Varas to Rebecah Woods. August 7, 1788. Aaron voh? and William Donaldson. (Wm. Alexander.)

Philip Baruhezer to Dally Clover. January 25, 1789. Philip (his b mark) Boruhizir and (? in Dutch ?) (W. J. S. Alexander.)

Abraham Buck to Elizabeth Waggoner (?). February 24, 1789. (They are so blotted, I can not make them out.) (Will Alexander.)

John Brandon to Jane Knox. March 10, 1789. John Brandon and Absalom Knox. R. Martin for (Ad. Osborn.)

Robert Bradshaw to Betsy Haden. April 3, 1790. Robert Bradshaw and Dugless Haden. C. Caldwell D C pro (Ad. Osborn C C.)

Samuel Baley to Tomith Pearson. August 11, 1789. Samuel (his X mark) Baley and Robert Foster. (Basil Gaither.)

Christopher Brandon to Sarah Newman. October 15, 1789. Christopher Brandon and John Brandon(?).

David Boston to Barbarra Lydehher. November 3, 1789. David (his B mark) Boston and Peter Faust. (Evan Alexander.)

William Bateman to Ruth Pinston. November 23, 1789. William batemans and J. G. Laumann. (Ed. Hains.)

Samuel Bracking to Ann Breneger. December 20, 1789. Samuel (his X mark) Byacking(?) and William Butler. (Basil Gaither.)

RESOLUTIONS OF RESPECT TO THE MEMORY OF MRS. HELEN DE BERNIÈRE HOOPER WILLS, WHO DIED JUNE 24, 1911

IN MEMORIAM.

Whereas, God in His all perfect love and wisdom has seen it was well to remove from earth to a brighter, higher life our faithful member and beloved Genealogist and Historian, Mrs. Helen De Bernière Hooper Wills:

THEREFORE BE IT RESOLVED, That the North Carolina Society, Daughters of the Revolution, deplores the great loss sustained in her death.

That they are truly grateful for the noble example of her well-spent life and fully realize that our Society has lost one of its most loyal, useful and wisest members, who held the esteem and love of all the other Daughters, whose devotion to the organization was realized in the painstaking service of the most valuable years of her life.

That they will ever feel the absence of her presence, and lament the loss of her impartial guidance and wisdom in council, of her usefulness in a special line that knew not the bounds of any particular State.

That we tender to the afflicted family our heartfelt sympathy in this great sorrow.

That these resolutions be spread upon the minutes of the Society and a copy sent to the family.

MARY HILLIARD HINTON,
MRS. E. E. MOFFITT,
MRS. HUBERT HAYWOOD,
MRS. JAMES E. SHEPHERD,
Committee.

INFORMATION

Concerning the Patriotic Society

"Daughters of the Revolution"

The General Society was founded October 11, 1890,—and organized August 20, 1891,—under the name of "Daughters of the American Revolution"; was incorporated under the laws of the State of New York as an organization national in its work and purpose. Some of the members of this organization becoming dissatisfied with the terms of entrance, withdrew from it and, in 1891, formed under the slightly differing name "Daughters of the Revolution," eligibility to which from the moment of its existence has been lineal descent from an ancestor who rendered patriotic service during the War of Independence.

"The North Carolina Society"

a subdivision of the General Society, was organized in October, 1896, and has continued to promote the purposes of its institution and to observe the Constitution and By-Laws.

Membership and Qualifications

Any woman shall be eligible who is above the age of eighteen years, of good character, and a lineal descendant of an ancestor who (1) was a signer of the Declaration of Independence, a member of the Continental Congress, Legislature or General Court, of any of the Colonies or States; or (2) rendered civil, military or naval service under the authority of any of the thirteen Colonies, or of the Continental Congress; or (3) by service rendered during the War of the Revolution became liable to the penalty of treason against the government of Great Britain: Provided, that such ancestor always remained loyal to the cause of American Independence.

The chief work of the North Carolina Society for the past eight years has been the publication of the "North Carolina Booklet," a quarterly publication on great events in North Carolina history—Colonial and Revolutionary. $1.00 per year. It will continue to extend its work and to spread the knowledge of its History and Biography in other States.

This Society has its headquarters in Raleigh, N. C., Room 411, Carolina Trust Company Building, 232 Fayetteville Street.

Vol. XI JANUARY, 1912 No. 3

The North Carolina Booklet

"Carolina! Carolina! Heaven's blessings attend her!
While we live we will cherish, protect and defend her."

Published by

THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY
DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION

The object of the Booklet is to aid in developing and preserving North Carolina History. The proceeds arising from its publication will be devoted to patriotic purposes. Editor.

ADVISORY BOARD OF THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET

Mrs. Hubert Haywood.
Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.
Mrs. Spier Whitaker.
Mr. R. D. W. Connor.
Dr. D. H. Hill.
Dr. E. W. Sikes.
Mr. W. J. Peele.
Miss Adelaide L. Fries.
Miss Martha Helen Haywood.
Dr. Richard Dillard.
Dr. Kemp P. Battle.
Mr. James Sprunt.
Mr. Marshall DeLancey Haywood.
Chief Justice Walter Clark.
Major W. A. Graham.
Dr. Charles Lee Smith.

EDITOR:
Miss Mary Hilliard Hinton.

OFFICERS OF THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION 1910-1912

REGENT:
Miss MARY HILLIARD HINTON.

VICE-REGENT:
Miss DUNCAN CAMERON WINSTON.

HONORARY REGENT:
Mrs. E. E. MOFFITT.

RECORDING SECRETARY:
Mrs. CLARENCE JOHNSON.

CORRESPONDING SECRETARY:
Mrs. PAUL H. LEE.

TREASURER:
Mrs. FRANK SHERWOOD.

REGISTRAR:
Mrs. JOSEPH CHESHIRE WEBB, Jr.

CUSTODIAN OF RELICS:
Mrs. JOHN E. RAY.

CHAPTER REGENTS

Bloomsbury Chapter.....Mrs. Hubert Haywood, Regent.
Penelope Barker Chapter.....Mrs. Patrick Matthew, Regent.
Sir Walter Raleigh Chapter,
Miss Catherine F. Seyton Albertson, Regent.
DeGraffenried Chapter.....Mrs. Charles Slover Hollister, Regent.

Founder of the North Carolina Society and Regent 1896-1902:
Mrs. SPIER WHITAKER.†

Regent 1902:
Mrs. D. H. HILL, Sr.*

Regent 1902-1906:
Mrs. THOMAS K. BRUNER.

Regent 1906-1910:
Mrs. E. E. MOFFITT.

*Died December 12, 1904.
†Died November 25, 1911.

SIR FRANCIS DRAKE.

THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET

Vol. XI JANUARY, 1912 No. 3

SIR WALTER RALEIGH AND HIS ASSOCIATES*

By R. D. W. CONNOR.

We are standing today on the threshold of American history. At no other point is it possible to obtain so general a view, so broad a sweep of the whole field of achievements by men of the English race in the New World as on this historic spot. The whole panorama of American history unrolls itself before us. That history began more than three hundred years ago when men of the English race, landing upon the sand banks which guard our eastern shore, laid their first firm grasp upon the American continent. How unconscious were those obscure sailors that they were there enacting one of the most significant scenes in the world's history! Three and a quarter centuries have elapsed since that day, yet even now, after all the tremendous results that have followed in their train, we cannot fully appreciate the vast significance of that simple ceremony. But for that ceremony there may never have been a "Citie of Raleigh in Virginia," Jamestown and Plymouth Rock may never have become immortal names in American history, and English settlers may never have found their way to the shores of Albemarle Sound. Perhaps Wolfe might never have scaled the Heights of Abraham and Daniel Boone might never have cleared the way for English civilization beyond the Alleghanies. There may have been no Thomas Jefferson to write a Declaration of Independence, no George Washington to make good its principles for the benefit of all mankind, no Constitution of the United States to apply them practically to the government of a mighty people. For there upon the coast of North Carolina men speaking the English language, thoroughly imbued with the principles of English law and English liberty, first set foot on American soil with a view to permanent possession, and thus led the way to the planting of English civilization amid the wild forests of the New World.

*Address by R. D. W. Connor before the Roanoke Island Colony Association, upon its annual pilgrimage to Roanoke Island, August 18, 1911, the 324th anniversary of the birth of Virginia Dare.

I am fully aware that many eminent historians sharply dissent from this view. They count Sir Walter Raleigh's efforts to plant an English colony on Roanoke as among the great failures of history. This seems to me a narrow, short-sighted view. It would doubtless be correct were it possible to say that the history of the Roanoke settlements began abruptly in the year 1584 and ended abruptly in the year 1587. But you cannot measure great historic events with a yard stick. Men die, ideas are immortal. The idea of another England beyond the waters of the Atlantic, conceived by the master mind of Sir Walter Raleigh, was the germ from which, through the developments of three centuries, has evolved the American Nation of the twentieth century. There is a vital connection, both physical and spiritual, between Roanoke and Jamestown. Among those who founded Jamestown were ten of the men who had coöperated with Raleigh in the settlements at Roanoke. In these men we have the physical connection between the two, while to the idea conceived by Raleigh and to the spirit of conquest and colonization which his attempts on this island called into existence, the English race in Europe, in Asia, in Africa, in Australia and the islands of the sea, and in America, owes the world-wide predominance which it today enjoys among the races of mankind. Nothing can be clearer, therefore, than that we, looking back over the events of the last three centuries, can hail the Roanoke settlements as the beginning of English colonization in America and throughout the world.

The details of no event in English or American history have been more faithfully recorded, or are better known than the details of the three expeditions which Sir Walter Raleigh, during the years 1584-1586, sent to Roanoke Island. No good purpose, therefore, would be served were I now to repeat that familiar story. Of the authors of those events, however, the same cannot be said. Even in England, whose history was so greatly enriched by their splendid deeds, an eminent British historian classes some of them as among "England's forgotten worthies." Their memory deserves a better fate from English-speaking peoples on either side of the Atlantic. Men who conceive and men who execute great ideas should forever be held in honorable esteem that subsequent generations of their fellow-men may be inspired to emulate their deeds and characters. Such a man was Walter Raleigh, and such, too, were Philip Amadas, Arthur Barlow, Ralph Lane, John White, Sir Francis Drake, Sir Richard Grenville, Thomas Cavendish and Thomas Harriot—that group of brilliant soldiers, sailors, adventurers and scholars whose names are inseparably connected with the story of Roanoke and to whose genius England owes her immense colonial empire of today.

The marvelous deeds by which these men laid the foundations of that vast empire found their inspiration in loyalty to queen and country, love of liberty, and devotion to religious convictions. At various times in English history an attack on any one of these sentiments has been sufficient to call forth the mightiest exertions of the English nation; during the closing years of the sixteenth century all three were attacked at one and the same time by one and the same arrogant power. Philip II of Spain, proclaiming Elizabeth of England an usurper, had laid claim to her throne. Mighty armies and navies had been levied and equipped throughout his boundless dominions for the sole purpose of establishing the despotism of Castile by overthrowing the liberties of England. The Pope of Rome had commissioned His Most Catholic Majesty to lead a crusade against the National Church of England and "to inaugurate on English soil the accursed work of the inquisition." As one man, without regard to religious convictions or sectarian prejudices, the people of England sprang to the defense of the throne, the constitution, and the church with an enthusiasm that stirs our blood with pride even after the lapse of three centuries. In this contest with Spain, England was "pitted against the greatest military power that had existed in Europe since the days of Constantine the Great. To many the struggle seemed hopeless. For England the true policy was limited by circumstances. She could send troops across the channel to help the Dutch in their stubborn resistance, but to try to land a force in the Spanish peninsula for aggressive warfare would be sheer madness. The shores of America and the open sea were the proper field of war for England. Her task was to paralyze the giant by cutting off his supplies, and in this there was hope of success, for no defensive fleet, however large, could watch all Philip's enormous possessions at once."[1] This was the work which was done so effectively by Raleigh and Drake, Amadas and Barlow, Grenville and Cavendish, that even until this day it has never been necessary to do it over again.

Before I undertake to point out the special service which entitles each of these men to an honorable place in our history, let me refresh your memories by stating briefly the relation which each bore to the Roanoke settlements. The connection of Sir Walter Raleigh with these events is known of all men. Philip Amadas and Arthur Barlow, you will remember, were the captains of the expedition dispatched by Raleigh in 1584 to explore the country and select a place for the contemplated colony. Ralph Lane was governor of the colony sent out in 1585. The fleet in which his colony sailed was under the command of Sir Richard Grenville. With Grenville sailed that "wonderful Suffolk boy," Thomas Cavendish, aged twenty-two years, who, before he had reached his twenty-ninth year, had rivaled the exploits of Sir Francis Drake in the Pacific and circumnavigated the globe. Two of the colonists with Lane were John White, afterwards governor of the "Lost Colony," and Thomas Harriot, the historian and scientist of the colony, to whose scholarly narrative we are indebted for most of our knowledge of its history. And finally there was Sir Francis Drake, whose timely arrival at Croatan in the summer of 1586 afforded Lane's homesick men an opportunity of returning to England.

[1] Fiske: "Old Virginia and Her Neighbors," I, 11, 22.

The impelling mind behind the achievements of these men was the mind of Walter Raleigh. Grenville, Amadas, Barlow, Cavendish, and the other glorious English "sea kings" of the sixteenth century understood England's problem well enough so far as it involved the ravaging of Spanish coasts and the plundering of Spanish treasure ships. But Raleigh understood that something greater and more permanent than such exploits was needed to establish English supremacy in Europe and America. It was not sufficient for England to destroy the power of Spain; she must at the same time build up the power of England. English colonies in North America would not only offset Spanish colonies in the West Indies, Mexico and South America, they would also develop English commerce and afford an outlet for English manufactures. All this the far-seeing mind of Raleigh perceived in his great design. The work of Grenville, Cavendish and their fellow-rovers, though of vital importance to the accomplishment of England's destiny, was destructive; Raleigh's work was constructive in the highest degree. "An idea like his has life in it, though the plant may not spring up at once. When it arises above the surface the sower can claim it. Had the particular region of the New World not eventually become a permanent English settlement, he would still have earned the merit of authorship of the English colonizing movement."[2] "Baffled in his first effort to plant the English race upon this continent, he yet called into existence a spirit of enterprise which first gave Virginia, and then North America, to that race, and which led Great Britain, from this beginning, to dot the map of the world with her colonies, and through them to become the greatest power of the earth."[3]

First among the agents selected by Raleigh to carry his great design into execution were Philip Amadas and Arthur Barlow. Though these two daring sailors were the pilots of that great Anglo-Saxon migration from England to America which ranks among the greatest events in the history of the human race, yet the details of their lives are almost totally unknown. The fact that they were selected by so keen a judge of men as Sir Walter Raleigh to command his expedition sets them much above the average adventurers of their day. They were, as we know, bold and experienced navigators. The manner in which they conducted the enterprise entrusted to them showed them worthy of the trust placed in them. No expedition into an unknown region was ever conducted with more complete success. From first to last such was the judgment and skill of the commanders that not a single mishap occurred to mar their triumph. The report which they submitted to Raleigh upon their return to England reveals a thorough understanding of their profession and an extraordinary keenness of observation coupled with rare good judgment. In their dealings with the savages they displayed firmness of temper guided by brilliant diplomacy and clear comprehension of the savage character. That Sir

[2] Stebbin: "Sir Walter Ralegh," p. 48.
[3] Henry: "Sir Walter Raleigh," in Winsor's Narrative and Critical History of America, III, 105.

Walter Raleigh was pleased with the manner in which they conducted their enterprise is evident from the fact that in the colony which he sent out under Ralph Lane, in 1585, he appointed Amadas to the high and responsible position of "Admiral of Virginia."

In Ralph Lane, Raleigh found a leader in whom were combined in a strange degree the character of the soldier and the spirit of the adventurer. Lane delighted in bold and arduous enterprises, but he always kept his eyes open to the main chance. In his character there appears something of the dauntless spirit of his cousin, the famous Catherine Parr, the last queen of Henry VIII. We find him constantly associated with Burghley, Walsingham, Raleigh, Drake, Hawkins and Grenville in those great events which give to the reign of Elizabeth its chief glory. With Lord Burghley he was on terms of confidential relation and appears frequently in the character of his adviser upon important public affairs. From the queen he received more than one weighty commission. In the very year in which Amadas and Barlow sailed for the New World, Lane wrote that he "had prepared seven ships at his own charges, and proposed to do some exploit on the coast of Spain," and delayed only until he should receive the queen's commission and the title of 'General of the Adventurers.' " When all England was in a fever of excitement over the approach of the Armada, called "Invincible," Lane was entrusted with carrying into effect measures for the defense of the coast, and at a later date was appointed "to assist in the defense of the coast of Norfolk." The next year, after the Armada had been shattered, he sailed with Drake on an expedition to the coast of Portugal, and in 1590 he was with Sir John Hawkins on a similar adventure. During the Irish rebellion of 1593-1594 he served with the royal army and won special commendation for his conduct. Yet in spite of the high consideration in which he was held by England's great leaders, we are told that all his life Lane was a great beggar. If so he was a royal beggar, for he begged only from his sovereign, as many greater men have done, and in his mendicancy there was nothing mean or groveling. Sir Henry Wallop complained to Lord Burghley that Lane, while sheriff of County Kerry, Ireland, expected "to have best and greatest things in Kerry, and to have the letting and setting of all the rest."[4]

Such was the man whom Raleigh selected to lead his first colony. At the time Lane was on duty for the crown in Ireland, but the queen ordered a substitute to be appointed in his government of Kerry and Clammorris, "in consideration of his ready undertaking the voyage to Virginia for Sir Walter Raleigh at Her Majesty's command." The event proved the wisdom of the choice. In his management of the colony Lane displayed executive ability and foresight. His dealings with the Indians were courageous and sagacious. He pushed his explorations with energy and intelligence. As Hawks has well said, a review of his conduct reminds us forcibly of the proceedings of Captain John Smith under circumstances not unlike his own. Lane remained at Roanoke only one year. At the end of that time force of circumstances over which he had no control compelled him to choose between starvation and the abandonment of the undertaking. Like a prudent man upon whom devolved the responsibility of men's lives, after making every reasonable effort to carry his work to successful conclusion, he reluctantly and regretfully chose the latter alternative. For this choice historians have censured him because, a few days after his departure, Sir Richard Grenville arrived at Roanoke with men and supplies sufficient to have placed the colony on its feet. But Grenville had long been overdue, and fairness to Lane requires that we should judge his conduct by the information which he had at the time, not by that which we now have. It is plain that he had no intention of returning to England until driven to it, as he said, by "the very hand of God as it seemed." Certainly Elizabeth, Raleigh, Drake and England's other great leaders, did not regard his course unfavorably, for we find them shortly afterwards, at that supreme moment in England's history when the great Armada was bearing down on her coast, summoning him to their most secret councils of war and entrusting him with important commands; and in 1593, as a reward for services to the crown, we see him kneeling before the great queen's representative to receive the honor of knighthood. Dire necessity occasioned by causes beyond the control of man drove him against his will to his final decision and put an end to the first attempt to found an English colony in America.

[4] See "Dictionary of National Biography," XXXII, 77-78; also Sainsbury's "Celendar of State Papers; Colonial Series, 1574-1660," 2-4.

The fleet which transported Lane's colony to Roanoke was under the command of one of the most remarkable men in an age of remarkable men. Sir Richard Grenville combined in his character all the faults and virtues of the age in which he lived. Brave, loyal and ambitious, he was proud, tyrannical and cruel. Ralph Lane complained of his "intolerable pride and insatiable ambition" during the voyage to Roanoke, and declared that by reason of his "tyrannical conduct from first to last, the action has been most painful and most perilous."[5] From others of his contemporaries, as well as from his own conduct, we learn that he was a man of "very unquiet mind and greatly affected to war," and that his nature was so "very severe" that "his own people hated him for his fierceness." But if his followers hated him for his cruelty, they admired him for his daring. No enterprise was too hazardous for his courage, no hardship too severe for his endurance, if it offered opportunity for either riches or glory. To his credit let it be said that with Grenville the search for wealth was a mere incident in his search for fame. In the service of his queen and country he counted no odds too great if only glory and honor waited upon success.

[5] Lane to Walsingham, "Calendar of State Papers, Colonial Series," 3.

Grenville's career is intimately connected with the events which we commemorate today. He first became interested in America through Sir Humphrey Gilbert, whose untimely death cut off prematurely one of the choicest spirits of the Elizabethan Era. After Gilbert's death he allied himself with his cousin, Sir Walter Raleigh, by whom he was placed in command of the fleet which bore Lane's colony across the Atlantic. That he did not underestimate the importance of the part he played in that event is shown by the fact that upon his return to England he wrote to Walsingham that he "had performed the action directed and discovered, taken possession of and peopled a new country and stored it with cattle, fruits and plants." Returning from Roanoke in 1585 he had his first brush with Spain when he was attacked by a Spanish man-of-war which, "after some fighting," he overpowered and captured. The following year he made a second voyage to Roanoke, which he found deserted. Leaving fifteen men to retain possession he again turned his prow eastward. No good British sailor of the sixteenth century thought that he had done his full duty to the queen if he crossed the Atlantic without carrying home some trophy of his prowess won from Spain. Grenville was not the man to form an exception to this rule. On his return voyage, in 1586, he touched at the Azores long enough to attack, capture and pillage the Spanish towns there and to carry off for ransom a number of important prisoners. In all the British kingdom Spain had no more implacable foe, nor a more dangerous one. Not Drake himself held her power so cheaply or manifested his contempt more plainly.

Grenville's adventurous career was finally brought to a close by an amazing exploit "memorable even beyond credit and to the height of some heroical fable"—an exploit commemorated by Tennyson in one of the most stirring ballads in our language. It was in the year 1591. Lord Thomas

SIR RICHARD GRENVILLE.

Howard, commanding a squadron of sixteen sail, had taken post at the Azores to intercept the Spanish treasure fleet upon its annual voyage from Mexico and Peru to Spain. In this squadron was the Revenge, commanded by Sir Richard Grenville, vice-admiral of the fleet, a ship of 500 tons burden, carrying a crew of 250 sailors. In the great fight against the Armada she had been the flagship of Sir Francis Drake, yet it is not Drake, but Grenville whose name occurs to us when the Revenge is mentioned. Soon after his arrival at the Azores, scurvy broke out among Lord Howard's crew and in a short time half his men were down with this hideous disease. While the epidemic was at its climax, a swift dispatch boat from England arrived on the scene with tidings that a powerful Spanish armament of fifty-three sail was bearing down upon the English fleet.

Then sware Lord Thomas Howard: "'Fore God, I am no coward!
But I cannot meet them here, for my ships are out of gear,
And the half of my men are sick. I must fly, but follow quick.
We are six ships of the line; can we fight with fifty-three?"

Then spake Sir Richard Grenville: "I know you are no coward;
You fly them for a moment to fight with them again.
But I've ninety men and more that are lying sick ashore.
I should count myself the coward if I left them, my Lord Howard,
To these Inquisition dogs and the devildoms of Spain."

So Lord Howard, crowding his sails, departed, leaving Grenville to follow as soon as he had brought his sick men aboard.

And they blessed him in their pain, that they were not left to Spain,
To the thumbscrew and the stake, for the glory of the Lord.

Scarcely had Sir Richard completed his task when the Spanish fleet, carrying five thousand sailors, hove in sight. Then the sturdy British tars, hankering for a tussle with the Dons, inquired of their leader:

"Shall we fight or shall we fly?
Good Sir Richard, tell us now,
For to fight is but to die!
There'll be little of us left by the time the sun be set."
And Sir Richard said again: "We be all good Englishmen.
Let us bang these dogs of Seville, the children of the devil,
For I never turned my back upon Don or devil yet."

Cheer after cheer from the throats of the British seamen greeted this stirring reply as—sheer into the heart of the foe,

With her hundred fighters on deck, and her ninety sick below, the little Revenge plunged into the midst of the jeering Spaniards.

Four galleons drew away
From the Spanish fleet that day,
And two upon the larboard and two upon the starboard lay.
And the battle-thunder broke from them all.

* * * * * * *

And the sun went down, and the stars came out far over the summer sea,
But never a moment ceased the fight of the one and the fifty-three.
Ship after ship, the whole night long, their high-built galleons came,
Ship after ship, the whole night long, with her battle-thunder and flame;
Ship after ship, the whole night long, drew back with her dead and her shame.
For some were sunk and many were shatter'd, and so could fight us no more—
God of battles, was ever a battle like this in the world before?

Wounded to the death, as he lay upon his deck, Sir Richard Grenville cried:

"Sink me the ship, Master Gunner—sink her, split her in twain!
Fall into the hands of God, not into the hands of Spain!"
And the gunner said, "Ay, ay," but the seamen made reply:
"We have children, we have wives,
And the Lord hath spared our lives;
We will make the Spaniards promise, if we yield, to let us go;
We shall live to fight again, and to strike another blow."
And the lion there lay dying, and they yielded to the foe.

And the stately Spanish men to their flagship bore him then,
Where they laid him by the mast, old Sir Richard caught at last.
And they praised him to his face, with their courtly foreign grace;
But he rose upon their decks, and he cried:
"I have fought for Queen and Faith like a valiant man and true;
I have only done my duty as a man is bound to do;
With a joyful spirit I, Sir Richard Grenville, die!"
And he fell upon their decks, and he died.

The modern historians, who are accurate if not entertaining, tell us that of the fifty-three ships in the Spanish fleet, thirty-eight were transports and only fifteen were men-of-war. But whether fifteen or fifty-three makes but slight difference. "When we have before us the fact that 150 men during fifteen hours of hand-to-hand fighting held out against a host of 5,000, and yielded only when not more than twenty were left alive, and those grievously wounded, the story * * * is not rendered more interesting and scarcely less wondrous by trebling the number of the host." And we are prepared to believe James Anthony Froude, although his critics assure us that he had no authority for his statement, when he tells us that this action of the Revenge "struck a deeper terror, though it was but the action of a single ship, into the hearts of the Spanish people; it dealt a more deadly blow upon their fame and moral strength than the destruction of the Armada itself, and in the direct results which arose from it it was scarcely less disastrous to them."[6]

One of the vessels of Grenville's fleet which conveyed Lane's colony to Roanoke in 1585 was commanded by Thomas Cavendish, in whom Grenville must have found a congenial spirit. Cavendish, like many other noblemen and gentlemen of the times, having squandered his patrimony, had determined to repair his fortune at the expense of the common enemy. The voyage to Roanoke, made in a ship fitted out at his own charge, was his first maritime adventure. He proved an apt scholar of his masters, Grenville and Drake.

[6] See "Dictionary of National Biography," XXIII, 122-124; "Calendar of State Papers," 2-4.

While waiting at San Juan de Porto Rico, ostensibly to build a pinnace, he and Grenville pounced upon and captured two Spanish frigates which contained "good and rich freight and divers Spaniards of account," whom they ransomed "for good, round sums." This employment we can well believe proved more congenial to the tastes and temper of Cavendish than Raleigh's scheme of "Westerne Planting."

Upon his return from this voyage Cavendish, incited by the exploits of Drake and Hawkins, prepared on his own account an expedition to circumnavigate the globe. His fleet consisted of three small vessels, the Desire, 140 tons; the Content, 60 tons, and the Hugh Gallant, 40 tons, and carried 123 sailors. Sailing from the west coast of England, Cavendish steered straight for the Spanish main where he repeated the exploits of Drake, sinking Spanish ships, burning Spanish towns and ravaging Spanish coasts. Throughout Spanish-America his name soon became a signal for terror and consternation. Running down the Atlantic coast of South America he passed through the Strait of Magellan out into the Pacific. Hunger, storms and battles had so reduced the number of his crew that he found it advisable to sink the Hugh Gallant, and with the Desire and the Content pursued his voyage northward until he touched Lower California. There falling in with the Great St. Anna, 700 tons, the private property of the king of Spain, he took her after a desperate battle of six hours. Her cargo of 600 tons of the richest merchandise and more than $20,000 worth of gold, proved a prize well worth taking. Yet so heavily were his ships already loaded with Spanish plunder that Cavendish was forced to send the greater part of this new treasure to the bottom along with the stately Spanish galleon. The historian of the expedition, an officer aboard the Desire, declares that "this was one of the richest vessels that ever sailed the seas; and was able to have made many hundreds wealthy if we had had means to have brought it home." Satisfied now with the results of his expedition, Cavendish decided to leave the Content to pursue her own way, and on November 19, 1587, turned the prow of the Desire homeward by way of the Cape of Good Hope. "On September 10, 1588," records the chronicler of his exploits, "like wearied men, through the favor of the Almighty, we got into Plymouth, where the townsmen received us with all humanity."

All England rang with the fame of Cavendish. His exploits became the theme of ballads and his name was on every man's tongue. For a time he held his head high among the best of England's naval heroes. Soon, however, he found that a fortune so easily gained was as easily lost. "Gallantry and following the court" quickly depleted his purse and he again looked toward the usual storehouse with a craving that was not to be resisted. In 1591 he fitted out a second expedition for the Spanish main, but he now sailed under an evil star. Fortune deserted him and after suffering untold horrors from hunger, storms and desertions, he died at sea in 1592, it is said of a broken heart. Something of the endurance required of English seamen of the sixteenth century may be understood when we learn that of the seventy-six men who sailed with Cavendish on this luckless voyage only a "small remnant" of fifteen lived to return and they were so weak from hardships and suffering that when they arrived off Bearhaven, Ireland, they "could not take in or heave a sail."[7]

In the summer of 1586, while Lane and the colonists at Roanoke were anxiously awaiting the long overdue return of Grenville with supplies from England, their anxiety was relieved by the appearance off Croatan of Sir Francis Drake with a fleet in which were counted twenty-three sails. He was a welcome visitor, for he began at once to make preparations to supply the colony with all needful things. But while these measures were under way a storm arose which put an end to all plans for relief and resulted in the embarkation of Lane and his homesick men for England.

[7] "Dictionary of National Biography," IX, 358-363.

The man who thus came to the rescue of the forlorn group on Roanoke Island was "until Nelson's time celebrated as the greatest of English seamen." Like Raleigh and Grenville, he was a native of that county of Devon whence have come so many of England's mighty sailors. Drake's mind and character raise him to a height far above Grenville and Cavendish and place him in the company of Raleigh, Blake and Nelson. To Raleigh and Drake, more than to any other men, England owes her world-wide colonial empire. As the former first put into practice the policy of breaking down Spain's colonial power by planting rival colonies in the New World, so the latter first carried into world-wide execution the allied policy of destroying Spain's maritime power by attacking her in American waters. His naval career was begun under no less a leader than Sir John Hawkins, and of course came at once into hostile collision with Spain. Spanish rapacity, cruelty and bigotry, we are told, "taught him the same kind of feeling toward Spaniards that Hannibal cherished toward Romans." Like Hannibal, he swore an eternal enmity to his foe, but in pursuit of his passion he deserved and met with a far better fate.

The most notable of his numerous exploits was the voyage in the Golden Hind which first carried the flag of England around the globe. Passing through the Strait of Magellan, with a single ship of only twenty guns, he skirted along the west coast of South America and "from Valparaiso northward along the Peruvian coast, dashed into seaports and captured vessels, carrying away enormous treasures in gold and silver and jewels. * * * With other property he meddled but little, and no act of wanton cruelty sullied his performances. After taking plunder worth millions of dollars this corsair-work gave place to scientific discovery, and the Golden Hind sailed far northward in search of a northeast passage into the Atlantic." In the course of this voyage Drake looked in at the Golden Gate, took possession of California in the name of Queen Elizabeth, christened it New Albion, and after sailing as far northward as Oregon, turned his prow into the Pacific, thence over the Indian Ocean, and rounding the Cape of Good Hope, sailed into the harbor of Plymouth in September, 1580. "The romantic daring of Drake's voyage," says John Richard Green, "as well as the vastness of the spoil, aroused a general enthusiasm throughout England. But the welcome he received from Elizabeth on his return was accepted by Philip as an outrage which could only be expiated by war. Sluggish as it was, the blood of the Spanish king was fired at last by the defiance with which Elizabeth received all demands for redress. She met a request for Drake's surrender by knighting the freebooter, and by wearing in her crown the jewels he had offered her as a present. When the Spanish Ambassador threatened that 'matters would come to the cannon,' she replied, 'quietly, in her most natural voice, as if she were telling a common story,' wrote Mendoza, 'that if I used threats of that kind she would fling me into a dungeon.'" One enthusiast, in an ecstasy of admiration, declared that the Golden Hind ought to be set upon the top of St. Paul's Cathedral, "that being discerned farre and neere, it might be noted and pointed at of the people with these true terms: Yonder is the barke that hath sailed round about the world."

In the same year in which Lane's colony landed on Roanoke Island, war having been declared against Spain, Drake fitted out a superb fleet of twenty-three sails and embarked for the Spanish main. On this expedition he took and sacked Cartagena, St. Domingo and St. Augustine and captured twenty prizes carrying 250 cannon.

After these exploits Drake turned his prow northward and skirted along the eastern coast of North America until he came to Roanoke, where he stopped to take a look in upon Raleigh's colony. He was a welcome visitor for, says Lane, he made "a most bountiful and honorable offer for the supply of our necessities to the performance of the action we were entered into; and that not only of victuals, munitions and clothing, but also of barks, pinnaces and boats; they also, by him to be victualled, manned and furnished to my contentation." But while preparations were being made to carry these generous measures into execution "there arose such an unwoonted storme, and continued foure dayes that had like to have driven all on shore, if the Lord had not held His holy hand over them." The vessels of Drake's fleet were "in great danger to be driven from their ankoring upon the coast. For we brake many cables and lost many ankors. And some of our fleet which had lost all (of which number was the ship appointed for Master Lane and his company) was driven to put to sea in great danger in avoyding the coast, and could never see us againe untill we met in England. Many also of our small pinnaces and boats were lost in this storm." As a result of this experience Lane, after consultation with Drake, decided to embark his colony for England. Then Drake, "in the name of the Almighty, weying his ankers (having bestowed us among his fleet,)" says Lane, "for the reliefe of whom hee had in that storm sustained more peril of wrake than in all his former most honorable actions against the Spanyards, with praises unto God for all, set saile the nineteenth of June, 1586, and arrived in Plymouth the seven and twentieth of July the same yeere."

The next year, in an exploit which thrills our blood even at this day, Drake reached the climax of his daring and audacity. Cruising along the coast of Spain, he suddenly dashed into the harbor of Cadiz, attacked and sunk the men-of-war there on guard, loaded his ships with the spoils of Mexico and Peru, and calmly set his sails for England. This work he laughingly called "singeing the King of Spain's beard." Philip, one day, invited a lady of his court to go on board his barge on the Lake of Segovia. But the prudent lady declined, saying that she dared not trust herself on water even with his Majesty "for fear of Sir Francis Drake."

It was with their spirits chafing at the insults but cowed by the daring and skill of the English seamen that the sailors and soldiers of Spain set sail in their Invincible Armada for the conquest of England. In that wonderful world-victory for freedom which an eminent historian calls "the opening event in the history of the United States," the name of Sir Francis Drake stands high on the roll of conquerors.[8]

Before taking leave of Cavendish, Grenville and Drake, I wish to say just a word in regard to the character of the warfare which they waged. In the twentieth century we should call those who engaged in such exploits pirates, and their work piracy. But we should do a grave injustice to the memory of those bold men who opened the way to the planting of English civilization in the New World if we should so think of them. The strict and well-defined principles of international law now prevailing throughout the civilized world were totally unknown during the sixteenth century. A Spanish fleet massacred a colony of French Huguenots in Florida and a French ship, fitted out by a private gentleman, retaliated in full measure at a time when the two countries were nominally at peace with each other. As John Fiske says: "A flavour of buccaneering pervades nearly all the maritime operations of that age and often leads modern writers to misunderstand or misjudge them. Thus it sometimes happens that so excellent a man as Sir Francis Drake, whose fame is forever a priceless possession for English-speaking people, is mentioned in popular books as a mere corsair, a kind of gentleman pirate. Nothing could show a more hopeless confusion of ideas. In a later generation the warfare characteristic of the Elizabethan age degenerated into piracy, and when Spain, fallen from her greatness, became a prey to the spoiler, a swarm of buccaneers infested the West Indies and added another hideous chapter to the lurid history of those beautiful islands. They were mere robbers, and had nothing in common with the Elizabethan heroes except courage. From the deeds of Drake and Hawkins to the deeds of Henry Morgan, the moral distance is as great as from slaying your antagonist in battle to murdering your neighbor for his purse."[9] Even England has on her honor rolls of ten centuries no more glorious deeds, no more honorable names than those of Walter Raleigh, Richard Grenville and Francis Drake. So effectively did those daring men do their work that Philip II, once the mightiest and richest of European monarchs, lived to see his maritime power shattered, his treasury empty and his glory departed. Until this work had been done there could be no hope that English colonies could be successfully planted in America.

[8] "Dictionary of National Biography," XV. 426-442; Froude: "English Seamen of the Sixteenth Century;" Green: "History of the English People."

Among those who accompanied Lane to Roanoke in 1586 were John White, the artist of the expedition, sent by Raleigh to make drawings of the country and its people, afterwards governor of the Lost Colony; and Thomas Harriot, the historian and scientist of the colony. To none who bore a part in the efforts to plant a colony on Roanoke Island, save to Raleigh alone, do we owe more than to White and Harriot. The work of "these two earnest and true men"—the splendid pictures of the one and the scholarly narrative of the other—preserve for us the most valuable information that we have of "Ould Virginia." They were the intimate friends of [9] "Old Virginia and Her Neighbors," I, 24.

Raleigh whose love and loyalty could be affected by no degree of prosperity or ill fortune. "Raleigh," says Henry Stevens, "was blessed in his household, or at his table, or in his confidence, with four sterling adherents who stuck to him through thick and thin, through prosperity and adversity. These were Richard Hakluyt, Jacques Le Moyne, John White and Thomas Harriot. When Wingandacoa makes up her jewels she will not forget these four, whom it is just to call Raleigh's Magi. * * * Together Harriot and White surveyed, mapped, pictured and described the country, the Indians, men and women; the animals, birds, fishes, trees, plants, fruits and vegetables."

We are told that whoever compares the original drawings of White with the engravings of De Bry, "as one may now do in the British Museum, must be convinced that, beautiful as De Bry's work is, it seems tame in the presence of the original water-colour drawings. There is no exaggeration in the engravings." The late Henry Stevens, of Vermont, whose work was done principally in London, who describes himself as "Student of American History, Bibliographer and Lover of Books," predicts that "White's name in the annals of English art is destined to rank high though it has hitherto failed to be recorded in the art histories and dictionaries. Yet his seventy-six original paintings in water-colours, done probably in Virginia in 1585-1586, while he was there with Harriot as the official draughtsman or painter of Raleigh's 'First Colonie' entitle him to prominence among English artists in Elizabeth's reign."

Thomas Harriot was one of the most eminent scholars of his age. No name in English history deserves to take precedence of his in scientific achievement. A graduate of St. Mary's Hall, Oxford, he was engaged by Sir Walter Raleigh to reside with him as his mathematical tutor and adviser in his maritime adventures. In this capacity he was sent by

Raleigh to Roanoke with Lane, and upon his return published at London, in 1588, "A Brief and True Report of the New-found Land of Virginia." This work attracted wide attention both in England and on the continent where it was translated into Latin. The Edinburgh Review described it as a work "remarkable for the large views it contains in regard to the extension of industry and commerce," and as one of the finest examples in existence of statistical surveys on a large scale. Harriot, in spite of weak health which, he complained, made him unable to write or even think accurately, and prevented his completing or publishing his work, won a place among the great astronomers and mathematicians of the world. After his death some of his mathematical discoveries were published by his friend, the Earl of Northumberland. "This work," we are told, "embodies the inventions by which Harriot virtually gave to Algebra its modern form." Had Harriot "published all he knew in algebra," says a modern scholar, "he would have left little of the chief mysteries of that art unhandled." In astronomy he applied the telescope to celestial purposes simultaneously with Galileo with whose name his is forever associated in one of the greatest branches of human knowledge. By his wonderful work in mathematics and astronomy Thomas Harriot, the historian and scientist of Roanoke, won for himself a place among "the immortal names that were not born to die."[10]

Such were the men, and such was their work which won for English-speaking people the noblest portion of the New World. Without their work all the statesmanship of Burghley and Walsingham would have been ineffective, Elizabeth's glorious reign would probably have ended in disaster and shame, and a long arctic night of bigotry and superstition, like the Dark Ages, would have enveloped Europe in its black and impenetrable folds. That these calamities were averted, that the power of Spain was crushed never to rise again, that the England of Elizabeth, Shakespeare and Raleigh triumphed over the Spain of Philip, Alva and Menendez, and that English ideals of liberty and law prevail throughout the northern part of America today, the English race throughout the world may thank Sir Walter Raleigh and those bold and daring seamen and adventurers who shattered Spain's naval power and here at Roanoke seized the best part of the New World for England. May we in America never forget that the glorious achievements of the Raleighs, the Drakes and the Grenvilles of that generation are as much a part of our inheritance as are the achievements of the Hancocks, the Jeffersons, the Harnetts and the Washingtons of a later generation.

[10] Stevens: "Thomas Hariot and His Associates."

GOVERNOR BENJAMIN SMITH*

BY COLLIER COBB,
Professor of Geology in the University of North Carolina.

Addressing Governor Kitchin, Professor Cobb said:

May it Please Your Excellency:

On behalf of the North Carolina Society of the Sons of the Revolution, I present through you to the State of North Carolina the portrait of Benjamin Smith, patriot, legislator, soldier, statesman, and philanthropist; builder of highways and of fortifications; conservationist and drainer of swamps; opener of waterways; believer in education for every child within the State, and the first benefactor of the University; Grand Master of Masons; Governor of North Carolina one hundred years before his time, and dreamer of dreams which you, sir, now help to make come true.

LIFE AND PUBLIC SERVICES OF BENJAMIN SMITH.

Benjamin Smith's education began more than a hundred years before he was born, for he came of a race of men who did things. He was descended from Sir John Yeamans, from old King Roger Moore, and his grandmother, Lady Sabina Smith, was the daughter of Thomas Smith, second Landgrave of his name in South Carolina. The father of our present subject was Colonel Thomas Smith, of South Carolina. So far as is known no relationship existed between him and his wife, whose name (as just stated) was also Smith. Thomas Smith, the first Landgrave, had seen rice cultivated in Madagascar; and one day, in 1696, when a sea captain, an old friend of his, sailed into Charleston Harbor from Madagascar, Thomas Smith got from him a bag of rice seed. This was carefully sown in a wet place in Smith's

*Address delivered in the Hall of the House of Representatives at Raleigh, November 15, 1911, on the occasion of the presentation of portrait of Governor Smith to the State by the North Carolina Society of the Sons of the Revolution.

From the Painting by JAQUES BUSBEE.

garden in Charleston. It grew, and the two Carolinas were changed into a land of great rice plantations. His great-grandson, Benjamin Smith, was later owner of the best rice plantation in North Carolina, a portion of the original grant to Landgrave Smith, who tried to establish settlements on the Cape Fear River in 1690. Also to be counted among his close kindred were the Bees and Grimkés, of South Carolina, and the Rhetts, who changed their name from Smith to that of their grandmother, Catherine Rhett, whose family in South Carolina had become extinct. Benjamin Smith thus came of a breed possessing ability, means, and position. The William Smith who introduced the culture of cotton into Virginia in 1621 is said to have been of the same stock.

While the public acts and many details of the private life of Benjamin Smith may be gathered from the records of his time, both State and National, and from the rather voluminous correspondence of his distinguished contemporaries, the date of his birth and the manner and place of his burial have frequently been brought into question. The weight of authority favors January 10, 1756, as his birthday, and January 10, 1826, his seventieth birthday, as the date of his death. Still there are those who contend that he was born in 1750, and that he died on the 10th of February, 1829. But a contemporary newspaper, the Raleigh Register, of February 14, 1826, has a notice of his death as having occurred recently at Smithville.

We know nothing, however, concerning his childhood and youth, but he must have received careful training, for we are told that, "While still young, just twenty-one years of age, he served as aide-de-camp of General Washington in the dangerous but masterly retreat from Long Island after the defeat of the American Army in August, 1776. He behaved with conspicuous gallantry in the brilliant action in which Moultrie, in 1779, drove the British from Port Royal Island, and checked for a time the invasion of South Carolina. A Charleston paper says: 'He gave on many occasions such various proofs of activity and distinguished bravery as to merit the approbation of his impartial country.' " Yet during the siege of Charleston, in 1780, a blunder of Smith's brought about the premature surrender of the city on the 12th of May. "Mr. Smith sent a letter to his wife by Mr. Rutlege, who was taking to the Governor a communication that had been confided to him orally, with the strictest injunction that no written communication be taken from the garrison. A letter addressed by a friend to his wife under assurance that it was only a family letter, Mr. Rutledge unwarily considered it no violation of his instructions. He was captured soon after he left the town and printed copies of the letter were next day thrown into the garrison in unloaded bombshells, and most unaccountably, through a secret agency, dispersed through all parts of the town in printed handbills. The letter plainly told that the garrison must soon surrender, that their provisions were expended, and Lincoln only prevented from capitulating by a point of etiquette. From this time hope deserted the garrison, while the reanimated efforts of the enemy showed their zeal revived." Lincoln surrendered the fort, and Charleston, with its stores, its advantages, and the army that defended it, fell into the hands of the British commander. Smith probably hastened the surrender just a little, but he did not cause it; for historians are generally agreed that Lincoln should have fled and saved his army soon after Clinton began engirdling the city about the 1st of April, and before the British fleet a week later ran by Fort Moultrie and entered the harbor.

In 1783 we find Benjamin Smith in the General Assembly of North Carolina, representing Brunswick County in the Senate. He was a member of the Constitutional Convention of 1788, that declined to accept the Federal Constitution, and in that body did all in his power to secure its adoption, since he was an ardent Federalist. He was a member of the convention that adopted the Constitution in 1789, and was on the committee that prepared the amendments which North Carolina proposed to the Constitution of the United States. He had some support for the Senatorship in 1789, but Benjamin Hawkins was elected. This Legislature of 1789 chartered the University of North Carolina, and Smith was named among the most eminent men of the State composing the first board of trustees. At the first meeting of the board, on the 18th of December, 1789, Colonel Smith offered to the University warrants for 20,000 acres of land in Tennessee that he had received as pay for his distinguished services in the Revolution, and he handed over the warrants at the second meeting of the board in 1790. He remained a trustee of the University until 1824, and took great pride in presiding over the meetings of the board during his term as Governor of the State.

The warrants Colonel Smith gave were for land located in Obion County, in the extreme northwest part of Tennessee. By the Treaty of Hopewell in 1795 the United States ceded this territory to the Chickasaw Indians. In 1810 the most terrific earthquake that has ever visited the interior of our country turned portions of this region into lakelets, and a large part of the University's tract is now occupied by Reelfoot Lake, the scene of the night-rider raid of a few years ago. It was not until twenty-five years afterward that a sale was effected, realizing $14,000 for the University. Smith Hall, built for a library half a century after the gift of the land warrants and today occupied by the Law School, the most attractive building on the campus, commemorates the munificence of Colonel Smith.

In 1791 Smith again became a member of the Assembly, and except for the three years, 1801, 1802 and 1803, he continued in the State Senate until his election as Governor in the fall of 1810, and he was again in the Senate in 1816. He was Speaker of the Senate from 1795 to 1799. In 1800 he was defeated for the Speakership by Joseph Riddick, and in the next election he was defeated for the Senatorship by William Wingate, a Jeffersonian Democrat. In that day personal conflicts growing out of political differences were by no means unusual, and there is a tradition of a duel that Smith fought with Thomas Leonard, a political opponent, in which the General was seriously wounded. The ball could not be extracted, and the Governor carried it in his thigh to the end of his days.

During his career as a legislator he served on many important committees, and he always voted as a strict partisan. He favored the making of roads, the building of causeways, the draining of bog lands, the foresting of dunes, and the keeping open of rivers and creeks at their falls for the free passage of fish. As a Member of the Assembly he bitterly opposed the founding of the city of Raleigh, and the removal of the capital from Fayetteville and again from New Bern.

In contemplation of a war with France, or of a second conflict with England, while General Washington was still President, Colonel Smith was made Brigadier-General of Militia, 1796. When a struggle with France seemed imminent, during the presidency of John Adams in 1797, the entire militia force of Brunswick County, officers and men, roused to enthusiasm by a speech General Smith made them, volunteered to follow his lead in the service of their country. In 1810, when trouble with England was culminating, he was again made Brigadier-General of his county forces.

In that same year he was elected Governor of North Carolina, and in his message to the General Assembly, November 20, 1811, he recommended the adoption of a penitentiary system, and appealed for a reform of the too sanguinary criminal code of the State. He also advised encouraging "domestic manufactures employing those persons who are unable or unfit to till the soil," the improving of the militia, and the establishment of public schools. In recommending the schools he said: "Too much attention can not be paid to the all-important subject of education. In despotic governments, where the supreme power is in the possession of a tyrant or divided amongst an hereditary aristocracy (generally corrupt and wicked), the ignorance of the people is a security to their rulers; but in a free government, where the offices and honors of the State are open to all, the superiority of their political privileges should be infused into every citizen from their earliest infancy, so as to produce an enthusiastic attachment to their own country, and ensure a jealous support of their own constitution, laws, and government, to the total exclusion of all foreign influence or partiality. A certain degree of education should be placed within the reach of every child in the State; and I am persuaded a plan may be formed upon economical principles that would extend this boon to the poor of every neighborhood, at an expense trifling beyond expectation, when compared with the incalculable benefits from such a philanthropic and politic system." Excusing the rhetoric, this might have been written a century later.

Upon retiring from the gubernatorial office he entered upon the carrying out of certain engineering plans which he had advocated as legislator and Governor for the improvement of conditions within the State. He stood for the best of what has characterized each and every administration from the time of Governors Vance and Jarvis to the days of Aycock and Glenn and of Your Excellency. He lived just one hundred years before his time. He could not long remain out of politics, and in 1816 his neighbors returned him to the State Senate. General Smith was a zealous Mason, and during his prime was for three years, from 1808 to 1811, Grand Master of the Grand Lodge of North Carolina.

Up to 1792 there were no homes in the neighborhood of Fort Johnston, near the mouth of the Cape Fear River, and Mr. Joshua Potts, of Wilmington, who made the first movement toward establishing a town there, has given us an interesting account of the settlement of Smithville in a manuscript that has come down to us, and published in 1904 by the University of North Carolina in James Sprunt Historical Monograph No. 4, pp. 86-90. Mr. Potts has told us how he and certain of his friends in 1790 undertook to lay off a town there and obtain a charter. Their plan was unexpectedly opposed in the Legislature by Colonel Smith, and the charter for the town of "Nashton," as they purposed calling the place, was defeated. A year after the defeat of the bill at Fayetteville, General Smith's neighbors who favored the bill determined that he should not be sent to the Assembly unless he would do his best to have an act passed for the intended purpose. General Smith accepted the conditions, was elected, and made good his word. The act was passed at New Bern in 1792. General Smith, when he returned from the Assembly, told his friends that on his making a motion and offering the bill for the act, "Mr. Macon or some other respectable member made an observation that many applications had been acted upon for different towns in the State, but that few, if any of them, had succeeded; that the said worthy member said, 'As General Smith has applied in behalf of this petty town, it should be called Smithville, as if by way of derision to the applicant, should the town (like many others) not succeed.'"

Benjamin Smith married Miss Sarah Rhett Dry, daughter of Colonel William Dry, a man of ability, excellent education, and rare accomplishments, and a member of the King's Council. She was also a direct descendant from Cromwell's admiral, Robert Blake. Both she and General Smith inherited large estates. We learn much of their manner of life and their generous hospitality from the diary of General Joseph Gardner Swift, of New York, first graduate of the United States Military Academy at West Point, who in his younger days enjoyed intimate association with General Smith. Swift, a young second lieutenant in the corps of engineers, "was sent to Wilmington in 1804 to examine the harbor of Cape Fear, and to report a plan of defense therefor, and also to direct the execution of a contract with General Benjamin Smith, of Belvidere, to construct a battery at the site of old Fort Johnston, in Smithville, of a material called 'tapia.'" He gave to the United States Government ten acres of land on Bald Head, or Smith's Island, which he owned, on which to build the lighthouse at the mouth of the Cape Fear River. He constructed the causeway from Wilmington across Eagles Island.

"As he advanced in years," to use the words of Dr. Battle, "Governor Smith lost his health by high living and his fortune by too generous suretyship. He became irascible and prone to resent fancied slights. His tongue became venomous to opponents. He once spoke with undeserved abusiveness of Judge Alfred Moore, and the insult was avenged by one of the members of the Assembly from Brunswick, Judge Moore's son Maurice." General Swift has given us in his "Memoirs" an account of this duel, which was fought on June 28, 1805, just over in South Carolina, near to the ocean side, where then stood the Boundary House, the line running through the center of the entrance hall and main passageway. Captain Moore was attended by his cousin, Major Duncan Moore, while General Smith's second was General Swift himself. Dr. Andrew Scott attended as surgeon for both combatants. At the second fire General Smith received his antagonist's ball in his side and fell. Dr. Scott, aided by Dr. Griffin, took the General to Smithville by water, while General Swift hastened to Belvidere, and conveyed Mrs. Smith in a chair to Smithfield through a storm of lightning and rain. The ball lodged near the General's left shoulder-blade, and it (or the bullet fired by Leonard years before) was the means of identifying Smith's ashes many years later when his remains were removed to the burial ground of St. James Church, Wilmington.

General Smith's great burden of debt was due to the defalcation of Colonel Reed, collector of the port of Wilmington, whose surety he was. It was to discharge this liability that General Smith had contracted to build the tapia work at Fort Johnston. General Swift has told us how this tapia was prepared from equal parts of lime, raw shells and sand, and water sufficient to form a paste or batter. All the engineering work in which the old hero engaged was undertaken to discharge debts, and it is sad to relate that in his old age he was arrested by the attorney of the University, who, Smith alleged, was his personal enemy, and held for a security debt, "but on learning the fact he was released by the Trustees with promptness."

Besides the home at Belvidere, Governor Smith at one time owned Orton, which came down to him from his ancestor, Roger Moore, being originally the home of his kinsman, Maurice Moore, grandson of Sir John Yeamans. Mrs. Smith's flower garden was such an attractive place that Dr. Griffin, dying of yellow fever in Wilmington, asked that he be buried there. The Isabella grape, highly esteemed by us for its fine flavor, was introduced to North Carolina from Mrs. Smith's garden where it grew from a cutting, the gift of a sea captain who had received some kindness at her hands. General Swift visited his old friend, General Smith, at Orton in 1818, and found him greatly depressed by his debts, Mrs. Smith "evincing a well-balanced serenity to cheer her husband." Swift returned to Wilmington, where he "found it a fruitless essay to liquidate the large claims of the General's creditors."

This man, of rare personal charm, of high character, and of openhearted and openhanded hospitality, became involved in such pecuniary difficulties that he was actually imprisoned for debt; and at the time of his death, in 1826, some of his creditors resorted to the unusual method, though allowed by the law of that day, of withholding his body from burial until his friends could meet the demands of the creditors. The deputies set to watch the body were lured away temporarily to partake of refreshments, and when they returned the coffin and its contents had disappeared. Friends had taken it out on the river to the old graveyard on the site of St. Philip's Church, then a ruin of old Brunswick town, where in the dead of night they gave the body of their comrade Christian burial. A story, probably originating with the careless watchers, that the coffin had been taken out on the river and in the darkness committed to its waters by the negroes who were trusted to row the boat, gained some credence; but what is less probable: that devoted friends would thus leave his body to slaves, or that they would let the story pass as a probable means of concealing his last resting place?

In 1853 their old friend, General Swift, caused to be erected over the grave of General and Mrs. Smith in the old Brunswick cemetery a marble slab on which was inscribed: "In memory of that Excellent Lady, Sarah Rhett Dry Smith, who died the 21st of November, 1821, aged 59 years. Also of her husband, Benjamin Smith of Belvidere, once Governor of North Carolina, who died January, 1826, aged 70."

ACCEPTANCE

In a graceful speech, on behalf of the State, Governor Kitchin thanked the Society for this gift of the portrait of Governor Smith, and expressed his gratification upon learning that there had been manifested in North Carolina a century ago such interest in public education and other beneficent measures for the upbuilding of the State and the good of its people. It is a source of sincere regret that Governor Kitchin's speech of acceptance, having been delivered without manuscript or notes, cannot be reproduced here. As is always the case with that gifted orator, his remarks were a source of entertainment and interest to his hearers, and it would gratify us to place them in full before those of our readers who were not so fortunate as to be present on that interesting occasion.

THE STORY OF QUEEN'S COLLEGE OR LIBERTY HALL IN THE PROVINCE OF NORTH CAROLINA

BY MARSHALL DELANCEY HAYWOOD,

Author of "Governor William Tryon and His Administration in the Province of North Carolina, 1765-1771," "Lives of the Bishops of North Carolina," etc.

Of all the Royal Governors of North Carolina none was more interested in the educational advancement of the Province than William Tryon. In December, 1770, while the General Assembly was in session at New Bern, he sent a message to that body, urging the further improvement of the school system, which had already been bettered to some extent during his administration. The Assembly continued its sittings several weeks into the succeeding year, not adjourning until January 26, 1771. On the 10th day of January in the latter year (Chapter III of the Laws of 1770), the Assembly passed on its final reading an act to incorporate an institution of learning to be called QUEEN'S COLLEGE, the same to be located in the town of Charlotte and county of Mecklenburg. As a reason for such action it was recited that "the proper education of youth has always been considered as the most certain source of tranquillity, happiness, and improvement, both of private families and of States and Empires, and there being no institution or seminary of learning established in this Province, whither the rising generation may repair, after having acquired at a Grammar School a competent knowledge of the Greek, Hebrew, and Latin languages, to imbibe the principles of science and virtue, and to obtain under learned, pious and exemplary teachers in a collegiate or academic mode of instruction a regular or finished education in order to qualify them for the service of their friends and country," etc. This act of incorporation further recited that several Grammar Schools had already been established in the western part of the Province, and in these could be obtained "very considerable progress in the languages and other literary attainments," but that these schools were not able to give what was considered a finished education. The trustees of Queen's College were Edmund Fanning, Thomas Polk, Robert Harris, Jr., Abraham Alexander, Hezekiah Alexander, John McKnitt Alexander, Ezekiel Polk, Thomas Neal, William Richardson, Hezekiah J. Balch, Joseph Alexander, Waightstill Avery, Henry Patillo, and Abner Nash. All of these fourteen trustees, with the exception of Fanning and Nash, were Presbyterians, including several learned clergymen of that denomination; but, anticipating the opposition which later came from the Court of St. James, and wishing to conciliate the King if possible, this charter provided that the President of this institution should be a member of the Church of England, licensed by the Governor. As a source of revenue it was provided that a tax of six pence per gallon should be levied on all rum and other spirituous liquors brought into and disposed of in Mecklenburg County for ten years following the passage of the act of incorporation. On January 15, 1771, Governor Tryon gave the act his official approval. In a letter to the Earl of Hillsborough, King George's Secretary of State for the Colonies, to whom he transmitted the act of Assembly for the King's consideration, Tryon wrote, under date of March 12, 1771, saying: "The necessity for such an institution in this country is obvious, and the propriety of the mode here adopted must be submitted to His Majesty. Though the President is to be of the established Church and licensed by the Governor, the Fellows, Trustees, and Tutors, I apprehend, will be generally Presbyterians, the college being promoted by a respectable settlement of that persuasion, from which a considerable body marched to Hillsborough in September, 1768, in support of government." The last clause in the extract, just quoted, has reference to the loyal support accorded Tryon by the Presbyterians, both clergymen and laymen, in holding in check the lawlessness of the Regulators. It was a service which the Governor always held in grateful remembrance.

Unfortunately for the cause of education in North Carolina the act establishing Queen's College had to take the course of other colonial laws and be passed upon by a King and Council in England who were never noted for their tolerance in either religion or politics. First it was referred to Richard Jackson, afterwards a member of Parliament, who was legal adviser to the Lords Commissioners for Trade and Plantations, a board which had oversight of affairs in America; and, upon Jackson's advice, this Board (in session at Whitehall, on February 26, 1772), reported to the King as follows:

> From this report of Your Majesty's Governor, and from the prevalency of the Presbyterian persuasion within the county of Mecklenburg, we may venture to conclude that this college, if allowed to be incorporated, will in effect operate as a seminary for the education and instruction of youth in the principles of the Presbyterian Church. Sensible as we are of that tolerating spirit which generally prevails throughout Your Majesty's dominions, and disposed as we particularly are in the case before us to recommend to every reasonable mark of favor and protection a body of subjects who, by the Governor's report, have behaved with such loyalty and zeal during the late troubles and disorders, still we think it our duty to submit to Your Majesty whether it may be advisable for Your Majesty to add encouragement to toleration by giving the Royal assent to an establishment which, in its consequences, promises great and permanent advantages to a sect of Dissenters from the Established Church who have already extended themselves over the Province in very considerable numbers.

With this preliminary kick from Mr. Jackson and the Lords Commissioners for Trade and Plantations, the Queen's College act of incorporation was passed forward to King George and the Lords of His Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council at the Court of St. James, on April 22, 1772, when it was formally vetoed, or "disallowed, declared void and of none effect." It was nearly a year later, April 7, 1773, before this action was certified to Governor Josiah Martin, Tryon's successor in office, who thereupon issued a proclamation from the Governor's Palace in New Bern, North Carolina, June 28, 1773, declaring the King's disapproval of the movement to establish the college in Charlotte.

On December 6, 1771, before the King had vetoed the act incorporating Queen's College, Thomas Polk, one of its trustees and a representative of the county of Mecklenburg in the Provincial Assembly, introduced into the Assembly an amendment to that act (Chapter IX of the Laws of 1771) which provided for the election of a Vice-President of the college, who should act as President when the latter official was absent from North Carolina, as was then the case. This amendment passed its final reading on December 12th, and received Governor Martin's approval on December 23d; but, when the act of incorporation itself was repealed, such action worked as a repeal of the amendment also.

The nominal President of Queen's College was Edmund Fanning, though nothing shows that he took an active part in its management. Fanning was a much better man than written history and the absurd traditions of North Carolina have represented him, and few men in the Province equaled him in scholarship. In 1757 he had graduated with the degree of Bachelor of Arts from Yale, which later conferred upon him the degree of Master of Arts, finally honoring him with the high degree of Doctor of Laws in 1803. In 1764 Harvard College gave him the degree of Master of Arts, as did also King's College (now Columbia) in 1772. Dartmouth College, in 1803, conferred upon him the degree of Doctor of Laws, and he received the degree of Doctor of Civil Law from the great University of Oxford, England, in 1774. We doubt if any of Fanning's contemporaries, in either Great Britain or America, ever received so many academic honors; and yet this holder of literary degrees which the greatest scholars of any time might covet, is represented by many writers as an abandoned extortionist and libertine, whose sole title to distinction was the favoritism of Tryon. In the Revolution, Fanning became a Loyalist, and was a General in the army of Great Britain at the time of his death in 1818. At that time it was written: "The world did not contain a better man in all the various relations of life—as a husband, a parent, and a friend. As a landlord and master he was kind and indulgent. He was much distinguished in the American war, and raised a regiment there, by which he lost a very large property."

It was through no ill will of any one in North Carolina that a charter was withheld from Queen's College. Governor Tryon did everything in his power to secure it, as did also the Provincial Assembly. Both Churchmen and Dissenters throughout the Province regretted the outcome of the effort to secure one, but all were then too loyal to call into question what His Most Gracious Majesty had been pleased to do—or undo. But this feeling did not last. King George's power was soon likewise to be "disallowed, declared void and of none effect." In the meantime, Queen's College was conducted without a charter, doing much good both morally and educationally. Among its students were William Richardson Davie, Joseph Graham, and many others who afterwards won fame as officers in the Revolution. It is also probable that one of its pupils was Andrew Jackson, as we learn from his biography (unabridged edition) by Parton. In 1775 the college building is said to have been a rendezvous for some of the earlier meetings of the Committee of Safety, though the Court House was used for the principal sessions of that body.

Queen's College was sometimes called Queen's Museum; and, by Chapter XX of the Private Laws of 1777 (April session), its name was changed to LIBERTY HALL—no longer a namesake of royalty but of the fair goddess who was henceforth ordained to preside over the destinies of America. Under the new charter, in 1777, the trustees were Isaac Alexander (President), Thomas Polk, Thomas Neal, Abraham Alexander, Waightstill Avery, Ephraim Brevard, David Caldwell, James Edmonds, John Simpson, Thomas Reese, Adlai Osborne, Samuel McCorkle, John McKnitt Alexander, Thomas McCaule, and James Hall—true Presbyterians and patriots all, with none to gainsay their rights. By the act last mentioned, the Legislature directed that the treasurer of the college should give bond to the Governor of the State for the faithful discharge of his duties; and a subsequent Legislature (Chapter XXIII of the Private Laws of 1778, April session), appropriated for its use all moneys which should accrue from the sale of lots in the town of Charlotte, but even this could not make it a prosperous institution in the midst of a war which was making a heavy drain upon the resources of the people of the State. Another act of the Legislature just after the war (Chapter XXIX of the Private Laws of 1784, October session) changed the name of Liberty Hall to SALISBURY ACADEMY, and directed that it should be removed to Salisbury, in Rowan County. If Salisbury Academy began operations with as many pupils as it had trustees (thirty-six, including those added in 1785), it had a promising start, but what its final fate was we are unable to say.

The building originally erected in Charlotte for the use of Queen's College, and later operated under the name of Liberty Hall, was evidently used for school purposes even after the Legislature directed the removal of the institution to Salisbury in 1784; for we find a not over-gratifying reference to it in Washington's Diary, May 28, 1791, when the Father of his Country took a look at it and its surroundings. He wrote: "Charlotte is a trifling place, though the Court of Mecklenburg is held in it. There is a school (called a college) in which, at times, there has been 50 or 60 boys." Such was the sad lot of the first college ever erected in North Carolina—crippled in its infancy by the King of Great Britain, and belittled in its old age by the President of the United States!

BIOGRAPHICAL, GENEALOGICAL AND HISTORICAL MEMORANDA

COMPILED AND EDITED BY Mrs. E. E. MOFFITT.

COLLIER COBB

Collier Cobb, who contributes for this number of The Booklet the article entitled "Governor Benjamin Smith," was born at Mount Auburn, his grandfather's plantation, in Wayne County, North Carolina, March 21, 1862. His father, the Reverend Needham Bryan Cobb, was then chaplain in the Army of Northern Virginia. The Cobbs are of English extraction and immigrated to Virginia in 1613. Another ancestor, Martin Franks (Francke) came from Germany to New Bern and settled on the Trent river. His daughter Susanna became the wife of William Heritage (1769) and the mother of Elizabeth Heritage, who married Jesse Cobb, a distinguished soldier of the Revolution, great-great-grandfather of the subject of this sketch, and through whose services he is a member of the North Carolina branch of the "Sons of the Revolution." He is also eligible and member through Needham Bryan Cobb, member of the North Carolina Provincial Congress of August, 1775; also through Benjamin May, of Pitt County, member of the North Carolina Provincial Congress, November, 1776; also through James Green, Secretary of the North Carolina Provincial Congress of April, 1776.

"Collier Cobb during his youth pursued his studies at home and was prepared for college by his mother, Mrs. Martha Louisa Cobb, a woman of vigorous intellect and very strong will, who reared twelve children and instructed them herself. This lady learned to read and speak German at the age of forty, that she might teach that language to her children, when by moving to another town, they had to give up the instruction of a German tutor. From her Collier Cobb inherited many of his characteristics, and her influence on his life has long been strong and lasting."

Collier Cobb entered Wake Forest College, 1878, at about the age of sixteen, and the following year he entered the University of North Carolina, where he pursued his course of study. Earth science had always been attractive to him, and at the University he determined on geology as a profession. After leaving the University he became a teacher and studied the topographic features of every section in which he taught. In the year 1885 he gave up teaching and entered Harvard, in order to perfect himself in his profession. Here he was honored with the Secretaryship of the Harvard Natural History Society, a post of distinction which had been held by Edward Everett Hale, Alexander Agassiz, Theodore Roosevelt, and many others. In 1889 he received the degree of A.B. with honors in Natural History, and five years later he received his Master's Degree from Harvard, his major subject being "the origin of the topographic features around King's Mountain." Mr. Cobb was assistant to Professor N. S. Shaler on the United States Geological Survey (1886-92). The influence of this excellent gentleman and learned scientist on the life of his pupil-associate became very strong, and to him Mr. Cobb owes the encouragement which induced him to persevere under great difficulties, and the retarding influences of ill health.

Mr. Cobb's activities cover a broad field, for while during the four years as assistant in the United States Geological Survey he was also assistant in Harvard University (1888-90) and instructor in the Massachusetts Institute of Technology (1890-92). Among his other acquirements and accomplishments he is an artistic amateur photographer, his pictures are widely known throughout the United States.

He has published many scientic papers, books and maps. He is Fellow of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, of the Association of American Geographers and Geological Society of America and other kindred Associations.

Mr. Cobb is notably active in the interests of his native State. He rendered valuable assistance to Colonel William L. Saunders in his monumental work, "The Colonial Records of North Carolina." He is President of the North Carolina Academy of Science; a member of the Elisha Mitchell Scientific Society; has published two geographies of the State; also, in 1879, a valuable map of the State, which has been used for over a quarter of a century in the schools. He was elected Professor of Geology in the University of North Carolina in 1892, and continues in that position, which attests his great popularity and fitness for the place. His extensive travels in other lands have proved of inestimable value to his country as well as to himself. He is widely known as a student of moving sands, which he has studied on the coasts of France, Belgium, and Holland, as well as those of the States, and of the desert regions of the world.

In the January number of THE BOOKLET, 1905, Professor Cobb contributed an article on "Some Changes in the North Carolina Coast since 1585." This article throws much light on the mooted question, as to which inlet the English adventurers of 1584 entered the sounds of North Carolina (then called Virginia). His investigations covered a study of all maps and originals obtainable, securing photographs, or tracings from John White's map of 1585, to the Coast Survey Charts of the present day. The notes presented by him are based on his own researches, investigations and explorations of the North Carolina coast. Many of the inlets found by early explorers have been closed and others, formed by the shifting sands, will reveal to the student of history something of the nature of the problem of which particular inlet was entered by the English colonists. Whatever confusion there may be as to names of various harbors mentioned, it is generally conceded that the explorers from 1585 to 1590 headed for an inlet or harbor near Roanoke Island called "Hatorask." The influence of these shifting sands upon the development of our State is an interesting subject for the student of earth science in its relation to man.

Professor Cobb's object in his investigations was to study the changes in the zone of early exploration and settlement as they have influenced the history of the State. The rounding of Cape Hatteras is attended with such danger that the loss to life and shipping is fearful indeed, and to avert this the government now has under consideration the opening of a great inland waterway, which will not only be an economic move, but humanitarian in its purpose.

Professor Cobb ranks high as a geologist, and in his fine library in Chapel Hill he still pursues his studies and to exert his powers on the students under his charge to become useful factors in the building up of the State and its institutions. "The story of his life presents many features of great use to young Americans, illustrating how perseverance and systematic endeavor will generally bring success. He is indeed a representative American, not self-made, though self-educated in the best sense, self-reliant and successful in the career which he has chosen. He has lived thoroughly up to his motto, 'Always do as best you can the work that lies immediately at hand. Want whatever work presents itself, and you will some day get the work you want to do.' "

In 1891 Professor Cobb married Mary Lindsay Battle, a daughter of Doctor William Horn Battle. She died November 27, 1900, leaving three children: William Battle, Collier, and Mary Louise. In 1904 he married Miss Lucy Plummer Battle, daughter of Honorable Richard H. Battle, of Raleigh, N. C. She bore him one son, Richard Battle Cobb. She died April 27, 1905. In November, 1910, Professor Cobb married Miss Mary Gatling, of Little Rock, Arkansas, a descendant of Governor Richard Caswell.

NOTE.—The material for the above sketch was drawn from Captain Samuel A. Ashe's sketch of Mr. Cobb, in the Biographical History of North Carolina, Vol. VI, p. 141; also from THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET, Vol. IV, January, 1903, article by Professor Cobb; also from the Records of the Sons of the Revolution of North Carolina.

MRS. HELEN DeBERNIÈRE WILLS

Mrs. Helen DeBerniere Wills departed this life on June 24, 1911. The death of this highly esteemed and honored member of the North Carolina Society Daughters of the Revolution is greatly lamented, and the loss of her valued service as Genealogist is sadly felt and deplored. Mrs. Wills was a highly educated woman, naturally endowed with a superior intellect, enriched with judicious culture yet possessed of a modesty so retiring that only those who knew her intimately were able to appreciate the excellence of her mind and character.

Under the guiding hand of a father of unusual literary ability, Mrs. Wills became proficient as a teacher, and for a time she pursued this occupation until her marriage to James Wills, a prominent druggist of Wilson, North Carolina, on August 12, 1867. As the years passed on, she was repeatedly called upon to follow her dear ones to the tomb. On October 26, 1884, her husband died, in the faith and hope of a Christian, after many years of trial and suffering, leaving her with two small sons. She again resumed teaching, in which she met with continued success until her children were fitted to take up their life work and repay her in a measure for her care of them.

With a spirit of independence, her desire being to take up some work to occupy her time and attention, she removed to Raleigh, N. C. It was here that her services were called into requisition by the Society of the Daughters of the Revolution to undertake the office of Genealogist, a peculiar and difficult branch of history. Not since the days of Mr. Hathaway, of Edenton, N. C., has any one accomplished what she did for Genealogy in North Carolina. Could she have had the physical strength to take up the work where he left it off, our State would have been doubly enriched by her services, but a weak constitution forbade her undertaking its continuance.

Mrs. Wills was a devoted church woman and a faithful attendant upon the ministrations of her rector, the Rev. Dr. I. McK. Pittinger, of the Church of the Good Shepherd in Raleigh, in whose congregation she had a host of friends who held her in the highest esteem. She was a type of the ante-bellum Southern lady, impressing her personality upon all those with whom she came in contact. Firm in her convictions, based upon the broad view she took of life, her judgment was to be relied on in matters of social or literary significance. She was a voracious reader, and was authority on general literature and language. She was especially a student of history and had connected herself with several patriotic organizations.

She became a member of the Society of the Daughters of the Revolution when it was first organized in the State, and to the day of failing health was ever on the alert to aid in its growth and progress. In all its difficulties and deliberations her voice had a potent influence. The voluminous notes and data which she had collected during her term of office will be most valuable to her successor.

Mrs. Wills was also a "Daughter of the Confederacy" from the time that the society was organized, and one more faithful was not easily found. She was Historian of the Johnston Pettigrew Chapter, U. D. C., of Raleigh, N. C., filling the place most effectually and faithfully.

She founded at Chapel Hill and was President of the Leonidas Polk Chapter, the first and only Chapter of the U. D. C. ever organized in that place, leaving it in a flourishing condition upon her return to Raleigh.

Her devotion to the U. D. C., her intense interest in its historic work, her desire to see recorded the truth of the cause, won for her the place of Chairman of the Historical Text-book Committee of the State Division. To this she spared no pains to vindicate the justice of the cause as she saw it. Early in 1903 she issued a circular letter to the President and Historian of every Chapter in the State, then numbering about sixty. This circular was for the purpose of reminding them of the importance of this branch of the U. D. C. work—the preservation of a truthful history of the War between the States, the training of our young people in familiarity with such history and the endeavor to eliminate from our schools the false teachings which traduce the South and her heroes. She held up Jefferson Davis, R. E. Lee and "Stonewall" Jackson as the highest types of American manhood, fit examples for the generations to come. These characters, as well as other Confederate history, to be studied by our young people in order to fit them to carry on the work after the older "Daughters" have passed away, and to impress upon them their duty to the old soldier of the Lost Cause while in life, and to keep green his grave after death. This circular met with many favorable responses, not only from the Society but from prominent educators and other public-spirited citizens. Mrs. Wills's actual experience before and during the war enabled her to recount the trend of events with trusted accuracy. She heard the first gun fired at Sumter, being at that time a resident of South Carolina, and the echoes of that forerunner of a great fratricidal strife ever remained a fearful memory.

A few years ago a society was formed by the descendants of "Signers of the Declaration of Independence." In this organization Mrs. Wills was solicited to enroll her name, being eligible through her ancestor on the maternal side, William Hooper, "The Signer." In this she became heartily interested and attended two of the meetings, the last on October 19, 1909, at Yorktown, Virginia—the one hundred and twenty-eighth anniversary of the surrender of Lord Cornwallis to General George Washington. This historic town was the scene of a memorable celebration conducted under the joint auspices of the "Descendants of Signers" and the Yorktown Historical Society. A very interesting description of the occasion was written by Mrs. Wills for THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET of July, 1910.

On account of a failure in health, late in the year 1910, she laid aside her work, to reside with her son, Mr. Henry Wills, in Chapel Hill, N. C., hoping that a change of altitude would restore her to health and enable her to resume her wonted occupation, but her days were numbered. After a lingering illness she passed away, surrounded by kind and sorrowing friends. She is survived by two sons, Henry C. Wills, of Chapel Hill, N. C., and George Wills, a prominent architect of New York City; also by one sister, Mrs. R. H. Graves, now residing in Philadelphia, besides several nephews and nieces.

GENEALOGY.

Mrs. Wills comes of a noble, patriotic, and cultured ancestry, being lineally descended from the Hooper, Maclaine, DeBerniére, and Jones families. She is the fifth in lineal descent from the Rev. William Hooper, Trinity Church, Boston, Massachusetts, the second Rector of that church from 1747 to his death in 1767. She is the fourth in descent from his son, William Hooper (1742-1790), the "signer" of the Declaration of Independence, of National fame. She is the third in descent from William Hooper third and Helen (Hogg) his wife, of Brunswick County, N. C., who died in 1804. She is the second in descent from the Rev. William Hooper (1792-1876), who married Frances Pollock Jones, daughter of Edward Jones (1762-1841), for many years Solicitor-General of North Carolina. Reverend Wm. Hooper, D.D., LL.D., was for many years Professor in the University of North Carolina and other institutions of learning, an instructor of youth for sixty-five years. She was a daughter of Professor John DeBernière Hooper (1811-1886), for many years Professor of Languages in the University of North Carolina, who was acknowledged to be one of the most accurate Greek, Latin and French scholars of his age and day.

From such ancestry Mrs. Wills inherited many varied traits that characterized this remarkable family, and at her demise many relatives and friends are left to mourn their loss.

IN MEMORIAM

Resolutions of Respect to the Memory of Mrs. Fanny DeBerniere Hooper Whitaker, who Died November 28, 1911

WHEREAS, God, in His divine love and never-failing wisdom, has called from her temporary home to "the Great Beyond" our beloved Founder, former State and Honorary Regent, Mrs. Fanny DeBernière Hooper Whitaker:

Therefore be it Resolved, That the North Carolina Society, Daughters of the Revolution, laments the inexpressible loss sustained in her death.

That they express the deepest gratitude for the high standard she has set us by the beautiful example of her noble life, and that they appreciate the great work she has done in founding this society, whose influence has been recognized as a factor in the universal historical awakening that is restoring North Carolina to her own, whose devotion will ever be an inspiration to our members—her loyal followers—to undertake more difficult tasks and to bring to accomplishment enduring achievements.

That they will always miss the guiding hand that has safely piloted them through troubled waters, and treasure her hallowed memory through the coming years.

To the dear ones is extended our warmest sympathy in this hour of sorrow.

That these resolutions be spread upon the minutes of the society and a copy be sent to the family.

MARY HILLIARD HINTON,
MRS. ANNIE (MOORE) PARKER,
MRS. HUBERT HAYWOOD,
Regent Bloomsbury Chapter.
MRS. E. E. MOFFITT,
Committee.

MARRIAGE BONDS OF ROWAN COUNTY, N. C.

BY MRS. M. G. McCUBBINS.

Squire Boone to Jane Vancleft. July 11, 1765. Squire Boone, John Johnston and Sam (his X mark) Tate. (Thomas Frohock). [This is framed and hangs on wall in clerk's office.]

Andrew Beard to Anne Locke. February 1, 1790. Andrew Beard and Jno. Beard. (C. Caldwell, D. C.)

John H. Berger to Susanna Miller. February 15, 1790. John H. Berger(?) (in Dutch) and Peter (his X mark) Berger.

Randel Bevin to Rachael Wood. February 15, 1790. Randel (his X mark) Bevin and Benjamin Stony(?). (Ed. Harris.).

Thomas Boulwin to Mary Coske (Cooke?). February 22, 1790. Thomas Boulwin(?) and William Aldredge.

Philip Brown to Rebekah Baker. March 1, 1790. Philip (his X mark) Brown and Charles Dunn.

John Baker to Jean Mitchel. May 20, 1790. John (his X mark) Baker and Sehon Smith. (C. Caldwell, D. C.)

John Braley to Mary Carson. May 22, 1790. John Braley and Wi^{m}. St. Carson. (C. Caldwell, D. C.)

Wm. Brewer to Mary Shumaker. June 10, 1790. William (his X mark) Bruer and Rich^{d} (his X mark) Speaks. (Basil Gaither.)

John Biles to Margaret Whiteker. July 2, 1790. John Biles and John (his X mark) Whiteker. (Basil Gaither.)

William Barly, Jr., to Jane Patteson. July 26, 1790. William Barly and Wm. Belay, Sr. (Jan Harris, D. C., for Charles Caldwell.)

John Barkley to Yuiley(?) Kern. August 21, 1790. John Barcley and John Kern. (C. Caldwell, D. C.)

John Berger to Margret Cruse. John Berger and Adam Stiyerwalt. September 1, 1790. (C. Caldwell, D. C.)

Muddeas Beam to Polly Wise. September 21, 1790. Muddeas Beam(?) (both in Dutch) Jacob Beam. (C. Caldwell, D. C.)

Samuel Badjet to Jenny Skene. October 21, 1790. Samuel Badgett and Jacob Skeen. (C. Caldwell, D. C.)

James Brian to Margaret Johnson. December 8, 1790. James Bryan and John Johnston. (C. Caldwell, C. C.)

Manning Brookshire to Elizabeth Sludder. December 14, 1790. Manning (his X mark) Brookshire and Jesse Brookshire.

Douglass Blue to Charity Hill. May 18, 1791. Douglass Blue and Moses Bellah. (Charles Caldwell, D. C.)

Archibald Blue to Martha Forest (or Foust). July 18, 1791. Arch^{d}. Blue and Moses Bellah. (C. Caldwell, D. C.)

David Bloomfield to Rachel Barkley. October 21, 1791. David (his X mark) Bloomfield and Wilson McCay. Cun:^{m} Harris.)

John Buse to Sarah Wyatt. November 8, 1791. John Buis and J. G. Lanmann. (Chs. Caldwell.)

Horatio Baker to Rachael Blaster(?). December 29, 1791. Horatio (his X mark) Baker and Philip Coleman(?) (in Dutch). (Ad: Osborn.)

Jeremiah Brown to Mary Charian (Marian?). June 29, 1792. Jeremiah (his X mark) Brown and Thomas (his X mark) Davis. (Chs. Caldwell.)

Jacob Bodenhamer to Elizabeth Spurgins. January 1, 1792. Jacob Bodenhamer and Peter Bodenhamer. (Jno. Monro?)

Moses Bella to Elizabeth Anderson. February 21, 1792. Moses Bellah and Wm. Anderson. (Chs. Caldwell.)

John Biles to Betsay Smithe. March 12, 1792. John Biles and Conrad Brem. (Chs. Caldwell.)

John Baxter to Hannah Owins(?). April 13, 1792. John Backster and James (his X mark) Wood. (Chs. Caldwell.)

William Baley to Lucy Foster. June 11, 1792. William Baily and Robert Dial. (Basil Gaither.)

George Bullen to Chlora Castor. October 9, 1792. George (his X mark) Bullen and Jacob Call (Castor?). (Jo. Chambers.)

Leonard Bevins to Sarah Moore. October 16, 1792. Leonard (his X mark) Bevins and Val: Beard. (Jos. Chambers.)

N. B. on back of bond.—Jos. Chambers testifies that they were married October 16, 1792.

Thomas Briggs to Esther Parks. October 19, 1792. Thomas Briggs and Simon (his G mark) Watson. Jos:[s] Chambers, D. C.)

Conrod Brown to Patience Penny. October (no date), 1792. Conrod (his X mark) Brown and David (his X mark) Brown. (Jo. Chambers.)

Jacob Bining to Nancy Rowan. November 17, 1792. Jacob Binning and John Braly.

John Buise to Martha Wyatt. January 12, 1793. John Buis, Jr., and Laurence Clinard. (Jno. (?)onro.)

William Bunton to Mary Cowan. January 31, 1793. William Bunten and Thomas Barrkley (or Barckley?). (Jos. Chambers.)

William Bateman to Elizabeth Smith. March 4, 1793. William (his X mark) Bateman and Mesheck(?) Pinkstone. (Jos. Chambers.)

William Braly to Margaret Woods. March 8, 1793. William Braly and Jno. Braly.

Daniel Brown to Ann Rablin. August 26, 1793. Daniel Brawn(?) and Mertin Räblin. (Jos. Chambers.)

John Henry Brinly to Catharine Easter. August 4, 1793. John Henry Brennly and Peter Easter (or Easten?). (Jno. (?)onro.)

William Brown to Lucy Chaffin. September 3, 1793. William Brown and Valentine (his X mark) Holderfield. (Jos. Chambers.)

Henry Benson to Jane Cathey. October 12, 1793. Henry Bonson and Jno. McRavey. (Jos. Chambers.)

Charles Burros to Nancy Renshaw. October 18, 1793. Charles Burroughs and James Heathman. (Jos. Chambers.)

George Briles to Barbra Coonrod. George Brile and David Coonrod (?) (in Dutch). (Jno. onro.)

Samuel Bucey to Katharine Seigler. February 10, 1794. Samuel Bucey and Laurence Seigler. (John Pinchback and Ly(?) Pinchback.)

John Burns to Mary Lopp. April 18, 1794. John (his X mark) Burns and Charles (his X mark) Burns. (Jo. Chambers.)

James Brown to Sarah Smith. July 23, 1794. James Brown and Tobias Fouro(?) (or Furr). (I. Troy, D. C.)

Daniel Benson to Mary Ham. August 25, 1794. Daniel Benson and John Peraman. (Friedrick Miller.)

INFORMATION

Concerning the Patriotic Society

"Daughters of the Revolution"

The General Society was founded October 11, 1890,—and organized August 20, 1891,—under the name of "Daughters of the American Revolution"; was incorporated under the laws of the State of New York as an organization national in its work and purpose. Some of the members of this organization becoming dissatisfied with the terms of entrance, withdrew from it and, in 1891, formed under the slightly differing name "Daughters of the Revolution," eligibility to which from the moment of its existence has been lineal descent from an ancestor who rendered patriotic service during the War of Independence.

"The North Carolina Society"

a subdivision of the General Society, was organized in October, 1896, and has continued to promote the purposes of its institution and to observe the Constitution and By-Laws.

Membership and Qualifications

Any woman shall be eligible who is above the age of eighteen years, of good character, and a lineal descendant of an ancestor who (1) was a signer of the Declaration of Independence, a member of the Continental Congress, Legislature or General Court, of any of the Colonies or States; or (2) rendered civil, military or naval service under the authority of any of the thirteen Colonies, or of the Continental Congress; or (3) by service rendered during the War of the Revolution became liable to the penalty of treason against the government of Great Britain: Provided, that such ancestor always remained loyal to the cause of American Independence.

The chief work of the North Carolina Society for the past eight years has been the publication of the "North Carolina Booklet," a quarterly publication of great events in North Carolina history—Colonial and Revolutionary. $1.00 per year. It will continue to extend its work and to spread the knowledge of its History and Biography in other States.

This Society has its headquarters in Raleigh, N. C., Room 411, Carolina Trust Company Building, 232 Fayetteville Street.

Some North Carolina Booklets for Sale

Address, EDITOR, Raleigh, N. C.

Vol. I

"Greene's Retreat," Dr. Daniel Harvey Hill.

Vol. II

"Our Own Pirates," Capt. S. A. Ashe.

"Indian Massacre and Tuscarora War," Judge Walter Clark.

"Moravian Settlement in North Carolina," Rev. J. E. Clewell.

"Whigs and Tories," Prof. W. C. Allen.

"The Revolutionary Congresses," Mr. T. M. Pittman.

"Raleigh and the Old Town of Bloomsbury," Dr. K. P. Battle.

"Historic Homes—Bath, Buncomb Hall, Hayes," Rodman, Blount, Dillard.

"County of Clarendon," Prof. John S. Bassett.

"Signal and Secret Service," Dr. Charles E. Taylor.

'Last Days of the War," Dr. Henry T. Bahnson.

Vol. III

"Volunteer State Tennessee as a Seceder," Miss Susie Gentry.

"Colony of Transylvania," Judge Walter Clark.

"Social Conditions in Colonial North Carolina," Col. Alexander Q. Holladay, LL.D.

"Battle of Moore's Creek Bridge, 1776," Prof. M. C. S. Noble.

"North Carolina and Georgia Boundary," Mr. Daniel Goodloe.

Vol. IV

"Battle Ramsaur's Mill, 1780," Major Wm. A. Graham.

"Quaker Meadows," Judge A. C. Avery.

"Convention of 1788," Judge Henry Groves Connor.

"North Carolina Signers of Declaration of Independence, John Penn and Joseph Hewes," by T. M. Pittman and Dr. E. Walter Sikes.

"North Carolina Troops in South America," Judge Walter Clark.

"Rutherford's Expedition Against the Indians," Capt. S. A. Ashe.

"Changes in Carolina Coast Since 1585," Prof. Collier Cobb.

"Highland Scotch Settlement in N. C.," Judge James C. MacRae.

"The Scotch-Irish Settlement," Rev. A. J. McKelway.

"Battle of Guilford Court-house and German Palatines in North Carolina," Major J. M. Morehead, Judge O. H. Allen.

Vol. VII. (Quarterly.)

July, No. 1.

"North Carolina in the French and Indian War," Col. A. M. Waddell.

"Locke's Fundamental Constitutions," Mr. Junius Davis.

"Industrial Life in Colonial Carolina," Mr. Thomas M. Pittman.

Address: "Our Dearest Neighbor—The Old North State," Hon. James Alston Cabell.

Biographical Sketches: Col. A. M. Waddell, Junius Davis, Thomas M. Pittman, by Mrs. E. E. Moffitt; Hon. Jas. Alston Cabell, by Mary Hilliard Hinton.

Abstracts of Wills. Mrs. Helen DeB. Wills.

October, No. 2.

"Ode to North Carolina," Pattie Williams Gee.

"The Finances of the North Carolina Colonists," Dr. Charles Lee Raper.

"Joseph Gales, Editor," Mr. Willis G. Briggs.

"Our First Constitution, 1776," Dr. E. W. Sikes.

"North Carolina's Historical Exhibit at Jamestown Exposition," Mary Hilliard Hinton.

Biographical Sketches: Dr. Kemp P. Battle, Dr. Charles Lee Raper, Willis Grandy Briggs, Pattie Williams Gee. By Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

January, No. 3.

"General Robert Howe," Hon. John D. Bellamy.

"Early Relations of North Carolina and the West," Dr. William K. Boyd.

"Incidents of the Early and Permanent Settlement of the Cape Fear," Mr. W. B. McKoy.

Biographical Sketches: John Dillard Bellamy, William K. Boyd, William B. McKoy. By Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

April, No. 4.

"St. James's Churchyard" (Poem), Mrs. L. C. Markham.

"The Expedition Against the Row Galley General Arnold—A Side Light on Colonial Edenton," Rev. Robt. B. Drane, D.D.

"The Quakers of Perquimans," Julia S. White.

"Fayetteville Independent Light Infantry," Judge James C. MacRae.

Biographical Sketches: Mrs. L. C. Markham, Rev. R. B. Drane, Julia S. White, Judge James C. MacRae. By Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

Vol. VIII.—(Quarterly)

July, No. 1.

"John Harvey," Mr. R. D. W. Connor.

"Military Organizations of North Carolina During the American Revolution," Clyde L. King, A.M.

"A Sermon by Rev. George Micklejohn," edited by Mr. R. D. W. Connor

Vol. V.—(Quarterly.)

No. 2.

"History of the Capitol," Colonel Charles Earl Johnson.

"Some Notes on Colonial North Carolina, 1700-1750," Colonel J. Bryan Grimes.

"North Carolina's Poets," Rev. Hight C. Moore.

No. 3.

"Cornelius Harnett," Mr. R. D. W. Connor.

"Celebration of the Anniversary of May 20, 1775," Major W. A. Graham.

"Edward Moseley," by Dr. D. H. Hill.

No. 4.

"Governor Thomas Pollok," Mrs. John W. Hinsdale.

"Battle of Cowan's Ford," Major W. A. Graham.

"First Settlers in North Carolina Not Religious Refugees," Rt. Rev. Joseph Blount Cheshire, D.D.

Vol. VI—(Quarterly.)

October, No. 2.

"The Borough Towns of North Carolina," Mr. Francis Nash.

"Governor Thomas Burke," J. G. de Roulhac Hamilton, Ph.D.

"Colonial and Revolutionary Relics in the Hall of History," Col. Fred. A. Olds.

"The North Carolina Society Daughters of the Revolution and its Objects."

Biographical Sketches: Dr. Richard Dillard, Mr. Francis Nash, Dr. J. G. de R. Hamilton and Col. Fred A. Olds, by Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

January, No. 3.

"State Library Building and Department of Archives and Records," Mr. R. D. W. Connor.

"The Battle of Rockfish Creek, 1781," Mr. James Owen Carr.

"Governor Jesse Franklin," Prof. J. T. Alderman.

"North Carolina's Historical Exhibit at Jamestown," Mrs. Lindsay Patterson, Mary Hilliard Hinton.

Biographical Sketches: Mrs. S. B. Kenneday, R. D. W. Connor, James Owen Carr, and Prof. J. T. Alderman, by Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

April, No. 4.

"The White Pictures," Mr. W. J. Peele.

"North Carolina's Attitude Toward the Revolution," Mr. Robert Strong.

"Some Overlooked North Carolina History," J. T. Alderman.

Biographical Sketches: Richard Benbury Creecy, the D. R. Society and Its Objects, Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

Genealogical Sketches: Abstracts of Wills; Scolley, Sprott and Hunter, Mrs. Helen de B. Wells.

Biographical and Genealogical Sketches: R. D. W. Connor, Clyde L. King, Marshall DeLancey Haywood, by Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

"Abstracts of Wills," Mrs. Helen DeB. Wills.

October, No. 2.

"Convention of 1835," Associate Justice Henry G. Connor.

"The Life and Services of Brigadier-General Jethro Sumner," Kemp P. Battle, LL.D.

"The Significance of the Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence," Prof. Bruce Craven.

Biographical and Genealogical Sketches: Judge Henry G. Connor, Kemp P. Battle, LL.D., Prof. Bruce Craven, by Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

January, No. 3.

"The Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence," Mr. A. S. Salley, Jr.

"The Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence," Prof. Bruce Craven.

"Mr. Salley's Reply."

"Mr. Craven's Rejoinder."

Biographical and Genealogical Sketches: Prof. Bruce Craven, Mr. Alexander S. Salley, Jr., by Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

"Patriotic Objects."

"Information Concerning the Patriotic Society D. R."

April, No. 4.

"Unveiling Ceremonies."

"Carolina," by Bettie Freshwater Pool.

"The Battle of King's Mountain," by Dr. William K. Boyd.

"Schools and Education in Colonial Times," by Dr. Charles Lee Smith.

"North Carolina Heroines of the Revolution," by Richard Dillard, M.D.

Biographical and Genealogical Sketches: Bettie Freshwater Pool, William K. Boyd, Charles Lee Smith, Richard Dillard, by Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

Vol. IX.—(Quarterly.)

July, No. 1.

"Indians, Slaves and Tories: Our 18th Century Legislation Regarding Them," Clarence H. Poe.

"Thomas Person," Dr. Stephen B. Weeks.

"Sketch of Flora McDonald," Mrs. S. G. Ayr.

Biographical and Genealogical Memoranda: Clarence H. Poe, Dr. Stephen B. Weeks, Mrs. S. G. Ayr, Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

Abstracts of Wills: Shrouck, Stevens, Sanderson, Shirley, Stevenson, Sharee, Shearer, Shine, Smithson, Sitgreaves, by Mrs. Helen DeB. Wills.

October, No. 2.

"General Joseph Graham," Mrs. Walter Clark.

"State Rights in North Carolina Through Half a Century," Dr. H. M. Wagstaff.

"The Nag's Head Portrait of Theodosia Burr," Bettie Freshwater Pool.

Biographical and Genealogical Memoranda: Mrs. Walter Clark, H. M. Wagstaff, by Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

Abstracts of Wills: Arnold, Ashell, Avelin, Adams, Battle, Burns, Boge, Bennett, by Mrs. Helen DeB. Wills.

January, No. 3.

"History of Lincoln County," Mr. Alfred Nixon.

"Our State Motto and Its Origin," Chief Justice Walter Clark.

"Work Done by the D. R. in Pasquotank County," C. F. S. A.

Biographical and Genealogical Memoranda: Alfred Nixon, Walter Clark, by Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

Abstracts of Wills: Clark, Evans, Fendall, Fort, Gorbe, Gambell, Grainger, Hill, White, by Mrs. Helen DeB. Wills.

April, No. 4.

"Der North Carolina Land und Colonie Etablissement," Miss Adelaide L. Fries.

"George Durant," Capt. S. A. Ashe.

"Hatorask," Mr. Jaques Busbee.

"The Truth about Jackson's Birthplace," Prof. Bruce Craven.

Biographical and Genealogical Memoranda: Miss Fries, Captain Ashe, Professor Craven, by Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

Vol. X.—(Quarterly.)

July, No. 1.

"The Chase," James Sprunt.

"Art as a Handmaiden of History," Jaques Busbee.

"Sketch of Colonel Francis Locke," George McCorkle.

"Unveiling of Tablet at Nixonton, N. C.," Mrs. Walker Waller Joynes.

"Address Delivered at Unveiling of Tablet at Nixonton, N. C.," by Former Lieutenant-Governor F. D. Winston.

"A Glimpse of Historic Yorktown," Mrs. Helen DeB. Wills.

"Colonel Polk's Rebellion," Capt. S. A. Ashe.

"Was George Durant Originally a Quaker?" William B. Phelps.

October, No. 2.

"The History of Orange County, Part I," Francis Nash.

January, No. 3.

"The Croatans," Hamilton McMillan.

"State Aid to Transportation in North Carolina: The Pre-Railroad Era," J. Allen Morgan.

"Joseph Hewes and the Declaration of Independence," R. D. W. Connor.

April, No. 4.

"An Address for the Baptism of Virginia Dare," Rt. Rev. Joseph Blount Cheshire, D.D.

"The Early History of Craven County," S. M. Brinson.

"Jacob Marling, an Early North Carolina Artist," Marshall DeLancey Haywood.

"The Social Condition of North Carolina in the Year 1783," Captain S. A. Ashe.

"Rowan County Wills and Marriage Bonds," Mrs. M. G. McCubbins.

Vols. I, II, III, IV, 25 cents each number.

Vols. V, VI, VII, VIII, IX, X, 35 cents each number.

The North Carolina Booklet

A QUARTERLY PUBLICATION ISSUED UNDER
THE AUSPICES OF THE

NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION

THIS PUBLICATION treats of important events in North Carolina History, such as may throw light upon the political, social or religious life of the people of this State during the Colonial and Revolutionary periods, in the form of monographs written and contributed by as reliable and painstaking historians as our State can produce. The Eleventh Volume began in July, 1911.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION:

One Year, One Dollar; Single Copies, Thirty-five Cents.

Miss Mary Hilliard Hinton, Editor, Raleigh, North Carolina.

Registered at Raleigh Post-office as second class matter.

Notice should be given if the subscription is to be discontinued. Otherwise it is assumed that a continuance of the subscription is desired.

All orders for back numbers and all communications relating to subscriptions should be sent to

Miss Mary Hilliard Hinton,
Midway Plantation, Raleigh, N. C.

Vol. XI APRIL, 1912 No. 4

The North Carolina Booklet

"Carolina! Carolina! Heaven's blessings attend her!
While we live we will cherish, protect and defend her."

Published by
THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY
DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION

The object of THE BOOKLET is to aid in developing and preserving North Carolina History. The proceeds arising from its publication will be devoted to patriotic purposes. EDITOR.

ADVISORY BOARD OF THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET

Mrs. Hubert Haywood.
Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.
Mr. R. D. W Connor.
Dr. D. H. Hill.
Dr. E. W. Sikes.
Mr. W. J. Peele.
Miss Adelaide L. Fries.
Miss Martha Helen Haywood.
Dr. Richard Dillard.
Dr. Kemp P. Battle.
Mr. James Sprunt.
Mr. Marshall DeLancey Haywood.
Chief Justice Walter Clark.
Major W. A. Graham.
Dr. Charles Lee Smith.

EDITOR:
Miss Mary Hilliard Hinton.

OFFICERS OF THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION 1910-1912

REGENT:
Miss MARY HILLIARD HINTON.

VICE-REGENT:
Miss DUNCAN CAMERON WINSTON.

HONORARY REGENT:
Mrs. E. E. MOFFITT.

RECORDING SECRETARY:
Mrs. CLARENCE JOHNSON.

CORRESPONDING SECRETARY:
Mrs. PAUL H. LEE.

TREASURER:
Mrs. FRANK SHERWOOD.

REGISTRAR:
Miss SARAH W. ASHE.

CUSTODIAN OF RELICS:
Mrs. JOHN E. RAY.

CHAPTER REGENTS

Bloomsbury Chapter.....Mrs. Hubert Haywood, Regent.
Penelope Barker Chapter.....Mrs. Patrick Matthew, Regent.
Sir Walter Raleigh Chapter,
Miss Catherine F. Seyton Albertson, Regent.
DeGraffenried Chapter.....Mrs. Charles Slover Hollister, Regent.

Founder of the North Carolina Society and Regent 1896-1902:
Mrs. SPIER WHITAKER.†

Regent 1902:
Mrs. D. H. HILL, Sr.*

Regent 1902-1906:
Mrs. THOMAS K. BRUNER.

Regent 1906-1910:
Mrs. E. E. MOFFITT.

*Died December 12, 1904.
†Died November 25, 1911.

THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET

Vol XI APRIL, 1912 No. 4

JAMES IREDELL, 1751-1799 [1]

By H. G. CONNOR.
Judge United States Court, Eastern District North Carolina.

"The character of this excellent man has been too little known. Similar has been the fate of many other valuable characters in America. They are too little known to those around them; their modest merits have been too familiar, perhaps too uniform, to attract particular and distinguished attention."

James Iredell was born in Lewes, Sussex County, England, October 5, 1751. His father, Francis Iredell, a merchant of Bristol, married Margaret McCulloch. The family were allied by blood to Sir George Macartney, the Earl of Wigton, the Fergusons, McCullochs, and, by marriage, to Governor Lyttleton. Henry McCulloch was connected with the Government of the Province of North Carolina, where he owned large landed estates. Through the influence of relatives, James Iredell was appointed Comptroller of the Customs at Port Roanoke (Edenton) N. C. It was said at the time, "The office is genteel requiring little or no duty, so that he will have time to apply himself to business; it is worth upwards of one hundred pounds sterling a year." Iredell appropriated a large portion of his salary to the support of his father and mother, thus "illustrating in a forcible manner his filial piety and generous nature." He sailed for his new home, bringing with him his commission, and letters of introduction from friends in England, to several gentlemen in Edenton, arriving at the latter place "near the close of the year 1768." His biographer says of him: "He was then just seventeen years old, at the age when pleasures are enjoyed with the keenest relish. Frank, ingenuous, of pleasing appearance, winning manners, and educated in the best schools of England, he was kindly received and warmly welcomed."

[1] The writer has, for his information relied largely upon McRee's "Life and Correspondence of James Iredell." Except as otherwise indicated herein, quotations given are taken from it.

The ancient borough of Edenton is situated on the northern shore of Albemarle Sound. It was founded in 1716, and named in honor of Eden, the Royal Governor. Mr. McRee says of the people to whom the young Comptroller came and among whom he resided during the remainder of his life: "If there was little of the parade and pomp of older communities, if many of the appliances of luxury were wanting, ease and abundance were the reward of but a slight degree of frugality and industry; the homes of the planters were comfortable and ample for all the purposes of hospitality; while their tables groaned beneath dainties beyond the reach of wealth on the other side of the Atlantic. * * * He who supposes the inhabitants were untutored people is grossly deceived. They were not refugees from the justice of the old world; nor were they of desperate fortunes or undisciplined minds—they were equal in cultivation, ability and patriotism to any of their contemporaries. The men were bold, frank, generous and intelligent; the females tender, kind and polite." The town contained about five hundred inhabitants. Of the residents of the town were Samuel Johnston, among the earliest, most enthusiastic and active Whigs, President of the Provincial Congress, Governor, and, upon the adoption of the Federal Constitution, the first United States Senator elected from the State, a lawyer of learning, a man of deep and extensive reading and singular purity of life spent in patriotic service to the State; Joseph Hewes, signer of the Declaration; Thomas Barker, Thomas Jones, Jasper Charlton, Stephen Cabarrus, Robert Smith, Charles Johnston, John Johnston, and Sir Nathaniel Duckenfield. In the adjoining counties were Colonel Richard Buncombe, who, being mortally wounded at Germantown died in Philadelphia; John Harvey, Speaker of the Assembly, and later Moderator of the First and Second Provincial Congresses called in the Province (August, 1774, and April, 1775); and others of less note, but of liberal education and of honorable service and position. The society of the town furnished to Iredell a social circle of cultured and refined hospitality into which he at once entered. It is with Iredell's preparation for, and work as, a lawyer, statesman and judge that we are specially concerned, which precludes an entrance into the interesting and charming story of his personal and social life further than it illustrates his public career.

Very soon after his arrival he began the study of law with Samuel Johnston. "Every moment of leisure was devoted to his legal studies and to such intercourse with intelligent gentlemen and cultivated ladies as was calculated to refine and improve. He was a diligent student; he copied Mr. Johnston's arguments and pleas in important cases. He read carefully and attentively the text-books, referring to the authorities quoted, and collecting and digesting kindred passages from all writers within his reach; he attended the courts, returned to his chamber and wrote out arguments of his own, applicable to the cases he had stated." A few extracts from his "Journal" give us a fair view of the young Comptroller, preparing himself for the career which, all unthought of, awaited him. On August 22, 1770, he writes: "Indolence in any is shameful, but in a young man quite inexcusable. Let me consider for a moment whether it will be worth my while to attempt making a figure in life, or whether I will be content with mediocrity of fame and circumstances.

* * * But nothing is to be acquired without industry; and indolence is an effectual bar to improvement. * * * I have not done as much as I ought to have done; read a little in Lyttleton's Tenures and stopped in the middle of his Chapter on Rents; whereas I ought to have gone through it. It would have been better than losing three or four games at billiards. N. B.—If you do play billiards make it a rule not to lengthen."

We learn from his journal that, while studying Lyttleton, he did not neglect polite literature. He says: "I have been reading a volume of the Spectator, which is ever new, ever instructive, ever interesting. I hope they will be transmitted, with honor, to the latest ages. * * * Strength of reason, elegance of style, delicacy of sentiment, fertility of imagination, poignancy of wit, politeness of manners, and the most amiable pattern of human life, appears through the whole, in so conspicuous a manner as at once to improve and delight. * * * Resumed my Spectator; read a great many entertaining and improving things, particularly Mr. Addison's Discourses on Fame, in the fourth volume, which are incomparably elegant and sublime. Surely the writings of such great, learned and good men are more than a counterpoise to the libertine writings of professed Deists, whose immoral lives made them dread an encounter hereafter." He continues this train of reflection regarding the infidelity so prevalent at that time, concluding with words, which are of special interest, giving expression to a principle which controlled his private and public conduct throughout his life: "At a time when licentiousness is at an amazing and dangerous height we shall be careful to guard against popular prejudice, though we must not blindly oppose the public voice because it may appear too tumultuous. Let us do things impartially and not oppose or condemn any conduct on the whole, on account of a few improper circumstances attending it."

His journal shows that he was a diligent student of the "Tenures." On July 31, 1771, he writes his father, "I am too often troubling you, but I will hope for your excuse of this last request, as it will be of particular, perhaps necessary, service for me. It is that you will be so obliging as to procure Dr. Blackstone's Commentaries on the Laws of England and send them by the first opportunity. I have, indeed, read them by the favor of Mr. Johnston, who lent them to me, but it is proper that I should read them frequently and with great attention. They are books admirably suited for a young student, and, indeed, may interest the most learned. The law there is not merely considered as a profession but a science. The principles are deduced from their source and we are not only taught, in the clearest manner, the general rules of law, but the reasons upon which they are founded. * * * Pleasure and instruction go hand in hand, and we apply to a science, difficult, indeed, at best, with less reluctance, when by a well-directed application we may hope to understand it with method and satisfaction. I would take leave to add one more desire, that you would be pleased to send me the Tatlers and Guardians—the Spectators I have, and these, with the others, will afford me agreeable desultory reading."

Mr. Johnston was a faithful and competent instructor. "As a lawyer he was ever highly honored and esteemed; his patience, his industry, his logic were signal. * * * As early as 1776 he was one of a committee to revise the statutes of the State." He was later one of the State Judges. Mr. Iredell received from Governor Tryon a license to practice law in all the Inferior Courts of the Province on December 14, 1770. He was licensed by Governor Martin to practice in the Superior Courts November 26th, 1771, and duly qualified at the April Term, 1772. During the intervening year, "with healthy but vehement ambition," he prosecuted his studies and regularly attended the courts. "Books he had not, save a volume or two stuffed into his saddle-bag with a scanty supply of apparel. * * * Iredell early fixed his eyes upon the glittering heights of his profession, and so self-assured was he of his capacity and industry that he never faltered in his purpose—he was resolute to win; and with such men to resolve is to compel success. If unemployed in the courthouse, he peopled his chambers with judge, jury and spectators; he argued his cases before his imaginary court and reported his own arguments." McRee gives an illustration of his habit of writing out arguments in cases tried in the courts, although not employed in them. It is interesting, both because of the careful and orderly statement of the facts and the logical arrangements of argument which marked his opinions when called into judicial service. The journal shows that, while preparing for his Superior Court license, Iredell was diligent in the study of Blackstone's Commentaries. The work had been published but a few years before and was widely read in America. Burke, in his speech on "Conciliation," stated that the booksellers informed him that as large a number of copies had been sold in America as in England. Iredell writes in his journal, "Came home and read an hour or two in Blackstone." "Employed myself all the rest of the evening reading Blackstone." "I immediately came home and finished the second volume of Blackstone."

The journal, during this year, leaves the reader in doubt whether he was most assiduous in his devotions to Miss Hannah Johnston or the great commentator. That he woeed both successfully is evidenced by the fact that on January 18, 1773, he was united in marriage to this estimable lady, who "supplemented what he needed. * * * She was his constant monitor, adviser, banker and trusted friend. * * * Their lives, united in one stream, flowed onward softly and gently." She was the sister of Governor Samuel Johnston. Their correspondence, when separated by his riding the circuit in the practice of his profession and, later, in the discharge of his high official duties, is both interesting and instructive. Iredell's grandfather was a clergyman of the Church of England. His early religious training and his associations impressed their influence upon his mind and character. He was given to religious contemplation and often wrote "reflections" upon religious subjects quite remarkable for so young a man. Within a year after coming to Edenton he writes his Sunday "thoughts," concluding: "I am not ashamed to think seriously of religion, and hope no example will induce me to treat it with indifference. Youth is as much concerned to practice and revere it as any in the more advanced stages of life, and I have drawn up the foregoing plain, but useful, remarks as thinking it the best way of employing my time when I have had no opportunity of attending public worship." Writing his brother, he says: "Let me desire you to let no flashes of wit, or impertinent raillery of religion, shock your principles or stagger your belief. Men of this cast laugh at religion, either because they know nothing of it or care nothing for it. Men of shallow understandings or bad hearts are those who generally rank themselves in the list of free thinkers."

The controversies between the Royal Governors and the people in North Carolina began at an early day. They continued to grow in number and intensity. "Though a King's officer, Iredell soon became imbued with the views of the American leaders; felt that his future was identified with their future, and determined to participate in their defeat or success, to share in their disgrace or glory. He soon formed intimacies with the leading men of the Province, men whose thoughts were to irradiate subsequent darkness, and whose voices were destined to cheer and sustain the people in the hour of disaster. Ere long he began with them an active correspondence, and his part was so well supported that a learned gentleman and most competent judge writes. 'He was the letter writer of the war. He had no equal amongst his contemporaries.' "

As early as September, 1773, he published his first political essay, saying, among other things: "I have always been taught, and till I am better informed must continue to believe, that the Constitution of this country is founded on the Provincial Charter, which may well be considered the original contract between the King and the inhabitants." "In 1774 the Revolution was fairly inaugurated in North Carolina. Nowhere were the points in dispute between the colonies and Great Britain more clearly stated or more ably argued. The people were generally agreed. * * * It is true that none meditated independence as an object of desire; but it was foreseen as a possible consequence. The contest, that was soon to be developed into flagrant war, was eminently, in North Carolina, based upon principle. The Whig leaders, ready with the pen and the columns of the newspapers and the pamphlets, discussed the tax on tea and the vindictive measures that followed the prompt opposition of Boston, with a degree of learning and logic that was not surpassed by any of their contemporaries in other provinces. * * * There was no array of class against class. The foremost in talent were foremost in all measures; they had the confidence of the people. The followers of such men as Harvey, Johnston, Ashe, Harnett, Hooper, and Caswell could not be otherwise than well informed. * * * In the quiet retreat of his study, with naught to stimulate but the promptings of his own honest heart and, perchance, the smile of his noble wife, with patient toil Iredell forged and polished the weapons of debate; if others fixed his mark he recked not who claimed the honor of the cast."

Mr. Iredell, at this time, began a correspondence with William Hooper, in which they discussed the questions engaging the attention of thoughtful men. On April 26, 1774, Hooper writes him: "Every man who thinks with candor is indebted to you for the share you have taken in this interesting controversy. * * * You have discussed dry truths with the most pleasing language, and have not parted with the most refined delicacy of manners in the warmth of the contest. * * * I am happy, dear sir, that my conduct in public life has met your approbation. It is a suffrage from a man who has wisdom to distinguish and too much virtue to flatter. * * * Whilst I was active in contest you forged the weapons which were to give success to the cause which I supported. * * * With you I anticipate the important share which the colonies must soon have in regulating the political balance. They are striding fast to independence, and ere long will build an empire upon the ruin of Great Britain; will adopt its Constitution, purged of its impurities, and, from an experience of its defects, will guard against those evils which have wasted its vigor and brought it to an untimely end."

The first Provincial Congress "called by the people themselves"—defying the threats of the Royal Governor—met in New Bern August 25, 1774. Iredell's friends, Johnston, Hewes, Thomas Jones, and Hooper, were conspicuous members. John Harvey was "Moderator." The first of Iredell's political efforts, which have been preserved, was addressed to "The Inhabitants of Great Britain." The address is set out in full in McRee's "Life and Correspondence," and contains an able and exhaustive statement and defense of the cause of the Americans. He gives the history of their coming and settling the province, the provisions of their charters and the violations of them by the King and his Parliament.

Iredell soon thereafter settled his accounts and closed his career as Collector, to which position he had been promoted. After the 4th of July, 1776, he became deeply interested in the proposed form of government to be adopted by the new State. He had attended the courts, when open, and had given diligent attention to the practice of his profession. After the adoption of the Constitution (November, 1776) and the inauguration of a State Government a judicial system was established—"Iredell drawing the first Court Law." At the session of the Assembly, November, 1777, the State was laid off into three judicial districts; Samuel Ashe, Samuel Spencer, and James Iredell were appointed judges. His appointment was brought about by William Hooper, who writes December 23, 1777: "Before this reaches you you will have received the information of being promoted to the first honors the State can bestow. * * * You will be at a loss to conjecture how I could have been accessory to this step after you had been so explicit to me on the subject. Be assured that I was not inattentive to your objections, nor did I fail to mention them and urge them with sincerity to every person who mentioned you for the office to which you are now designated. * * * I expostulated with them upon the impropriety of electing one who in all probability might decline, and leave one of the seats of justice vacant. * * * Their reasoning prevailed and you have now the satisfaction of an unrestricted choice. The appointment has been imposed upon you, and therefore you are at perfect liberty to act or not." Archibald Maclaine wrote: "I can only say that if it would answer your purposes as fully as it would please your friends and the public, it would give me real satisfaction." When it is remembered that at this time Iredell was but twenty-seven years old; that only ten years prior thereto he had come to the State a youth of seventeen, unknown, without wealth or other influences, his election, unsought and against his inclination, to the highest judicial position in the State, it is manifest that by his personal conduct and character, as well as his learning and ability, he had strongly and favorably impressed himself upon the people and their representative men. William Hooper was a lawyer of learning and experience, as were other members of the Assembly. Maclaine, also an eminent lawyer and member of the Assembly, thus expressed the opinion of his associates: "However arduous the task you have undertaken, we have the most hopes from your judgment and integrity, and these hopes are strengthened by your diffidence. * * * The members of the Assembly, in appointing you, thought, with great reason, that they effectually served themselves and their constituents. As to myself, I confess I was actuated by duty to the public, having been taught that your promotion would more effectually serve them than you." Iredell accepted the judgeship at much personal sacrifice. The salary was totally inadequate for the support of his family.

Replying to a letter from Governor Burke calling upon him to hold Courts of Oyer and Terminer, he says: "In regard to the courts your Excellency proposed immediately to establish, I am always ready to attend them as my duty requires, but I take the liberty to represent to your Excellency that I fear that I shall not be able to defray the expenses they will involve me in unless I receive a sum of money from the public. * * * I am not ashamed of confessing my poverty, as it has not arisen from any dishonorable cause. My circumstances have suffered deeply, but if I can bear myself above water I am content to suffer still. * * * I shall not fail to do my utmost then and at all times in discharge of my duty."[2]

He rode one circuit, during which his letters to his wife give an interesting account of the country through which he traveled, the people with whom he was associated and the experiences of a judge "on circuit" at that early period in our history. He went as far west as Salisbury. At the Edenton term, June 6, 1778, the grand jury requested that he furnish his charge for publication, saying: "This charge vindicates the American States, in the establishment of independency, by arguments drawn from undeniable rights and from real necessity, and grounded on incontestable facts. * * * It breathes a spirit of pure disinterested patriotism, and holds forth the most powerful incentive to persist in the opposition which America has so successfully begun. It points out persuasively the importance of a faithful observation of the various political and relative duties of security upon which the happiness of individuals and of the whole depends, and which will tend to give stability to our present Constitution."

[2]State Records of N. C., XXII, 552.

The language of the charge is spirited, the sentiment patriotic, with considerable warmth of expression towards the King and his ministers. A few extracts will give an idea of its general tone. Referring to the fact that no courts had been held for a long time, he says: "This court of justice opens at a most interesting period of the policy of this country. We have been long deprived of such, from a variety of causes, in some of which we have shared with our brethren on the Continent; others were peculiar to ourselves. The event, however, has been unhappy and distressing, and every wellwisher to his country must view with pleasure a scene of anarchy changed to that of law and order, and powers of government established capable of restraining dishonesty and vice. Such powers have been established under circumstances which should induce to them peculiar reverence and regard. They have not been the effect of usurpation; they have not proceeded from a wanton desire of change; they have not been imposed upon you by the successful arms of a tyrant; they have been peaceably established by the public at large, for the general happiness of the people, when they were reduced to the cruel necessity of renouncing a government which ceased to protect, and endeavored to enslave them, for one which enabled them, with a proper share of courage and virtue, to protect and defend themselves. * * * We desired only the privileges of a free people, such as our ancestors had been and such as they expected we should be. We knew it was absurd to pretend we should be free when laws might, at pleasure, be imposed upon us by another people. * * * Our ancestors came here to enjoy the blessings of liberty. They purchased it at an immense price. Their greatest glory was that they had obtained it for themselves and transmitted it to their posterity. God forbid that their posterity should be base or weak enough to resign it, or let it appear that the true British spirit, which has done such wonders in England, has been lost or weakened by being transplanted to America. * * * You will, I hope, excuse, gentlemen, the particular, perhaps too great particularity, with which I have gone into this subject. Yet I thought it my duty to point out to you some of the principles upon which the revolution in our government has taken place and which, in my opinion, prove not only the propriety of its being effected, but the indispensable obligation we are under to maintain and support it. * * * The struggles of a great people have almost always ended in the establishment of liberty. The enjoyment of it is an object worthy of the most vigilant application and the most painful sacrifices. Is there anything we read with more pleasure than the sufferings and contentions of a brave people who resist oppression with firmness, are faithful to the interests of their country and disdain every advantage that is incompatible with them? Such a people are spoken of with admiration by all future ages. * * * These are the glorious effects of patriotism and virtue. They are the rewards annexed to the faithful discharge of that great and honorable duty, fidelity to our country."

Referring to the burdens laid upon the colonists and their right to resist them, he says: "We knew of no right they could have to such a power. Our charters did not recognize it. It certainly was not in our ancestors' contemplation, who left that very country because freedom could not be enjoyed in it. Custom had given it no sanction. * * * It was reconcilable to no principles of justice. * * * We despised the miserable application of a few political maxims * * * which to this hour is the basis upon which all the fraud, iniquity, injustice, cruelty and oppression that America has experienced from Great Britain have been defended. * * * The divine right of kings was exploded with indignation in the last century. Men came at length to be persuaded that they were created for a nobler purpose than to be slaves of a single tyrant. They did not confine this idea to speculation; they put to death one King and expelled another. This was done in England, the seat of our haughty enemies, who seem to think the right of resistance is confined alone to their kingdom." When it is remembered that this charge was delivered at a time when the American cause was far from hopeful, the courage exhibited was of no low order. Iredell, too, was a conservative—but withal a man and a patriot.

Soon thereafter he sent his resignation to the Governor, who accepted it with much reluctance, saying, "as you can well conceive, well knowing your place can not be supplied by a gentleman of equal ability and inclination to serve the State." He continued the practice of the law until, on July 8, 1779, he was tendered and accepted the position of Attorney General. Hooper writes, expressing pleasure that he has consented to accept, saying: "I have the happiness to assure you that the leading characters in this part of the country [Cape Fear] speak of you as a capital acquisition to our courts, and exult that there is a prospect of offenders being brought to due punishment without the passions of party or the prejudice of individuals swaying the prosecution." Iredell traveled the circuit, attending the courts in the discharge of his duties and receiving a large share of civil business. His letters to Mrs. Iredell give an interesting and often amusing account of his experiences. From New Bern he writes: "Expenses are enormous. My last jaunt has cost me $600 on the road and the depreciation will certainly proceed most rapidly, for they are giving away the money at the printing office in so public and careless a manner as to make it quite contemptible." Again he writes: "There has not been much business, but I have been applied to in almost everything. I have already received in civil suits 1,240 pounds in paper besides nineteen silver dollars. I expect to receive tomorrow 500 pounds and my salary for this and Edenton Court, which will be 1,000 pounds. * * * My fear is that, as usual, the money will be much depreciated before I lay it out. I shall carefully preserve the hard money to the last." From New Bern, at the following term, he writes Mrs. Iredell that he has received 4,540 pounds "of this currency," 1,350 pounds of Continental, and $9 in hard money; that he will receive 1,500 pounds for his salary at these courts, "but my expenses here are monstrous—160 pounds a day for my board and lodging only." At Wilmington he was employed in the first admiralty case tried in the State of which the record is extant. The Assembly at Halifax, 1781, voted the judges 20,000 pounds each and the Attorney General 10,000 pounds "for making up the depreciation of their allowance." Iredell resigned his office (1781), of which, writing to his brother, Rev. Arthur Iredell, July, 1783, he says: "Since then I have been only a private lawyer, but with a show of business very near equal to any lawyers in the country."

After the ratification of the Treaty of Peace and the withdrawal of troops from the State, the people began the work of restoring their fortunes and enacting laws suited to their new political situation. Differences, more or less fundamental, which had manifested themselves during the war, became more marked—dividing the leaders and people into parties. Iredell was in agreement with the conservatives, Johnston, Hooper, Maclaine, Davie, Spaight, and others, in opposition to Willie Jones, Thomas Person, Samuel Spencer, and others. The former insisted that the State should carry out in good faith the terms of the treaty, and adopt such measures as were necessary for that purpose; enforce contracts and maintain a strong and stable government. While Iredell neither held nor sought any public position, he was "in touch," through correspondence and otherwise, with the leaders of the party known as Conservatives. He prosecuted the practice of his profession with industry and success, ranking easily with the leaders of the bar. The more radical sentiment in the State was disposed to magnify the power of the Legislature and oppose any restriction upon it by the enforcement of Constitutional limitations, especially by the courts. In an address to the public, Iredell set forth his views regarding the enforcement of Constitutional limitations upon the Legislature. Referring to the Convention (November, 1776), which formed the Constitution, he says: "It was of course to be considered how to impose restrictions on the Legislature that might still leave it free to all useful purposes, but at the same time guard against the abuse of unlimited power, which was not to be trusted, without the most imminent danger, to any men or body of men on earth. We had not only been sickened and disgusted for years with the high and almost impious language from Great Britain, of the omnipotent power of the British Parliament, but had severely smarted under the effects. We felt, in all its rigor, the mischiefs of an absolute and unbounded authority, claimed by so weak a creature as man, and should have been guilty of the basest breach of trust as well as the grossest folly if in the same moment, when we spurned at the insolent despotism of Great Britain, we had established a despotic power among ourselves. * * * I have no doubt but that the power of the Assembly is limited and defined by the Constitution. It is a creature of the Constitution. * * * These are consequences that seem so natural, and indeed so irresistible, that I do not observe that they have been much contested. The great argument is, that although the Assembly have not a right to violate the Constitution, yet if they in fact do so, the only remedy is either by a humble petition that the law may be repealed or a universal resistance of the people. But, in the meantime, their act, whatever it is, is to be obeyed as a law; for the judicial power is not to presume to question the power of an act of Assembly." He proceeds, with remarkable clearness and force, to set forth his opinion upon this question, expressing the view which has since been pursued by the courts, both State and Federal. He concludes: "These are a few observations that have occurred to me on this subject. They are given by a plain man, unambitious of power, but sincerely and warmly interested in the prosperity of his country; feeling every respect for the Constitutional authority of the Legislature which, in his opinion, is great enough to satisfy an ambitious as well as support the efforts of a public-spirited mind, but a determined enemy on all occasions of arbitrary power in every shape whatever, and reverencing beyond expression that Constitution by which he holds all that is dear to him in life." It must be remembered that these views were expressed before any court had held that it was within the power and therefore the duty of the judiciary to refuse to enforce statutes passed without Constitutional warrant. The question had been mooted, and in one case passed upon, prior to the date of Iredell's address (1786), but the opinion of the Court had not been published beyond the jurisdiction in which it was decided. Richard Dobbs Spaight, while a member of the Convention at Philadelphia (August 12, 1877), in a letter to Iredell, refers to the action of the judges in holding an act depriving litigants of trial by jury (Bayard v. Singleton, 1 Martin, 42) unconstitutional. He laments "that the Assembly have passed laws unjust in themselves and militating in their principles against the Constitution in more instances than one." He says: "I do not pretend to vindicate the law, which has been the subject of controversy; it is immaterial what law they have declared void; it is their usurpation of the authority to do it that I complain of, as I do most positively deny that they have any such power; nor can they find anything in the Constitution, either directly or impliedly, that will support them or give them any color of right to exercise that authority. * * * It must be acknowledged that our Constitution unfortunatcly has not provided a sufficient check to prevent the intemperate and unjust proceedings of our Legislature, though such a check would be very beneficial, and I think absolutely necessary to our well being; the only one that I know of is the annual election which, by leaving out such members, will in some degree remedy, though it can not prevent, such evils as may arise." On August 26, 1787, Iredell answered Mr. Spaight's letter at length, saying: "In regard to the late decision at New Bern, I confess that it has ever been my opinion that an act inconsistent with the Constitution was void, and that the judges, consistently with their duties, could not carry it into effect. The Constitution appears to me to be a fundamental law, limiting the powers of the Legislature, and with which every exercise of those powers must be compared." In regard to his apprehension that the power will be abused, Iredell says: "If you had seen, as I did, with what infinite reluctance the judges came to this decision, what pains they took by proposing expedients to obviate its necessity, you would have seen in a strong light how little probable it is a judge would ever give such a judgment when he thought he could possibly avoid it. But whatever may be the consequences, formed as our Constitution is, I can not help thinking they are not at liberty to choose, but must in all questionable instances decide upon it. It is a subject indeed of great magnitude, and I heartily lament the occasion for its discussion. In all doubtful cases, to be sure the act ought to be supported, it should be unconstitutional beyond dispute before it is pronounced such."

The Convention at Philadelphia having submitted the new Federal Constitution to the Legislatures of the States, Iredell at once entered upon the task of securing its adoption by the people of North Carolina. In no State was the opposition more pronounced or determined. The popular leaders of the dominant party were active in their opposition, one of the most prominent of them declaring that "Washington was a d—n rascal and traitor to his country for putting his hand to such an infamous paper as the new Constitution." Another, said to have been the most popular leader in the State, seriously insisted in the Convention upon rejecting it without discussion, saying that he had made up his mind and was sure that others had done so. "Of all those who were most active in pressing upon the people the adoption of the Constitution Mr. Iredell was undoubtedly the most able and energetic."

At the session of the Legislature November, 1787, Mr. Johnston was elected Governor and Mr. Iredell a member of the Council; he was also appointed a commissioner to revise and collect the Acts of the General Assembly, then in force. A convention of the people was called to meet at Hillsboro, composed of delegates from the several counties and the borough towns. Iredell was elected, unanimously, from Edenton. On January 8, 1788, he published a pamphlet entitled "Answer to Mr. Mason's Objections to the New Constitution Recommended by the late Convention at Philadelphia," by "Marcus." He stated each of Mr. Mason's "objections" in their order, and in the same order answers them. It is not within the scope of this sketch to undertake a review of Mr. Iredell's "answer" to the celebrated paper of Mr. George Mason. The pamphlet made a favorable impression on the public mind and strongly influenced Iredell's future career. The correspondence between Iredell and William Hooper, William R. Davie and Maclaine gives an interesting view of the condition of public sentiment in the State in regard to the new Constitution. Says one, writing of the leaders in the Convention: "The most prominent Federalists were Iredell, Davie, Governor Johnston, Spaight, Maclain [sic] and Steele. Foremost in their number and the leading spirit of the whole body was Judge Iredell, conspicuous for his graceful elocution, for the apt application of his varied learning, his intimate knowledge of the schemes of government, and his manly and generous temper.

"Davie, with spotless plume, towering in intellect, as in stature, above the majority of the members, stood like a knight of the olden time, lance in hand, the luster of his military services played about him and was reflected in flashing light from hauberk, morion and polished steel.

"Governor Johnston, the President of the Convention, calm, lucid and convincing, seldom participated in the debate; when he did, his blows were always delivered with stunning effect.

"Maclaine, sensible, pointed and vigorous, was the Hotspur of his party.

"Steele was laborious, clear-sighted and serviceable by his knowledge of men.

"Willie Jones, although democratic in theory, was aristocratic in habits, tastes, pursuits and prejudices; he lived sumptuously and wore fine linen; he raced, hunted and played cards. A patriot in the Revolution, he was now the head of a great party. * * * He was a loving and cherished disciple of Jefferson, and was often taunted with his subserviency to Virginia 'abstractions.' He seldom shared in the discussions.

"Judge Spencer, candid and temperate, was in debate far superior to his associates.

"David Caldwell, a Presbyterian divine, was learned and intelligent. He had for years discharged the triple functions of preacher, physician and teacher.

"McDowell, the rival of Davie in military renown, was a man of action rather than words.

"Bloodworth, by no means the least among them, was one of the most remarkable men of the era, distinguished for the versatility of his talents and his practical knowledge of men, trades, arts, and sciences. The child of poverty, diligence and ambition had supplied the place of patronage and wealth; he was resolute almost to fierceness, and almost radical in his democracy."

William Hooper, General Allen Jones, William Blount, and Judge Ashe were defeated at the polls.

The debates were conducted with ability and dignity, and at times with much asperity. While Davie, Spaight, Maclaine and Johnston bore their share, Iredell was the acknowledged leader for adoption. The proceedings of the Convention are published in Elliott's Debates. The opposition could not be overcome and, on the final vote, the Constitution was rejected by a vote of 184 to 84.[3] While Iredell was defeated he made many friends and advanced his reputation in the State. One of the new western counties was given his name. The requisite number of States having ratified the Constitution, the new government was organized April 30, 1789, North Carolina taking no part but remaining a free, sovereign, independent State.

It appears from the letters of the Honorable Pierce Butler, Senator from South Carolina, written from New York, August 11, 1789, that Iredells' reputation had extended beyond the borders of the State. He says: "The Southern interest calls aloud for some such men as Mr. Iredell to represent it—to do it justice." Dr. Williamson writes, at the same time: "The North Carolina Debates are considerably read in this State, especially by Congress members, some of whom, formerly had little knowledge of the citizens of North Carolina, have lately been very minute in their inquiries concerning Mr. Iredell. By the way, I have lately been asked by a Senator whether I thought you would accept a judge's place under the new government if it required your moving out of the State, as we are not in the Union." A second Convention met at Fayetteville November 2, 1789. Iredell was not a candidate for election as a delegate. With but little debate the Constitution was ratified and amendments proposed. A bill was passed establishing a university, the names of Samuel Johnston and James Iredell being placed at the head of the list of trustees.[4]

Maclaine writes Iredell December 9, 1789: "What would you think of being the District Judge?" He was soon called to a larger field and higher judicial service. On February 10, 1790, without solicitation on his part, Mr. Iredell was nominated by President Washington, and unanimously con-

[3]Convention of 1788.—N. C. Booklet, Vol. IV.
[4]Battle's History of the University of North Carolina, 821.

firmed by the Senate, one of the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States. He was just thirty-nine years old. The President enclosed his commission with the following letter: "One of the seats on the bench of the Supreme Court of the United States having become vacant by the resignation of the gentleman appointed to fill the same, I have thought fit, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint you to that office, and have now the pleasure to enclose you a commission to be one of the Associate Judges of the Supreme Court of the United States. You have, sir, undoubtedly considered the high importance of a judicial system in every civil government. It may therefore be unnecessary for me to say anything that would impress you with this idea in respect to ours. * * * I must, however, observe that, viewing as I do the Judicial System of the United States as one of the main pillars on which our National Government must rest, it has been my great object to introduce into the high offices of that department such characters as, from my own knowledge or the best information, I conceived would give dignity and stability to the government * * * at the same time that they added luster to our national character." It is said that "Washington derived his conviction of Iredell's merits from a perusal of the Debates in the North Carolina Convention and the famous reply to George Mason's objections." [5] Butler wrote Iredell February 10th: "I should have been happy to have had you in Congress. The Union will no longer be deprived of your aid and the benefit of your abilities. * * * I congratulate the States on the appointment and you on this mark of their well-merited opinion of you." Acknowledging the letter from the President, Iredell writes: "In accepting this dignified trust I do it with all the diffidence becoming the humble abilities I possess; but, at the same time, with the most earnest resolution to endeavor by unremitting application a faithful discharge of all of its duties, in the best manner in my power." Judge Iredell was assigned to the Southern Circuit and entered upon the work immediately. He reached Charleston May 23, 1790, and there met Mr. Rutledge before whom he took the oath of office. He writes Mrs. Iredell: "I have received the greatest and kindest civilities from Mr. Rutledge, at whose house I have the pleasure of staying." He proceeded to Savannah. There was but little business in the new Court other than organizing the Circuit Courts and putting the new judicial system in working order. Supposing that the judges would "rotate" in the Circuit Court work, he removed his family to New York. The Court having, to his surprise, adopted the rule which confined judges to one circuit—Iredell's being the Southern—he found himself very much embarrassed. The long distance to be traveled (1,900 miles) twice each year was a severe tax upon his health and strength. He justly complained of the arrangement to the Chief Justice, who conceded that "your share of the task has hitherto been more than in due proportion." Although the judges refused to make a more equitable rule, by exchanges, they sometimes rode different circuits. Justice Iredell took his seat with the Chief Justice and his associates at the August Term, 1790. No business was transacted, the Court adjourning sine die. Iredell again rode the Southern Circuit, but it does not appear that there was much business to engage his attention.

[5] Carson's History of the Supreme Court, 155.

William Hooper, to whom Iredell was strongly attached, and for whose character and talents he had the highest regard, died October 14, 1790. Writing a letter of condolence to Mrs. Hooper, Iredell said: "An attachment founded on the most perfect esteem and upon a gratitude excited by repeated and most flattering obligations, ought not, and, in me, I trust is not capable of being weakened by any change of place, time or circumstance."

A suit was instituted at this time in the State Court against Iredell and his co-executor upon a bond given by their testator to a British subject. His co-executor pleaded the "Confiscation Act," in which Iredell refused to join. By direction of Justices Wilson, Blair and Rutledge a writ of certiorari was issued to the State Court, which the judges refused to obey. As an indication of the jealousy of the new government in the State, the General Assembly adopted a resolution declaring that "The General Assembly do commend and approve of the conduct of the judges of the Courts of Law and Courts of Equity in this particular."[6] At the same session the House of Commons, by a vote of twenty-five to fifty-five, refused to adopt a resolution requiring the Governor and other State officials to take an oath "to support the Constitution of the United States."

On the Southern Circuit at Savannah (1791) a question arose, stated by Judge Iredell, as follows: "There were depending some suits for the recovery of debts, to which pleas were put in by the defendants, not denying the existence of the debts, but showing (as they conceived) a right in the State of Georgia to recover them under certain Acts of Assembly of the State passed prior to the Treaty of Peace. The Attorney and Solicitor General of the State were directed to interfere in the defense, but the counsel for the defendants refused to permit them. The Attorney and Solicitor General, being dissatisfied with the pleas, applied to the Court for leave to interfere in behalf of the State." Judge Iredell was of the opinion that the State could appear only in the Supreme Court, and for this reason denied the motion. He suggested that the State had a remedy by an appeal to the Equity jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. Deeply impressed with the gravity as well as the novelty of the question he writes: "I have been thus particular in stating this interesting subject, because it appears to me of the highest moment, although I believe it would be difficult to devise an unexceptionable remedy. But the discussion of questions wherein are involved the most sacred and awful principles of public justice, under a system without precedent in the history of mankind, necessarily must occasion many embarrassments which can be more readily suggested than removed." Out of these suits arose the celebrated case of Georgia v. Brailsford, 2 Dallas, 402; 3 Dallas, 1.

[6] State Records, XXI, 441, 865, 1080, 1082.

At the April Term, 1792, of the Circuit Court at Savannah Judge Iredell delivered a charge to the grand jury which so impressed the members that they unanimously requested its publication. A number of his "charges" in other circuits were published at the request of the grand juries. At the June Term, 1792, at the Circuit Court at Raleigh, N. C., Judge Iredell, with District Judge Sitgreaves, was confronted with a delicate question. Congress had enacted a statute directing that the invalid pension claims of widows and orphans should be exhibited to the Circuit Courts; that those to whom the Court granted certificates should be placed on the Pension list, subject to the review of the Secretary of War. Conceiving that the duties thus imposed were not judicial in their character, and therefore not authorized by the Constitution, which carefully separated the powers and duties of each department of the Government, Judge Iredell prepared a remonstrance, addressed to the President, in which he said:

"We beg leave to premise that it is as much our inclination as it is our duty to receive with all possible respect every act of the Legislature, and that we never can find ourselves in a more painful situation than to be obliged to object to the execution of any, more especially to the execution of one founded on the purest principles of humanity and justice, which the actual question undoubtedly is. But however lamentable a difference really may be * * * we are under the indispensable necessity of acting according to the best dictates of our judgment." He set forth at length the reasoning by which he had been brought to the conclusion that he could not, with proper regard to the Constitutional distribution of powers, execute this statute, concluding: "The high respect we entertain for the Legislature, our feelings as men for persons whose situation requires the earliest as well as the most effectual relief, and our sincere desire to promote, whether officially or otherwise, the just and benevolent views of Congress, so conspicuous on this as well as on many other occasions, have induced us to reflect whether we could be justified in acting under this act personally in the character of commissioners during the session of a court; and could we be satisfied that we had authority to do so we would cheerfully devote such part of our time as might be necessary for the performance of the service." The other Justices addressed similar letters to the President. The question was brought before the Court by a motion made by Attorney General Randolph, ex officio for a mandamus directed to the Circuit Court for the District of Pennsylvania, commanding the Court to proceed to hear the petition of William Hayburn, etc. The Court being divided in opinion whether he could make the motion ex officio, he was permitted to do so on behalf of Hayburn. No decision was made at the time and Congress soon thereafter "made other provisions for the relief of pensioners." Judge Iredell, until the act was repealed, heard a large number of petitions as commissioner. He writes Mrs. Iredell from Hartford, Connecticut, September 30, 1792: "We have a great deal of business to do here, particularly, as I have reconciled myself to the propriety of doing the invalid business out of court." In United States v. Ferreria, 13 Howard, 51, Chief Justice Taney says of the action of the Court: "The repeal of the act clearly shows that the President and Congress acquiesced in the correctness of the decision, that it was not a judicial power."

Following the refusal to permit Georgia to intervene in the Brailsford case, in the Circuit Court, the State filed a bill in equity in the Supreme Court, alleging that the title to the bond, upon which the action in the Circuit Court was brought, was, by virtue of an act passed during the war, confiscating and sequestrating the property and debts of British subjects in the State. The Court was asked to enjoin the plaintiffs from proceeding, etc. Each of the Judges wrote opinions. Iredell observed that he had sat in the Circuit Court and refused the motion of the State to intervene. He said that the Court could not, with propriety, sustain the application of Georgia because whenever a State is a party the Supreme Court has exclusive jurisdiction of the suit. The State, therefore, did not have a complete and adequate remedy at law. "Every principle of law, justice and honor, however, seem to require that the claim of the State of Georgia should not be indirectly decided or defeated by a judgment pronounced between parties over whom she had no control, and upon a trial in which she was not allowed to be heard." He was of the opinion that an injunction should be awarded to stay the money in the hands of the Marshal until the Court made further orders, etc. The Court was divided in opinion, the majority holding that an injunction should issue until the hearing. At the February Term, 1793, a motion was made by Randolph to dissolve the injunction. Iredell was of the opinion that the motion should be denied. He held that, for several reasons, the State could not sue on the bond at law, asking: "How is she to obtain possession of the instrument without the aid of a Court of Equity?" pointing out the practical difficulties which she would encounter in securing the bond. To the suggestions that the State could bring an action of assumpsit for money had and received against Brailsford, which he termed "the legal panacea of modern times," he conclusively answers that while the action "may be beneficially applied to a great variety of cases, it can not be pretended that this form of action will lie before the defendant has actually received the money," and this Brailsford has not done. He suggests that the injunction be continued, and an issue be tried at the bar to ascertain whether the State of Georgia or Brailsford was the true owner. Although a majority of the Judges were of the opinion that the State had an adequate remedy at law, the course suggested by Iredell was substantially pursued. At the February Term, 1794, an amicable issue was submitted to a special jury. The argument continued for four days, when the Chief Justice instructed the jury: "The facts comprehended in the case are agreed; the only point that remains is to settle what is the law of the land arising upon those facts; and on that point it is proper that the opinion of the Court should be given." He says that the opinion of the Court is unanimous, that the debt was subjected, not to confiscation, but only to sequestration, and that therefore the right of the creditor to recover it was revived at the coming of peace, both by the law of nations and the Treaty of Peace. It is not very clear what question of fact was submitted to the decision of the jury. He further instructed the jury that while it was the "good old rule" that the Court should decide questions of law and the jury questions of fact, the jury have a right, nevertheless, to take upon themselves to judge of both and to determine the law as well as the facts. The learned Chief Justice suggests that the Court "has no doubt that you will pay that respect which is due to the opinion of the Court; for, as on the one hand, it is presumed that juries are the best judges of facts, it is, on the other hand, presumable that the courts are the best judges of law. But still both objects are lawfully within your power of decision."

Notwithstanding the facts were agreed upon and the Court was unanimous in opinion in regard to the law, the jury, "after being absent some time," returned to the bar and proposed certain questions of law, which being answered, "without going away from the bar," they returned a verdict for the defendant. The case has the distinction of being the only one in which a jury was empaneled in the Supreme Court. Flanders says: "The charge of the Chief Justice to the jury is curious, from the opinions he expressed as to the extent of their powers. His statement of the law on that point is clearly erroneous."[7] Mr. James Scott Brown says: "The judgment was clearly right, but the statement of the Chief Justice that the jury was judge of the law, as well as the facts, is open to serious doubt."[8]

In Chisholm v. Georgia, 2 Dallas, 419, standing alone, Iredell enunciated and, with a wealth of learning and "arsenal of argument," maintained the position that a State could not be "haled into court" by a citizen of another State. The question arose in an action of assumpsit instituted in the Supreme Court against the State of Georgia, process being served upon the Governor and the Attorney General. The State refused to enter an appearance, but filed a remonstrance and protest against the jurisdiction. The Attorney General, Randolph, representing the plaintiff, lodged a motion that unless the State entered an appearance and showed cause to the contrary, by a day named, judgment by default and inquiry be entered, etc. This motion was argued by Randolph, the State not being represented. Each of the justices filed opinions. Iredell first analyzed the provisions of the Constitution conferring jurisdiction upon the Court in controversies wherein a State was a party. He quotes the language of the Judiciary Act distributing the jurisdiction in such cases.

[7]Lives of the Chief Justices, 393.
[8]Great American Lawyers, Vol. I, 285.

He dwells somewhat on the meaning which should be given to the word "controversies" in the Constitution, with the suggestion that the use of this word indicated a purpose to so restrict the causes in which jurisdiction was conferred as to exclude actions at law for the recovery of money. He proceeds to consider the question whether it is necessary for Congress to prescribe a method of procedure in controversies wherein the State is a party. He argues that while the judicial department of the government is established by the Constitution, the Congress must legislate in respect to the number of the Judges, the organization of the Supreme and such inferior courts as may be established, etc. He quotes the fourteenth section of the Judiciary Act, in which power is conferred upon the courts to issue writs of scire facias, habeas corpus, and all other writs not specially provided for by statute, which may be necessary for the exercise of their respective jurisdictions and "agreeable to the principles and usages of law," noting the fact that "neither in the State now in question, nor in any other in the Union, any particular legislation authorizing a compulsory suit for the recovery of money against a State was in being, either when the Constitution was adopted or at the time when the Judicial Act was passed," and concludes that only principles of the common law, a law which is the ground work of the laws in every State in the Union and which, so far as it is applicable to the peculiar circumstances of the country, and when no special act of legislation controls it, is in force in such State, as it existed in England at the time of the first settlement of this country; that no other part of the common law of England can have any reference to the subject but that which prescribes remedies against the Crown. Thus he is brought to the decision of the real question in the case. It is manifest that if, until Congress has prescribed some mode of procedure by which, in controversies wherein the State is a party, the Court must proceed by a mode "agreeable to the principles and usages of law," and, to find such principles and usages, resort must be had to the common law, the question necessarily arises whether the States of the Union, when sued, are to be proceeded against in the same manner as, by the common law, is prescribed for proceeding against the Sovereign. It is just at this point that the line of thought between Iredell and Wilson divides. The former says: "Every State in the Union, in every instance where its sovereignty has not been delegated to the United States, I consider to be as completely sovereign as the United States in respect to the powers surrenderd; each State in the Union is sovereign as to all the powers reserved. It must necessarily be so, because the United States have no claim to any authority but such as the States have surrendered to them; of course the powers not surrendered must remain as they did before. * * * So far as the States, under the Constitution, can be made legally liable to this authority, so far, to be sure, they are subordinate to the authority of the United States, and their individual sovereignty is, in this respect, limited. But it is limited no further than the necessary execution of such authority requires." It will be observed that Iredell is not, at this point in the argument, discussing the question whether it is within the power of Congress to prescribe a mode of procedure for bringing a State into the Federal Court to answer for a money demand by a citizen of another State. The argument is that, until it has done so, the only method of proceeding against a State is that prescribed by the common law for proceeding against the Sovereign. It therefore becomes necessary to follow the argument and establish the proposition that prior to the formation and ratification of the Constitution each State was a sovereign, and that in ratifying the Constitution it did not part, in respect to the mode of proceeding against it in a controversy in the Federal Courts, with its sovereignty. He proceeds to give an exhaustive and interesting history of the method of procedure for the recovery of money at the common law against the King. The history of the law in England in this respect, although very interesting, has no permanent interest to the student of American Constitutional law. He thus concludes this branch of the discussion: "I have now, I think, established the following propositions: First, that the Court's action, so far as it affects the judicial authority, can only be carried into effect by acts of the Legislature, appointing courts and prescribing their method of procedure; second, that Congress has provided no new law, but expressly referred us to the old; third, that there are no principles of the old law to which we must have recourse that, in any measure, authorizes the present suit, either by precedent or analogy."

This conclusion was sufficient, from Iredell's point of view, to dispose of the case before the Court, but Judge Wilson, who wrote the principal opinion for the majority, threw down the gauntlet and challenged the basic proposition upon which Iredell's argument was founded. Here we find the line of cleavage between the two schools of thought upon the fundamental conception of the relations which the States bore to the Federal Government. Iredell was a Federalist, Wilson a Nationalist. Wilson opened his opinion with these words: "This is a case of uncommon magnitude. One of the parties to it is a State, certainly respectable, claiming to be sovereign. The question to be determined is whether this State, so respectable and whose claim soars so high, is amenable to the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States? This question, important in itself, will depend on others, more important still; may, and perhaps will be, ultimately resolved into one no less radical than this—do the people of the United States form a nation?" Iredell was not a man to conceal his opinions when either propriety or duty demanded their expression. Meeting his associate upon the "main question," "So far as this great question affects the Constitution itself, if the present afforded, consistently with the particular grounds of my opinion, a proper occasion for a decision upon it, I should not shrink from its discussion. But it is of extreme moment that no Judge should rashly commit himself upon important questions, which it is unnecessary for him to decide. My opinion being that even if the Constitution would admit of the exercise of such a power, a new law is necessary for the purpose, since no part of the existing law applies, this alone is sufficient to justify my determination in the present case. So much, however, has been said on the Constitution that it may not be improper to intimate that my present opinion is strongly against any construction of it which will admit, under any circumstances, a compulsive suit against the State for the recovery of money. I think every word in the Constitution may have its full effect without involving this consequence, and nothing but express words or an insurmountable implication (neither of which I consider can be found in this case) would authorize the deduction of so high a power. * * * A State does not owe its origin to the government of the United States, in the highest or any of its branches. It was in existence before it. It derives its authority from the same pure and sacred source as itself, the salutary and deliberate choice of the people." He thus lays down a canon of Constitutional construction: "If, upon a fair construction of the Constitution of the United States, the power contended for really exists, it undoubtedly may be exercised, though it is a power of first impression. If it does not exist upon that authority, ten thousand examples of similar powers would not warrant its assumption." That Iredell was in harmony with Hamilton is manifest from the following language used by him in the Federalist: "It is inherent in the nature of sovereignty not to be amenable to the suit of an individual without its consent. This is the general sense and the general practice of mankind, and the exemption, as one of the attributes of sovereignty, is now enjoyed by the government of every State in the Union. Unless, therefore, there is a surrender of this immunity in the plan of the Convention, it will remain with the States, and the danger intimated must be merely ideal. * * * There is no color to pretend that the State governments would, by the adoption of that plan, be divested of the privilege of paying their own debts in their own way, free from every restraint but that which flows from the obligation of good faith."[9] So Madison declared in the Virginia Convention. "It is not within the power of individuals to call a State into court."[10] Marshall, meeting the same objection to the Constitution, said: "I hope that no gentleman will think that a State will be called to the bar of the Federal Court. * * * It is not natural to suppose that the sovereign power should be dragged before a court."

Mr. Carson, writing of the opinion of the Court in Chisholm's case, says: "From these views Iredell alone dissented in an able opinion, of which it has been said that it enunciated, either directly or by implication, all the leading principles which have since become known as State Rights' Doctrine and which as a legal argument was far superior in clearness of reasoning to Wilson or Jay. He confined himself strictly to the question before the Court, whether an action of assumpsit would lie against a State."[11]

In his "Lives of the Chief Justices" Van Santvord says: "These views [of the majority] were not concurred in by Judge Iredell, who delivered a dissenting opinion. . That [9]No. 81 (J. C. Hamilton, Ed. 602).

[10]Elliott's Debates, 2d Ed., 533.
[11]Hist. Sup. Court, 174.

able jurist considered the question also in a Constitutional point of view, and as a question of strict construction. With great force of reasoning, and admirable precision and clearness of illustration, he analyzed the argument of the Attorney General, and arrived at exactly the opposite conclusion. His opinion was that no part of the existing law applied to this case; and even if the Constitution would admit of the exercise of such a power, a new law was necessary to carry the power into effect, and that assumpsit at the suit of a citizen would not lie against a State. One can scarcely arise from a careful perusal of this able opinion without being sensibly impressed with the force of the reasoning of the learned Judge, and the accuracy of his deductions. Lucid, logical, compact, comprehensive, it certainly compares very favorably with that of the Chief Justice in every respect, and as a mere legal argument must be admitted to be far superior.[12] * * * As a constitutional lawyer Judge Iredell had no superior upon the bench. His judicial opinions are marked by great vigor of thought, clearness of argument, and force of expression. He did not always concur with the majority of his brethren in their constitutional constructions, and on such occasion rarely failed to sustain his positions by the strictest legal as well as logical deductions. In the interesting case of Ware v. Hylton, 3 Dallas, 199, his dissenting opinion exhibits uncommon research, learning, and ability. As a legal argument it may be regarded as one of the best specimens that have been preserved of the old Supreme Court."[13]

"The rough substance of my argument in the suit against the State of Georgia," bearing date "February 18, 1793," as penned by the author, is before me. The writing is neat, the "headings" carefully arranged, a few erasures—interline-

[12] Page 60.
[13] Ib., p. 61.

ations—showing care and caution in the form of expression. The argument covers twenty-three pages; the paper is well preserved and the writing distinct. Of this opinion Mr. Justice Bradley, in Hans v. Louisiana, 134 U. S., 14 (1889), said: "The highest authority of this country was in accord rather with the minority than with the majority of the Court. * * * And this fact lends additional interest to the able opinion of Mr. Justice Iredell on that occasion. The other justices were more swayed by a close observance of the letter of the Constitution, without regard to former experience and usages; and because the letter said that the judicial power shall extend to controversies between a State and citizens of another State, etc., they felt constrained to see in this language a power to enable the individual citizen of one State, or of a foreign State, to sue another State of the Union in the Federal Courts. Justice Iredell, on the contrary, contended that it was not the intention to create new and unheard of remedies by subjecting sovereign States to action at the suit of individuals (which he showed conclusively was never done before), but only by proper legislation to invest the Federal Courts with jurisdiction to hear and determine controversies and cases between the parties designated that were properly susceptible to litigation in courts. Adhering to the mere letter, it might be so; and so in fact the Supreme Court held in Chisholm v. Georgia; but looking at the subject as Hamilton and Mr. Justice Iredell did, in the light of history and experience, and the established order of things, the views of the latter were clearly right, as the people of the United States subsequently decided. * * * In view of the manner in which that decision was received by the country, the adoption of the Eleventh Amendment, the light of history and the reason of the thing, we think we are at liberty to prefer Justice Iredell's views in this regard." This language was approved by Fuller, C. J.; Miller, Field, Gray, Blatchford, and Lamar, Associate Harlan, J., alone dissenting. It is not within the purpose or scope of this sketch to enter into a discussion of the merits of the great question involved in this battle of the giants or of the manner in which they sustained their conclusions. It is, however, a part of the history of the controversy and of the times, that two days after the opinion was filed sustaining the jurisdiction, by a majority of the Court, the Eleventh Amendment was introduced into Congress. "It was proposed by Mr. Sedgwick, a Representative from Massachusetts, but was passed in the Senate as amended by Mr. Gallatin."[14] Mr. Guthrie says that Mr. Caleb Strong was its author. The words are: "The judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend to any suit, in law or equity, commenced or proceeded against one of the United States by citizens of another State or by citizens or subjects of foreign States." It is significant that the language of the Amendment is declaratory of what, in the opinion of Congress, was the correct construction of the Constitution. It was essentially a reversal of the decision of the Court and writing into the Constitution the dissenting opinion of Justice Iredell. This is evidenced by the fact that notwithstanding that, in accordance with the decision in Chisholm's case, judgment was rendered for the plaintiff at February Term, 1794, and a writ of inquiry awarded, the Court, at February Term, 1798, in Hollingsworth v. Virginia, 3 Dallas, 378, upon being informed that the Eleventh Amendment had been adopted, "delivered an unanimous opinion that there could not be exercised any jurisdiction in any case, past or future, in which a State was sued by the citizens of another State, or by citizens or subjects of any foreign State." Mr. William D. Guthrie says: "The unusual and peculiar wording of the Amendment first attracts attention. Instead of declaring how the Constitution shall read in the future it declares how it shall 'not be construed.' * * * The Amendment, therefore, does not purport to amend or alter the Constitution, but to maintain it unchanged while controlling its scope and effect and thereby authoritatively declaring how it shall not be construed."[15] Mr. Justice Bradley says: "The Supreme Court had construed the judicial power as extending to such a suit, and the decision was overruled. The Court so understood the effect of the amendment."[16]

[14]Watson's Const., 1535.

With that remarkable prevision which marks him as one of, if not the first, prophetic statesman which the world has produced, Hamilton points out the danger and difficulty which lurked in the construction given to the Constitution by the majority in Chisholm's case. He says: "To what purpose would it be to authorize suits against States for the debts they owed? How could recoveries be enforced? It is evident that it could not be done without waging war against the contracting State; and to ascribe to the Federal Courts, by mere implication and in destruction of a preëxisting right of the State Governments a power which would involve such a consequence, would be altogether forced and unwarrantable." This language becomes of present interest in the light of the concluding words of the opinion of Mr. Justice Holmes in Virginia v. West Virginia. "As this is no ordinary commercial suit but, as we have said, a quasi-international difference referred to this Court in reliance upon the honor and constitutional obligation of the States concerned rather than ordinary remedies, we think it best, at this stage, to go no further but to await the effect of a conference between the parties which, whatever the outcome, must take place. * * * But this case is one that calls for forbearance upon both sides; great States have a temper superior to that of private litigants and it is to be hoped that enough has been decided for patriotism, the fraternity of the Union and mutual consideration to bring it to an end."[17] Certainly the history of attempts to enforce money demands against States, through Federal Courts, thoroughly vindicates the wisdom of Iredell's view and the apprehension expressed in his concluding words: "This opinion I hold, however, with all the reserve proper for one which, according to my sentiments in the case, may be deemed, in some measure, extra-judicial. With regard to the policy of maintaining such suits, is not for this Court to consider, unless the point in all other respects was very doubtful. Policy then might be argued from with a view to preponderate the judgment. Upon the question before us I have no doubt. I have, therefore, nothing to do with the policy, but I confess, if I was at liberty to speak on that subject, my opinion on the policy of the case would also differ from that of the Attorney General. It is, however, a delicate topic. I pray to God that if the Attorney General's doctrine as to the law be established by the judgment of this Court, all the good he predicts of it may take place and none of the evils with which, I have the concern to say, it appears to me to be pregnant." In South Dakota v. North Carolina,[18] the question, as there presented, was discussed and decided against the contention of the State by a divided Court of five to four. The present Chief Justice wrote a strong and well sustained dissenting opinion, concurred in by Chief Justice Fuller, Justices McKenna and Day. The decree there was, however, confined to a statutory mortgage upon specific property. The question whether judgment for a deficiency would be entered was expressly reserved. The case was settled by compromise.

[15]"The Eleventh Amendment."—Columbia Law Review, March, 1908.
[16]Hans v. Louisiana, 134 U. S. 11.

The Court has refused to take jurisdiction in a number of [17]Virginia v. West Virginia, 220 U. S., 35.

[18]192 U. S., 286.

cases where the attempt was made to avoid the provisions of the Amendment.[19]

In Penhallow v. Doane,[20] Judge Iredell wrote an interesting opinion in which he discussed the relation which each of the original colonies bore to each other prior to the formation of the Confederation and the power conferred on the Confederation to establish Courts of Admiralty, and the effect of the judgments of such courts in prize cases. It is not practicable to make extracts from this opinion, but the following is of especial and permanent interest: "By a State forming a republic I do not mean the Legislature of the State, the executive of the State, or the judiciary, but all the citizens which compose that State and are, if I may so express myself, integral parts of it. * * * In a republic all the citizens, as such, are equal, and no citizen can rightfully exercise any authority over another, but in virtue of a power constitutionally given by the whole community which forms such body politic."

In Talbot v. Jansen,[21] an interesting question was presented in regard to the right of expatriation and how it was accomplished. Iredell wrote an opinion in which he discussed the law of nations, etc. Upon the right of expatriation and the limitations upon its exercise the opinion is interesting and enlightening.

In the case of Hylton v. The United States,[22] involving the question whether a tax on carriages was a direct tax, Iredell wrote a carefully guarded opinion concurring with the other Justices that the tax in question was not a direct tax within the meaning of the Constitution. He says: "There is no necessity or propriety in determining what is, or is not, a direct or indirect tax, in all cases. Some difficulties may arise which we do not at present foresee." His caution has [19]Hans v. Louisiana, supra. Christian v. A. & N. C. R. R. Co., 123 U. S., 233; Murray v. Distilling Co., 213 U. S., 151.

[20]3 Dallas, 54.
[21]3 Dallas 133.
[22]3 Dallas, 171.

been justified by the history of the attempt to settle this much vexed question. Alexander Hamilton appeared for the Government. Iredell writes to Mrs. Iredell: "The day before yesterday Mr. Hamilton spoke in our court, attended by the most crowded audience I ever saw there, both Houses of Congress being almost deserted on the occasion. Though he was in very ill health he spoke with astonishing ability and in a most pleasing manner, and was listened to with the profoundest attention. His speech lasted three hours. * * * In one part of it he affected me extremely. Having occasion to observe how proper a subject it was for taxation, since it was a mere article of luxury which a man might either use or not as it was convenient to him, he added: 'It so happens that I once had a carriage myself and found it convenient to dispense with it.' "

At the Spring Term, 1793, of the Circuit Court at Richmond, before Jay, Iredell, and District Judge Griffin, the celebrated case of Ware v. Hylton was heard. During the war the Legislature of Virginia passed an act confiscating the debts of British subjects and directing the payment of such debts to the loan office of the State. The defendant, who was indebted to the plaintiff, a British subject, had, in obedience to the statute, made a partial payment thereon. Suit was brought on the bond. The defendants were represented by Patrick Henry, Marshall, Inis and Campbell. Iredell writes to Mrs. Iredell from Richmond, May 27th: "We began on the great British cases the second day of the court, and are now in the midst of them. The great Patrick Henry is to speak today. I never was more agreeably disappointed than in my acquaintance with him. I have been much in his company and his manners are very pleasing, and his mind, I am persuaded, highly liberal. It is a strong additional reason I have, added to many others, to hold in high detestation violent party prejudice."

The discussion was one of the most brilliant exhibitions ever witnessed at the bar of Virginia. Mr. Henry spoke for three consecutive days. The case was argued upon appeal at the February Term, 1796, of the Supreme Court,[23] Iredell wrote an opinion concurring with the majority of the Court that the Treaty of Peace enabled the creditor to sue for the debt, but was of the opinion (dissenting) that the recovery should be confined to the amount that had not been paid into the loan office. He said: "In delivering my opinion in this important case I feel myself deeply affected by the awful position in which I stand. The uncommon magnitude of the subject, its novelty, the high expectation it has excited, and the consequences with which a decision may be attended, have all impressed me with their fullest force." Referring to the argument, he said: "The cause has been spoken to, at the bar, with a degree of ability equal to any occasion. However painfully I may at any time reflect on the inadequacy of my own talents I shall, as long as I live, remember, with pleasure and respect, the arguments which I have heard in this case. They have discovered an ingenuity, a depth of investigation and a power of reasoning fully equal to anything I have ever witnessed, and some of them have been adorned with a splendor of eloquence surpassing what I have ever felt before. Fatigue has given way under its influence and the heart has been warmed while the understanding has been instructed." The opinion is exhaustive in learning. A competent judge has written that "as a legal argument it may be regarded as one of the best specimens that have been preserved of the old Supreme Court."[24]

Chief Justice Jay having resigned, and the Senate having refused to confirm the nomination of Judge Rutledge, there was much speculation as to who would be appointed. Governor Johnston wrote Iredell: "I am sorry that Mr. Cushing refused the office of Chief Justice, as I don't know whether a less exceptionable character can be obtained without passing over Mr. Wilson, which would perhaps be a measure that could not be easily reconciled to strict neutrality." Iredell writes Mrs. Iredell a few days after: "Mr. Ellsworth is nominated our Chief Justice, in consequence of which I think that Wilson will resign. * * * The kind expectation of my friends that I might be appointed Chief Justice were too flattering. Whatever other chance I might have had there could have been no propriety in passing by Judge Wilson to come at me."

[23] 3 Dallas, 199.
[24] Van Santvoord, Lives of the Chief Justices.

Iredell rode the Middle Circuit during the spring of 1796. His charge at Philadelphia was published at the request of the grand jury. At the August Term, 1798, in the case of Calder v. Bull, [25] Iredell set forth very clearly his view respecting the power of the judiciary to declare invalid acts of the Legislature passed in violation of constitutional limitations. He says: "In a government composed of legislative, executive and judicial departments, established by a Constitution which imposed no limits on the legislative power, the consequence would inevitably be that whatever the Legislature chose to enact would be lawfully enacted, and the judicial power could never interpose to pronounce it void. It is true that some speculative jurists have held that a legislative act against natural justice must, in itself, be void; but I can not think that under such a government any court of justice would possess the power to declare it so. * * * It has been the policy of all the American States, which have individually framed their State Constitutions since the Revolution, and of the people of the United States, when they framed the Federal Constitution, to define with precision the objects of the legislative power and to restrain its exercise within marked and settled boundaries. If any act of Congress, or of the Legislature of a State, violates those Constitutional provisions, it is unquestionably void; though I admit that as the authority to declare it void is of a delicate and awful nature, the Court will never resort to that authority but in a clear and urgent case. If, on the other hand, the Legislatures of the Union shall pass a law within the general scope of their Constitutional power, the Court can not pronounce it to be void merely because it is, in their judgment, contrary to the principles of natural justice. The ideas of natural justice are regulated by no fixed standard; the ablest and the purest men have differed on the subject, and all that the Court could properly say in such an event would be that the Legislature had passed an act which, in the opinion of the Judges, was inconsistent with the principles of natural justice." It is doubtful whether this principle, peculiar to American Constitutional law, with its limitations, has been more accurately stated.

[25] 3 Dallas, 386.

Judge Iredell rode the Eastern Circuit with Judge Wilson. He was much pleased with the people of New England, receiving many courtesies from them. He writes from Boston that he soon found himself "engaged for every day in the week—sometimes different invitations on the same day. Judge Lowell has been particularly kind to me." His charge to the grand jury at Boston was published by request and referred to by the editor of the paper as "uniting eloquence with exhaustive knowledge and liberality." From Boston he writes: "I have constantly received distinction and courtesy here, and like Boston more and more. * * * It is scarcely possible to meet with a gentleman who is not a man of education. Such are the advantages of schools of public authority; every township is obliged to maintain one or more to which poor children can have access without any pay." He writes from Exeter, New Hampshire: "I met in Boston with a gentleman who lives in Newbury Port of the name of Parsons, who appears to me to be the first lawyer I have met with in America, and is a remarkably agreeable man." This was Theophilus Parsons, later Chief Justice of Massachusetts. He writes that he had dined with the Committee and Corporation of Harvard College, "being seated next to the Lieutenant Governor, the famous Samuel Adams, who, though an old man, has a great deal of fire yet. He is polite and agreeable."

On May 27, 1797, Judge Iredell delivered a charge to the grand jury in Richmond, Virginia, which was "animated, perhaps too warm." At that time the grand jury frequently made presentment of matters which they regarded as worthy of public attention, although not the subject of criminal prosecution. They presented "as a real evil the circular letters of several members of the last Congress, and particularly letters with the signature of Samuel J. Cabell, endeavoring, at a time of real public danger, to disseminate unfounded calumnies against the happy Government of the United States, thereby to separate the people therefrom and to increase or produce a foreign influence ruinous to the peace, happiness and independence of these United States." Mr. Cabell made an angry retort, attacking the jury, judge and the Supreme Court. He proposed to bring the matter before Congress as a breach of privilege. Mr. Jefferson urged Mr. Monroe to call it to the attention of the Legislature. Just what they proposed to do with the jury or the judge does not very clearly appear. Judge Iredell published a card in which he said that the charge was prepared before he reached Richmond and had been delivered in Pennsylvania and Maryland; that he was not acquainted with Mr. Cabell and knew nothing of the letters referred to by the grand jury. He concludes: "With regard to the illiberal epithets Mr. Cabell has bestowed not only upon me, but on the other Judges of the Supreme Court, I leave him in full possession of all the credit he can derive from the use of them. I defy him, or any other man, to show that, in the exercise of my judicial character, I have ever been influenced in the slightest degree by any man, either in or out of office, and I assure him that I shall be as little influenced by this new mode of attack by a member of Congress as I can be by any other." The political feeling in the country, and especially in Virginia, was at that time very bitter. Governor Johnston, Judge Iredell's brother-in-law, and always his wise friend, writing him in regard to this incident, said: "The answer was very proper, if proper to give it any answer at all." He further said that which every Judge knows from experience to be true: "I am sensible of the difficulties with which a man of warm feelings and conscious integrity submits to bear, without a reply, unmerited censure; yet I am not certain but that it is more suitable to the dignity of one placed in high and respectable departments of State to consider himself bound to answer only when called upon constitutionally before a proper tribunal."

Iredell rode the Southern Circuit during the spring of 1798, suffering much fatigue and discomfort. Judge Wilson, having suffered financial reverses, sought the hospitality of Governor Johnston and Judge Iredell, and found in them sympathetic friends. His health failed rapidly, resulting in his death August 21, 1798. He was buried at Hayes, the home of Governor Johnston. His remains were removed to Philadelphia a short time since. At the February Term, 1799, of the Supreme Court, Iredell sat for the last time. He filed "one of his best and most carefully written opinions" concurring with the conclusion reached by the other Judges in Sims v. Irvine.[26] He held the Circuit Court at [26] 3 Dallas, 425.

Philadelphia, at which term several of the insurgents were on trial for treason. In his last charge to the grand jury he dwelt at much length on the law of treason and the Alien and Sedition laws. It is manifest that Iredell, as were many others, was deeply impressed with the belief that French philosophy and infidelity, coupled with the revolutionary proceedings in that country, were making an impression upon the people of this country, finding defenders among leaders of public sentiment, seriously threatening the peace of the country and the dissolution of the Union. He was a Federalist and joined with the members of that party in their reverence for Washington. He disliked and distrusted the French leaders and their principles. His charge was filled with warning against the influence of principles and conduct which, in his opinion, were involving the American people in the French Revolution, and the disturbed relations of that country with England. His concluding words in his last charge to a grand jury are interesting and illustrative of the condition of his mind. He says: "If you suffer this government to be destroyed what chance have you for any other? A scene of the most dreadful confusion must ensue. Anarchy will ride triumphant, and all lovers of order, decency, truth and justice be trampled under foot. May that God, whose peculiar province seems often to have interposed to save these United States from destruction, preserve us from this worst of all evils, and may the inhabitants of this happy country deserve His care and protection by a conduct best calculated to obtain them." The grand jury, requesting the publication of the charge, say: "At a time like the present, when false philosophy and wicked principles are spreading with rapidity under the imposing garb of liberty over the fairest country of the old world, we are convinced that the publication of a charge fraught with such clear and just observations on the nature and operation of the Constitution and laws of the United States will be highly beneficial to the citizens thereof." As an illustration of the condition of public sentiment, Governor Johnston writes Iredell who, having concluded the trials in Philadelphia had come to Richmond, "I am glad that you have got away from the land of treason to the land of sedition; the change is something for the better." Chief Justice Ellsworth, riding the Southern Circuit, writes Iredell from Raleigh, N. C., June 10, 1799: "My opinion, collected from some gentlemen who have been lately traveling in that State (Virginia), and others who were at the Petersburg races, presents a melancholy picture of that country. These gentlemen returned with a firm conviction that the leaders there were determined upon the overthrow of the general government. * * * That the submission and assistance of North Carolina was counted on as a matter of course." The Chief Justice, however, adds: "As it was shortly after the election these may have been the momentary effusions of disappointed ambition."

Thirty years of constant and wearing work, coupled with the climate in which he lived and the long journeys on the Southern Circuit, which he rode four times in five years, had impaired Judge Iredell's health. He was unable to attend the August Term, 1799, of the Court. His illness increased until, on October 20, 1799, at his home in Edenton, he passed away, in the forty-ninth year of his age. His friend, the Rt. Rev. Charles Pettigrew, testified of him: "In the run of the above twenty years I have often heard high encomiums on the merits of this great and good man; but never in a single instance have I heard his character traduced or his integrity called in question."

His biographer, from whose excellent work I have largely drawn in the preparation of this sketch, says that with Judge Iredell's papers is an original "Treatise on Evidence," "an * * * Essay on the Law of Pleading," and one on the "Doctrine of the Laws of England concerning Real Property so far as it is in use or force in the State of North Carolina"; the two last unfinished.

When it is remembered that he came to America at seventeen years of age, with neither wealth nor family influence; that his opportunities and sources of study were limited by the condition of the country; that for seven of the thirty years of his life here the country was engaged in war, we can, in some degree, appreciate the immense labor which he performed and the results which he accomplished. His life is a tribute to the teaching and example of his parents, the influence of those with whom he was brought into association in his adopted home, his industry, talents, patriotism, and lofty principles of honor and integrity.

Judge Iredell left one son, bearing his name, who became a lawyer of learning and distinction, Judge of the Superior Court, Governor, and United States Senator. He was, for many years, Reporter of the Supreme Court of the State and author of an excellent work on "The Law of Executors." He died during the year of 1853. His descendants are among the most honorable, useful and patriotic citizens of the State.

It has been the purpose of this sketch to set forth, in the space which could be allotted, a short survey of the judicial work of Judge Iredell. His early death cut short a career on the bench full of promise of enlarging scope and usefulness. That he would have continued to develop his high judicial qualities and, if permitted, shared with the "Great Chief Justice" the work of laying deep and strong the foundations of American Constitutional law can not be doubted. His opinions upon Constitutional questions evince a very high order of judicial statesmanship.

DAVID CALDWELL—TEACHER, PREACHER, PATRIOT

By CHARLES LEE SMITH.

No other North Carolinian of the Revolutionary period deserves more lasting fame than that consecrated preacher, learned teacher, and devoted patriot, the Reverend David Caldwell, D.D. He had his full share of the troubles of the times, as it was the delight of both the Tories and the British to persecute him. After driving him from his home, they destroyed with great wantonness his library and the valuable papers which he had prepared. An effort was made to seduce him with British gold, but neither money nor persecution could shake his loyalty to the cause he had espoused. His is one of the most illustrious names in the educational history of our State, and it has been said, "Dr. Caldwell, as a teacher, was probably more useful to the church (Presbyterian) than any other one man in the United States." He was an able preacher. Through his influence the Reverend John Anderson, D.D., the Reverend Samuel E. McCorkle, D.D., and many others who became distinguished, were brought into the ministry of his church.

David Caldwell, the son of a sturdy Scotch-Irish farmer, was born in Lancaster County, Pa., March 22, 1725. In early youth, after receiving the rudiments of an English education, he was apprenticed to a carpenter, and until his twenty-sixth year he worked at the bench. He then decided to enter the ministry, and his first steps were to obtain a classical education. For some time he studied in Eastern Pennsylvania at the school of the Reverend Robert Smith, the father of John B. Smith, so favorably known in Virginia as president of Hampden-Sidney College, and of the Reverend Samuel Stanhope Smith, D.D., at one time president of Princeton College.[1] Before entering college he taught school for one or more years.

It is not certainly known what year he entered Princeton, though he was graduated in 1761. At the time he became a student the requirements for admission were as follows: "Candidates for admission into the lowest or Freshman class must be capable of composing grammatical Latin, translating Virgil, Cicero's Orations, and the four Evangelists in Greek; and by a late order (made in Mr. Davies's administration) must understand the principal rules of vulgar arithmetic. Candidates for any of the other higher classes are not only previously examined, but recite a fortnight upon trial, in that particular class for which they offer themselves; and are then fixed in that, or a lower, as they happen to be judged qualified. But, unless in very singular and extraordinary cases, none are received after the Junior year." [2]

His assiduity as a student may be gathered from the following incident related by Dr. Caruthers: "An elderly gentleman of good standing in one of his (Caldwell's) congregations stated to me a few weeks since that when he was a young man Dr. Caldwell was spending a night at his father's one summer about harvest, and while they were all sitting out in the open porch after supper, a remark was after some time made about the impropriety of sitting so long in the night air; when he (Dr. Caldwell) observed that, so far as his own experience had gone, there was nothing unwholesome in the night air; for while he was in college he usually studied in it and slept in it during the warm weather, as it was his practice to study at a table by the window, with the sash raised, until a late hour, then cross his arms on the table, lay his head on them, and sleep in that position till morning. This was not very far behind the most inveterate students of the seventeenth century, whether in Europe or America, and a man who had strength of constitution to pursue such a course of application, though of moderate abilities, could hardly fail to become a scholar." [3]

[1] Foote's Sketches of North Carolina, p. 232.
[2] Maclean's History of the College of New Jersey, vol. 1, p. 272.

The scope of the instruction given at Princeton is set forth in a description of the college by President Finley, published in 1764; and as Dr. Caldwell was graduated in 1761, probably the courses were then substantially the same as while he was a student. After taking his degree in 1761 he taught for a year at Cape May. He then returned to Princeton, where he took a graduate course and at the same time served as tutor in languages; so it is certain that he had the system of instruction as it was under Dr. Finley's administration. In his account of the courses and methods President Finley says: "As to the branches of literature taught here, they are the same with those which are made parts of education in the European colleges, save only such as may be occasioned by the infancy of this institution. The students are divided into four distinct classes, which are called the Freshman, the Sophomore, the Junior, and the Senior. In each of these they continue one year, giving and receiving in their terms those tokens of respect and subjection which belong to their standings, in order to preserve a due subordination. The Freshman year is spent in Latin and Greek languages, particularly in reading Horace, Cicero's Orations, the Greek Testament, Lucian's Dialogues, and Xenophon's Cyropedia. In the Sophomore year they still prosecute the study of the languages, particularly Homer, Longinus, etc., and enter upon the sciences, geography, rhetoric, logic and the mathematics. They continue their mathematical studies throughout the Junior year, and also pass through a course of natural and moral philosophy, metaphysics, chronology, etc.; and the greater number, especially such as are educating for the service of the church, are initiated into the Hebrew. * * * The Senior year is entirely employed in reviews and composition. They now review the most improving parts of Latin and Greek classics, part of the Hebrew Bible, and all the arts and sciences. The weekly course of disputation is continued, which was also carried on through the preceding year. They discuss two or three theses in a week, some in the syllogistic and others in the forensic manner, alternately, the forensic being always performed in the English tongue." Besides the above there were public disputations on Sundays on theological questions, and once each month the Seniors delivered original orations before a public audience. Members of the Senior and lower classes were also required from time to time to declaim.[4] Such was the course of instruction taken by Dr. Caldwell, and such in general was the educational system which prevailed in the first institution for higher education established in North Carolina.

[3] Caruthers's Caldwell, p. 20.

At a meeting of the Presbytery held at Princeton in September, 1762, David Caldwell was received as a candidate for the ministry. He was licensed to preach in 1763. In 1764 he labored as a missionary in North Carolina, returning to New Jersey in 1765, being ordained to the full work of the ministry at the Presbytery held at Trenton in July of that year. He immediately returned to North Carolina, where he labored as a missionary, until on March 3, 1768, he was installed as a pastor of the Buffalo and the Alamance congregations.

At that time there were but few Presbyterian ministers in North Carolina, and Dr. Caldwell was one of the very first to make this State his permanent home. His history is more identified with the moral and educational history of North Carolina than is that of any other one man of the eighteenth century. In 1766 he married the daughter of the [4]Maclean's History of the College of New Jersey, vol. 1, p. 266.

Reverend Alexander Craighead, and as the salary from his churches was not sufficient for the support of a family, it became necessary for him to supplement it by teaching school. At this time schools for primary education existed in various parts of the colony, but to him is due the honor of having established the first institution for the higher education that achieved more than local fame. The average attendance of students was from fifty to sixty, which was a large number for the time and circumstances of the country. The exercises of the school were not interrupted by the war till 1781, at that time nearly all his students having taken service in the American army. The school was reopened as soon as circumstances permitted, "though the number of students was small until peace, and with it incipient prosperity were restored to the country." For many years "his log cabin served North Carolina as an academy, a college, and a theological seminary." Such was his reputation as an instructor and disciplinarian, that in his school were students from all the States south of the Potomac. It is claimed that he was instrumental in bringing more men into the learned professions than any other man of his day, certainly in the Southern States. While many of his students continued their studies in Princeton and in the University of North Carolina, after the establishment of that institution, the larger number, and several of those who became the most distinguished in after-life, never went anywhere else for instruction, nor enjoyed other advantages for higher education than those afforded at his school. We are told that "Five of his scholars became governors of different States; many more became members of Congress; and a much greater number became lawyers, judges, physicians, and ministers of the gospel." Dr. Caldwell continued his labors as a teacher till about 1822, when he was forced by the infirmities of age to retire from active work.

Judge Archibald D. Murphey, in an address before the literary societies of the University of North Carolina in 1827, referring to educational conditions before the opening of that institution in 1795, has this to say about the Caldwell School: "The most prominent and useful of these schools[5] was kept by Dr. David Caldwell, of Guilford County. He instituted it shortly after the close of the war, and continued it for more than thirty years. The usefulness of Dr. Caldwell to the literature of North Carolina will never be sufficiently appreciated, but the opportunities for instruction in his school were very limited. There was no library attached to it; his students were supplied with a few of the Greek and Latin classics, Euclid's Elements of Mathematics, and Martin's Natural Philosophy. Moral philosophy was taught from a syllabus of lectures delivered by Dr. Witherspoon, in Princeton College. The students had no books on history or miscellaneous literature. There were indeed very few in the State, except in the libraries of lawyers who lived in the commercial towns. I well remember that after completing my course of studies under Dr. Caldwell I spent nearly two years without finding any books to read, except some old works on theological subjects. At length I accidentally met with Voltaire's History of Charles XII, of Sweden, an odd volume of Smollett's Roderick Random, and an abridgment of Don Quixote. These books gave me a taste for reading, which I had no opportunity of gratifying until I became a student in this University in the year 1796. Few of Dr. Caldwell's students had better opportunities of getting books than myself; and with these slender opportunities of instruction it is not surprising that so few became eminent in the liberal professions. At this day (1827), when libraries are established in all our towns, when every professional man and every respectable gentleman has a collection of books, it is difficult to conceive the inconveniences under which young men labored thirty or forty years ago."

[5]For sketches of the schools, including Dr. Caldwell's, referred to by Judge Murphey, see the writer's History of Education in North Carolina (Washington, 1888).

The Reverend Dr. Caruthers says: "But the most important service he (Dr. Caldwell) rendered as a teacher was to the church or to the cause of religion, for nearly all the young men who came into the ministry of the Presbyterian Church for many years, not only in North Carolina but in the States south and west of it, were trained in his school, many of whom are still living (1842); and while some are superannuated, others are still useful men, either as preachers or as teachers in different institutions of learning." [6]

It is said that his mode of discipline was peculiar to himself, and while it did not admit of imitation, yet it was so successful that it could not be surpassed. His students were bound to him with bonds of affection, and an approving word from their "Dominie" was eagerly sought for. If the course of instruction at his school was not very extended it was thorough, as is testified by those who were prepared by him for future usefulness. Governor John M. Morehead, one of North Carolina's most distinguished sons, who studied under Dr. Caldwell and was prepared by him for the Junior class half advanced in the University of North Carolina, gave him the highest praise as a teacher, though at the time he was under his instruction Dr. Caldwell was between eighty-five and ninety years old.

Dr. Caldwell was a member of the State Convention of 1776, which drew up the "Bill of Rights" and framed the Constitution. He was also a member of the convention to consider the Constitution of the United States in 1788, where he took a decided stand as an advocate of States' rights; but in the party conflicts preceding the second war with Great Britain he was on the side of the Federalists. Such was the esteem in which he was held by his State, and such his reputation for scholarship, that on the establishment of the University of North Carolina the presidency was tendered him. On account of his years the honor was declined. In 1810 that institution conferred on him the honorary degree of Doctor of Divinity. He died August 25, 1824, and the next day was buried in the graveyard of Buffalo Presbyterian Church, Guilford County.

[6] Caruthers's Caldwell, p. 36.

GOVERNOR SAMUEL JOHNSTON OF NORTH CAROLINA[1]

By R. D. W. CONNOR,
Secretary of the North Carolina Historical Commission.

On the east coast of Scotland, twelve miles from the confluence of the Firth of Tay with the German Ocean, lies the ancient town of Dundee, in population third, in commercial importance second among the cities of Scotland. The general appearance of Dundee, we are told, is picturesque and pleasing, and its surrounding scenery beautiful and inspiring. Thrift, intelligence, and independence are characteristics of its inhabitants. It is noted for its varied industrial enterprises, and from time immemorial has been famous among the cities of Britain for its extensive linen manufactures. A long line of men eminent in war, in statecraft, in law, and in letters adorns its annals. Its history carries us back to the time of the Crusades. In the twelfth century it received a charter from the hand of William the Lion. Within its walls William Wallace was educated, and there he struck his first blow against the domination of England. In the great Reformation of the sixteenth century its inhabitants took such an active and leading part as to earn for their town the appellation of "the Scottish Geneva." During the civil wars of the following century they twice gave over their property to pillage and themselves to massacre rather than submit to the tyranny of the House of Stuart. But in every crisis the indomitable spirit of Dundee rose superior to disaster and her people adhered to their convictions with a loyalty that never faltered and a faith that never failed.[2]

[1]An address delivered before the Grand Lodge of Masons, in the Masonic Temple, Raleigh, January 10, 1912, upon the presentation to the State by the Grand Lodge of a marble bust of Governor Samuel Johnston, first Grand Master of Masons of North Carolina.
[2]Encyclopædia Britannica, 9th ed., VII, 534-36.

In this fine old city, among its true and loyal people, the ancestors of Samuel Johnston lived, and here, in 1733, he himself was born.[3] The spirit of Dundee, its loyalty to principle, its unconquerable courage, and its inflexible adherence to duty, entered into his soul at his very birth, and developed and strengthened as he grew in years and in powers of body and mind. Throughout his life he displayed in public and in private affairs many of those qualities of mind and character which have given the Scotch, though small in number, such a large place in the world's history. Says Mr. Henry Cabot Lodge, "six centuries of bitter struggle for life and independence, waged continuously against nature and man, not only made the Scotch formidable in battle, renowned in every camp in Europe, but developed qualities of mind and character which became inseparable from the race. * * * Under the stress of all these centuries of trial they learned to be patient and persistent, with a fixity of purpose which never weakened, a tenacity which never slackened, and a determination which never wavered. The Scotch intellect, passing through the same severe ordeals, as it was quickened, tempered, and sharpened, so it acquired a certain relentlessness in reasoning which it never lost. It emerged at last complete, vigorous, acute, and penetrating. With all these strong qualities of mind and character was joined an intensity of conviction which burned beneath the cool and calculating manner of which the stern and unmoved exterior gave no sign, like the fire of a furnace, rarely flaming, but giving forth a fierce and lasting heat." [4] Had the author of these fine lines had the character of Samuel Johnston in his mind's eye, as he did have that of another eminent Scotch-descended Carolinian, his description could not have been more accurate.

[3]McRee says December 15, 1733.—Life and Correspondence of James Iredell, I, 37. Johnston himself writing to his sister, Mrs. Iredell, January 24, 1794, says: "Yesterday finished my sixty-first birthday."—Ms. letter in C. E. Johnson Mss. Collections of the North Carolina Historical Commission. But Samuel Johnston, Sr., writing to Samuel Johnston, Jr., in a letter dated "Newbern, 17th, 1754," month omitted, says: "I give you joy of your being of age last Sunday."—Copy of letter in Collections of the N. C. Hist. Com. Original in the library at "Hayes."

[4]Address in the United States Senate, March 12, 1910, at the presentation to the United States by the State of South Carolina of a statue of John C. Calhoun.

In the great crises of our history in which he figured so largely, immediately preceding and immediately following the American Revolution, Samuel Johnston, with keen penetrating vision, saw more clearly than any of his colleagues the true nature of the problem confronting them. This problem was, on the one hand, to preserve in America the fundamental principles of English liberty against the encroachments of the British Parliament, and on the other, to secure the guarantees of law and order against the well-meant but ill-considered schemes of honest but ignorant reformers. For a full quarter of a century he pursued both of these ends, patiently and persistently, "with a fixity of purpose which never weakened, a tenacity which never slackened, and a determination which never wavered." Neither the wrath of a royal governor, threatening withdrawal of royal favor and deprivation of office, nor the fierce and unjust denunciations of party leaders, menacing him with loss of popular support and defeat at the polls, could swerve him one inch from the path of the public good as he understood it. Beneath his cool and calculating manner burned "an intensity of conviction" which gave him in the fullest degree that rarest of all virtues in men who serve the public—I mean courage, courage to fight the battles of the people, if need be, against the people themselves. Of course Johnston never questioned the right of the people to decide public affairs as they chose, but he frequently doubted the wisdom of their decisions; and when such a doubt arose in his mind he spoke his sentiments without fear or favor and no appeal or threat could move him. He was ready on all such occasions to maintain his positions with a "relentlessness in reasoning" that carried conviction, and out of defeat invariably wrung ultimate victory. More than once in his public career the people, when confronted by his immovable will, in fits of party passion discarded his leadership for that of more compliant leaders; but only in their calmer moments to turn to him again to point the way out of the mazes into which their folly had entangled them.

A Scotchman by birth, Samuel Johnston was fortunate in his ancestral inheritance; an American by adoption, he was equally fortunate in his rearing and education. In early infancy[5] his lot was cast in North Carolina, the most democratic of the American colonies, and whatever tendency this fact may have given him toward democratic ideals was later strengthened by a New England education and by his legal studies.[6] At the age of twenty-one he became a resident of Edenton, then a small village of four or five hundred inhabitants, but the industrial, political, and social center for a large and fertile section of the province. Its leading inhabitants were men and women of wealth, education, and culture. Their social intercourse was easy, simple, and cordial. Cards, billiards, backgammon, dancing, tea drinking, hunting, fishing, and other outdoor sports, were their chief amusements. They read with appreciative insight the best literature of the day, made themselves familiar with the philosophy of

---

[5]In his third year. His parents, Samuel and Helen (Scrymoure) Johnston came to North Carolina some time prior to May 25, 1735.—Colonial Records of North Carolina, IV, 9. They probably accompanied Samuel's brother, Gabriel, who become governor of the colony, November 2, 1734. McRee incorrectly gives the name of Governor Samuel Johnston's father as John.—Iredell, I, 36. Letters of his at "Hayes" show that his name was Samuel. See also Grimes: Abstracts of North Carolina Wills, 187, 188; and Col. Rec. IV, 1080, 1110. He resided in Onslow county, but owned large tracts of land not only in Onslow, but also in Craven, Bladen, New Hanover, and Chowan.—Col. Rec., IV, 72, 219, 222, 329, 594, 601, 628, 650, 800, 805, 1249. He was a justice of the peace in New Hanover, Bladen, Craven, and Onslow.—Col. Rec., IV, 218, 275, 346, 347, 814, 1239. He served also as collector of the customs at the port of Brunswick.—Col. Rec., IV, 395, 725, 998, 1287; and as road commissioner for Onslow county, State Records, XXIII, 221. His will, dated November 13, 1756, was probated in January, 1757.—Abstracts, 188. His wife having died of child-birth in 1751 (letter to his son), his family at the time of his death consisted of two sons, Samuel and John, and five daughters, Jane, Penelope, Isabelle, Ann, and Hannah. To his sons he devised 6,500 acres of land, and to his daughters land and slaves.—Abstracts, 188.

[6]Governor Josiah Martin, writing of Johnston, to Lord George Germain, May 17, 1777, says: "This Gentleman, my Lord, was educated in New England, where * * * it may be supposed he received that bent to Democracy which he has manifested upon all occasions."—Col. Rec., X, 401. Letters from his father, addressed to him while he was at school in New Haven, Conn., bear dates from 1750 to 1753. I have not been able to ascertain what school he attended. In 1754 he went to Edenton to study law under Thomas Barker.

the Spectator and the Tatler, and followed with sympathetic interest the fortunes of Sir Charles Grandison and Clarissa Harlowe. They kept in close touch with political events in England, studied critically the Parliamentary debates, and among themselves discussed great constitutional questions with an ability that would have done honor to the most learned lawyers of the Inner Temple.[7] Within the town and its immediate vicinity dwelt John Harvey, Joseph Hewes, Edward Buncombe, Stephen Cabarrus, and, after 1768, James Iredell. Preceding Iredell by a little more than a decade came Samuel Johnston, possessed of an ample fortune, a vigorous and penetrating intellect, and a sound and varied learning, which soon won for him a place of preëminence in the province. "He bore," says McRee, "the greatest weight of care and labor as the mountain its crown of granite. His powerful frame was a fit engine for the vigorous intellect that gave it animation. Strength was his characteristic. In his relations to the public, an inflexible sense of duty and justice dominated. There was a remarkable degree of self-reliance and majesty about the man. His erect carriage and his intolerance of indolence, meanness, vice, and wrong, gave to him an air of sternness. He commanded the respect and admiration, but not the love of the people." [8] At Edenton, surrounded by a group of loyal friends, Johnston entered upon the practice of his profession and in 1759 began a public career which, for length of service, extremes of political fortune, and lasting contributions to the welfare of the State, still stands unsurpassed in our history.[9]

[7]See the picture of Edenton society drawn by James Iredell in his diary, printed in McRee's Iredell.

[8]Iredell, I, 37-38.

[9]He was twelve times elected to the General Assembly, serving from 1759 to 1775, inclusive. On April 25, 1768, he was appointed Clerk of the Court for the Edenton District. In 1770 he was appointed Deputy Naval Officer of the province, but was removed by Gov. Martin, Nov. 16, 1775, on account of his activity in the revolutionary movement. Dec. 8, 1773, he was selected as one of the Committee of Continental Correspondence appointed by the General Assembly. He served in the first four Provincial Congresses, which met Aug. 25, 1774, April 3, 1775, Aug. 20, 1775, and April 4, 1776. Of the third and fourth he was elected President. The Congress, Sept. 8, 1775, elected him Treasurer for the Northern District. Sept.

Johnston's public career covered a period of forty-four years and embraced every branch of the public service. As legislator, as delegate to four provincial congresses, as president of two constitutional conventions, as member of the Continental Congress, as judge, as governor, as United States Senator, he rendered services to the State and Nation which rank him second to none among the statesmen of North Carolina. Time does not permit me today to dwell on all these points of his career, and I must content myself with inviting your attention to his services in just three of the great crises of our history: First, in organizing the Revolution in North Carolina; second, in framing the first state constitution; third, in the ratification by North Carolina of the Constitution of the United States.

You are of course familiar with the principal events which led up to the outbreak of the Revolution. Johnston watched the course of these events with the keenest interest and the most profound insight. By inheritance, by training, and by conviction he was a conservative in politics. He clung tenaciously to the things that were and viewed with apprehension, if not with distrust, any tendency of those in power to depart from the beaten path marked out by time and experience. It was not to be expected, therefore, that he, holding the principles of the British Constitution in great reverence, would look with favor upon departures from those principles so radical as those proposed by the British Ministry. It has frequently been pointed out that in the American Revolution

9, 1775, he was selected as the member-at-large of the Provincial Council, the executive body of the revolutionary government. The Provincial Council, Oct. 20, 1775, elected him Paymaster of Troops for the Edenton District. Dec. 21, 1776, he was appointed by the Provincial Congress a commissioner to codify the laws of the State. In 1779, 1783, 1784 he represented Chowan county in the State Senate. The General Assembly, July 12, 1781, elected him a delegate to the Continental Congress. In 1785 the States of New York and Massachusetts selected him as one of the commissioners to settle a boundary line dispute between them. He was three times elected Governor of North Carolina, Dec. 12, 1787, Nov. 11, 1788, and Nov. 14, 1789. He resigned the governorship in Dec., 1789 to accept election to the United States Senate, being the first Senator from North Carolina. In 1788 and 1789 he was President of the two Constitutional Conventions, at Hillsboro and Fayetteville, called to consider the ratification of the Federal Constitution. Dec. 11, 1789 he was elected a trustee of the University of North Carolina. From 1800 to 1803 he served as Superior Court Judge. He died in 1816.

England and not America represented the radical position. The Americans held to the British Constitution as they had received it from their fathers, they protested against the innovations of the Ministry, and they went to war to conserve the principles of English liberty as they had been handed down from time immemorial. They were the true conservatives. This, too, was the point of view of such British statesmen as Fox, and Pitt, and Burke, and Rockingham. In this contest, accordingly, there could be but one place for Samuel Johnston,—inheritance, education, conviction, all carried him at once into the camp of the Whig party.

From the passage of the Stamp Act in 1765 Johnston maintained a firm and decided stand against every step taken by the British Ministry to subject the colonies in their local affairs to the jurisdiction of Parliament. A special significance attaches to his services. His birth in Scotland, his residence in North Carolina, his education in Connecticut, his intimate correspondence with friends in England, all served to lift him above any narrow, contracted, provincial view of the contest and fitted him to be what he certainly was, the leader in North Carolina in the great continental movement which finally resulted in the American Union. Union was the great bugbear of the King and Ministry, and for some years before the actual outbreak of the Revolution an important object of their policy was to prevent the union of the colonies. They sought, therefore, as far as possible, to avoid all measures which, by giving them a common grievance, would also afford a basis upon which they could unite. In order to accomplish this purpose more effectively acts of Parliament to a large extent gave way in the government of the colonies to instructions from the King issued to the royal governors. These instructions the governors were required to consider as of higher authority than acts of the assemblies and as binding on both the governors and the assemblies. A set was not framed to apply to all the colonies alike, but special instructions were sent to each colony as local circumstances dictated. Since these local circumstances differed so widely in the several colonies, the King and his ministers thought the patriots would not be able to find in these instructions any common grievance to serve as a basis for union.

In North Carolina the battle was fought out on three very important local measures which involved the financial policy of the province, the running of its southern boundary line, and the jurisdiction of the colonial courts. On all three the King issued positive instructions directing the course which the Assembly should pursue. Thus a momentous issue was presented for the consideration of its members: Should they permit the Assembly to degenerate into a mere machine whose highest function was to register the will of the Sovereign; or should they maintain it as the Constitution and their charters intended it to be, a free, deliberative, law-making body, responsible for its acts only to the people? Upon their answer to this question it is not too much to say hung the fate of the remotest posterity in this State. I record it as one of the proudest events in our history, beside which the glories of Moore's Creek, Kings Mountain, Guilford Court House, and even of Gettysburg itself pale into insignificance, that the Assembly of North Carolina had the insight to perceive their problem clearly, the courage to meet it boldly, and the statesmanship to solve it wisely.

"Appointed by the people [they declared] to watch over their rights and privileges, and to guard them from every encroachment of a private and public nature, it becomes our duty and will be our constant endeavor to preserve them secure and inviolate to the present age, and to transmit them unimpaired to posterity. * * * The rules of right and wrong, the limits of the prerogative of the Crown and of the privileges of the people are, in the present refined age, well known and ascertained; to exceed either of them is highly unjustifiable." [10]

[10] For a more extended account of this great contest, see my Cornelius Harnett: An Essay in North Carolina History, 68-78.

Hurling this declaration into the face of the royal governor the Assembly peremptorily refused obedience to the royal instructions. In this momentous affair Samuel Johnston stood fully abreast of the foremost in maintaining the dignity of the Assembly, the independence of the judiciary, and the right of the people to self-government. With unclouded vision he saw straight through the policy of the King and stood forth a more earnest advocate of union than ever. He urged the appointment of the committees of correspondence throughout the continent, served on the North Carolina committee, and favored the calling of a Continental Congress. When John Harvey, in the spring of 1774, suggested a provincial congress, Johnston gave the plan his powerful support,[11] and when the Congress met at New Bern, August 25, 1774, he was there as one of the members from Chowan. Upon the completion of its business this Congress authorized Johnston, in the event of Harvey's death, to summon another congress whenever he should deem it necessary. No more fit successor to Harvey could have been found. Johnston's unimpeachable personal character commanded the respect of the Loyalists,[12] his known conservatism was a guarantee that the revolutionary program under his leadership would be conducted with proper regard for the rights of all and in an orderly manner, and his thorough sympathy with the spirit and purposes of the movement assured the loyal support of the entire Whig party. How thoroughly he sympathized with the whole program is set forth in the following letter written to an English friend who once resided in North Carolina:

"You will not wonder [he writes] at my being more warmly affected with affairs of America than you seem to be. I came over so early and am now so riveted to it by my connections that I can not help feeling for it as if it were my natale solum. The ministry from the time of passing the Declaratory Act, on the repeal of the Stamp Act, seemed to have used every opportunity of teasing and fretting the people here as if on purpose to draw them into rebellion or some violent opposition to Government. At a time when the inhabitants of Boston were every man quietly employed about their own private affairs, the wise members of your House of Commons on the authority of ministerial scribbles declare they are in a state of open rebellion. On the strength of this they pass a set of laws which from their severity and injustice can not be carried into execution but by a military force, which they have very wisely provided, being conscious that no people who had once tasted the sweets of freedom would ever submit to them except in the last extremity. They have now brought things to a crisis and God only knows where it will end. It is useless, in disputes between different countries, to talk about the right which one has to give laws to the other, as that generally attends the power, though where that power is wantonly or cruelly exercised, there are instances where the weaker State has resisted with success; for when once the sword is drawn all nice distinctions fall to the ground; the difference between internal and external taxation will be little attended to, and it will hereafter be considered of no consequence whether the act be to regulate trade or raise a fund to support a majority in the House of Commons. By this desperate push the ministry will either confirm their power of making laws to bind the colonies in all cases whatsoever, or give up the right of making laws to bind them in any case." [13]

[11]Col. Rec., X, 968.

[12]Archibald Neilson, a prominent Loyalist whom Gov. Martin appointed Johnston's successor as Deputy Naval Officer, wrote to James Iredell, July 8, 1775: "For Mr. Johnston, I have the truest esteem and regard. In these times, in spite of my opinion of his judgment, in spite of myself—I tremble for him. He is in an arduous situation: the eyes of all—more especially of the friends of order—are anxiously fixed on him."—McRee's Iredell, I, 260.

This is a very remarkable letter. Consider first of all its date. It was written at Edenton, September 23, 1774. At that time the boldest radicals in America, even such men as Samuel Adams, of Massachusetts; Patrick Henry, of Virginia; Cornelius Harnett, of North Carolina, scarcely dared breathe the word independence. But here is Samuel Johnston, most conservative of revolutionists, boldly declaring that the contest between England and her colonies was a dispute "between different countries," and threatening an appeal to arms to decide whether the British Parliament should make laws "to bind the colonies in all cases whatsoever," or be compelled to surrender "the right of making laws to bind them in any case." The man who ventured this bold declaration was no unknown individual, safe from ministerial wrath by reason of his obscurity, but was the foremost statesman of an important colony, and his name was not unfamiliar to those who gathered in the council chamber of the King.

[13] To Alexander Elmsley, of London.—Col. Rec., IX, 1071.

The death of John Harvey in May, 1775, left Samuel Johnston the undisputed leader of the revolutionary party in North Carolina. In July he issued a call for a congress to meet in Hillsboro, August 20, and of this Congress he was unanimously chosen president. Until now Josiah Martin, the royal governor, had cherished the hope that Johnston would not go to the extreme of rebellion but that he would ultimately break with the Whig party and throw the great weight of his influence on the side of the royal government. Consequently early in the struggle, in very flattering terms, Martin had offered to recommend Johnston to the King for appointment to the next vacancy in the Council; and had refrained from removing him from his position as the deputy naval officer of the colony, "notwithstanding," he wrote, "I had found him uniformly in opposition to every measure of Government during my administration." [14] But now any further forbearance toward Johnston would be disloyalty to the King, and accordingly on October 7, 1775, the Governor addressed a letter to him notifying him of his removal. "The respect I have entertained for your private character," he said, had restrained him from taking this step heretofore; but now duty to his Royal Master would not permit his taking upon himself "the guilt of conniving at the undutiful behavior of one of the King's servants" in appearing "in the conspicuous character of Moderator of a popular Assembly unknown to the laws and constitution of this province.

[14] Gov. Martin to Johnston, Oct. 4, 1772: "In case of a vacancy at the Council Board I wish to know whether you will permit me to name you to the King; if it be agreeable to you, I shall be much flattered by an opportunity of making so honorable an acquisition to the Council of this Province."—Col. Rec., IX, 342. See also Martin to Lord Dartmouth, Col. Rec. IX, 1053; and to Lord Germain, X, 401.

* * * And [he continued] I have seen with greater surprise, if possible, your acceptance of the appointment of treasurer of the northern district of this colony, unconstitutionally and contrary to all law and usage conferred upon you by this body of your own creation." [15] To this communication Johnston replied in a letter of biting sarcasm but a model of courtesy and good taste. "It gives me pleasure," he said, referring to the Governor's reasons for his removal, "that I do not find neglect of duties of my office in the catalogue of my crimes," and then continued:

"At the same time that I hold myself obliged to your Excellency for the polite manner in which you are pleased to express yourself of my private character, you will pardon me for saying that I think I have reason to complain of the invidious point of view in which you are pleased to place my public transactions when you consider the late meeting of the delegates or deputies of the inhabitants of this province at Hillsborough, a body of my own creation. Your Excellency cannot be ignorant that I was a mere instrument in this business under the direction of the people; a people among whom I have long resided, and who have on all occasions placed the greatest confidence in me, to whose favorable opinion I owe everything I possess and to whom I am bound by gratitude (that most powerful and inviolable tie on every honest mind) to render every service they can demand of me, in defense of what they esteem their just rights, at the risk of my life and property.

You will further, Sir, be pleased to understand, that I never considered myself in the honorable light in which you place me, one of the king's servants; being entirely unknown to those who have the disposal of the king's favors, I never enjoyed nor had I a right to expect, any office under his Majesty. The office which I have for some years past executed under the deputation of Mr. Turner was an honest purchase for which I have punctually paid an annual sum, which I shall continue to pay till the expiration of the term for which I should have held it agreeably to our contract.

Permit me, Sir, to add that had all the king's servants in this province been as well informed of the disposition of the inhabitants as they might have been and taken the same pains to promote and preserve peace, good order, and obedience to the laws among them, that I flatter myself I have done, the source of your Excellency's unnecessary lamentations had not at this day existed, or had it existed it would have been in so small a degree that ere this it would have been nearly exhausted; but, Sir, a recapitulation of errors which it is now too late to correct would be painful to me and might appear impertinent to your Excellency. I shall decline the ungrateful task, and beg leave, with all due respect, to subscribe myself, Sir, your Excellency's most obedient, humble servant." [16]

[15] Col. Rec., X, 262.

At the beginning of the Revolution Johnston, in common with the other Whig leaders throughout the continent, disclaimed any purpose of declaring independence. But once caught in the full sweep of the revolutionary movement they were carried along from one position to another until, by the opening of the year 1776, they had reached a situation which admitted of no other alternative. As North Carolina was the first colony to take the lead in demanding independence, so Samuel Johnston was among the first advocates of it in North Carolina. Writing March 3, 1776, he expressed the opinion that the future might "offer a more favorable opportunity for throwing off our connection with Great Britain," but immediately added:

"It is, however, highly improbable from anything that I have yet been able to learn of the disposition of the people at home, from the public papers, for I have not lately received any letters, that the colonies will be under the necessity of throwing off their allegiance to the king and Parliament of Great Britain this summer. If France and Spain are hearty and sincere in our cause, or sufficiently apprised of the importance of the connection with us to risk war with Great Britain, we shall undoubtedly succeed; if they are irresolute and play a doubtful game I shall not think our success so certain."

March 20, Joseph Hewes writing from Philadelphia, where he was in attendance on the Continental Congress, asked Johnston for his views on the subject of independence. In reply Johnston said:

"I am inclined to think with you that there is little prospect of an accommodation. You wish to know my sentiments on the subjects of treating with foreign powers and the independence of the colonies. I have apprehensions that no foreign power will treat with us till we disclaim our dependence on Great Britain and I would wish to have assurances that they would afford us effectual service before we take that step. I have, I assure you, no other scruples on this head; the repeated insults and injuries we have received from the people of my native island has (sic) done away all my partiality for a connection with them and I have no apprehensions of our being able to establish and support an independence if France and Spain would join us cordially and risk a war with Great Britain in exchange for our trade." [17]

[16] Col. Rec., X, 332.

When the fourth Provincial Congress, at Johnston's summons, met at Halifax, April 4, 1776, the entire patriot party was fully abreast of his position on the subject of independence. "All our people here," he wrote, April 5, "are up for independence"; and a few days later he added: "We are going to the devil * * * without knowing how to help ourselves, and though many are sensible of this, yet they would rather go that way than to submit to the British Ministry. * * * Our people are full of the idea of independence." In compliance with this popular sentiment, the Congress, April 12, adopted its famous resolution empowering the North Carolina delegates in the Continental Congress "to concur with the delegates of the other colonies in declaring independency and forming foreign alliances." [18]

Samuel Johnston had now reached the climax of his influence and popularity, for by his election to the presidency of the Provincial Congress he had attained the highest position in public life to which a citizen of North Carolina in 1776 could aspire. The next few years were for him a period of eclipse. Deceived by the specious insinuations of his political opponents his constituents were led to discard his leadership and to accept that of men of fairer promises but of smaller achievements.

Immediately after declaring for independence the Congress at Halifax appointed a committee "to prepare a temporary civil constitution." Among its members were Johnston, Harnett, Abner Nash, Thomas Burke, Thomas Person, and William Hooper. They were (as I have said in another place)[19] men of political sagacity and ability, but their ideas of the kind of constitution that ought to be adopted were woefully inharmonious. Heretofore in the measures of resistance to the British Ministry remarkable unanimity had prevailed in the councils of the Whigs. But when they undertook to frame a constitution faction at once raised its head. Historians have designated these factions as "Conservatives" and "Radicals," terms which carry their own meaning and need no further explanation. However it may not be out of place to observe here that while both were equally devoted to constitutional liberty, the Radicals seem to have placed the greater emphasis on the noun, liberty, the Conservatives on its modifier, constitutional. The leader of the former was undoubtedly Willie Jones, while no one could have been found to question the supremacy of Samuel Johnston among the latter. Congress soon found that no agreement between the two could be reached while continued debate on the constitution would only consume time which ought to be given to more pressing matters. Consequently the committee was discharged and the adoption of a constitution was postponed till the next meeting of Congress in November. Thus the contest was removed from Congress to the people and became the leading issue of the election in October.

[17] Ms. letter in the library at "Hayes."
[18] For a full discussion of the movement toward independence, see my Cornelius Harnett, Chap. X.

Willie Jones and his faction determined that Samuel Johnston should not have a seat in the November Congress, and at once began against him a campaign famous in our history for its violence. Democracy exulting in a freedom too newly acquired for it to have learned the virtue of self-restraint, struck blindly to right and left and laid low some of the sturdiest champions of constitutional liberty in the province. The contest raged fiercest in Chowan. "No means," says McRee, "were spared to poison the minds of the people; to inflame their prejudices; excite alarm; and sow in them, by indefinite charges and whispers, the seeds of distrust. * * * It were bootless now to inquire what base arts prevailed, or what calumnies were propagated. Mr. Johnston was defeated. The triumph was celebrated with riot and debauchery; and the orgies were concluded by burning Mr. Johnston in effigy." [20]

[19]Cornelius Harnett, 152.

From that day to this much nonsense has been written and spoken about Johnston's hostility to democracy and his hankering after the fleshpots of monarchy, and the admirers of Willie Jones from then till now have expected us to believe that the man who for ten years had been willing to sacrifice his fortune, his ease, his peace of mind, his friends and family, and life itself, to overthrow the rule of monarchy was ready, immediately upon the achievement of that end, to conspire with his fellow-workers against that liberty which they had suffered so much to preserve. That Johnston did not believe in the "infallibility of the popular voice"; that he thought it right in a democracy for minorities to have sufficient safeguards against the tyranny of majorities; that he considered intelligence and experience more likely to conduct a government successfully than ignorance and inexperience, is all true enough. But that he also ascribed fully to the sentiment that all governments "derive their just powers from the consent of the governed"; that he believed frequency of elections to be the surest safeguard of liberty; that he thought representatives should be held directly responsible to their constituents and to nobody else, we have not only his whole public career but his most solemn declarations to prove. He advocated, it is true, a government of energy and power, but a government deriving its energy and power wholly from the people. This is the very essence of true, genuine democracy.

[20] Iredell, I, 334.

Although not a member of the Congress which framed our first State Constitution, Johnston's duties as treasurer made it necessary for him to attend its session, and his presence there exerted a most wholesome influence on the final draft of that instrument. In mere matters of policy he manifested but little interest; but there were three points of prime importance to be settled which would ultimately determine the character of the government about to be formed. These were, first, the degree of responsibility to the people to which representatives should be held; second, the basis of the suffrage; and third, the degree of independence to be accorded to the judiciary. On these three points Johnston felt and thought deeply, and exerted himself to have his views incorporated in the Constitution.

In regard to the first he expressed himself as follows in a letter written from Halifax in April while the constitution was under consideration:

"The great difficulty in our way is, how to establish a check on the representatives of the people, to prevent their assuming more power than would be consistent with the liberties of the people. * * * Many projects have been proposed too tedious for a letter to communicate. * * * After all, it appears to me that there can be no check on the representatives of the people in a democracy but the people themselves; and in order that the check may be more efficient I would have annual elections." [21]

But by "the people," Johnston did not mean all the citizens of the State any more than we today, by the same term, mean to include all the citizens of the Commonwealth. Like us Johnston referred only to those citizens who were endowed with the franchise. He did not believe in unrestricted manhood suffrage. Such a basis he thought might be "well adapted to the government of a numerous, cultivated people," but he did not think North Carolina in 1776 was ready for any such untried experiment, and he advocated, therefore, a property qualification. On this point he was "in great pain for the honor of the province" and viewed with alarm the tendency to turn the government over to "a set of men without reading, experience, or principle to govern them." [22]

[21] Iredell, I, 277.

But it was to the judiciary that he looked to safeguard the rights of the individual citizen, and in order that this safeguard might be the more effective he wished it to be independent of the transitory passions of majorities. On this subject he spoke with more than his usual vigor.

"God knows [he exclaimed] when there will be an end of this trifling here. A draft of the Constitution was presented to the House yesterday. * * * There is one thing in it which I cannot bear, and yet I am inclined to think it will stand. The inhabitants are impowered to elect the justices in their respective counties, who are to be the judges of the county courts. Numberless inconveniences must arise from so absurd an institution.[23] They talk [he wrote later] of having all the officers, even the judges and clerks, elected annually, with a number of other absurdities." [24]

Johnston's alarm was needless. Under his guidance conservative influences prevailed and a method of choosing judges in line with his views was adopted. In its final form the Constitution embodied to a large extent Johnston's views on all three of these cardinal points. It provided for a legislature of two chambers chosen annually, for a property qualification for electors for state senators, and for judges chosen by the General Assembly to serve during good behavior.

I know of no more striking personal triumph in the history of North Carolina than this achievement of Johnston. Politically discredited by his own people, without the support of a powerful political party, and totally devoid of that glam-

[22] To Thomas Burke.—State Rec., XI, 504.
[23] To James Iredell.—Col. Rec., X, 1040.
[24] To Mrs. James Iredell.—McRee's Iredell, I, 339.

our and subtle influence which accompanies high official position, he had, through the convincing logic of his arguments, the trust inspired by his acknowledged wisdom, and the confidence imposed in his integrity, forced a hostile Convention to accept his views and lay the cornerstones of the Commonwealth on firm and solid grounds. How firmly he builded is shown by the fact that fifty-eight years passed before annual sessions of the Assembly gave way to biennial sessions; seventy-nine years before the property qualification for electors for state senators was abolished; and ninety-one years before the election of judges was given to the people and their terms changed from good behavior to a term of years. Had Johnston been alive when these changes were proposed there can be no doubt that he would have advocated them. In 1776 he stood for a political system suitable to the physical, mental and moral conditions of the State at that period: in 1835 he would have done the same thing. As a practical statesman, more deeply concerned in securing a good working system than in promulgating vague and uncertain theories, he would have been among the first to recognize the changed conditions wrought by fifty years of marvelous development, and to have advocated changes in the Constitution in conformity with the changed spirit and needs of the time.

Johnston's eclipse was temporary. Accepting his defeat philosophically, he withdrew after the framing of the Constitution from all participation in politics, and watched the course of events in silence. For assuming this attitude he has been severely censured, both by his contemporaries and by posterity, who have charged him with yielding to pique, and with being supine and indifferent to the welfare of the State because he could not conduct its affairs according to his own wishes.[25] But is it not pertinent to ask what other course he could have pursued? He was not an ordinary politician. He had no inordinate itching for public office. He was, indeed, ambitious to serve his country, but his country had pointedly and emphatically repudiated his leadership. Was it not, then, the part of wisdom to bow to the decree? Did not patriotism require him to refrain from futile opposition? The event clearly demonstrated that his course was both wise and patriotic, for the people soon came to their sober second thought and the reaction in Johnston's favor set in earlier than he could possibly have anticipated. They sent him to the State Senate, the General Assembly elected him treasurer, the Governor appointed him to the bench, the General Assembly chose him a delegate to the Continental Congress, and the Continental Congress elected him its presiding officer.[26] The reaction finally culminated in his election as Governor in 1787, and his relection in 1788 and again in 1789. Among the many interesting problems of his administration were the settlement of Indian affairs, the adjustment of the war debt, the treatment of the Loyalists, the cession of the western territory to the Federal Government, and the "State of Franklin"; but today time does not permit that we consider his policy toward them. The chief issue of his administration was the ratification of the Federal Constitution to the consideration of which we must devote a few moments.

[25]See letters of Archibald Maclaine to George Hooper.—State Rec., XVI, 957, 963.

The Convention to consider the new Constitution met at Hillsboro, July 21, 1788. "Conservatives" and "Radicals," now rapidly crystallizing into political parties as Federalists and Anti-Federalists, arrayed themselves for the contest under their former leaders, Samuel Johnston and Willie Jones. The Anti-Federalists controlled the Convention by a large majority, nevertheless out of respect for his office they unanimously elected Governor Johnston president. All the debates, however, were held in committee of the whole, and this plan, by calling Governor Johnston out of the chair, placed him in the arena in the very midst of the contest. Though he was the accepted leader of the Federalists, the burden of the debate fell upon the younger men, among whom James Iredell stood preëminent. Contesting preëminence with Iredell, but never endangering his position, were William R. Davie, Archibald Maclaine, and Richard Dobbs Spaight. Governor Johnston but rarely indulged his great talent for debate, but when he did enter the lists he manifested such a candor and courtesy toward his opponents that he won their respect and confidence, and he spoke with such a "relentlessness in reasoning" that but few cared to engage him in discussion. Johnston could not have been anything else than a Federalist. Since the signing of the treaty of peace with England the country had been drifting toward disunion and anarchy with a rapidity that alarmed conservative and thoughtful men. The issue presented in 1787 and 1788, therefore, was not the preservation of liberty but the prevention of anarchy, and on this issue there could be but one decision for Samuel Johnston. The day for the speculative theories and well-turned epigrams of the Declaration of Independence had passed; the time for the practical provisions of the Federal Constitution had come. Consequently the debates at Hillsboro dealt less with theories of government than with the practical operations of the particular plan under consideration.

[26]He declined to serve.

In this plan Willie Jones and his followers saw all sorts of political hobgoblins, and professed to discover therein a purpose to destroy the autonomy of the States and to establish a consolidated nation. They attacked the impeachment clause on the ground that it placed not only Federal Senators and Representatives, but also State officials and members of the State Legislatures completely at the mercy of the National Congress. Johnston very effectively disposed of this ridiculous contention by pointing out that "only officers of the United States were impeachable," and contended that Senators and Representatives were not Federal officers but officers of the States. Continuing he said:

"I never knew any instance of a man being impeached for a legislative act; nay, I never heard it suggested before. A representative is answerable to no power but his constituents. He is accountable to no being under heaven but the people who appoint him. * * * Removal from office is the punishment, to which is added future disqualification. How can a man be removed from office who has no office? An officer of this State is not liable to the United States. Congress cannot disqualify an officer of this State. No body can disqualify but the body which creates. * * * I should laugh at any judgment they should give against any officer of our own." [27]

But, said the opponents of the Constitution, "Congress is given power to control the time, place, and manner of electing senators and representatives. This clause does away with the right of the people to choose representatives every year"; under it Congress may pass an act "to continue the members for twenty years, or even for their natural lives"; and it plainly points "forward to the time when there will be no state legislatures, to the consolidation of all the states." To these arguments Johnston replied:

"I conceive that Congress can have no other power than the States had. * * * The powers of Congress are all circumscribed, defined, and clearly laid down. So far they may go, but no farther. * * * They are bound to act by the Constitution. They dare not recede from it."

All these arguments sound very learned and very eloquent, retorted the opponents of the Constitution, but the proposed Constitution does not contain a bill of rights to "keep the States from being swallowed up by a consolidated government." But Governor Johnston, in an exceedingly clear-cut argument, pointed out not only the absurdity but even the danger of including a bill of rights in the Constitution. Said he:

[27] Elliott's Debates. The following extracts from Johnston's speeches on the Constitution are all from the same source.

"It appears to me, sir, that it would have been the highest absurdity to undertake to define what rights the people of the United States are entitled to; for that would be as much as to say they are entitled to nothing else. A bill of rights may be necessary in a monarchial government whose powers are undefined. Were we in the situation of a monarchial country? No, sir. Every right could not be enumerated, and the omitted rights would be sacrificed if security arose from an enumeration. The Congress cannot assume any other powers than those expressly given them without a palpable violation of the Constitution. * * * In a monarchy all power may be supposed to be vested in the monarch, except what may be reserved by a bill of rights. In England, in every instance where the rights of the people are not declared, the prerogative of the king is supposed to extend. But in this country we say that what rights we do not give away remain with us."

Though Johnston desired to throw all necessary safeguards around the rights of the people, he did not desire a Union that would be a mere rope of sand. The Union must have authority to enforce its decrees and maintain its integrity, and if he foresaw the rise of the doctrines of nullification and secession, he foresaw them only to expose what he thought was their fallacy.

"The Constitution [he declared] must be the supreme law of the land, otherwise it will be in the power of any State to counteract the other States, and withdraw itself from the Union. The laws made in pursuance thereof by Congress, ought to be the supreme law of the land, otherwise any one state might repeal the laws of the Union at large. * * * Every treaty should be the supreme law of the land; without this, any one state might involve the whole union in war."

Acts of Congress, however, must be in "pursuance" of the powers granted by the Constitution, for Johnston had no sympathy with the notion that the courts must enforce acts of legislative bodies regardless of their constitutionality. As he said:

"When Congress makes a law in virtue of their [sic] constitutional authority, it will be actual law. * * * Every law consistent with the Constitution will have been made in pursuance of the powers granted by it. Every usurpation, or law repugnant to it, cannot have been made in pursuance of its powers. The latter will be nugatory and void."

Johnston, of course, did not think the Constitution perfect and he was as anxious as Willie Jones to have certain amendments made to it. But he took the position that North Carolina, then the fourth of the thirteen States in population, would have more weight in securing amendments in the Union than out of it. Indeed, he reasoned, as long as the State remains out of the Union there is no constitutional way in which she can propose amendments. Accordingly, as the leader of the Federalists, on July 30, he offered a resolution:

"That though certain amendments to the said Constitution may be wished for, yet that those amendments should be proposed subsequent to the ratification on the part of this State, and not previous to it."

Willie Jones promptly rallied his followers against this action and defeated Johnston's resolution by a vote of 184 to 84. Then after proposing a series of amendments, including a bill of rights, the Convention, by the same vote of 184 to 84, refused to ratify the Constitution and, August 2, adjourned sine die.

Thus a second time, in a second great political crisis, Willie Jones triumphed over his rival; but again, as in 1776, his triumph was short-lived. With wise forethought Iredell and Davie had caused the debates of the Convention to be reported and published, and through them appealed from the Convention to the people. How far these debates influenced public opinion it is of course impossible to say, but certain it is that no intelligent, impartial reader can rise from their perusal without being convinced that the Federalists had much the better of the argument. Public opinion so far shifted toward the Federalists' position that when the second Convention met at Fayetteville, November 16, 1789, the Federalists had a larger majority than their opponents had had the year before. Again Samuel Johnston was unanimously elected president. The debates of this Convention were not reported; indeed, the debates of the former Convention had rendered further discussion unnecessary. The people of the State had read those debates and had recorded their decision by sending to the Convention a Federalist majority of more than one hundred. Accordingly after a brief session of only six days the Convention, November 21, 1789, by a vote of 195 to 77, ratified the Constitution of the United States and North Carolina reëntered the Federal Union. It has been so frequently affirmed that in North Carolina it is today very generally believed that this action of the Convention of 1789 was due to the adoption of the first ten amendments to the Federal Constitution; and, further, that the action of Willie Jones and his party in rejecting the Constitution in 1788 forced Congress to submit these amendments. In the interest of historical accuracy let us for just a moment examine this statement. A few dates quickly dispose of the matter. The North Carolina Convention rejected the Constitution August 2, 1788. On November 17, of the same year, the General Assembly passed the resolution calling a second Convention. It was not until September 25, 1789, nearly a year later, that Congress submitted the first ten amendments to the several States. When the North Carolina Convention met at Fayetteville, November 16, 1789, not a single State had acted on these amendments, and more than a year passed after North Carolina had ratified the Constitution before the required number of States had accepted the amendments. Moreover, when the Convention met at Fayetteville, in 1789, the opponents of the Constitution still urged its rejection because the amendments which had been proposed did not meet the objections of the former Convention in "some of the great and most exceptional parts" of the Constitution. The only result of the action of Jones and his party in 1788, therefore, was to keep North Carolina out of the Union for a year and thus to prevent the State's casting her vote for George Washington as the first President of the United States.

The privilege of transmitting the resolution of ratification to the President of the United States and of receiving from him an acknowledgment of his sincere gratification at this important event, fell to the lot of Samuel Johnston. It was fitting, too, that he who, for more than twenty years, had stood among the statesmen of North Carolina as the very personification of the spirit of union and nationalism should be the first to represent the State in the Federal Senate. Of his services there I can not speak today more than to say that he represented the interests of North Carolina with the same fidelity to convictions and courage in the discharge of his duties which had always characterized his course in public life; and that on the great national issues of the day he lifted himself far above the narrow provincialism which characterized the politics of North Carolina at that time and stood forth in the Federal Senate a truly national statesman. It had been well for North Carolina and her future position in the Union had she adhered to the leadership of Johnston, Davie, Iredell and the men who stood with them,—men too wise to trifle with their principles, too sincere to conceal their convictions, and too brave and high-minded to mislead their people even for so great a reward as popular favor. But in the loud and somewhat blatant politics of that day these men could play no part, and one by one they were gradually forced from public life to make way for other leaders who possessed neither their wisdom, their sincerity, nor their courage. In 1793, Samuel Johnston retired from the Senate, and, except for a brief term on the bench, spent the remaining twenty-three years of his life in the full enjoyment of his happy family circle.

Thus, Mr. Grand Master, I have endeavored to point out, as briefly as possible, why it is that we deem Samuel Johnston worthy of a niche under the stately dome of our Capitol in company with Graham, and Ransom, and Morehead. On the mere score of office-holding he surpassed any of them; indeed, his career in this respect has not been surpassed by any other in our history. But in the fierce light of History what a paltry thing is the mere holding of public office; and how quickly posterity forgets those who present no other claim to fame. Posterity remembers and honors him only who to other claims adds those of high character, lofty ideals, and unselfish service; whose only aims in public life are the maintenance of law, the establishment of justice, and the preservation of liberty; who pursues these ends with a fixity of purpose which never weakens, a tenacity which never slackens, and a determination which never wavers. Measuring Samuel Johnston by this standard, I am prepared to say that among the statesmen of North Carolina he stands without a superior. Indeed, taking him all in all, it seems to me that he approaches nearer than any man in our history to Tennyson's fine ideal of the "Patriot Statesman."

> O Patriot Statesman, be thou wise to know
> The limits of resistance, and the bounds
> Determining concession; still be bold
> Not only to slight praise but suffer scorn;
> And be thy heart a fortress to maintain
> The day against the moment, and the year
> Against the day; thy voice, a music heard
> Thro' all the yells and counter-yells of feud
> And faction, and thy will, a power to make
> This ever-changing world of circumstance,
> In changing, chime to never-changing Law.

BIOGRAPHICAL, GENEALOGICAL AND HISTORICAL MEMORANDA

COMPILED AND EDITED BY MRS. E. E. MOFFITT.

JUDGE HENRY GROVES CONNOR

The article in this number of THE BOOKLET on Judge James Iredell is the third contribution which Judge Connor has made to its pages. To Vol. IV, No. 4, he contributed "The Conventions of 1778-1779 and the Federal Constitution." To Vol. VIII, No. 2, he contributed "The Convention of 1835." A biographical sketch of Judge Connor appeared in Vol. VIII, No. 2 (October, 1908). In 1909 Judge Connor resigned from the Supreme Court bench of North Carolina, to accept an appointment made by President Taft as Judge of the United States Court, from the Eastern District of North Carolina.

CHARLES LEE SMITH

A biographical sketch of Charles Lee Smith, Ph.D., LL.D., author of the article on David Caldwell—Teacher, Preacher, Patriot, in this number of THE BOOKLET, was published in Volume VIII, No. 4 (April, 1909). Since that time he has been elected a member of the Board of Trustees of the University of North Carolina, a member of the Board of Managers of the North Carolina Society of the Sons of the Revolution, and a member of the Advisory Board of THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET. A recent volume of the National Cyclopædia of American Biography contains an interesting account of this public-spirited citizen of Raleigh.

R. D. W. CONNOR

Mr. Connor's address on Governor Samuel Johnston, appearing in this number of THE BOOKLET, is the seventh

Some North Carolina Booklets for Sale

Address, EDITOR, Raleigh, N. C.

Vol. I

"Greene's Retreat," Dr. Daniel Harvey Hill.

Vol. II

"Our Own Pirates," Capt. S. A. Ashe.

"Indian Massacre and Tuscarora War," Judge Walter Clark.

"Moravian Settlement in North Carolina," Rev. J. E. Clewell.

"Whigs and Tories," Prof. W. C. Allen.

"The Revolutionary Congress," Mr. T. M. Pittman.

"Raleigh and the Old Town of Bloomsbury," Dr. K. P. Battle.

"Historic Homes—Bath, Buncomb Hall, Hayes," Rodman, Blount, Dillard.

"County of Clarendon," Prof. John S. Bassett.

"Signal and Secret Service," Dr. Charles E. Taylor.

"Last Days of the War," Dr. Henry T. Bahnson.

Vol. III

"Volunteer State Tennessee as a Seceder," Miss Susie Gentry.

"Colony of Transylvania," Judge Walter Clark.

"Social Conditions in Colonial North Carolina," Col. Alexander Q. Holladay, LL.D.

"Battle of Moore's Creek Bridge, 1776," Prof. M. C. S. Noble.

"North Carolina and Georgia Boundary," Mr. Daniel Goodloe.

Vol. IV

"Battle Ramsaur's Mill, 1780," Major Wm. A. Graham.

"Quaker Meadows," Judge A. C. Avery.

"Convention of 1788," Judge Henry Groves Connor.

"North Carolina Signers of Declaration of Independence, John Penn and Joseph Hewes," by T. M. Pittman and Dr. E. Walter Sikes.

"North Carolina Troops in South Carolina," Judge Walter Clark.

"Rutherford's Expedition Against the Indians," Capt. S. A. Ashe.

"Changes in Carolina Coast Since 1585," Prof. Collier Cobb.

"Highland Scotch Settlement in N. C.," Judge James C. MacRae.

"The Scotch-Irish Settlement," Rev. A. J. McKelway.

"Battle of Guilford Court-house and German Palatines in North Carolina," Major J. M. Morehead, Judge O. H. Allen.

Vol. V.—(Quarterly.)

No. 2.

"History of the Capitol," Colonel Charles Earl Johnson.

"Some Notes on Colonial North Carolina, 1700-1750," Colonel J. Bryan Grimes.

"North Carolina's Poets," Rev. Hight C. Moore.

No. 3.

"Cornelius Harnett," Mr. R. D. W. Connor.

"Celebration of the Anniversary of May 20, 1775," Major W. A. Graham.

"Edward Moseley," by Dr. D. H. Hill.

No. 4.

"Governor Thomas Pollok," Mrs. John W. Hinsdale.

"Battle of Cowan's Ford," Major W. A. Graham.

"First Settlers in North Carolina Not Religious Refugees," Rt. Rev. Joseph Blount Cheshire, D.D.

Vol. VI—(Quarterly.)

October, No. 2.

"The Borough Towns of North Carolina," Mr. Francis Nash.

"Governor Thomas Burke," J. G. de Roulhac Hamilton, Ph.D.

"Colonial and Revolutionary Relics in the Hall of History," Colonel Fred. A. Olds.

"The North Carolina Society Daughters of the Revolution and its Objects."

Biographical Sketches: Dr. Richard Dillard, Mr. Francis Nash, Dr. J. G. de R. Hamilton and Col. Fred A. Olds, by Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

January, No. 3.

"State Library Building and Department of Archives and Records," Mr. R. D. W. Connor.

"The Battle of Rockfish Creek, 1781," Mr. James Owen Carr.

"Governor Jesse Franklin," Prof. J. T. Alderman.

"North Carolina's Historical Exhibit at Jamestown," Mrs. Lindsay Patterson, Mary Hilliard Hinton.

Biographical Sketches: Mrs. S. B. Kenneday, R. D. W. Connor, James Owen Carr, and Prof. J. T. Alderman, by Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

April, No. 4.

"The White Pictures," Mr. W. J. Peele.

"North Carolina's Attitude Toward the Revolution," Mr. Robert Strong.

"Some Overlooked North Carolina History," J. T. Alderman.

Biographical Sketches: Richard Benbury Creecy, the D. R. Society and Its Objects, Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

Vol. VII.—(Quarterly.)

July, No. 1.

"North Carolina in the French and Indian War," Col. A. M. Waddell.

"Locke's Fundamental Constitutions," Mr. Junius Davis.

"Industrial Life in Colonial Carolina," Mr. Thomas M. Pittman.

Address: "Our Dearest Neighbor—the Old North State," Hon. James Alston Cabell.

Biographical Sketches: Col. A. M. Waddell, Junius Davis, Thomas M. Pittman, by Mrs. E. E. Moffitt; Hon. Jas. Alston Cabell, by Mary Hilliard Hinton.

Abstracts of Wills. Mrs. Helen DeB. Wills.

October, No. 2.

"Ode to North Carolina," Pattie Williams Gee.

"The Finances of the North Carolina Colonists," Dr. Charles Lee Raper.

"Joseph Gales, Editor," Mr. Willis G. Briggs.

"Our First Constitution, 1776," Dr. E. W. Sikes.

"North Carolina's Historical Exhibit at Jamestown Exposition," Mary Hilliard Hinton.

Biographical Sketches: Dr. Kemp P. Battle, Dr. Charles Lee Raper, Willis Grandy Briggs, Pattie Williams Gee. By Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

January, No. 3.

"General Robert Howe," Hon. John D. Bellamy.

"Early Relations of North Carolina and the West," Dr. William K. Boyd.

"Incidents of the Early and Permanent Settlement of the Cape Fear," Mr. W. B. McKoy.

Biographical Sketches: John Dillard Bellamy, William K. Boyd, William B. McKoy. By Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

April, No. 4.

"St. James's Churchyard" (Poem), Mrs. L. C. Markham.

"The Expedition Against the Row Galley General Arnold—A Side Light on Colonial Edenton," Rev. Robt. B. Drane, D.D.

"The Quakers of Perquimans," Julia S. White.

"Fayetteville Independent Light Infantry," Judge James C. MacRae.

Biographical Sketches: Mrs. L. C. Markham, Rev. R. B. Drane, Julia S. White, Judge James C. MacRae. By Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

Vol. VIII.—(Quarterly.)

July, No. 1.

"John Harvey," Mr. R. D. W. Connor.

"Military Organizations of North Carolina During the American Revolution," Clyde L. King, A.M.

"A Sermon by Rev. George Micklejohn," edited by Mr. R. D. W. Connor.

Genealogical Sketches: Abstracts of Wills; Scolley, Sprott and Hunter, Mrs. Helen de B. Wills.

Biographical and Genealogical Sketches: R. D. W. Connor, Clyde L. King, Marshall Delancey Haywood, by Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

"Abstracts of Wills," Mrs. Helen DeB. Wills.

October, No. 2.

"Convention of 1835," Associate Justice Henry G. Connor.

"The Life and Services of Brigadier-General Jethro Sumner," Kemp P. Battle, LL.D.

"The Significance of the Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence," Prof. Bruce Craven.

Biographical and Genealogical Sketches: Judge Henry G. Connor, Kemp P. Battle, LL.D., Prof. Bruce Craven, by Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

January, No. 3.

"The Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence," Mr. A. S. Salley, Jr.

"The Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence," Prof. Bruce Craven.

"Mr. Salley's Reply."

"Mr. Craven's Rejoinder."

Biographical and Genealogical Sketches: Prof. Bruce Craven, Mr. Alexander S. Salley, Jr., by Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

"Patriotic Objects."

"Information Concerning the Patriotic Society D. R."

April, No. 4.

"Unveiling Cer~monies."

"Carolina," by Bettie Freshwater Pool. .

"The Battle of Kings Mountain," by Dr. William K. Boyd.

"Schools and Education in Colonial Times," by Dr. Charles Lee Smith.

"North Carolina Heroines of the Revolution," by Richard Dillard M.D.

Biographical and Genealogical Sketches: Bettie Freshwater Pool, William K. Boyd, Charles Lee Smith, Richard Dillard, by Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

Vol. IX.—(Quarterly.)

July, No. 1.

"Indians, Slaves and Tories: Our 18th Century Legislation Regarding Them," Clarence H. Poe.

"Thomas Person," Dr. Stephen B. Weeks.

"Sketch of Flora McDonald," Mrs. S. G. Ayr.

Biographical and Genealogical Memoranda: Clarence H. Poe, Dr. Stephen B. Weeks, Mrs. S. G. Ayr, by Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

Abstraacts of Wills: Shrouck, Stevens, Sanderson, Shirley, Stevenson, Sharee, Shearer, Shine, Smithson, Sitgreaves, by Mrs. Helen DeB. Wills.

October, No. 2.

"General Joseph Graham," Mrs. Walter Clark.

"State Rights in North Carolina Through Half a Century," Dr. H. M. Wagstaff.

"The Nag's Head Portrait of Theodosia Burr," Bettie Freshwater Pool.

Biographical and Genealogical Memoranda: Mrs. Walter Clark, H. M. Wagstaff, by Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

Abstracts of Wills: Arnold, Ashell, Avelin, Adams, Battle, Burns, Boge, Bennett, by Mrs. Helen DeB. Wills.

January, No. 3.

"History of Lincoln County," Mr. Alfred Nixon.

"Our State Motto and Its Origin," Chief Justice Walter Clark.

"Work Done by the D. R. in Pasquotank County," C. F. S. A.

Biographical and Genealogical Memoranda: Alfred Nixon, Walter Clark, by Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

Abstracts of Wills: Clark, Evans, Fendall, Fort, Gorbe, Gambell, Grainger, Hill, White, by Mrs. Helen DeB. Wills.

April, No. 4.

"Der North Carolina Land und Colonie Etablissement," Miss Adelaide L. Fries.

"George Durant," Capt. S. A. Ashe.

"Hatorask," Mr. Jaques Busbee.

"The Truth About Jackson's Birthplace," Prof. Bruce Craven.

Biographical and Genealogical Memoranda: Miss Fries, Captain Ashe, Professor Craven, by Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

Vol. X.—(Quarterly.)

July, No. 1.

"The Chase," James Sprunt.

"Art as a Handmaiden of History," Jaques Busbee.

"Sketch of Colonel Francis Locke," George McCorkle.

"Unveiling of Tablet at Nixonton, N. C.," Mrs. Walker Waller Joynes.

"Address Delivered at Unveiling of Tablet at Nixonton, N. C.," by Former Lieutenant-Governor F. D. Winston.

"A Glimpse of Historic Yorktown," Mrs. Helen DeB. Wills.

"Colonel Polk's Rebellion," Capt. S. A. Ashe.

"Was George Durant Originally a Quaker?" William B. Phelps.

October, No. 2.

"The History of Orange County, Part I," Francis Nash.

January, No. 3.

"The Croatans," Hamilton McMillan.

"State Aid to Transportation in North Carolina: The Pre-Railroad Era," J. Allen Morgan.

"Joseph Hewes and the Declaration of Independence," R. D. W. Connor.

April, No. 4.

"An Address for the Baptism of Virginia Dare," Rt. Rev. Joseph Blount Cheshire, D.D.

"The Early History of Craven County," S. M. Brinson.

"Jacob Marling, an Early North Carolina Artist," Marshall DeLancey Haywood.

"The Social Condition of North Carolina in the Year 1783," Captain S. A. Ashe.

"Rowan County Wills and Marriage Bonds," Mrs. M. G. McCubbins.

Vols. I, II, III, IV, 25 cents each number.

Vols. V, VI, VII, VIII, IX, X, 35 cents each number.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

VOLUME XI.

PAGE

The North Carolina Union Men of 1861..... 3-16
By Major William A. Graham.

Some Early Physicians of the Albemarle..... 17-25
By Dr. Richard Dillard.

Some Ballads of North Carolina..... 26-42
By Professor John A. Lomax.

A Painting of the Baptism of Virginia Dare..... 43-44

Tablet Marking the Site of the Old Town of Bloomsbury or Wake Court House..... 45-53

Biographical and Genealogical Memoranda..... 54-58

Rowan County Wills and Marriage Bonds..... 59-69
By Mrs. M. G. McCubbins.

Illustration: Tablet and stone marking the site of Bloomsbury, now Raleigh, N. C., erected by Bloomsbury Chapter D. R.

Roanoke Island 73-81
By Chief Justice Walter Clark.

How Interest Can be Aroused in the Study of the History of North Carolina 82-98
By Chief Justice Walter Clark.

Kill Devil Hill 99-104
By Jaques Busbee.

Career of General James Hogun, One of North Carolina's Revolutionary Officers 105-110
By Chief Justice Walter Clark.

A Forgotten Law..... 111-114
By Annie Lane Devereux.

Rowan County Wills and Marriage Bonds..... 117-130
By Mrs. M. G. McCubbins.

Revolutions of Respect to the Memory of Mrs. Helen DeBernière Hooper Wills..... 131
Illustrations: Walter Clark, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of North Carolina.
Sir Walter Raleigh.

Sir Walter Raleigh and His Associates..... 135-157
By R. D. W. Connor.

Governor Benjamin Smith..... 158-168
By Dr. Collier Cobb.

The Story of Queen's College or Liberty Hall in the Province of North Carolina..... 169-175
By Marshall DeLancey Haywood.

PAGE

Biographical, Genealogical and Historical Memoranda..... 176-180
By Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

Mrs. Helen DeBerniere Wills..... 181

In Memoriam—Mrs. Fannie DeBerniere Hooper Whitaker.. 186

Marriage Bonds of Rowan County, N. C..... 187-190
By Mrs. M. G. McCubbins.

Illustrations: Sir Francis Drake.
Sir Richard Grenville.
Governor Benjamin Smith.

James Iredell, 1751-1799..... 201
By H. G. Connor.

David Caldwell—Teacher, Preacher, Patriot..... 251
By Charles Lee Smith.

Governor Samuel Johnston of North Carolina..... 259
By R. D. W. Connor.

Biographical, Genealogical, and Historical Memoranda..... 286
By Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

North Carolina State Library
Raleigh

Vol. XII JULY, 1912 No. 1

The North Carolina Booklet

GREAT EVENTS IN NORTH CAROLNA HISTORY

PUBLISHED QUARTERLY
BY
THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY
DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION
RALEIGH, N. C.

CONTENTS

	Page
Swannanoa By Calvin H. Wiley	3
Union County and the Old Waxhaw Settlement By Robert Ney McNeely	6
The Masonic Revolutionary Patriots of North Carolina By Marshall DeLancey Haywood	21
Diary of George Washington	41
A Partisan Leader in 1776 By Rebecca Cameron	53
Rowan County Wills By Mrs. M. G. McCubbins	59
Biographical and Genealogical Sketch By Mrs. E. E. Moffitt	63

SINGLE NUMBERS 35 CENTS $1.00 THE YEAR

ENTERED IN THE POST-OFFICE AT RALEIGH, N. C., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

N813b

The North Carolina Booklet

Great Events in North Carolina History

Volume XII of THE BOOKLET will be issued quarterly by the North Carolina Society, Daughters of the Revolution, beginning July, 1912. THE BOOKLET will be published in July, October, January, and April. Price $1.00 per year, 35 cents for single copy.

EDITOR:
MISS MARY HILLIARD HINTON.

VOLUME XII

History of Union County, Including the Waxhaw Settlement.
Mr. Ney McNeely

The Forest (Poem).....Mr. R. F. Jarrett

Masonic Revolutionary Patriots in North Carolina.
Mr. Marshall DeLancey Haywood

Our Forests—What They Have Done, Are Doing, and May Do for North Carolina.....Dr. Collier Cobb

Some Notable Senatorial Campaigns in North Carolina.
Judge Robert W. Winston

Historic Homes, Part VI: Palmyra in the Happy Valley.
Mrs. Lindsay Patterson

Elizabeth Maxwell Steele: the Famous Revolutionary Patriot.
Dr. Archibald Henderson

Reprint of Washington's Diary, written in North Carolina.

The Confederacy (Poem).....Mr. R. F. Jarrett

History of the Whig Party in North Carolina.

North Carolina's Social Life, Ante-bellum.....Major E. J. Hale

How "Carolina" Came to be Written.....Mr. Jaques Busbee

Old letters, heretofore unpublished, bearing on the Social Life of the different periods of North Carolina's History, will appear hereafter in THE BOOKLET.

This list of subjects may be changed, as circumstances sometimes prevent the writers from keeping their engagements.

The histories of the separate counties will in the future be a special feature of THE BOOKLET. When necessary, an entire issue will be devoted to a paper on one county.

THE BOOKLET will print abstracts of wills prior to 1800, as sources of biography, history and genealogy. Mrs. M. G. McCubbins will contribute abstracts of wills and marriage bonds in Rowan County to the coming volume. Hon. F. D. Winston will furnish similar data from Bertie County.

Mrs. E. E. Moffitt has consented to edit the Biographical Sketches hereafter.

Parties who wish to renew their subscriptions to THE BOOKLET for Vol. XII are requested to give notice at once.

Many numbers of Volumes I to XI for sale.

Vol. XII JULY, 1912 No. 1

The North Carolina Booklet

"Carolina! Carolina! Heaven's blessings attend her!
While we live we will cherish, protect and defend her."

Published by
THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY
DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION

The object of THE BOOKLET is to aid in developing and preserving North Carolina History. The proceeds arising from its publication will be devoted to patriotic purposes. EDITOR.

ADVISORY BOARD OF THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET

Mrs. Hubert Haywood.
Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.
Mr. R. D. W Connor.
Dr. D. H. Hill.
Dr. E. W. Sikes.
Mr. W. J. Peele.
Miss Adelaide L. Fries.
Miss Martha Helen Haywood.
Dr. Richard Dillard.
Dr. Kemp P. Battle.
Mr. James Sprunt.
Mr. Marshall DeLancey Haywood.
Chief Justice Walter Clark.
Major W. A. Graham.
Dr. Charles Lee Smith.

EDITOR:
Miss Mary Hilliard Hinton.

OFFICERS OF THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION 1910-1912

REGENT:
Miss MARY HILLIARD HINTON.

VICE-REGENT:
Miss DUNCAN CAMERON WINSTON.

HONORARY REGENT:
Mrs. E. E. MOFFITT.

RECORDING SECRETARY:
Mrs. CLARENCE JOHNSON.

CORRESPONDING SECRETARY:
Mrs. PAUL H. LEE.

TREASURER:
Mrs. FRANK SHERWOOD.

REGISTRAR:
Miss SARAH W. ASHE.

CUSTODIAN OF RELICS:
Mrs. JOHN E. RAY.

CHAPTER REGENTS

Bloomsbury Chapter.....Mrs. Hubert Haywood, Regent.
Penelope Barker Chapter.....Mrs. Patrick Matthew, Regent.
Sir Walter Raleigh Chapter,
Miss Catherine F. Seyton Albertson, Regent.
DeGraffenried Chapter.....Mrs. Charles Slover Hollister, Regent.

Founder of the North Carolina Society and Regent 1896-1902:
Mrs. SPIER WHITAKER.†

Regent 1902:
Mrs. D. H. HILL, Sr.*

Regent 1902-1906:
Mrs. THOMAS K. BRUNER.

Regent 1906-1910:
Mrs. E. E. MOFFITT.

*Died December 12, 1904.
†Died November 25, 1911.

THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET

Vol. XII JULY, 1912 No. 1

SWANNANOA

By CALVIN H. WILEY.
In North Carolina Reader, 1855.

Swannanoa, nymph of beauty,
I would woo thee in my rhyme,
Wildest, brightest, loveliest river
Of our sunny Southern clime!
Swannanoa, well they named thee,
In the mellow Indian tongue;
Beautiful* thou art, most truly,
And right worthy to be sung.

I have stood by many a river,
Known to story and to song—
Ashley, Hudson, Susquehanna,
Fame to which may well belong;—
I have camped by the Ohio,
Trod Scioto's fertile banks,
Followed far the Juniata,
In the wildest of her pranks,—

But thou reignest queen forever,
Child of Appalachian hills,
Winning tribute as thou flowest,
From a thousand mountain rills.

*Swannanoa, in the Indian tongue (Cherokee) signifies beautiful.

Thine is beauty, strength-begotten,
'Mid the cloud begirded peaks,
Where the patriarch of the mountains*
Heav'nward for thy waters seeks.

Through the laurel and the beeches,
Bright thy silvery current shines,
Sleeping now in granite basins,
Overhung by trailing vines,
And anon careering onward
In the maddest frolic mood,
Waking, with its sea-like voices,
Fairy echoes in the wood.

Peaceful sleep thy narrow valleys,
In the shadow of the hills,
And thy flower-enameled border,
All the air with fragrance fills.
Wild luxuriance, generous tillage,
Here alternate meet the view,
Every turn, through all thy windings,
Still revealing something new.

Where, O graceful Swannanoa,
Are the warriors who of old
Sought thee at thy mountain sources,
Where thy springs are icy cold—
Where the dark brow'd Indian maidens,
Who their limbs were wont to lave
(Worthy bath for fairer beauty)
In thy cool and limpid wave?

*Black Mountain.

Gone forever from thy borders,
  But immortal in thy name,
Are the Red Men of the forest!
  Be thou keeper of their fame!
Paler races dwell beside thee,
  Celt and Saxon till thy lands,
Wedding use unto thy beauty—
  Linking over thee their hands.

UNION COUNTY AND THE OLD WAXHAW SETTLEMENT

By ROBERT NEY McNEELY.

The territory lying between the Rocky River and the Catawba and which now comprises Union County, North Carolina, was, prior to the coming of the white settlers, inhabited by a tribe of Indians called the "Waxhaws," from whom the Waxhaw Settlement took its name. Aside from the traditions of the Catawba Indians, a kindred tribe of the Waxhaws, of the battles between the Waxhaws and neighboring tribes of Indians, the earliest information we have of the Waxhaws is the mention made by John Lawson, Surveyor-General of the Carolinas, who on the last day of the year 1699 left Charlestown, South Carolina, and made his way up through the Carolinas on a surveying or rather prospecting tour. He had with him one man, and he tells in his diary that when they reached the settlement of the Waxhaw Indians the chief of the tribe received them cordially, entertained them in his wigwam, and gave them every assistance that he could; that the man he had with him married one of the Indian girls the first evening they were in the Waxhaws, that on the next morning he awoke and found that his new Indian wife had secretly abandoned him in the night and had carried away with her all of his clothes, valuables, a pair of moccasins and a red bandana handkerchief, and that the chief upon being informed of the loss that the groom had suffered ordered some of his men to go in search of the young lady, had her brought back and compelled her to restore the stolen articles.

In about the year 1740 the Waxhaw Indians were attacked with an epidemic of smallpox, a disease theretofore unknown to this tribe, which killed so many of them as to cause the tribe to disband and join the Catawbas and other neighboring tribes. The lands covered by the village of the Waxhaws were later embraced in the farm of Capt. Andrew Pickens on Waxhaw Creek. Upon this territory becoming abandoned by the Indians, the land agents, finding so goodly a land unmolested by savages and claimed by no one, immediately began an advertising scheme to bring desirable immigrants to it from any and all places where the best class of immigrants could be found. This brought settlers from Germany, England, Scotland, Ireland, Wales, Virginia, Pennsylvania, and the already settled portions of North Carolina. The Scotch-Irish settlers from Pennsylvania made what has always been termed "The Waxhaw Settlement," which comprises Jackson and Sandy Ridge townships in Union County and a portion of Lancaster County across the South Carolina line. Vance and Goose Creek townships were settled mostly by people from Rowan and Cabarrus counties. New Salem, Marshville, and Lane's Creek townships were settled by people from Virginia and the settled portions of North Carolina. Buford Township was settled by immigrants from Germany, and Monroe Township was settled by immigrants from all the places hereinbefore named.

At the time of the coming of the white settlers this territory was covered with a massive forest of oak, pine and other timber. There was no underbrush, the trees were large, rather far apart, high to the limbs and heavy topped—so, that, while the rays of the sun could hardly reach the ground through the thick tree tops, the view from the ground of the surface of the country was unbroken except by the large tree trunks which like rustic columns supported the canopy of foliage above. For grazing the territory was unsurpassed, for the grass grew almost waist high and the country was covered with a thick growth of wild pea vines. Here the pioneer hunter found game in abundance and fish in every stream.

The territory which is now Union County was until 1749 included in the boundary of Bladen, after which time until 1763 it was included in the boundary of Anson, and from 1763 until the county of Union was established in 1842 one-half of the territory belonged to Anson and the other half to Mecklenburg. So, the best of both Mecklenburg and Anson was taken to make Union.

The Waxhaw Settlement was made in 1751 by the Scotch-Irish from Pennsylvania. These people, after the siege of Londonderry, had come to Pennsylvania, pushed forward to the western frontiers until they found themselves in immediate contact with the Indians, among whom the French hostile influence was predominant, and with whom they had speedily become involved in quarrels in which the rich but peaceable Pennsylvania Quakers refused to give assistance, and in the hope of securing both friendlier neighbors and a milder climate they had left Pennsylvania and had come down, following the foot of the mountains until they reached the Waxhaws. Among these immigrant settlers was Andrew Pickens, father of General Andrew Pickens of Revolutionary fame, who soon organized the men of the settlement into a company of militia, and the North Carolina State Records show a copy of a report of "Capt. Andrew Pickens, of Anson, in 1755," which gives the names of the men of his company as follows: "Lieutenant, Robert Ramsay; Ensign, John Crocket; Sergeant, Thomas Wright; Sergeant, William Beard; Sergeant, William King; Corporal, Alexander

Crocket; Corporal, John Hagans; Corporal, John Galahen; Corporal, John Martin Clime; Corporal, William Hood, and Privates:

Archie Crocket	John Taylor	Robert McClelland
Andrew Nutt	John Wall	Robert Galt
Andrew Pickens	John Montgomery	Robert Caldwell
Andrew Curswell	John Lockhart	Robert Maheney
Andrew McCoune	John Taggart	Robert McCorkle
Benjamin Thompson	John Bartley	Robert Montgomery
David Miller	James McCorkle	Robert Woods
Phalex Canady	James Walker	Robert Day
George Davis	James Moore	Samuel Rogers
George Walker	Joseph Pickens	Samuel Burnett
George Douglass	Jeremiah Collins	William Davis
Hugh McCain	Joseph Baxter	William Nutt
Hugh Coffey	Moses Davis	William Nutt, Jr.
John Davis	Patrick Coin	William Pickens
John Nutt	Philip Walker	William Arden
John Pickens	Edward Williams	William McKee
John Lynn	Robert Davis	William King
John Arnel Pender	Robert Crockett	William Smith
John Canady	Robert Nutt	William Martin
John Hood	Roger Smith	William Lynn

To this settlement also there came from Scotland and Ireland many immigrants directly. Among these were Andrew Jackson, Sr. (father of the seventh President), Maj. James Crawford, George McCamie, and Messrs. Crow, Latham, and Leslie, all of whom were brothers-in-law, having married sisters—the Hutchinsons—in Carrickfergus, Ireland. To the Waxhaws, too, came Patrick Calhoun, father of South Carolina's greatest statesman. About the same time came Captain James Wauhab (Walkup), who afterwards led his company in the battle of Wauhab's Mill, or as it is locally called, "The Battle of the Waxhaws," and it was here that he met and married Margaret Pickens, one of the sisters of General Andrew Pickens. To the Waxhaws came the Rev.

Alexander Craighead, the Rev. William Richardson, and several other Presbyterian preachers, who were profound scholars and who devoted the full measure of their ability to the educational, religious and political development of the people of the settlement.

The settlers in the Waxhaws built a Presbyterian church—now called the Old Waxhaw Church—just over the line in South Carolina. The location of this church was at the time thought to be in Anson County, N. C., and it was many years later when the State line was run that it first appeared that the church was in South Carolina. The deed given by Rev. Robt. Miller for the church grounds says that it is "lying and being in the county of Anson and State of North Carolina," and the deed is recorded in Anson County, N. C. This church was always served by an educated ministry, and these ministers not only used the church for religious services on the Sabbath, but for school purposes through the week. The people from over a scope of country for fifteen miles around attended the religious services at this church. The school advantages given by the ministers in this church were equal to any schools of the kind in the southern colonies before the Revolutionary War. The people here purchased good books, well bound in leather, and in the libraries of the people in the Waxhaws to this day may be seen many of the old books of their pioneer ancestors.

Before the beginning of the Revolution the entire territory which had once been the hunting grounds of the Waxhaw Indians, and which is now Union County, had become partially settled throughout. However, except in the Waxhaw Settlement, churches and schools were still not started, and it was after the Revolution that churches and schools were first established among these people. So, the religious and educational training of these children of the pioneers was left to the parents in the homes.

Among these settlers over the county were John Belk, Esquire, from Middlesborough, England; Stephen Billue, Thomas Cochran, James Doster, Maj. John Foster, John Ford (one of the signers of the Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence), Richard Griffin, Henry Hargett, from Germany; George Helms and Tilman Helms, from Pennsylvania; James Houston and William Houston, from Virginia; Aaron Howie, John Lemmond, and William Lemmond, from Ireland; George Laney, from Germany; William McRee, Hugh McCain, George McWhorter, Henry McNeely, John McNeely, John McCorkle, David Moore, Charles Montgomery, Capt. Charles Polk, William Pyron, Wm. Osborne, James Ross, John Stilwell, Jesse Stilwell, William Simpson, Jacob Secrest, Emanuel Stevens, Matthew Stewart, John Thompson, John Wentz, and others.

When the Revolution came these people, with the exception of a few who participated in the Mecklenburg Declaration affair, exercised themselves but very little about the war until about the time of the battle of Camden. Tarleton's massacre of Buford's men some fifteen miles southeast of the Waxhaw church over in South Carolina, turned these people from an attitude of almost indifference to the struggle to a fierce and determined participation in it. In the Waxhaws the minister was insulted, his house and books were burnt, and the British soldiers declared war against all Bibles which contained the Scotch version of the Psalms. It was this conduct that fired the people of this section and refilled Sumter's ranks and furnished many of the heroes of Hanging Rock, King's Mountain, Cowpens, Wauhab's Mill, or The Battle of The Waxhaws, Eutaw Springs, and Blackstocks.

It was the rising of these people which opened the way for Marion's famous partisan warfare from the swamps of the Pee Dee and the Santee, which recalled Cornwallis and delayed him in upper South Carolina, and thus preserved

Washington in the Jerseys from an attack by Cornwallis, until the French fleet was ready to coöperate with him.

In the Waxhaws on the banks of Waxhaw Creek, near the old home place of Col. William Walkup, was fought the battle of The Waxhaws or the battle of Wauhab's Mill. This battle was the real battle of the Waxhaws, but it is now the common error of almost all historians to speak of the battle of the Waxhaws as being the massacre of Buford's men by Tarleton at the place locally called "The Buford Battle Ground." No marker shows the field whereon the battle of the Waxhaws was fought, although it is one of the battle-fields of the Revolution, and one in which there were a number of killed and wounded, and in which battle Capt. James Wauhab and several other American commanders, although ultimately defeated, fought for a time bravely and well against superior numbers.

Among the many soldiers of this county in the Revolution were Col. William Richardson Davie, Major John Foster, Capt. James Wauhab, Capt. Chas. Polk, Capt. John Cuthbertson, Thomas Ashcraft, John Belk, James Belk, Darling Belk, Britton Belk, Jeremiah Clontz, George Carriker, John Ewing, Wm. Houston, John Lemmond, William Lemmond, David Moore, Wm. McCain, John McCain, James McCain, Hugh McCain, Jr., Henry McNeely, John McNeely, George McWhorter, Jas. Ross, Edward Richardson, William Simpson, Emanuel Stevens, John Thompson, Philip Wolfe and numerous others whose names we do not have. Nearly every man in the territory that is now Union County belonged to some military company, and nearly all of them went out and did service for the American cause, but the names of all who did service are not obtainable, the rosters not having been kept, and many of them having been too patriotic to apply for pay, thus failing to get their names on the payrolls. The Britton Belk mentioned as having served in the Revolution was killed in that war. He was one of the crowd present at the adoption of the Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence. He took with him to that meeting his ten-year-old son, James Belk, and one hundred years later, at the Centennial Celebration of the aforesaid Declaration, this same James Belk, at the age of one hundred and ten years, was present, was introduced to the great gathering by Governor Z. B. Vance and he told the people present his recollection of the affair and how the men threw their hats in air when Colonel Polk finished reading the paper which declared Mecklenburg folks independent.

In the early days The Waxhaws seemed to be a sort of cradle of genius, for no other section wielded so great an influence or furnished so many notable men. Here were the Jacksons, the Calhouns, and the Pickenses. Andrew Jackson was born here. Patrick Calhoun for a time lived here and belonged to the old Waxhaw church. Here General Andrew Pickens grew up and here he married Rebecca Calhoun. Here in the Waxhaws grew up William Richardson Davie, the distinguished partisan leader in the War of the Revolution, Governor of North Carolina, one of the framers of the Constitution of the United States, Minister to France in the time of Napoleon and founder of the University of North Carolina. William H. Crawford, the great Georgian, went from the Waxhaws. So, from this people went out three of the greatest men of their times, Jackson, Calhoun, and Crawford, men who directed the politics of the nation and whose antagonisms became the antagonisms of the nation's people. The Waxhaws produced William Smith, a Judge and United States Senator in South Carolina. Dr. John Brown, one of the early professors in the University of South Carolina, was reared in the Waxhaws, was a schoolmate of Jackson and with him when they were boys in their teens, rode under Davie at Hanging Rock. From the Waxhaws went Stephen

D. Miller, once Governor of South Carolina, and once a Senator of the United States, a man of great power in an age of great men. From the Waxhaws, too, went J. Marion Simms, a surgeon of world-wide fame, and one who, in his department, has never been surpassed. And many another notable man in the early days claimed the Waxhaws for his home.

In the neighborhood of the Waxhaws were many large slave holders, the people had commodious old ante bellum homes, and, while they were far removed from the lines of traffic and the marts of trade, they were a refined and splendid people and exerted considerable influence in both of the Carolinas. When the National Military Academy was about to be established the community of the Waxhaws was influential enough to come within one vote of getting it at the Great Falls on Catawba River, instead of West Point.

After the Revolution, numbers of people—many of them persons who had done service in the American army—came and made their homes in the territory that is now Union County. Among these were John Austin, Bryant Austin, Charles Austin, Thomas Ashcraft, Willis Alsobrooks, Nathaniel Bivens, Samuel Blythe, Samuel Bickett (great grandfather of Attorney-General T. W. Bickett), Redden Bennett, James Benton (a first cousin of Senator Thomas H. Benton), Richard Bass, Willis Bass, John Brewer, James Blair, William Brooks, John Broom, Philip Carriker (Kiker), William Chainey, Simon Crowell, Peter Crowell, Samuel Crowell, Lewis Conder, Charles Dry, Thos. P. Dillon, Moses Eason, Frederick Ezell, Robert Fowler, Thomas Griffin, Jonathan Gordon, Leonard Green, James Gathings, William Howard, Stephen Hasty, Peebles Hasty, Martin Harkey, Richard Hudson, John Hudson, William Hamilton, Dennis Henegan, Samuel Howie, Michael Henegar, James Jenkins, William Long, Rev. Jesse Lewellyn, Thomas Lewis, Thomas Love, John Lawson, David Moore, Ebenezer Marsh, the widow Margaret Mullis, Henry Massey, Daniel McCollum, Walter Nance, Richard Nash, James Ormond, Samuel Presson, William Potts, Moses Pierce, Peter Parker, William Phillips, Jacob Penegar, Richard Pressley, John Pressley, Levy Presslar, Moses Paxton, Henry Rape, Peter Rape, Thomas Rogers, Robert Russell, Edward Richardson, John Ray, Solomon Rowe, John Shannon, Abram Smith, John Smith, John Stancil, Solomon Simons, Moses Stegall, Andrew Stinson, David Starnes, Frederick Starnes, Thomas Shelby, Joshua Sikes, Cornelius Sikes, Alexander Scott, Thomas Tanner, Moses Tomberlin, John Thomas, Stephen Trull, Rev. Joseph Williams, John Walden, Philip Wolfe, William Winchester, and others. From the people hereinbefore mentioned are descended most of the people of Union County.

When the War of 1812 came the people of this settlement responded to the call for soldiers, and among those who served in that war from what is now Union County were Britton Belk, John Belk, Allen Broom, Henry Clontz, Chas. Crowell, John Cuthbertson, Moses Craig, John Crowell, Peter Chainey, Thos. S. Cochran, Robert Cochran, John Ford, Gideon Freeman, John Funderburk (Vanderberg), Joshua Fincher, Samuel Givens, Samuel Holden, William Helms, Chas. Helms, Joel Helms, Aaron Howey, Henry Hargett, Jr., William Hargett, David Harkey, John Harkey, William Houston, Jesse Ivey, Andrew King, Wm. L. Lemmond, Chas. Laney, John Long, Henry Moser, John McCorkle, Thomas Miller, Hugh McCain, Capt. David Moore, Matthew McCall, James McCall, Hugh McElroy, James Morrison, William Pyron, Moses Purser, John Phillips, James Rone, Daniel Rich, Samuel Rape, Samuel Rayner, Jacob Starnes, William Shelby, Alexander Stewart, Frederick Starnes, Nathaniel Starnes, Elias Stilwell, Moses Tomberlin, Groves Vincent, Moses Vick, Jesse Yandle, Samuel Yandle, William Yerby (Irby), and others.

Union County was established by an Act of the General Assembly of North Carolina ratified December 19, 1842, being formed from about equal portions of territory taken from Anson and Mecklenburg counties.

Within a few years after the county of Union was established the Mexican War began, and Union furnished her quota of soldiers for that conflict. The soldiers of Union enlisted in Capt. Harrison's company in Mecklenburg, Capt. Arey's company in Cabarrus, and in Capt. McManus' company in Lancaster, South Carolina. In the Mecklenburg company the Union County soldiers were Robert H. Ewing, Cyrus Q. Lemmond, Jackson H. Lemmond, Brown Lemmond, Daniel C. Robinson, William F. Rae, and others. In the Cabarrus company the Union County soldiers were John Wilson Long, Valentine Smith, and others. And in the Lancaster company the Union County soldiers were John Irby, John Gay, W. LaFayette Belk, and others.

In the Civil War Union County furnished twelve companies, as follows:

Company B, 15th N. C. Volunteers .....May, 1861
Company B, 26th N. C. Volunteers .....June, 1861
Company D, 37th N. C. Volunteers .....September, 1861
Company F, 35th N. C. Volunteers .....October, 1861
Company B, 48th N. C. Volunteers .....February, 1862
Company A, 48th N. C. Volunteers .....March, 1862
Company E, 48th N. C. Volunteers .....March, 1862
Company F, 48th N. C. Volunteers .....March, 1862
Company I, 48th N. C. Volunteers .....March, 1862
Company I, 53d N. C. Volunteers .....March, 1862
Company C, 10th Battalion Artillery.....March, 1862
Company F, 71st N. C. Volunteers (2d Regt. Junior Reserves), April, 1864

The soldiers of Union County were always noted for their bravery and skill in the fighting business. He was a Union

North Carolina State Library
Raleigh

County soldier, William Freezland, who was the first to cross the stone wall on Cemetery Ridge at the battle of Gettysburg.

One of the wealthiest and best of the old Presbyterians in the old Waxhaws was Maj. John Foster, one of the bravest of Revolutionary soldiers. He was buried on the south side of Waxhaw Creek, near where his fine old ante bellum home once stood. His grave is marked by a granite slab on which is this inscription:

SACRED TO THE MEMORY OF
MAJ. JOHN FOSTER
WHO DEPARTED THIS LIFE JANUARY 22, A. D. 1821
AGED 72 YEARS

HE IMMIGRATED FROM IRELAND A. D. 1765
HE WAS A CAPTAIN OF A TROOP OF HORSE IN THE REVOLUTIONARY WAR, IN WHICH HE DISTINGUISHED HIMSELF IN SEVERAL ENGAGEMENTS, AS AN ACTIVE AND BRAVE OFFICER

Grain hid in the earth
Repays the peasant's care,
And evening sun but sets
To rise more fair.

He has left his beloved wife to lament his loss.

The wise, the just, the pious
And the brave
Live in their deaths and flourish
From the grave.

A man's religion is the leading element in his character in every act of his life, and so it is with a county of men. In the religious life of Union County people, the Baptists, the Methodists, and the Presbyterians have always been predominant. The Scotch-Irish, who made the Waxhaw Settlement, built the first Presbyterian church here, soon after the settlement was made in 1751. The Methodists established McWhorter's Camp Ground, which was the first foothold of Methodism in the county, in the year 1787. Nearly all of the eastern and central parts of Union were originally Baptists. Among the early preachers of the Baptist faith who served these people were Rev. John Bennett, as early as 1790, Rev. Chas. Cook 1800, Rev. Joseph Williams 1805, Rev. Jacob Helms 1815, Rev. Jesse Lewellyn, and Rev. William Taylor 1820, Rev. George Little and Rev. Edmund Davis 1825, and Rev. Solomon Snyder as early as 1835. The county is now covered with splendid churches, all of which are served by able ministers.

Union County has always been free from ambitious politicians, but the people of the county have always been interested in their country's welfare, and have always been careful to elect good men to fill the offices. The following are the names of the men who have served Union County in the capacity of Sheriff, in the order in which they served: William Wilson, John Blount, Alexander Richardson, Darling Rushing, Joshua Sikes, Henry Long, Culpeper Austin, Franklin L. Rogers, John J. Hasty, A. F. Stevens, John W. Griffin, John J. Hasty, A. J. Price, J. P. Horne, B. A. Horne, and John Griffith.

The following are the names of the men who have served Union County in the capacity of Clerk of the Superior Court: Maj. D. A. Covington, J. T. Draffin, W. E. Doster, Hugh M. Houston, John M. Ingram, W. H. Simpson, G. W. Flow, Col. Samuel H. Walkup, G. W. Flow, James C. Huey, Geo. C. McLarty, Frank H. Wolfe, E. A. Armfield, D. A. Houston, and C. E. Houston.

The following are the names of the men who have served Union County in the capacity of Register of Deeds: Thomas P. Dillon, J. M. Greene, J. F. McLure, John W. Holm, J. O. Griffin, W. J. C. McCauley, C. N. Simpson, H. J Wolfe, F. H. Wolfe, John W. Bivens, P. P. W. Plyler, John M. Stewart, and J. E. Stewart.

The following are the names of the men who have served

Union County in the capacity of Treasurer: Plummer Stewart, James W. Doster, Lemuel Presson, Albert Marsh, Thomas W. Griffin, A. J. Price, G. C. McLarty, James McNeely, Jas. H. Williams, Geo. M. Laney, and J. W. Laney.

The following are the names of the men who have served in the State Senate from Union County: Col. Samuel H. Walkup, Maj. D. A. Covington, Capt. C. M. T. McCauley, Culpeper Austin, Henry B. Adams, J. F. Payne, G. C. McLarty, O. M. Sanders, T. J. Jerome, R. F. Beasley, R. B. Redwine, and R. W. Lemmond.

The following persons have represented Union County in the State Legislature: Dr. J. Williams, Darling Rushing, Col. T. C. Wilson, Cyrus Q. Lemmond, Culpeper Austin, Jonathan Trull, Hugh Downing, Capt. C. M. T. McCauley, Lemuel Presson, David A. Covington, Henry B. Adams, James Houston, J. F. Payne, Jas. A. Marsh, V. T. Chears, T. C. Eubanks, R. L. Stevens, J. N. Price, J. W. Bivens, C. N. Simpson, E. C. Williams, R. B. Redwine, R. W. Lemmond, R. N. McNeely, John C. Sikes, and R. V. Houston.

The first railroad in Union County was built in 1874. The first newspaper, the Monroe Enquirer, was established in 1873. The first bank established in the county was in 1875. The first cotton mill in the county was built in 1891. Today Union County has eight banks, five cotton mills, four lumber factories, two railroads and another in process of construction, more telephones than any county in the State, good rural free delivery, rural telephones, rural graded schools and rural graded roads—except that it is just a little off in the road business. The county has always been noted for the high class of its professional men, and in agriculture the farmers of Union County are unsurpassed by any anywhere. The people of the county are all good people of the purest Anglo-Saxon type, with no infusion of foreign blood, are descended from worthy ancestors, have been prolific enough to have sent immigrants to every State in the south and the west without decreasing the population at home, are keeping apace with the progress of the times, and are living up to the high standard which has been maintained in the county since the days of the pioneer settlers.

THE MASONIC REVOLUTIONARY PATRIOTS OF NORTH CAROLINA*

By MARSHALL DeLANCEY HAYWOOD,
HISTORIAN OF THE MASONIC GRAND LODGE OF NORTH CAROLINA, GENERAL HISTORIAN OF THE SOCIETY OF SONS OF THE REVOLUTION, HISTORIOGRAPHER OF THE DIOCESE OF NORTH CAROLINA, ETC.

On February 22d (Washington's birthday), 1910, an association of patriotic Masons was formed for the purpose of building in Alexandria, Virginia, a Masonic Temple which is to be A Memorial to Washington the Mason. This building will also be a storehouse for a collection of Washington relics of untold value now kept in the lodge room in Alexandria. In connection with this movement, the authorities of Alexandria-Washington Lodge, No. 22, of which Washington was the first Worshipful Master, intend to publish a volume which will relate chiefly to Washington himself—the incidents connected with his life, ancestry, relatives, personal associates, etc.—at the same time introducing therein some account of Masonic patriots from various States who bore a part (either civil, military or naval) in the War for American Independence. Having been requested to give some account of those Masons in North Carolina who participated in that glorious contest, I comply most willingly—glad of the opportunity of aiding to perpetuate the recollection of their deeds, and also wishing to honor the memory of their great commander and Masonic brother, as a true North Carolinian should. Honors from the Old North State to Washington, both during his lifetime and after his death, have been many and marked. In 1777 the county of Washington, in North Carolina, was erected out of a territory theretofore known as Washington District, on the western frontier. When the State of North Carolina ceded Tennessee to the Union of States, the county of Washington went with it. In 1799, a second county of Washington in North Carolina was created, so far east that it could not be taken up by another new State, unless that State should be located in Albemarle Sound or the Atlantic Ocean. Long before the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, was established in 1791, the town of Washington, in North Carolina (chartered by the Legislature of 1782) was a proud namesake of the victorious leader of our armies in the war then closing. In 1815, the State of North Carolina gave an order to the world's greatest sculptor of that day, Antonio Canova, for an elegant marble statue of Washington (clad as a Roman Consul) which was completed and delivered in 1821. It was later destroyed by fire with the old Capitol at Raleigh in 1831, after which our people brooded over their loss for about fifteen years, and then consoled themselves by having a bronze replica made from Houdon's marble statue of Washington in Richmond, said to be the most lifelike representation of the General in existence.

*An address delivered before the 125th annual communication of the Grand Lodge of North Carolina, at Raleigh, January 9, 1912.

Several Lodges in North Carolina have been named in honor of Washington, including "American George Lodge," chartered in 1789, with the heroic Revolutionary veteran Lieutenant-Colonel Hardy Murfree as its Worshipful Master. Honors paid to Washington in person without stint were the result of his tour through North Carolina in 1791; and, when he had finished his course on earth, and his mortal remains had been laid to rest with Masonic honors, meetings were held in various Lodges throughout the State to bear testimony to his greatness and worth, both as a patriot and a Mason. The Grand Lodge of North Carolina formally notified all subordinate Lodges within its jurisdiction of the loss which America and Masonry had sustained, and recommended to the Brethren that they should wear mourning for the space of one month.

To write a complete history of Freemasonry in the Revolution would be almost equivalent to writing a history of the war itself. From the immortal Washington, commander-in-chief, and his principal Generals (Arnold alas! not excepted) down to many worthy privates in the regiments under them; from John Paul Jones, the greatest of our fighters on the ocean, down to the hardy seamen who manned his guns; from Grand Masters Benjamin Franklin, Peyton Randolph, and other great leaders in the Continental Congress, down to less famous participants in the councils of the young republic—in all grades of civil society, in all ranks of military and naval life—a knowledge of Masonry could be found. And in no one of the Thirteen Colonies did the Order number among its members more patriotic military and political leaders than those who lived in North Carolina. In colonial days the highest Masonic rank attained by any person in the New World was that conferred upon Colonel Joseph Montfort, of Halifax, North Carolina, when the Duke of Beaufort, Grand Master of England, commissioned him "Provincial Grand Master of and for America," on January 14, 1771. Montfort threw the weight of his great influence to the side of the Colonies in 1775-'76. He was elected a member of the Provincial Congress of North Carolina which assembled at New Bern, in April, 1775, but was too ill to serve; and he died on March 25, 1776, before the war had well begun. On February 13, 1911, a massive and beautiful granite monument was erected over his remains in front of the old Masonic Hall in Halifax (to which spot they had been removed from their original resting place), and on this is the following inscription:

THE RIGHT WORSHIPFUL
JOSEPH MONTFORT
BORN IN ENGLAND A. D. 1724
DIED AT HALIFAX, N. C.
MARCH 25, A. D. 1776

Appointed Provincial Grand Master of and for America on Jan. 14, A. L. 5771 (A. D. 1771)
BY THE DUKE OF BEAUFORT
Grand Master of the Grand Lodge of England, A. F. and A. M.
First Clerk of the Court of Halifax County
Treasurer of the Province of North Carolina
Colonel of Colonial Troops
Member Provincial Congress
ORATOR - STATESMAN - PATRIOT - SOLDIER
THE HIGHEST MASONIC OFFICIAL EVER REIGNING ON THIS CONTINENT
THE FIRST - THE LAST - THE ONLY GRAND MASTER OF AMERICA

The claim made for the primacy of Montfort over other Provincial Grand Masters of America (of whom there were several) lies in the fact that the commissions of the others limited their powers to those parts of the Continent where no other Provincial Grand Master exercised jurisdiction, while Montfort was given absolute authority without this limitation.

Enclosing the grave, over which lies the above mentioned monument, is an iron fence, on the locked gate of which is a bronze tablet inscribed as follows:

THE GRAVE OF MONTFORT
This gate swings only by order of the Worshipful Master of ROYAL WHITE HART LODGE to admit a Pilgrim Mason.

The erection of this monument, which was dedicated with imposing ceremonies amid a great gathering of Masons from North Carolina and elsewhere, was the preliminary step toward erecting a Masonic Hall at Halifax as a memorial to Montfort, by the Joseph Montfort Memorial Association, an organization which chiefly owes its existence to the energy and devotion of Harry W. Gowen, of Royal White Hart Lodge. This lodge owns many priceless relics and records of the Colonial and Revolutionary periods, including a Master's chair, led up to by three steps, which are a part of the chair itself (the same which was used in Colonial days by Montfort), a Bible presented to the lodge by Montfort, Montfort's commission from Grand Master the Duke of Beaufort, and the original charter of Royal White Hart Lodge from the same English source, together with minute books and other manuscript records which tell the history of the lodge from 1764 down to the present time, with a few omissions. It is sincerely to be hoped that the Masonic fraternity will see that the Hall at Halifax is built. Aside from the precious records and relics which it will house, it is a memorial which the memory of Montfort fully deserves; for he was no figurehead, but a live, energetic, active Grand Master who paid frequent personal visits to the lodges over which he had jurisdiction, as shown by the only extant Colonial minute books in North Carolina, which are now at Halifax, New Bern, Edenton, and Warrenton.

Cornelius Harnett was Deputy Provincial Grand Master under Montfort, at the outbreak of the Revolution, and the name of a greater patriot has never adorned the annals of his native State. Harnett filled many positions of perilous prominence under the new government, being President of the Provincial Council of North Carolina, a member of the Continental Congress of the United Colonies, etc. So great was his activity in the cause of liberty, and so obnoxious was he to the British, that Sir Henry Clinton excepted him by name, together with Robert Howe (another Mason), from the operation of a general proclamation of amnesty by means of which he hoped to effect a reconciliation between Great Britain and her rebellious colonies in America during the year 1776. Later on in the war, Harnett was captured, and he died a prisoner in Wilmington, after being subjected to inhuman treatment by his captors. When the news of his death reached Unanimity Lodge, in Edenton, June 27, 1781, "it was agreed by the brethren that they shall immediately go into mourning for the Right Worshipful Cornelius Harnett, Esquire, late Grand Master of the State of North Carolina." Before the Revolution, as already noted, Harnett had been Deputy Provincial Grand Master of America under Montfort, his office being vacated by Montfort's death in 1776, and the above quoted action by Unanimity Lodge gives rise to an interesting question as to whether Harnett received another commission later on from some other source, constituting him Provincial Grand Master of North Carolina. In 1906 the Society of Colonial Dames of America erected in Wilmington a handsome monument to the memory of Harnett and other colonists and patriots of the Cape Fear.

There is a tradition that the Committees of Safety, in the early stages of the Revolution, were composed almost exclusively of Masons, and that the committee meetings (often being in secret) were usually held in the lodge rooms. The leaders of those committees and of the State Congresses in North Carolina were certainly Masons, as the records show. After active hostilities had begun at Lexington, Massachusetts, and the news of that battle flew to the southward, it was sent through North Carolina to the patriots of South Carolina and Georgia by such well-known Masons as Richard Cogdell and Joseph Leach, of the committee in New Bern, Cornelius Harnett, of the committee in Wilmington, and Robert Howe, of the committee in Brunswick. From that time up to the adoption of the State Constitution, three Provincial Congresses met in North Carolina and were presided over as follows: the Provincial Congress at Hillsborough, in August, 1775, Samuel Johnston, President, who was the first Grand Master of the Grand Lodge of North Carolina after the war; the Provincial Congress at Halifax, in April, 1776, Samuel Johnston again President; and the Provincial Congress at Halifax, in November, 1776, Richard Caswell, President, who succeeded Johnston as Grand Master after the Revolution. When these Congresses were not in session the supreme legislative body of the State was a Provincial Council, presided over by Cornelius Harnett, to whose high rank in Masonry we have already referred. After independence was declared, Richard Caswell was elected the first Governor of the State.

To the bitter warfare between Whig and Tory, which devastated North Carolina, is probably due the loss of practically all Masonic records of the Colonial and Revolutionary periods except those owned by Royal White Hart Lodge, now No. 2, at Halifax; Johnston-Caswell Lodge, No. 10, at Warrenton (these being the records of Blandford or Blandford-Bute Lodge, the former name of Johnston-Caswell); St. John's Lodge, now No. 3, at New Bern, and Unanimity Lodge, now No. 7, at Edenton. The records of Royal White Hart Lodge, Halifax, begin on November 1, 1764, and run through most of the Colonial period, but omit the Revolution, later beginning again; those of Blandford, or Blandford-Bute, Lodge (now called Johnston-Caswell), Warrenton, begin on April 29, 1766, end on June 24, 1768, and begin again on April 6, 1782; those of St. John's Lodge, New Bern, begin on January 9, 1772, and break off on June 24, 1773, starting up again on the same page of the minute book (showing that nothing has been torn out) on March 16, 1787, without a word of explanation as to omission, though the lodge was then probably dormant; and the records of Unanimity Lodge, Edenton, begin on November 8, 1775, running through the Revolution, the lodge afterwards becoming dormant for two or three years, though it was revived in 1787. The Colonial and Revolutionary records of all of the other lodges of the period before the formation of the Grand Lodge in 1787 are lost or destroyed. These, so far as we know, were St. John's Lodge, now No. 1, of Wilmington; St. John's Lodge, now No. 4, of Kinston; Royal Edwin Lodge (name changed to Charity Lodge), now No. 5, of Windsor; Royal William Lodge (now extinct), No. 6 of Winton; and Phœnix Lodge (name formerly Union Lodge), now No. 8, of Fayetteville. In Warren County, a part of the old county of Bute, was a lodge called Dornoch Lodge, of whose origin we know nothing and whose records are lost. As it had a Scotch name it may have worked under authority of the Grand Lodge of Scotland. It sent representatives to the convention of 1787, which organized the Grand Lodge of North Carolina. This convention held that Dornoch Lodge was not legally constituted, but that its delegates were lawfully made Masons. Blandford Lodge, its neighbor, had, however, affiliated with it before that time. Dornoch Lodge passed out of existence, and most of its members went into Johnston-Caswell Lodge, No. 10, which was formerly Blandford Lodge. Another lodge known to have existed in North Carolina before the Revolution was called "The First Lodge in Pitt County." It was chartered by the Grand Lodge at Boston on December 30, 1767, and became extinct in a few years. As to the sources of the charters of the other lodges mentioned above, St. John's Lodge, in Wilmington, was chartered in 1755 by the Grand Lodge of England; Royal White Hart Lodge, in Halifax, was first chartered "by virtue of a letter of authority obtained from Cornelius Harnett, Grand Master of the Lodge in Wilmington," in 1764, but it received a new charter from the Grand Lodge of England, in 1767. Blandford Lodge, or Blandford-Bute Lodge (for it was written both ways) seems to have been without a name of any kind at first, as its earliest record, April 29, 1766, speaks of it simply as "a lodge held at Buffaloe"—Buffaloe Creek being a stream which ran by the court-house of Bute County, about eight miles southwest of the present town of Warrenton. Blandford Lodge received its authority from the Grand Lodge of Virginia, as we find from a resolution passed at the close of the Revolution, May 18, 1782, referring to a "deputation" from the Grand Lodge of Virginia, December 23, 1766. As has already been stated it worked some months earlier than that date, viz., April 29, 1766—possibly without authority of any kind. St. John's Lodge, in New Bern, was chartered by Grand Master Montfort, in 1772, and now owns its original charter; St. John's Lodge, in Kinston, was probably chartered by Grand Master Montfort just before the Revolution, between 1772 and 1775, and the same is no doubt true of Royal Edwin Lodge in Windsor and Royal William Lodge in Winton, as the Grand Lodge of 1791, in settling precedence, gave these three lodges places between St. John's Lodge of New Bern, chartered in 1772 by Grand Master Montfort, and Unanimity Lodge, in Edenton, whose records show that it was chartered in 1775 by Grand Master Montfort; the next lodge on the list, Phœnix Lodge, of Fayetteville, stated in a protest as to precedence, which it sent to the Grand Lodge of 1855, that it had at first worked under a dispensation from the Grand Lodge of Scotland under the name of Union Lodge and had surrendered that dispensation to take a charter under the name of Phœnix Lodge, from the Grand Lodge of North Carolina after the organization of the latter body. The first lodge chartered by the Grand Lodge after its organization in 1787, was Old Cone Lodge,

No. 9, in Salisbury, the charter of which was issued on November 20, 1788. This lodge is now extinct. In 1779, during the War of the Revolution, while so many North Carolina troops were stationed in the vicinity of Philadelphia, the Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania ("Ancients") chartered an Army Lodge, Charter or Warrant No. 20, among these North Carolinians, but the charter was later revoked and no record of the workings of that lodge has been preserved. Whether any other military lodges existed among the North Carolina troops we are unable to say. About eight miles from Wilmington is a place still known as Masonborough, which McRee, in his Life and Correspondence of James Iredell, (Vol. I., p. 393) tells us "was so called because a number of zealous Masons built originally there, so closely together as to create a straggling village or hamlet." The lodge at Masonborough, according to tradition was called Hanover Lodge. All of its records are lost, which is greatly to be regretted, as it is said to have numbered among its members such renowned patriots as Major-General Robert Howe, the highest ranking officer from North Carolina in the Continental service, and William Hooper, a signer of the Declaration of Independence, besides others of scarcely less note. Of the old lodge building at Masonborough, which was made of hewn pine logs and roofed with heavy cypress shingles, Chief of Police John J. Fowler, of Wilmington, under date of November 25, 1911, writes: "That this was the original Masonic Lodge there can be no doubt. Often, in my earliest days, I heard many of the oldest inhabitants so denominate it. For over fifty years this was my family's summer home. The building was destroyed by fire in 1896. After the fire it was discovered that beneath the floor of the lodge room was an empty brick vault in which the Masonic archives were probably preserved." Hanover Lodge passed out of existence before 1787, when the Grand Lodge was organized.

As we have spoken of Hooper, we may also mention the fact that Joseph Hewes and John Penn, the other two signers of the Declaration of Independence from North Carolina, were likewise Masons. Hewes is recorded as a "visiting brother" at a meeting of Unanimity Lodge, in Edenton, on St. John the Evangelist's Day, December 27, 1776, just after his return from the Continental Congress in Philadelphia. He was probably made a Mason in the latter city. As to Penn, the late Colonel William L. Taylor, of Granville County (a zealous Mason, as his father was before him) declared that his father and Penn had attended lodges together, as his father had often remarked, but he could not recall the name of Penn's own lodge.

Not only on the rolls of those lodges whose Revolutionary records are preserved, but also in the archives of those which were formed soon after the war, we can find the names of many noted patriots of North Carolina. There were Governors Alexander Martin, Nathaniel Alexander, and Montfort Stokes, officers of the Grand Lodge, all of whom had served in the war—Martin as a Colonel of Continentals, Alexander as a Surgeon, and Stokes as a seaman, the last named becoming a Major-General of United States Volunteers in the War of 1812-'15. Captain Benjamin Williams, of the Second North Carolina Continental Regiment, a member of Royal White Hart Lodge, No. 2, at Halifax, also became Governor, as did others who will be mentioned later on. Among the "Heroes of King's Mountain" we find Colonel Joseph McDowell, of Rising Sun Lodge, No. 38, in Morganton; Lieutenant-Colonel Frederick Hambright, of Orange Lodge, No. 47, in Lincoln County; Captain William Lenoir, Worshipful Master of Liberty Lodge, No. 45, in Wilkes County, and Colonel John Sevier, Governor of Tennessee, of Tennessee Lodge, No. 41, in that State when the "Grand Lodge of North Carolina and Tennessee" was a single jurisdiction. Nor should we fail to mention such sterling patriots as Brigade-Chaplain Adam Boyd and Surgeon Solomon Halling, of St. John's Lodge, No. 1, in Wilmington (Halling formerly of St. John's Lodge, No. 3, in New Bern), both zealous clergymen in the Episcopal Church after the war. Another patriotic Mason of the same faith was the Reverend Charles Edward Taylor, a priest of the Church of England, who had come to America in 1771, who was Chairman of the Committee of Safety of Northampton County and Chaplain of the Provincial Congress at Hillsborough August, 1775. Taylor became Worshipful Master successively of Unanimity Lodge in Edenton, and Royal White Hart Lodge, in Halifax, in which latter place he died at the end of the year 1784. The Reverend Charles Cupples, who also held holy orders in the Church of England, was a member of Blandford Lodge, in Warren (formerly Bute) County, and had officiated as Chaplain of the Revolutionary Assemblies at Smithfield and at New Bern.

In addition to the officers already mentioned there were such worthy veterans of the North Carolina Continental Line as Major John Walker, Captain John Kingsbury, and Paymaster William Lord, of St. John's Lodge, No. 1, in Wilmington; Major John Nelson, Major Thomas Hogg, Captain Thomas Evans, Captain Gee Bradley, Captain Howell Tatum, Captain Joseph Montfort,* Captain Jesse Reid, Captain John Ingles, Lieutenant William Bush, Lieutenant Thomas Pasteur, Lieutenant John Tillery, Lieutenant James Tatum, Lieutenant Robert Hays, Ensign John Ford, Surgeon Joseph Blythe, and Matthew Cary Whitaker, a youthful private (later Worshipful Master), all of Royal White Hart Lodge, No. 2, at Halifax; Brigadier-General Jethro

*Captain Joseph Montfort, of the Continental Line (not to be confused with Grand Master Joseph Montfort) was First Lieutenant, Third North Carolina Continentals, May, 1776; Captain-Lieutenant, February, 1777; Captain, January, 1779; taken prisoner at Charleston, May, 1780; served till close of war; Captain First United States Infantry, June, 1790; killed, April 17, 1792, by Indians, at Fort Jefferson, Ohio.

Sumner and Lieutenant Dixon Marshall, of Blandford Lodge, in Warren County; Colonel the Marquis de Britigney, Captain John Daves (wounded at Stony Point), Surgeon William McClure, and Surgeon and Paymaster Isaac Guion, of St. John's Lodge, No. 3, of New Bern; Lieutenant-Colonel Hardy Murfree, Worshipful Master of Royal William Lodge, No. 5, in Winton; Colonel Edward Buncombe (mortally wounded at Germantown), Colonel Gideon Lamb, Colonel John Patten, Colonel Nicholas Long, Lieutenant-Colonel Lott Brewster, Captain Clement Hall, Captain Cosmo de Medici, and Lieutenant Joseph Worth, of Unanimity Lodge, No. 7, in Edenton; Lieutenant Lehausius de Keyser, of Phœnix Lodge, No. 8, in Fayetteville; Deputy Adjutant General John Armstrong, who was wounded at Germantown, and Capt. John Stokes, whose right hand was cut off by a sabre stroke at Waxhaw (the latter's service in Virginia Continentals), of Old Cone Lodge, No. 9, in Salisbury; Captain John Macon, of Dornoch Lodge, in Warren County; Lieutenant Curtis Ivey, of St. John's Lodge, No. 13, Duplin County; Captain William Shepperd, Captain Absalom Tatum, and Captain William Lytle, all of Eagle Lodge, No. 19 (now No. 71) in Hillsborough; and Captain Simon Bright, Captain John Craddock, and Lieutenant Abner Lamb, whose lodges are not known to the present writer, though they are duly recorded as visiting brethren in some of the old minute books. Among the militia officers of the Revolution who were Masons may be mentioned Brigadier-General Isaac Gregory, recorded as present in the Grand Lodge and as a visiting brother in Unanimity Lodge, No. 7, Edenton, though his own Lodge is not mentioned; Brigadier-General William Bryan, of St. John's Lodge, No. 3, in New Bern; Brigadier-General John Simpson, of the "First Lodge in Pitt County," heretofore mentioned; and Brigadier-General Thomas Benbury, Worshipful Master of Unanimity Lodge, No. 7, in Edenton. The list of militia officers further shows, among others, Colonel John Geddy, Colonel Guilford Dudley, Lieutenant-Colonel John Branch, and Major Egbert Haywood, of Royal White Hart Lodge, No. 2, in Halifax; Colonel Benjamin Seawell, of Blandford Lodge, in Bute County; Colonel Richard Cogdell and Colonel Joseph Leech, of St. John's Lodge, No. 3, in New Bern; Colonel Thomas Brown, of Phœnix Lodge, No. 8, in Fayetteville; Lieutenant-Colonel Alexander Dobbins, of Old Cone Lodge, No. 9, in Salisbury; Colonel James Kenan, Worshipful Master of St. John's Lodge, No. 13, in Duplin County; Major John Hinton, Junior, of Democratic Lodge, No. 21, in Raleigh; Quartermaster-General Robert Burton, of Hiram Lodge, No. 24, in Williamsborough; Colonel Adlai Osborne, Worshipful Master of Mount Moriah Lodge, No. 27, in Iredell County; Captain William Houston, of Stokes Lodge, No. 32, in Cabarrus County; Colonel Martin Armstrong, of Unanimity Lodge, No. 34, in Surry County; Colonel Waightstill Avery, Worshipful Master of Rising Sun Lodge, No. 38, in Morganton, and Surgeon Robert Williams, of Federal Lodge, No. 42, in Pitt County. The gentleman last mentioned should not be confused with Robert Willams, of Surry County, for many years Grand Secretary of the Grand Lodge, and Grand Master from 1811 till 1814.

The above mentioned Lodges were not always the only ones to which the gentlemen spoken of belonged, for transfers by dimit were as common then as now, and the present writer knows of four lodges to which Governor Montfort Stokes and Lieutenant-Colonel Hardy Murfree belonged. In fact, dual membership seems to have been allowed then, for some persons are recorded on the rolls of two or more lodges at the same time.

The Grand Lodge of North Carolina was organized in 1787; and, for many years thereafter, no one was elected

Grand Master except from among those who had borne a prominent part in the War of the Revolution, in either civil or military capacities. The first Grand Master was Samuel Johnston, Governor of North Carolina, the first United States Senator to represent North Carolina, and a member of the Continental Congress, being elected President of the latter body, which high office he declined. The successor of Johnston, as Grand Master, was Richard Caswell, first Governor of North Carolina after independence was declared, a Major General of State Troops in the Army of the Revolution, and a member of the Continental Congress. After Caswell's death in office, Johnston again became Grand Master, served three terms, and was succeeded by William Richardson Davie, an active and enterprising cavalry officer in the Revolution, later Governor of North Carolina, "Father of the University," and Special Envoy to France when Napoleon was First Consul. After Davie retired from the office of Grand Master, the Grand Lodge elected as his successor Colonel William Polk, a battle-scarred survivor of the Revolution, who had received a shot through the face and tongue while serving under General Francis Nash when that officer fell mortally wounded at Germantown, in Pennsylvania; and he was also riding by the side of General William Lee Davidson when the latter was slain at Cowan's Ford, on the Catawba River, in North Carolina. Polk served as Grand Master for three terms, and next came successively Chief Justice John Louis Taylor and Associate Justice John Hall, of the North Carolina Supreme Court, both of whom grew to manhood after the Revolution—Taylor being a native of England. When Grand Master Hall's term had expired he was succeeded by Governor Benjamin Smith, the last Revolutionary patriot who ever held the post of Grand Master, and who went out of office in 1811.

Many of the above mentioned patriots were Masons before the Revolution, some entered the Order during the war, and some of the younger ones came in after the return of peace. To the last named class belonged a tousel-haired country boy of thirteen who (together with his brother two years older) guided the command of Major Davie, afterwards Grand Master, when that officer attacked the British outpost at Hanging Rock in 1780. This lad, after reaching manhood, became an enthusiastic Mason, was elected Grand Master of the Grand Lodge of Tennessee, eventually becoming President of the United States—Andrew Jackson, himself the hero of many fierce battles, who said late in life that Davie was the best soldier he had ever known and the one from whom he had learned some of his most valuable lessons in the art of war. Parton, the biographer of Jackson, declares: "So far as any man was General Jackson's model soldier, William Richardson Davie, of North Carolina, was the individual."

Micajah Bullock, of Granville County, was a veteran of the Revolution who belonged to Hiram Lodge, No. 24, in the old town of Williamsborough, not long after the war, though we are unable to ascertain when he first became a Mason. He had been Commissary in a regiment of North Carolina militia commanded by Colonel Ebenezer Folsom, whose very name was a terror to the Tories of the State. When Bullock came home he brought with him a battle-flag which had been carried by the North Carolina troops at Guilford Court House and in other actions. It was of a peculiar design, patterned very much like the present United States flag, but with the difference that it had red and blue stripes (instead of red and white), and thirteen blue stars on a white field instead of white stars on a blue field, as now. In 1854, Edward Bullock, a son of the aforementioned Micajah Bullock, placed it in the hall of Mount Energy Lodge, No. 140, at Tranquillity, in Granville County, for safekeeping, and it remained there until 1905, when it was removed and deposited in Creedmoor Lodge, No. 499, in the same county of Granville. When the new Masonic Temple, built in Raleigh by the Grand Lodge, was completed, the descendants of Micajah Bullock formally presented the flag to the Grand Lodge, January 13, 1909, and it is still a treasured possession of that body. On account of its having been carried in the Battle of Guilford Court House, the North Carolina Society of the Sons of the Revolution had a reproduction of it made, which was presented by that organization to the Guilford Battle Ground Company on July 4, 1911. The original is the only flag of its kind known to exist, and there is no other Revolutionary battle-flag of any kind now in North Carolina.

Very few men of consequence among the Masons of North Carolina were Loyalists in the Revolution. Of these the most prominent were Provincial Grand Secretary William Brimage, and Chief Justice Martin Howard, the latter being Past Master of St. John's Lodge, now No. 3, of New Bern. Andrew Miller and Alexander Telfair, of Royal White Hart Lodge, now No. 2, in Halifax, were also Loyalists. The property of Miller and Telfair in North Carolina was confiscated, and Brimage and Howard also suffered heavy losses in consequence of their loyalty to King George. All four were highly esteemed in their respective communities before the politics of the day caused differences with their neighbors.

As has just been stated, there were very few Masons among the citizens of North Carolina who adhered to the Royal cause, but there were many members of the Order among the officers (some of the highest rank) in the British regiments which were sent over for the purpose of subjugating the Colonies. Though they came on a hostile errand, the American Masons never forgot that they were brethren, and always returned the paraphernalia of an Army Lodge when captured.

An English periodical, quoted in the interesting volume entitled Washington and His Masonic Compeers, by Sidney Hayden, records an incident of this character. Referring to one of the English Army Lodges, it says:

> During the Revolution, its lodge-chest fell into the hands of the Americans. They reported the circumstances to General Washington, who embraced the opportunity of testifying his estimation of Masonry in the most marked and gratifying manner, by directing that a guard of honor, under a distinguished officer, should take charge of the chest, with many articles of value, and return them to the regiment. The surprise, the feeling of both officers and men may be imagined when they perceived the flag of truce that announced this elegant compliment from their noble opponent but still more noble brother. The guard of honor, with their flutes playing a sacred march, the chest containing the constitution and implements of the craft borne aloft like another Ark of the Covenant equally by Englishmen and Americans who were lately engaged in the strife of war, now marched through the enfiladed ranks of the gallant regiment that with presented arms and colours hailed the glorious act by cheers.

It must not for a moment be supposed that the list given in this sketch contains the names of all North Carolina Masons who bore a part in the Revolution. Scores of worthy names have doubtless been omitted, but those mentioned will serve to show the Order's patriotism in a most trying time. It would far exceed the limits of this paper to tell, even in part, of the prowess in battle displayed by these men; of their toilsome marches, with days and nights of exposure to the extremes of heat and cold; of the military prisons where hunger and pestilence made life a burden and death a welcome visitor; and of the final triumph of the cause for which so many sacrifices had been made. The bare mention of many of the names of the patriots enumerated above calls to mind some of the most brilliant achievements of the Revolution—of Howe hastening with his Continentals to the aid of a sister colony when Lord Dunmore invaded Virginia, and afterwards rising to the highest rank under Washington; of Caswell and his compatriots winning the first great victory of the Revolution when a force of warlike Highlanders, outnumbering them nearly two to one, was overwhelmingly defeated at the battle of Moore's Creek bridge, with the loss of but one man on the American side; of Buncombe, Polk, and Armstrong watering the soil of Pennsylvania with their blood; of Murfree leading a column of Wayne's forces in the storming of Stony Point; of John Stokes losing his right hand while fighting Tarleton's dragoons; of stout old General Gregory vainly striving to rally the Americans at Camden and remaining on the field until his horse had been killed and its rider pierced with two bayonet wounds; of Sumner and his heroic brigade in the bloody charge at Eutaw Springs; of Benbury and his brigade of militia defending the Virginia-Carolina boundary; of Sevier, McDowell, Hambright, Lenoir, and other courageous frontiersmen subduing the hostile savages on the western border and annihilating the trained troops of Ferguson at King's Mountain; of Davie and his fleet troopers hanging on the rear of the army of Cornwallis as the British commander pursued his toilsome march through North Carolina; and of Colonel Lamb and Lieutenant Worth, who survived the dangers of the field only to fall victims to sickness brought on by their long service in the army. After being shot down and captured at the battle of Germantown, Colonel Buncombe, of Unanimity Lodge, in Edenton, a courageous soldier and hospitable gentleman, had closed his days at the end of seven months of suffering from an unhealed wound, while a paroled prisoner in Philadelphia; and a few years later, the equally brave statesman, Cornelius Harnett, Past Deputy Provincial Grand Master of America, had died a prisoner in Wilmington after being dragged from a sick bed to a stockade without a roof or covering of any kind. Among the Continental officers who passed a weary existence in the military prisons of Charleston, after valiantly defending that city when beleagured by Sir Henry Clinton, were Colonel Patten, Majors Nelson and Hogg, Captains Montfort, Daves, Bradley, Evans, Reed, Ingles, Craddock, and Howell Tatum, Lieutenants James Tatum, Marshall, Pasteur, Hays, and Ford, Surgeons Blythe and McClure, and doubtless others.

As much has been said of the prowess in battle and fortitude in affliction displayed by the patriots of the Revolution, it would also be a grateful task to tell of the charitable workings of Masonry in that war—deeds of kindness unknown to the world at large—but our limits in this brief paper preclude a recital, even in part, of the numerous cases of relief afforded, though the old minute books abound with the mention of such instances. In an oration at New Bern on the Feast of St. John the Evangelist, 1789, Doctor Solomon Halling, who had been an efficient surgeon in the Revolution and afterwards entered the sacred ministry, said: "Let us reflect, while we enjoy the bounties of indulgent heaven, 'on how many bare, unsheltered heads the rude storms of howling winter beat pitiless.' What numbers solicit charity? The poor, the aged parents of a numerous offspring, stretch out their palsied hands for relief. The helpless widow, with her infant train, requests some small pittance. The war-worn soldier, whose mangled form bears honorable scars, testimonials of his patriotism and good will to his fellow-men, expects some recompence from our beneficence—the sick, the maimed and the blind desire to partake of our bounty."

Thus ends the imperfect narrative wherein I have endeavored to tell of the Masonic Revolutionary Patriots of North Carolina. In life they were the brave defenders of North Carolina and her sister States; and their passing away dissolved the "goodliest fellowship of famous knights whereof this world holds record."

DIARY OF GEORGE WASHINGTON

COPIED WITH LITERAL EXACTNESS FROM THE ORIGINAL, VOL. XXXIV—PART II, Pages 2390–7.

[Lossing imprint in MSS. Division, Library of Congress, Washington, D. C.]

1791. SATURDAY, APRIL 16TH.

* * * At this place (i. e. Hallifax) I arrived about six o'clock, after crossing the Roanoke; on the South bank of which it stands.

This River is crossed in flat Boats which take in a Carriage & four horses at once.—At this time, being low, the water was not rapid but at times it must be much so, as it frequently overflows its banks which appear to be at least 25 ft. perpendicular height.

The lands upon the River appear rich, & the low grounds of considerable width—but those which lay between the different Rivers—namely Appamattox, Nottaway, Meherrin and Roanoke are all alike flat, poor & covered principally with pine timber.

It has already been observed that before the Rain fell, I was travelling in a continued cloud of dust—but after it had rained some time, the Scene was reversed, and my passage was through water; so level are the Roads.

From Petersburg to Hallifax (in sight of the Road) are but few good Houses, with small appearance of wealth.—The lands are cultivated in Tobacco—Corn,—Wheat & Oats, but Tobacco and the raising of Porke for market, seems to be the principal dependence of the Inhabitants; especially towards the Roanoke.—Cotton & Flax are also raised but not extensively.

Hallifax is the first town I came to after passing the line between the two States, and is about 20 miles from it.—To this place vessels by the aid of Oars and Setting poles are brought for the produce which comes to this place, and others along the River; and may be carried 8 or 10 miles higher to the falls which are neither great nor of much extent;—above these (which are called the great falls) there are others; but none but what may with a little improvement be passed. This town stands upon high ground; and it is the reason given for not placing it at the head of the navigation there being none but low ground between it and the falls—It seems to be in a decline & does not it is said contain a thousand Souls.

SUNDAY, 17TH.

Col°. Ashe[105] the Representative of the district in which this town stands, and several other Gentlemen called upon, and invited me to partake of a dinner which the Inhabitants were desirous of seeing me at & excepting it dined with them accordingly.

MONDAY, 18TH.

Set out by six o'clock—dined at a small house kept by one Slaughter, 22 miles from Hallifax and lodged at Tarborough 14 miles further.

This place is less than Hallifax, but more lively and thriving;—it is situated on Tar River which goes into Pamplico Sound and is crossed at the Town by means of a bridge a great height from the water, and notwithstanding the freshes rise sometimes nearly to the arch.—Corn, Porke, and some Tar are the exports from it.—We were recd. at this place by as good a salute as could be given by one piece of artillery.

TUESDAY, 19TH.

At 6 O'clock I left Tarborough accompanied by some of the most respectable people of the place for a few miles—dined at a trifling place called Greenville 25 miles distant—and lodged at one Allan's 14 miles further a very indifferent house without stabling which for the first time since I commenced my Journey were obliged to stand without a cover.

[105] John B. Ashe, a soldier of the Revolution under Gen. Greene, a member of the Continental Congress in 1787, a representative in the Federal Congress from 1790 to 1793, and afterwards elected governor of the State. He died before entering upon the duties of the office.

Greenville is on Tar River and the exports the same as from Tarborough with a greater proportion of Tar—for the lower down the greater number of Tar makers are there—This article is contrary to all ideas one would entertain on the subject, rolled as Tobacco by an axis which goes through both heads—one horse draws two barrels in this manner.

WEDNESDAY, 20TH.

Left Allan's before breakfast, & under a misapprehension went to a Col°. Allan's, supposing it to be public house; where we were very kindly & well entertained without knowing it was at his expence, until it was too late to rectify the mistake.—After breakfasting, & feeding our horses here, we proceeded on & crossing the River Nuse 11 miles further, arrived in Newbern to dinner.

At this ferry which is 10 miles from Newbern, we were met by a small party of Horse; the district Judge (M^r. Sitgreave)[106] and many of the principal Inhabitants of Newbern, who conducted us into town to exceeding good lodgings—It ought to have been mentioned that another small party of horse under one Simpson met us at Greenville, and in spite of every endeavor which could comport with decent civility, to excuse myself from it, they would attend me to Newbern.—Col°. Allan did the same.

This town is situated at the confluence of the Rivers Nuse & Trent, and though low is pleasant. Vessels drawing more than 9 feet water cannot get up loaded.—It stands on a good deal of ground, but the buildings are sparce and altogether of Wood;—some of which are large & look well—The number of Souls are about 2000.—Its exports consist of Corn, Tobacco, Pork,—but principally of Naval Stores & lumber.

[106] John Sitgreaves was resident of Newbern, and had been an officer in the war for Independence. He was a member of the Continental Congress in 1784, of his State Legislature in 1787, and was made United State District Judge.

THURSDAY, 21ST.

Dined with the Citizens at a public dinner given by them; and went to a dancing assembly in the evening—both of which was at what they call the Pallace—formerly the Government House & a good brick building but now hastening to Ruins.[107]—The Company at both was numerouse at the latter there were abt. 70 ladies.

This town by Water is about 70 miles from the Sea—but in a direct line to the entrance of the River not over 35—and to the nearest Seaboard not more than 20, or 25.—Upon the River Nuse, & 80 miles above Newbern, the Convention of the State that adopted the federal Constitution made choice of a spot, or rather district within which to fix their Seat of Government; but it being lower than the back Members (of the Assembly) who hitherto have been most numerous inclined to have it they have found means to obstruct the measure—but since the Cession of their Western territory it is supposed that the matter will be revived to good effect.

FRIDAY, 22D.

Under an Escort of horse, and many of the principal Gentlemen of Newbern I recommenced my journey—dined at a place called Trenton which is the head of the boat navigation [107] This building was erected for Governor Tryon in 1769; and his demand upon the Assembly for twenty-five thousand dollars for the purpose of building a palace "suitable for the residence of the royal governor," was one of the causes of strong popular indignation against the governor. His wife and sister, both beautiful and accomplished women, used every blandishment to induce compliance on the part of the representatives of the people. Mrs. Tryon gave them princely dinners and balls. Human nature then, as now, was weak, and Tryon not only secured the first appropriation of $25,000, but a further sum of $50,000.

A drawing of the building, with a full account of it, may be found in Lossing's Pictorial Field Book of the Revolution, II, 364, second edition.

of the River Trent, wch. is crossed at this place on a bridge—and lodged at one Shrine's 10 m. farther—both indifferent Houses.

SATURDAY, 23D.

Breakfasted at one Everets 12 miles bated at a Mr. Foy's 12 miles farther and lodged at one Sage's 20 miles bey^{d}. it—all indifferent Houses.

SUNDAY, 24TH.

Breakfasted at an indifferent House about 13 miles from Sage's—and three miles further met a party of Light Horse from Wilmington; and after these a Comm^{ee}. & other Gentlemen of the Town; who came out to escort me into it, and at which I arrived under a federal salute at very good lodgings prepared for me, about two o'clock—at these I dined with the Commee. whose company I asked.

The whole Road from Newbern to Wilmington (except in a few places of small extent) passes through the most barren country I ever beheld; especially in the parts nearest the latter; which is no other than a bed of white sand.—In places, however, before we came to these, if the ideas of poverty could be separated from the Sand, the appearances of it are agreeable, resembling a lawn well covered with evergreens, and a good verdure below from a broom or course grass which having sprung since the burning of the Woods had a neat and handsome look especially as there were parts entirely open—and others with ponds of water, which contributed not a little to the beauty of the scene.

Wilmington is situated on the Cape Fear River, about 30 miles by water from its mouth, but much less by land—It has some good houses pretty compactly built.—The whole und^{r}. a hill; which is formed entirely of sand.—The number of Souls in it amount by the enumeration to about 1000, but it is agreed on all hands that the Census in this State has been very inaccurately & Shamefully taken by the Marshall's deputies; who, instead of going to Peoples houses, & there, on the spot, ascertaining the Nos.; have advertised a meeting of them at certain places, by which means those who did not attend (and it seems many purposely avoided doing it, some from an apprehension of its being introductory of a tax, & others from religious scruples) have gone with their families, unnumbered—In other instances, it is said these deputies have taken their information from the Captains of Militia Companies; not only as to the men on their Muster Rolls, but of the Souls, in their respective familes; which at best, must in a variety of cases, be mere conjecture whilst all those who are not on their lists—Widows and their families &c[a]. pass unnoticed.

Wilmington, unfortunately for it, has a Mud bank,—miles below, over which not more than 10 feet water can be brought at common tides, yet it is said vessels of 250 Tons have come up.—The q[ty]. of Shipping, which load here annually, amounts to about 1200 Tons.—The exports consist chiefly of Naval Stores and lumber.—Some Tobacco, Corn, Rice, & flax seed with Porke.—It is at the head of the tide navigation, but inland navigation may be extended 115 miles farther to and above Fayettesville which is from Wilmington 90 miles by land, & 115 by Water as above.—Fayettesville is a thriving place containing near —— Souls—6000 Hhds. of Tobacco, & 3000 Hhds. of Flax Seed have been recd. at it in the course of the year.

Monday, 25th.

Dined with the Citizens of the place at a public dinner given by them—Went to a Ball in the evening at which there were 62 ladies—illuminations, Bonfires, &c.

TUESDAY, 26TH.

Having sent my Carriage across the day before, I left Wilmington about 6 o'clock, accompanied by most of the Gentlemen of the Town, and breakfasting at M^r. Ben. Smith's lodged at one Russ' 25 miles from Wilmington.—An indifferent House.

WEDNESDAY, 27TH.

Breakfasted at Will^m. Gause's a little out of the direct Road 14 miles—crossed the boundary line between No. & South Carolina abt. half after 12 o'clock which is 10 miles from Gause's—* * *

THE DIARY OF GEORGE WASHINGTON,* FROM 1789 TO 1791; EMBRACING THE OPENING OF THE FIRST CONGRESS, AND HIS TOURS THROUGH NEW ENGLAND, LONG ISLAND, AND THE SOUTHERN STATES. TOGETHER WITH HIS JOURNAL OF A TOUR TO THE OHIO, IN 1753. EDITED BY BENSON J. LOSSING, RICHMOND, 1861. PRESS OF THE HISTORICAL SOCIETY.

(Southern Tour.)

WEDNESDAY, MAY 25, 1791.

Set out at 4 o'clock for Camden—(the foundered horse being led slowly on)—breakfasted at an indifferent house 22 miles from the town, (the first we came to) and reached Camden about two o'clock, 14 miles further, when an address was recd. & answered.—Dined (late) with a number of Gentlemen and Ladies at a public dinner.—The Road from Columbia to Camden, excepting a mile or two at each place, goes over the most miserable pine barren I ever saw, being quite a white sand, & very hilly.—On the Wateree within a mile & half of which the town stands the lands are very good,—they Culture Corn, Tobacco & Indigo.—Vessels carrying 50 or 60 Hhds. of Tobo. come up to the Ferry at this place at which there is a Tobacco Wharehouse.

*This part of the Diary relating to Washington's tour through North Carolina, was copied from a volume in the Library of Johns Hopkins University. THE EDITOR.

THURSDAY, 26TH.

After viewing the british works about Camden I set out for Charlotte—on my way—two miles from Town—I examined the ground on wch. Genl. Green & Lord Rawdon had their action.[1]—The ground had but just been taken by the former—was well chosen—but he not well established in it before he was attacked; which by capturing a Videt was, in some measure by surprise—Six miles further on I came to the ground where Genl. Gates & Lord Cornwallis had their Engagement wch. terminated so unfavourably for the former.[2]—As this was a night meeting of both Armies on their march, & altogether unexpected each formed on the ground they met without any advantage in it on either side it being level & open.—Had Genl, Gates been ½ a mile further advanced, an impenetrable Swamp would have prevented the attack which was made on him by the British Army, and afforded him time to have formed his own plans; but having no information of Lord Cornwallis's designs, and perhaps not being apprised of this advantage it was not seized by him.

Camden is a small place with appearances of some new buildings.—It was much injured by the British whilst in their possession.[3]

After halting at one Sutton's 14 m. from Camden I lodged at James Ingrams 12 miles father.

FRIDAY, 27TH.

Left Ingrams about 4 o'clock, and breakfasting at one Barr's 18 miles distant lodged at Majr. Crawford's 8 miles farther—About 2 miles from this place I came to the Corner where the No. Carolina line comes to the Rd.—from whence

[1] On Hobkirk's Hill, April 25, 1781.

[2] On the north side of Sanders's Creek, August 16, 1780. The two generals were approaching each other in the night, along a road filled with deep sand; and neither of them had any knowledge of the fact, until their advanced guards came in contact. The battle occured early in the morning.

[3] Lord Rawdon, the British commander there, alarmed for the safety of his forts in the lower country, set fire to Camden on the 10th of May, 1781, and retreated down the Santee.

the Road is the boundary for 12 miles more.—At Majr. Crawfords I was met by some of the chiefs of the Catawba nation who seemed to be under apprehension that some attempts were making, or would be made to deprive them of the 40,000 Acres wch. was secured to them by Treaty and wch. is bounded by this Road.[1]

SATURDAY, 28TH.

Sett off from Crawfords by 4 o'clock and breakfasting at one Harrison's 18 miles from it got into Charlotte 13 miles further, before 3 o'clock,—dined with Genl. Polk and a small party invited by him, at a Table prepared for the purpose.[2]

It was not, until I had got near Barrs that I had quit the Piney & Sandy lands—nor until I had got to Crawfords before the lands took quite a different complexion—here they began to assume a very rich look.

Charlotte is a trifling place, though the Court of Mecklenburg is held in it—There is a School (called a College) in it at which, at times there has been 50 or 60 boys.[3]

SUNDAY, 29TH.

Left Charlotte about 7 o'clock, dined at Colo. Smiths 15 miles off, and lodged at Majr. Fifers 7 miles farther.

[1] This is yet a reservation for the Catawba Indians, near the southeast corner of Yorkville district in South Carolina. It was originally larger than now. They were once a powerful tribe, but are dwindled to the most insignificant remnant. Their chief village was on the Catawba river, about twenty-five miles from Yorkville. The following eloquent petition of Peter Harris, a Catawba warrior during the Revolution, is preserved among the Colonial records at Columbia, South Carolina. It is dated, 1822:

"I am one of the lingering survivors of an almost extinguished race. Our graves will soon be our only habitations. I am one of the few stalks that still remain in the field where the tempest of the Revolution has passed. I fought against the British for your sake. The British have disappeared, and you are free; yet from me have the British took nothing; nor have I gained anything by their defeat. I pursued the deer for subsistence; the deer are disappearing, and I must starve. God ordained me for the forest, and my ambition is the shade. But the strength of my arm decays, and my feet fail me in the chase. The hand which fought for your liberties is now open for your relief. In my youth I bled in battle, that you might be independent; let not my heart in my old age bleed for the want of your commiseration."

[2] General Thomas Polk, who was Colonel of the militia of Mecklenburg County, North Carolina, at the opening of the war of Independence. It was in Charlotte, and partially under the influence and through the exertions of General Polk, that a convention of delegates, selected by the people of Mecklenburg County, passed resolutions at the close of May, 1775, which virtually declared the people represented free and independent of the British crown.

[3] This was called, previous to the Revolution, Queen's Museum or College. There the republicans of that section of North Carolina met to discuss the exciting questions of the day. It was the Faneuil Hall of Western Carolina.

MONDAY, 30TH.

At 4 o'clock I was out from Majr. Fifers;[1] and in about 10 miles at the line which divides Mecklenburgh from Rowan Counties; I met a party of horse belonging to the latter, who came from Salisbury to escort me on—(It ought to have been mentioned also that upon my entering the State of No. Carolina I was met by a Party of the Mecklenburgh horse—but these being near their homes I dismissed them)—I was also met 5 miles from Salisbury by the Mayor of, the Corporation, Judge Mc.Koy, & many others;—Mr. Steel, Representative for the district,[2] was so polite as to come all the way to Charlotte to meet me.—We arrived at Salisbury about 8 o'clock, to breakfast,—20 miles from Captn. Fifers.—The lands between Charlotte & Salisbury are very fine, of a reddish cast and well timbered, with but very little underwood—Between these two places are the first meadows I have seen on the Road since I left Virga. & here also we appear to be getting into a Wheat Country.

This day I foundered another of my horses.

Dined at a public dinner givn. by the Citizens of Salisbury; & in the afternoon drank Tea at the same place with about 20 ladies, who had been assembled for the occasion.

Salisbury is but a small place altho' it is the County town, and the district Court is held in it;—nor does it appear to be much on the increase,—there is about three hundred souls in it and tradesmen of different kinds.

---

[1] Son of John Phifer, one of the leading patriots of Mecklenburg County, who died early in the Revolution. His remains were buried at the Red Hills, three miles west of Concord, in Cabarrus County, North Carolina. I saw over his grave in 1848, a rough mutilated memorial slab, upon which, tradition averred, a fire was built by British soldiers, when on their march from Charlotte to Salisbury, in contempt for the patriot's memory. He was one of the signers of the Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence.

[2] General John Steele, who was a representative in Congress for four years. He was a native of Salisbury, and first appeared in public life as a member of the North Carolina House of Commons, in 1787. He was appointed by President Washington, controller of the United States Treasury, and was continued in office by President Adams. He died in 1815.

TUESDAY, 31ST.

Left Salisbury about 4 o'clock; at 5 miles crossed the Yadkin,[1] the principal stream of the Pedee, and breakfasted on the No. Bank (while my Carriages & horses were crossing) at a Mr. Youngs' fed my horses 10 miles farther, at one Reeds—and about 3 o'clock (after another halt) arrived at Salem, one of the Moravian towns 20 miles farther—In all 35 from Salisbury.

The Road between Salisbury & Salem passes over very little good land, and much that is different; being a good deal mixed with Pine, but not sand.

Salem is a small but neat village; & like all the rest of the Moravian settlements, is governed by an excellent police—having within itself all kinds of artizans—The number of Souls does not exceed 200.[2]

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 1ST.

Having received information that Governor Martin was on his way to meet me; and would be at Salem this evening, I resolved to await his arrival at this place instead of halting a day at Guilford as I had intended;

Spent the forenoon in visiting the Shops of the different Tradesmen—The houses of accommodation for the single men & Sisters of the Fraternity—& their place of worship.—

[1]At the Trading Ford, probably, where Greene with Morgan and his light troops crossed, with Cornwallis in pursuit. There is now a great bridge over the Yadkin, on the Salisbury road, about a mile and a half above the Trading Ford.

[2]There is still a very flourishing settlement of Moravians, or United Brethren, at Salem, where the church was first planted in 1766. The log-house in which the first Moravian settlers were at first lodged, was yet standing in 1857.

Washington's visit as recorded in his Diary, is duly noted in the records of the Moravian Society at Salem, and copies of the addresses delivered on that occasion are preserved.

The following is the address of the Moravians to the President:—

To the President of the United States.

THE HUMBLE ADDRESS OF THE UNITED BRETHREN IN WACHOVIA.

Happy in sharing the Honour of a Visit from the Illustrious President of the Union to the Southern States, the United Brethren in Wachovia humbly beg Leave, upon this joyfull Occasion to express their highest Esteem Duty and Affection for the great Patriot of this Country.

Deeply impressed as we are with Gratitude to the great Author of our Being for his unbounded Mercies, we can not but particularly acknowledge his gracious Providence

Invited six of their principal people to dine with me—and in the evening went to hear them sing,—perform on a variety of instruments Church music.

In the Afternoon Governor Martin as was expected (with his Secretary) arrived.[1] over the temporal and political Prosperity of the Country, in the Peace whereof we do find Peace, and wherein none can take a warmer Interest than ourselves, in particular when we consider that the same Lord who preserved Your precious Person in so many imminent Dangers, has made You in a conspicuous Manner an Instrument in His Hands to forward that happy Constitution,—together with those Improvements, whereby our United States begin to flourish, over which You preside with the Applause of a thankfull Nation.

---

Whenever therefore we sollicit the Protection of the Father of all Mercies over this favoured Country, we can not but fervently implore His Kindness for Your Preservation which is so intimately connected therewith.

May this gracious Lord vouchsafe to prolong Your valuable Life as a further Blessing and an Ornament of the Constitution, that by Your worthy Example the Regard for Religion be encreased, and the Improvements of Civil Society encouraged.

The Settlements of the United Brethren though small, will always make it their Study to contribute as much as in them layeth, to the Peace and Improvement of the United States and all the particular Parts they live in, joining their ardent prayers to the best Wishes of this whole Continent, that Your Personal as well as Domestic Happiness may abound, and a Series of Success may crown Your Labours, for the Prosperity of our Times, and an Example to future Ages, untill the glorious Reward of a faithfull Servant shall be Your Portion.

signed in Behalf of the United Brethren in Wachovia by FREDERICK WILLIAM MARSHALL,
JOHN DANIEL KOEHLER,
CHRISTIAN LEWIS BENZIEN.

Salem the first of June 1791.

To the United Brethren of Wachovia,

GENTLEMEN,

I am greatly indebted to your respectful and affectionate expressions of personal regard, and I am not less obliged by the patriotic sentiments contained in your address.

From a Society, whose governing principles are industry and the love of order, much may be expected towards the improvement and prosperity of the country, in which their Settlements are formed—and experience authorises the belief that much will be obtained.

Thanking you with grateful sincerity for your prayers in my behalf, I desire to assure you of my best wishes for your social and individual happiness.

GO WASHINGTON.

[1] This entry closes this volume of the Diary. The President reached Mount Vernon on the 12th of June, having made a most satisfactory journey of more than seventeen hundred miles, from his seat on the Potomac, in sixty-six days, with the same team of horses. "My return to this place is sooner than I expected," he wrote to Hamilton, "owing to the uninterruptedness of my journey by sickness, from bad weather, or accidents of any kind whatsoever," for which he had made an allowance of eight days.

A PARTISAN LEADER IN 1776

By REBECCA CAMERON.

Colonel William Shepperd, of Long Meadows, near Hillsboro, North Carolina, was an officer of the North Carolina line during the War of the Revolution of 1776, and a terror to the Tories in the middle part of the State.

Many are the stories of his prowess still kept alive in the farm houses of Orange, those treasuries of local tradition, but this one was told me by his grand-nephew, Dr. William Strudwick, and therefore may be received as authentic.

No man is search of a hero would have given Colonel Shepperd a second thought. He was a very short, sparebuilt man, of plain, insignificant appearance, blind in one eye, with a thin, high, piping voice, long, lank, black hair that he generally kept out of his way by tying a red bandanna handkerchief around his head.

A democrat of intensest degree, he affected the roughest costume; and in an age when gentlemen wore nothing but "purple and fine linen" he clothed himself in homespun woven on his own plantation and shoes made by his own negroes.

Yet that spare frame was knit together with joints and muscles like bands of fine tempered steel; and from that solitary dark eye looked forth a spirit so intrepid that no danger could appal it; no adverse fortune dismay or subdue; and that thin, high voice had the irresistible ringing command of a born master of men in its piping tones. He had organized a partisan force of Minute Men some four or five hundred strong; men who dwelt peaceably enough at home, until a runner notified them that Shepperd had work for them to do, when at the appointed place of rendezvous would gather a band of rough and resolute men, ready to execute any plan, however daring and hazardous, of their idolized chief.

An English officer, Colonel Patton, was then raiding through Orange and the adjoining counties, carrying terror and devastation with him. Born a gentleman, educated as a soldier, and a man of superb physical development, he mocked at fear; and, utterly devoid of conscience, staunch in his loyalty to the King, and with an utter scorn of the American rebels, he showed no quarter; rapine, violence, and murder marked every step of his onward progress and none were able to stay his course.

Colonel Shepperd and his troopers, returning home after the disastrous battle of Briar Creek (March 3, 1779), found Patton devastating the country, and riding roughshod over the people. Plan after plan to capture him was devised, but Patton, who was as capable and wary as a soldier as he was brutal as a man, slipped through Shepperd's toils again and again, and laughed him to scorn. Finally Colonel Shepperd was ordered on some expedition that withdrew his forces from the neighborhood, and Patton getting wind of it, came down into the lion's den, quartered at Long Meadows for the night and a day, and, although treating Mrs. Shepperd with extreme courtesy (for while absolutely without humanity to women as women, he never failed to treat a lady of his own social rank with the most finished courtesy of manner) he appropriated the Colonel's stock, provender and plantation supplies like the freebooter that he was.

Colonel Shepperd, returning one night to visit his wife, to whom he was passionately devoted, discovered that Patton was in the neighborhood, and laid a plan to capture him. Summoning his immediate bodyguard of trusty, picked men, he stationed thirteen of them in an old deserted schoolhouse to lie in wait while he and the others reconnoitred. Returning to the schoolhouse what was his anger and astonishment to find it empty and a card tacked up by Colonel Patton to tell the reason why.

Patton had also been out scouting, and came to the schoolhouse, where a pack of cards and jug of whiskey were helping the ambuscaders to forget their duty.

All the muskets were piled near the door, and their owners, sitting crosslegged on the floor, were deep in the mysteries of a game, while the sentry lifted the jug to his head a time or so too often.

Stepping lightly to the open door, Colonel Patton seized one of their own muskets and leveling it at the absorbed group of card players cried out: "Surrender to Colonel Patton of His Majesty's forces, or I will shoot every man of you."

Half drunk, wholly surprised, and with the instinctive obedience of the common soldier to the born commander, they at once surrendered.

Still holding his musket at point blank range, Patton made one of the men advance and hand him the muskets, one by one, butts foremost, and then he was required to tie his comrades, each man with his own halter-rein; the horses in turn were secured to their masters, and thus yoked together man and beast, the crestfallen thirteen men marched ahead of their solitary captor to the British camp.

A fiery, passionate man, Shepperd's rage and mortification knew no bounds. His desire to capture Patton became a perfect frenzy and he bent every energy to its accomplishment. If a man will, he generally can, and Shepperd's hour came at last.

Not very long after the disgraceful capture of Shepperd's men there was to be a sale in the neighborhood. People had submitted if they were not subdued, and Patton rode or walked through the land a veritable Lord Paramount, and none dared resist or gainsay. He was going to attend the sale, not as a bidder nor a buyer, but to take, vi et armis, whatever he saw fit.

Colonel Shepperd had either heard or suspected that Patton would be at the sale, so he stationed some of his men above and below the point of attack he had selected, and early on the morning of the day, dressed like a common farmer as he always was, and with a loose halter over his arm, he mounted his horse and took a bridle path through the woods that would bring him out on the road that Patton must travel to reach the sale. A house occupied by a farmer named Smith was on the left of the road above Shepperd's lower ambuscade. After a while, down the road came Patton, riding a superb black mare; dressed in full British uniform and presenting a very brilliant and splendid appearance. He was tall, large, and superbly handsome; and in courage and high soldierly qualities fully Shepperd's equal.

As he rode gallantly on in all the pride of conscious beauty and power, out of a bridle-path to his right rode a small, badly dressed, ill favored man, who, saluting him awkwardly as he rode alongside, said: "I bought some colts not long ago from a man named Smith who lives somewhere hereabouts, and they have strayed away, and I reckon they have gone back to their old home, so I am looking for them. Can you tell me where Smith lives?"

"Oh, yes," said Patton, carelessly raising his right arm and pointing across the road, "he lives across the road in that house yonder."

He had turned his face in the direction indicated as he spoke, and in that instant a pair of wiry arms were clasped 'round him like a vise, and a small piping voice cried out: "Colonel Patton, you are my prisoner, sir."

Patton was a stammerer in his speech, and he stuttered out angrily: "It's a damned lie sir; I am no man's prisoner," struggling desperately to release himself as he spoke. He had not reckoned on the immense strength hidden away in the small body of his captor, and his efforts were unavailing. Drawing his sword with his left hand he essayed to cut himself loose, but Shepperd was so small and so close to him that the slashes did not touch him.

Patton shortened his sword and stabbed mercilessly at the arm around him until it was gashed and stabbed in a dozen placed, but the resolute little Colonel never loosened his hold nor flinched.

This, though long in the telling, occupied only a moment of time, and the horses, feeling loose bridles on their necks, broke and ran, as country horses generally do, and landed both riders in the road.

Patton, being the heavier, fell underneath, and when Shepperd's troopers, attracted by the riderless horses passing them, for everybody knew Patton's black mare, a superb English thoroughbred, came hurrying up, they found the stubborn little Colonel holding his prostrate foe in an embrace that seemed like riveted bands of steel.

The arrival of reinforcements made the contest hopeless for Patton, who had been badly hurt by his heavy fall, and he said: "I surrender, and claim the usages of war as an officer and a gentleman." Shepperd at once unloosed his clasp, and when Patton was helped to his feet he held out his sword, saying: "To whom do I surrender?" "To Colonel William Shepherd, sir," answered the Colonel, with a ring of triumph in his voice.

"Colonel Shepperd!" exclaimed Patton, in the utmost surprise and chagrin, as he looked at the small, insignificant speaker.

"Yes, sir; Colonel William Shepperd, of the North Carolina line, who has promised to hang Colonel Patton whenever he caught him," said Shepperd, drawing from his pocket a pair of handcuffs that he had carried for months for the purpose of braceleting Patton if ever captured. With a spring like a tiger Patton shook himself free from the troopers who surrounded him, and catching up the limb of a fallen tree, he put his back against a large oak and exclaimed: "Colonel Shepperd, you shall never subject me to the disgrace of handcuffs; I will die first. I claim the usages of war, to be treated like an officer and a gentleman. I will never submit to be handcuffed."

"You have forfeited all the consideration due a soldier, sir. You are a robber and a murderer," said Shepperd bitterly.

"I wear the uniform of a British officer, sir, and I demand to be treated like an officer of His Majesty's army. I give you my word of honor to make no effort to escape. I will go alone with you or with any one else to headquarters. I will consider myself your prisoner and deport myself accordingly, without constraint, but I will not submit to personal indignity and no man shall handcuff me alive."

Shepperd was no fool. He saw plainly enough that Patton would make a desperate resistance in which he would have to be killed outright or else so badly hurt that traveling would be impossible, so he abandoned the idea of handcuffs and accepting Patton's parole both men mounted their horses that had been caught and brought back to them by Shepperd's men, and set off alone for Gates' headquarters, near Asheville, riding, eating, and sleeping together like brothers until they reached the American camp, where Shepperd turned his prisoner over to the authorities, and he was tried by drumhead court-martial, condemned and executed.

Colonel Shepperd died in Hillsboro in a house now used as a part of Mr. Nathan Brown's store on Churton street.

ROWAN COUNTY WILLS

Contributed by Mrs. M. G. McCUBBINS.

Samuel Hall (Book E, page 127), February 20, 1793. Wife: Elizabeth. Sons: George and Abraham. Ex.: Sons, George and Abraham. Test: Isaac Eaton, Jese(?) Willcockson, and John Alexander.

Samuel Luckie (Book E, page 132), May 31, 1797. Wife: Anne. Sons: Samuel (the youngest) and Robert. Granddaughter: Peggy. Ex.: Sons, Samuel and Robert. Test: John Hall, William Luckie, Jr., and Robert Luckie.

Thomas Lyall (Book E, page 133), February 19, 1781. Wife: Mary. "Children." Daughter: Margaret (land on south fork of Yadkin River) and Elizabeth (the home place). Ex.: Wife, Mary, Samuel Young and Thomas McKay. A codicil speaks of step-daughter Susannah Cowan. Test.: Jas. Brandon, Jas. Graham, and William Mackey.

John Lowasser (Book E, page 135), April 24, 1794. Wife: Elizabeth. Children. Daughter: Catharine. Ex.: Wife, Elizabeth and friend, Jacob Fisher. Test.: Philip Lamly, Conrad Beicher, and Conrad Franck.

Samuel Luckey (Book E, page 136), January 4, 1801. Son: John (land west of Hunting Creek). Daughters: Eleanor McQuire, Ann Luckey, and Mary Luckey. Granddaughter: Anne Ronshaw. Ex.: Son, Samuel and son-in-law, James McGuire. Test.: John Evans, Thomas Beavoe(?), and Samuel McNeely.

Jacob Link (Book E, page 137), December 18, 1800. Wife: Nancy. Children. Ex.: Thomas Pinkston and William Link. Test: George Robison, Christopher Figenbinder, and James Ghon.

Elijah Lyon (Book E, page 138), December 7, 1800.

Wife: Nancy. Sons: Nathan, Richard, and Elijah. Daughters: Rebecca Dickey, Esther Roas Bosidos, Mary, Nooly Bosidos, and Elizabeth. (There may be other children.) Ex.: Wife, Mary, and son Richard. Test: John Evan, Jr., and David Maxwell.

Daniel Lewis (Book E, page 141), March 19, 1801. Wife: Hannah (the homeplace). Daughters: Sarah Hendricks Cunningham and Hannah. Son: Daniel (to get homeplace after his mother's death). Ex.: Wife, Hannah, and son, Daniel. Test: Elijah Renshaw, Jr., and John Fox.

Peter Lewis, yeoman (Book E, page 143), September 20, 1803. Daughters: Jane, Wallis, and Elleanor Wally. Sons: James, Simon, and Peter. Others mentioned: Charles Smith and William Bird. Ex.: Son, Peter. Test: John Culberston and Elijah Martin.

John Luckbee (Book E, page 142), no date. Wife: Barbara. Son: George. Children. Others mentioned: Daniel Lents. Ex.: John Cope and David Luckbee. Test: John Philip.

Henry Leonard (Book E, page 145), October 12, 1803. Wife: Elizabeth. Sons: Charles and Jacob. "Daughters" (not named). Children. Ex.: Friends, Jacob Houltshouser and John Linn. Witnesses: T. Ross(?) and Peter Lyalle.

LAST WILL AND TESTAMENT OF WILLIAM LEE DAVIDSON.

In the name of God amen, I William Lee Davidson, of the state of North Carolina and county of Rowan being in health of body and of perfect mind and memory thanks be given to God, calling to mind the mortality of my Body and knowing that it is appointed for all men once to die do make and ordain this my Last Will & Testament, that is to say principally and first of all I give and recommend my soul into the hands of almighty God that give it, and my Body I recommend to the earth to be buried in a decent and Christian manner at the discretion of my executors; Nothing doubting but at the general resurrection I shall receive the same again, by the mighty power of God, and as touching such Worldly Estate wherewith it has pleased God to bless me in this, I give, demise and dispose of the same in the following manner & form Imprimis, It is my will & I do order that in the first place, all my just Debts & funeral Charges be paid & Satisfyed.."..".."

Item, I do give & Bequeath unto my well beloved Wife, Mary Davidson one—blooded Sorrel Mare together with a Saddle & Bridle besides her thirds and likewise the use of the plantation on which I now live untill my son George comes of age, for which she is to take proper care of the children and gave them proper Learning or as much Learning as she thinks is necessary she is also to have the Discretionary use of the pay arising from my services in the army during her Widowhood for the use of the family.....

Item I do give and bequeath unto my beloved sons George Davidson, John Alexander Davidson & Ephriam Brevard Davidson the Tract of land I now live on, my three Lots in the Town of Charlotte in Mecklenburg—County N°. Carolina together with all the lands that may be confirmed to me or my officers as a reward for my services to the United States of America to be divided into three proportions of as equal value as posible by my Executors and each of my sons above mentioned to have one share which the Executors are to determine to them severally according as their Circomstances may make it prudent or fit at the time of the Division which is left to the discretion of my Executors.....

My Negroes all the remainder of my land goods Chattels &C. (except a tract of land Containing four Hundred Acres lieing on rich land Mountain in Burk County and a tract of land entered by James Davidson in my behalf at the old Camping ground on a fork of Broad River in Burk County to be Divided into four equal parts one of which is to be given at the Discretion of my Executors to my three sons above mentioned.....

Item I do give & Bequeath unto my well Beloved Daughters Jean Davidson, Namela Davidson and Marjeret Davidson and the child with which my wife is now pregnant the remaining part of my Estate, including the two tracts above to be Equally Divided amongst them, should the last be a Daughter, But if a Son he is to have the land mentioned on Richland Mountain & Broad River and the Remainder to be equally Distributed by my Executors to my three Daughters mentioned.....

I do constitute and appoint John Brevard, Esq^{r} John Dickey & William Sharp, Esq^{r} to be my whole executors of this my last Will & Testament and do hereby utterly revoke & Disanull all & every other former Testaments, Wills, Legacies & Executors by me in any wise before named Willed or Bequeathed, Ratifying and Confirming this and no other to be my last Will and Testament in Witness Whereof I have hereunto set my hand & Seal this seaventeenth of Day of Decem^{r} in the year of our Lord one thousand seven Hundred and Eighty.....

Wm L. Davidson (Seal)

Signed, Sealed, Published, pronounced and Declared by the said Will^{m} Davidson as his last Will and Testament in the presence of us, who in his pres*ents* and in the presents of each other have hereunto subscribed our names.

Robert Wilson.
Jas. Crawford.
David Shelton.

BIOGRAPHICAL AND GENEALOGICAL SKETCH

By Mrs. E. E. MOFFITT.

Robert Ney McNeely, the author of the sketch of "Union County" in this issue of the Booklet, was born on a farm near Waxhaw, North Carolina, November 12, 1883. He is the son of Robert and Henrietta (Belk) McNeely, names closely linked with this section of the State, and numbered among the best and most respected of the old families of the Waxhaws.

Mr. McNeely was named by his father after Marshal Ney of France. His father was led to believe, as many others were, that the French Marshal and the "Ney" who taught school in North Carolina were one and the same man. Except that some of the pupils of the North Carolina teacher lived in this county and firmly believed that their teacher was the French Marshal there is no other proof than what has already been written that the North Carolina teacher was a Marshal of France. Mr. McNeely was prepared for college at the College Hill and the Waxhaw schools, taught school a couple of years and then entered the University of North Carolina, where he graduated with the degree of LL.B. At the University he won the Bryan Sheppard prize of $25 in gold, for the best thesis on a legal subject. He studied law under Judge James C. MacRae, admitted to the bar at Monroe in 1907 and has practiced here ever since. He was elected to the State Legislature in 1909, and was at one time called to the chair by the Speaker and asked to preside over the House for a while. Fond of the law and devoted to the profession, he has met with encouraging and growing success. It is quite apparent after reading the sketch of Union County that Mr. McNeely is well read in American history and an unquestioned authority upon the local history and traditions of Western North Carolina. From the energy and force thus far displayed by him his fellow citizens have reason to look forward with growing interest to further and greater development.

A biographical and genealogical sketch of Mr. Marshall DeLancey Haywood, who writes of the "Masonic Revolutionary Patriots in North Carolina" in this number of the BOOKLET, appeared in Vol. VIII, 1.

Vol. XII OCTOBER, 1912 No. 2

The North Carolina Booklet

GREAT EVENTS
IN NORTH CAROLNA
HISTORY

PUBLISHED QUARTERLY
BY
THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY
DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION
RALEIGH, N. C.

CONTENTS

	Page
Elizabeth Maxwell Steel: Patriot By Archibald Henderson	68
Palmyra in the Happy Valley By Mrs. Lindsay Patterson	104
The Forest By R. F. Jarrett	135
The Forests of North Carolina By Collier Cobb	136
Marriage Bonds of Rowan County By Mrs. M. G. McCubbins	158
Biographical and Genealogical Memoranda By Mrs. E. E. Moffitt	162

SINGLE NUMBERS 35 CENTS $1.00 THE YEAR

Entered at the Postoffice at Raleigh, N. C., July 15, 1905, under the act of Congress of March 3, 1879.

The North Carolina Booklet

Great Events in North Carolina History

Volume XII of THE BOOKLET will be issued quarterly by the North Carolina Society, Daughters of the Revolution, beginning July, 1912. THE BOOKLET will be published in July, October, January, and April. Price $1.00 per year, 35 cents for single copy.

EDITOR:
MISS MARY HILLIARD HINTON.

VOLUME XII

History of Union County, Including the Waxhaw Settlement.
Mr. Ney McNeely

The Forest (Poem).....Mr. R. F. Jarrett

Masonic Revolutionary Patriots in North Carolina.
Mr. Marshall DeLancey Haywood

Our Forests—What They Have Done, Are Doing, and May Do for North Carolina.....Dr. Collier Cobb

Some Notable Senatorial Campaigns in North Carolina.
Judge Robert W. Winston

Historic Homes, Part VI: Palmyra in the Happy Valley.
Mrs. Lindsay Patterson

Elizabeth Maxwell Steele: the Famous Revolutionary Patriot.
Dr. Archibald Henderson

Reprint of Washington's Diary, written in North Carolina.

The Confederacy (Poem).....Mr. R. F. Jarrett

History of the Whig Party in North Carolina.

North Carolina's Social Life, Ante-bellum.....Major E. J. Hale

How "Carolina" Came to be Written.....Mr. Jaques Busbee

Old letters, heretofore unpublished, bearing on the Social Life of the different periods of North Carolina's History, will appear hereafter in THE BOOKLET.

This list of subjects may be changed, as circumstances sometimes prevent the writers from keeping their engagements.

The histories of the separate counties will in the future be a special feature of THE BOOKLET. When necessary, an entire issue will be devoted to a paper on one county.

THE BOOKLET will print abstracts of wills prior to 1800, as sources of biography, history and genealogy. Mrs. M. G. McCubbins will contribute abstracts of wills and marriage bonds in Rowan County to the coming volume. Hon. F. D. Winston will furnish similar data from Bertie County.

Mrs. E. E. Moffitt has consented to edit the Biographical Sketches hereafter.

Parties who wish to renew their subscriptions to THE BOOKLET for Vol. XII are requested to give notice at once.

Many numbers of Volumes I to XI for sale.

Mrs. Steel presenting two bags of specie to General Greene.
(From painting by Alonzo Chappel.)

Vol. XII OCTOBER, 1912 No. 2

The North Carolina Booklet

"Carolina! Carolina! Heaven's blessings attend her!
While we live we will cherish, protect and defend her."

Published by

THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY
DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION

The object of THE BOOKLET is to aid in developing and preserving North Carolina History. The proceeds arising from its publication will be devoted to patriotic purposes. EDITOR.

ADVISORY BOARD OF THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET

Mrs. Hubert Haywood.
Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.
Mr. R. D. W Connor.
Dr. D. H. Hill.
Dr. E. W. Sikes.
Mr. W. J. Peele.
Miss Adelaide L. Fries.
Miss Martha Helen Haywood.
Dr. Richard Dillard.
Dr. Kemp P. Battle.
Mr. James Sprunt.
Mr. Marshall DeLancey Haywood.
Chief Justice Walter Clark.
Major W. A. Graham.
Dr. Charles Lee Smith.

EDITOR:
Miss Mary Hilliard Hinton.

OFFICERS OF THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION 1912-1914

REGENT:
Miss MARY HILLIARD HINTON.

VICE-REGENT:
Miss DUNCAN CAMERON WINSTON.

HONORARY REGENT:
Mrs. E. E. MOFFITT.

RECORDING SECRETARY:
Mrs. CLARENCE JOHNSON.

CORRESPONDING SECRETARY:
Mrs. PAUL H. LEE.

TREASURER:
Mrs. FRANK SHERWOOD.

REGISTRAR:
Miss SARAH W. ASHE.

CUSTODIAN OF RELICS:
Mrs. JOHN E. RAY.

CHAPTER REGENTS

Bloomsbury Chapter.....Mrs. Hubert Haywood, Regent.
Penelope Barker Chapter.....Mrs. Patrick Matthew, Regent.
Sir Walter Raleigh Chapter,
Miss Catherine F. Seyton Albertson, Regent.
DeGraffenried Chapter.....Mrs. Charles Slover Hollister, Regent.

Founder of the North Carolina Society and Regent 1896-1902:
Mrs. SPIER WHITAKER.†

Regent 1902:
Mrs. D. H. HILL, Sr.*

Regent 1902-1906:
Mrs. THOMAS K. BRUNER.

Regent 1906-1910:
Mrs. E. E. MOFFITT.

*Died December 12, 1904.
†Died November 25, 1911.

THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET

Vol. XII OCTOBER, 1912 No. 2

ELIZABETH MAXWELL STEEL: PATRIOT

By ARCHIBALD HENDERSON.

I.

Commanding the approach to the majestic State Capitol building at Columbia, S. C., has but recently been erected a noble specimen of the sculptor's art. In a chair of state, suggestive of Imperial Roman grandeur, is seated a matron as noble in appearance, as stately in bearing, as the most celebrated matron of classic Roman history. Pressing forward to fling their floral offerings at her feet are two lovely cherubs; and Fame, supremely proud in the glad fulfillment of her vocation, is about to crown the matron, all unconscious of the sublime decoration, with a wreath of laurel. In the expression upon the face of the matron, whose striking head in its facial features represents a composite of Southern traits, are mingled pride—for the heroism of the South; contemplation—in recollection of the trials of her people; and ineffable sadness—for the spent lives and frustrated hopes of a gallant army whelmed under the might of numbers. From the pediment of that monument speak out these chiseled words:

When reverses followed victories, when want displaced plenty, when mourning for the flower of Southern manhood darkened countless homes, when government tottered and chaos threatened, the women were steadfast and unafraid. They were unchanged in their devotion, unshaken in their patriotism, unwearied in ministrations, uncomplaining in sacrifices, splendid in fortitude; they strove while they wept.*

*The inscription, a portion of which is quoted here, was written by Wm. E. Gonzales.

The inspiration to celebrate the loyalty, patriotism, and self-sacrifice of the women of the South in the War between the States, has filled today the heart of the New South. Along with this quickened inspiration, which has touched the spirit of the younger generation, goes the impulse to celebrate the patriotic women of an earlier day, the fostering mothers of the infancy of the Republic. The numerous patriotic societies, now devoting their zealous efforts towards memorializing the heroism of Revolutionary and Colonial days, have caught the true spirit of Froude, who said that "history is a voice forever sounding across the centuries the laws of right and wrong." Not all of history is writ in the blood of "war and war's alarms." The courage and endurance of the gentler sex, their unselfish devotion to their country, the uplifting moral force of their fidelity to principle and loyalty to a cause, the high example of their generosity in lavish expenditure of optimism and ready contribution of personal earnings, inspiring the soldiery to renewed efforts of energy and sturdier martial exploits—these were contributions of incalculable moment in firing and keeping alight the flame of Revolutionary patriotism. Such influences—of hope, inspiration, faith, generosity—as well as the victories of shot and shell, of musket and cutlass, now at last are beginning to win the outspoken and tangible gratitude of a loyal people.

II.

It is the comment of the stranger within North Carolina's borders, even of the New Englander, that nowhere is local history so completely bone and sinew of the historical curriculum of the child's education as in North Carolina. Not even in New England, that paradise of the historian, the antiquarian, and of the average citizen informed with minute knowledge of and active pride in his section's past, is the accent in the historical education of the child so thrown upon the local contribution, as in this State. With good reason may the patriotic societies insist that, hereafter, the local contributions of the patriotic women in the Revolutionary period assume their just value in the perspective of our history.

No American colony, one ventures to say, surpassed North Carolina in the number and variety of instrumentalities by which women aided the American patriots and fostered the spirit of opposition to the unjust legislation of a misguided Parliament and the fatuous blindness of a recalcitrant King. For bravery and endurance, North Carolina can point to Betsy Dowdy and her famous ride; for the display of physical courage in opposing the enemies of her country, to Rachel Caldwell; for unshaken moral courage, and for wit, as exasperating as it was ready, to Mary Slocumb and Mrs. Ashe; for supreme patriotism—the one in offering a husband and seven sons to her country's service, the other in giving "eight sons to the rebel army,"—to Mrs. Wilson and Mrs. Brevard; for generosity instinct with self-sacrifice, to Elizabeth Maxwell Steel. This is but a first division in the long roll of honor.

For feminine naïvete and charm, as well as for loyalty of a delightfully unexpected variety, the action of the ladies of Mecklenburg and Rowan is unparalleled—the voluntarily uniting in an association "not to receive the addresses of any young gentlemen—(except the brave volunteers who served in the expedition to South Carolina, and assisted in subduing the Scovilite insurgents), the ladies being of opinion that such persons as stay loitering at home, when the important calls of their country demand their military services abroad, must certainly be destitute of that nobleness of sentiment, that brave, manly spirit, which would qualify them to be the defenders and guardians of the fair sex."* Is it any wonder that the Committee of Safety of Rowan County, in response to the request of the ladies for approbation of their resolutions, forthwith resolved with mingled mirth and pride, "that this committee present their cordial thanks to the said young ladies for so spirited a performance; look upon the resolutions to be sensible and polite; that they merit the honor, and are worthy the imitation of every young lady in America."* Equally inspired by patriotic sentiment, and, furthermore, peculiarly noteworthy for their practical defiance of British injustice, were the resolutions of the famous and internationally historic Edenton Tea Party, inspired by the action of the Provincial deputies of North Carolina, "not to drink any more tea, nor wear any more British cloth, etc." The ladies declare that they can not be indifferent on any occasion that appears nearly to affect the peace and happiness of their country; pronounce their action a "duty which we owe, not only to our near and dear connections, who have concurred in them, but to ourselves, who are essentially interested in their welfare"; and proceed to give to America this "memorable proof of their patriotism."†

*South Carolina and American General Gazette, February 9, 1776.

III.

On October 11, 1911, was unveiled at Salisbury, N. C., by the Daughters of the American Revolution, a bronze memorial tablet to Elizabeth Maxwell Steel, doubtless the most famous, nationally, of all North Carolina's patriotic women of the Revolution. The tablet, one and one-half by two feet in size, bears the following inscription:

*Records, Salisbury, N. C., May 8, 1776.
†Morning Chronicle and London Advertiser, January 16, 1775.

Tablet at Salisbury, N. C., set up on the site of Elizabeth Maxwell Steel's Tavern.

D. A. R.
THIS TABLET
IS ERECTED TO THE MEMORY OF ELIZABETH MAXWELL STEELE PATRIOT
BY THE
ELIZABETH MAXWELL STEELE CHAPTER
DAUGHTERS OF THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION
1781-1911

The tablet was erected upon the very spot which witnessed the patriotic action of this fine and generous spirit—being set into the granite column, at the Smith Drug Company's shop, facing on Main Street and situated near the corner of Main and Council streets.* After prayer by the Rev. Byron Clark of the First Presbyterian Church of Salisbury, Mrs. J. P. Moore, Regent of the local chapter, to whose efforts the event was in such large measure due, spoke as follows:

"Friends having placed this tablet to mark an historic spot and to commemorate the deed of the illustrious Revolutionary patriot, Elizabeth Maxwell Steele, we come with reverence to finish that which we have begun. We hope by our example and precept to uplift the youth of our State to perpetuate our history and to promote patriotism. We, therefore, in the name of the Elizabeth Maxwell Steele Chapter, Daughters of the American Revolution, unveil this marker for the love of the Old North State and our country."

Mrs. William N. Reynolds, of Winston-Salem, State Regent, then spoke the following dedicatory words:

"It is our very great pleasure and privilege to gather together to do honor to one who so nobly served her day and generation that she was an honor to the land she loved so well. In the words of Holy Writ, she 'stretched forth her hands to the poor and needy, and in her tongue was the law of kindness.' And because of that, she, being dead, yet speaketh, and her works do follow her.

"It is with tender pride that the Daughters of the American Revolution come to crown with immortelles that gracious daughter of Rowan, who, in the darkest hour of her country's need, gave of her abundance and sent the soldier hero on his way, cheered and strengthened, to fight his country's battles. Those battles were won, not by might, not by power, but by the blessing of Almighty God; and thirteen weak, struggling colonies became one of the great nations of the earth.

*The tablet, hid from view by a large United States flag, was unveiled by Misses Mary Henderson and Janet Quinn, of Salisbury, and wreathed by Miss Elizabeth Steele Clary, of Greensboro, and Master Richard Henderson, Jr., of Salisbury. The orator of the occasion, whose address was published in full in the Salisbury Evening Post, October 12, 1911, was the Hon. Theo. F. Kluttz, of Salisbury. Benediction was pronounced by Dr. J. F. Mallett, rector of St. Luke's Episcopal Church.

"Great with granaries that feed the world; great with a material prosperity that seemingly has no limit; great with a growth so stupendous that no man may foresee the end. All are hers. And yet, the true, the only real greatness, that of a nation whose God is the Lord, must be made and kept by the womanhood of that nation. It was given us by women like Elizabeth Maxwell Steele. It must be kept a sacred trust by those of us who today hold in our hands that priceless inheritance. It is our great and high mission as Daughters of the American Revolution to pass it on, great and glorious and untainted, to those who shall come after, and we are helping to do this when we honor the memory of one of whom it may be said—as it was of one of England's greatest queens—'Those about her from her shall learn the perfect ways of honor.'"

"We do well to honor her memory," said the orator on that occasion, Hon. Theo. F. Kluttz, "and to keep alive the remembrance of her womanly contribution to the cause of liberty and independence." That she may live in historic memory, and that the details and message of her life may not be lost to posterity, the present writer has undertaken this historical monograph. The recent discovery, in Carlisle, Pennsylvania, of a number of autograph letters of Mrs. Steel, written to her brother in-law, Ephraim Steel, during the Revolutionary period, appreciably adds, to this impression of her life and character, the thrill and vitality of contemporaneous human interest.

IV.

In the second quarter of the eighteenth century, the Maxwell family emigrated to Rowan County, North Carolina, from Pennsylvania. They were borne southward in that migration of the peoples—Pennsylvania Germans, English, Scotch-Irish, and Highland Scotch— from Maryland, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Virginia, which carried the Robertsons to Guilford, the Seviers and Shelbys to Watauga, the Hendersons to Granville, the Harts to Orange, the Boones and Bryans to Rowan. When the Maxwell family reached Salisbury they found that the place had already been settled by emigrants who had followed thither the course of the old Trading Path. The family—the parents and two children, a boy and a girl—settled in the western part of Rowan County. Elizabeth was born in 1733, and was, Rumple says, a native of west Rowan. Her brother, James Maxwell, a man of rare culture and refinement, enjoyed the privilege of studying medicine under the greatest Scotch physicians of the day in Edinburgh. In time, he became dissatisfied with the location of the family in Rowan, and returned to Pennsylvania, presumably after the marriage of his sister, Elizabeth, to Mr. Robert Gillespie.

In 1756, or shortly before, Robert Gillespie settled in Salisbury. In partnership with Thomas Bashford he purchased a large number of lots there in 1757.* One of these lots was the one upon which they built and conducted the tavern, inn, or "ordinary," as an inn was often called in those days, which stood near the corner of Main (formerly Corbin) and Council streets. The license to conduct this inn was granted to "Bashford & Gillespie" in 1756.† The "tariff" of liquors sold at these inns in Salisbury, fixed by the County Court, reminds one, because of the number and variety of potable refreshments ever on tap, of those English taverns on which Charles Dickens, in the language of the late lamented "Professor" Thomas Dunston, loved to "dilate, prevaricate, and divulge." The tariff for supplies and accommodations at this period (1755) is as follows:

*In 1757 they purchased lots Nos. 3, 11 and 12 in the great "East Square," from Carter and Foster, Trustees of the Township of Salisbury. These lots contained 144 square poles each, and on one of them they established their inn. Cf. Rumple's Rowan County, chapters VI and VII.

†Records of the Inferior Court, Salisbury, dating from 1753.

Rum, Whiskey and Spirituous Liquors & so in Proportion p Gal	6— 0
Loaf sugar Punch p Quart with ½ point of Liquor in it	0—10
Brown sugar Ditto p Ditto	0— 8
Wine p Quart	1— 6
Stewed Spirits p Quart & so in proportion	2— 6
Good Home Brewed Ale p Quart	0— 4
English Beer p Quart	1— 0
For dinner of roast or boiled flesh	1 shilling
For supper and breakfast, each	6 pence
For lodging over night, good bed	2 pence
For stablage (24 hours) with good hay or fodder	6 pence
For pasturage, first 24 hours	4 pence
For pasturage, every 24 hours after	2 pence
For Indian corn or other grain, p quart	2 pence

In May, 1756, Mr. Chief Justice Henley held a conference in Salisbury, at the house of Mr. Peter Arrand, with King Hagler of the Catawba Nation, fifteen of his principal warriors and some thirty of his young men, painted and armed after their fashion in time of war. The Indians were entertained at the expense of the colony, provisions being supplied them by the licensed ordinaries of Gillespie & Bashford, John Lewis Beard, Peter Arrand, and by various individuals.* Robert Gillespie was evidently a man of considerable means, for on June 2, 1758, he sold to William Harrison and James Stewart four and one-half lots in the town of Salisbury—"No. one in the West Square, No. two in said Square, and No. two in the South Square, and No. four in the South Square, also one Moiety or half-part of a lot, No. nine, in the East Square"—, together with four other tracts of lands, totalling fourteen hundred and seven acres.†

* In the Reports of the Committee of Public Claims, Edenton, November 27, 1758 appears the following entry: "Robert Gillespie of Rowan County was allowed his claim of Eight pounds eight shillings for provision for the Indians, as by acct rendered. Col. Rec., V, 981.

† Records for the Inferior Court of Pleas and Quarter Sessions, Salisbury, Rowan County, held for said County on the third Tuesday in April, 1762. The numbered lots within the town limits may be identified by means of the town plat, still preserved.

To Robert Gillespie and his wife, Elizabeth, who ably assisted him in managing the inn, were born two children, a son Robert, who became an officer in the American army, and a daughter, Margaret, who, on July 2, 1776, was united in marriage to a young Presbyterian preacher, Samuel Eusebius McCorkle, afterwards famous as scholar and divine.* The happiness brought by the two children was rudely interrupted in 1760, when, in one of the skirmishes which Col. Hugh Waddell, Commander at Fort Dobbs, had with the Indians in defense of the settlements, Robert Gillespie, Sr., was scalped by the Indians, and died from the effects of his wounds.† Elizabeth Gillespie, for her proven business capacity, was appointed administrator of her husband's estate, as evidenced by the following entry in the Records of the Inferior Court of Pleas and Quarter Sessions, Salisbury, third Tuesday in October, 1762: "Elizabeth Gillespie, Adm. of Robert Gillespie Came into Open Court and [made] a final Settlement and there App^{d} that there Remains Forty Shillings proc. Mon. in her Hands, which Sum was allowed her for her Trouble and Expences in and about the S^{d} Estate, &c."

Some years after the death of her husband (in 1763, to be precise), Elizabeth Maxwell Gillespie was married a second time—on this occasion to a gentleman of Scotch-Irish strain, an emigrant from Pennsylvania, William Steel.‡ He was one of a family of eight sons and one daughter, whose parents were Samuel and Mary (Stevenson) Steel. Six of the brothers, John, Thomas, William, Joseph, Samuel, and Ephraim, came to America from their home in Ireland; while of the other members of the family remaining in Ireland, Ninian, who was educated at Dublin University, became an eminent preacher, James a prosperous farmer, and "Jinny" married a man named George Hogg, bore him four or five children, and died while yet a young woman.* John, William, Thomas, and Joseph came to America soon after reaching man's estate, and "engaged in the affairs of their adopted land with commendable energy." Joseph, who fixed his residence at Hilton Head, S. C., was a man of means, engaged chiefly in importing merchandise from the West Indies. After the fall of Charleston, in May, 1780, all trace of him was lost by his relations. John settled permanently at Carlisle, Pennsylvania; and William and Joseph, before their settlement in the South, doubtless spent some time in Pennsylvania. Thomas, who was of a roving disposition, enjoyed the wild, free life of the frontier, and as late as 1786 was living near the road to Fort Pitt. He remained unmarried, enlisted in the Continental army, and died about 1790.

* In his Sketches of North Carolina, p. 354, Foote incorrectly states that the Rev. S. E. McCorkle married Miss Steele, instead of Miss Gillespie. For an elaborate sketch of Dr. McCorkle, cf. Foote, ch. XXVI.

† For an account of one of these engagements with the Indians, cf. Col. Rec., VI, 230. Robert Campbell, who was scalped in this skirmish, subsequently recovered from his wounds and was recompensed by the colony in the sum of £20. (Col. Rec., VI, 422.)

‡ The family in this generation spelled the name without the final e. Autograph signatures of both William Steel and Elizabeth, his wife, shown in the present monograph, demonstrate this. The family so spelled the name in all probability to distinguish themselves from the other family of Steeles living in Pennsylvania. The next and all succeeding generations of both the North Carolina and Pennsylvania branches of William Steel's family spelled the name Steele.

The picturesque tavern kept by William and Elizabeth Steel was a microcosm of the life of the period. Here, in miniature, were caught the vivid impressions of the moving events and poignant passions of the hour. Here assembled the Regulators to mature their plans against those vultures of the courts, Frohock and Fanning.† Here dined Waightstill Avery, then novice in the law, the courtly William Hooper, and "other gentlemen of the bar" with the new Justice of the Superior Court, Richard Henderson. Here, too, doubtless, Richard Henderson planned with Daniel Boone, John Findlay, and John Stuart that long and extensive scouting expedition to the wilderness of Kentucky in search of rich lands, which subsequently led to the famous Colony of Transylvania and the first permanent colonization of the West. Here the gay barristers, Waightstill Avery, John Williams, Alexander Martin, Adlai Osborne, John Dunn, Samuel Spencer, and William Hooper sipped their sugared whiskey and nutmeg sangaree, and occasionally here, no doubt, as at Hillsborough, "narrowly escaped being intoxicated" (Avery's Diary—1769). Still in a perfect state of preservation are account books of the Steel Tavern, covering a considerable number of years.*

* Cf. The Steele Family in Cumberland County, Pennsylvania: The Genealogical Publishing Co., Chicago. Also The Steele Family, by D. S. Durrie: Albany, 1859.

† N. C. Col. Rec., VIII, 521.

On Wednesday, August 7, 1771, pursuant to an act of the Assembly (Newbern, 1770), William Steel took the oath and qualified as Commissioner of the Borough of Salisbury. The other Commissioners were Matthew Troy, Daniel Little, John Lewis Beard, Peter Ribe, William Temple Coles, James Kerr, Maxwell Chambers, Alexander Martin, and John Dunn†.

William Steel died on November 1, 1773, at the age of thirty-nine, leaving only one son, who was born on November 16, 1764.‡ This was John Steele, known in history as General Steele, one of the most eminent men in the history of the

* I have recently examined these old account books, now in the possession of Captain Richard Henderson (U. S. Navy, retired), great-grandson of Elizabeth Maxwell Steel. I append one entry:

April 12th., 1773.

Waightstill Avery----To Sangaree.

2 s.

† Records of the Inferior Court, Rowan County, Salisbury, N. C.

‡ William Steel's will, dated September 9, 1773, probated May 7, 1774, contains one clause willing certain property, contingently, to the four children of his brother, John Steel.

State.* His tombstone, in the old family graveyard at the Steele homestead, now "Steeleworth," just within the limits of the town of Salisbury, at present the home of the family of Capt. Richard Henderson, bears this striking inscription:

CONSECRATED BY CONJUGAL AND FILIAL AFFECTION.
AN ENLIGHTENED STATESMAN,
A VIGILANT PATRIOT,
AN ACCOMPLISHED GENTLEMAN.
THE ARCHIVES OF HIS COUNTRY TESTIFY
THE SERVICES OF HIS SHORT BUT USEFUL
LIFE. LONG WILL THAT COUNTRY DEPLORE
HIS LOSS. BUT WHEN WILL THIS SE-QUESTERED SPOT CEASE TO WITNESS THE SACRED SORROW OF HIS FAMILY AND FRIENDS?

V.

On a wild wintry night in the early hours of the first of February, 1781, a lonely horseman sits his weary steed anxiously awaiting news of the day's campaign. The rain is slowly falling upon this solitary figure—a man of fine presence, manly beauty, erect and commanding bearing, vigorous and well proportioned frame. As evening darkens into night and the leaden-footed hours creep by, this soldierly figure continues to maintain his station at the rallying point of the militia, seven miles below Torrence's Tavern, on the road to Salisbury. This young man of only thirty-nine, in such gloomy dejection awaiting news of the day's conflict, whose fair and florid complexion has not entirely

* Of his life there is no occasion to speak here. Ample materials for his biography are now in the possession of the North Carolina Historical Commission, the archives of the University of North Carolina, and the present writer. Suffice it to say that he died at the early age of fifty (August 14, 1815), having served as Member of Congress, Member and Speaker of the House of Commons, Commissioner on the N. C.-S. C. Boundary Line, General of Militia, first Comptroller of the Treasury during the administrations of Washington, who was his intimate friend, and Adams, and invited to serve in the same capacity by Jefferson, his political opposite. For brief accounts of his life, cf. the Sprunt Historical Monograph, No. 9 (with original letters); Wheeler's History of North Carolina, under "Rowan County"; and Rumple's Rowan County.

A copy of Charles Willson Peale's portrait of General Nathaniel Greene. Owned by his great-granddaughter, Mrs. Wm. Brenton Greene, Jr.

yielded to the exposures of five campaigns, is the most brilliant soldier, leader, and strategist, bar Washington, on the American continent—the "Fabius of America," General Nathaniel Greene.

It is the crucial hour of that remarkable strategic movement, the retreat of the Americans before the hotly pursuing Cornwallis. The very fate of the South, and perhaps of the American colonies, hangs in the balance. Anxiety lies heavy upon Greene, for his resources are at the very lowest ebb. Only by bringing out the militia can he venture to oppose the unresting pursuit of Cornwallis; and for that he needs ready money to distribute among the soldiers, and a fresh store of hope and enthusiasm with which to fire his jaded soldiers to renewed efforts. On the preceding day he has sent Morgan forward post-haste towards the Yadkin, while he remains behind to make one more desperate effort to collect and embody the militia.

Midnight is some time past when the anxious watcher, alert on his lonely vigil, hears the splashing plod of a horse's hoofs upon the sodden road. The jaded messenger, drenched with rain, brings the news that gives despair: "General Davidson is killed, the militia scattered; Cornwallis has effected the passage of the Catawba, and Huger is being hotly pressed by the British." In profound dejection over the depressing news, which seems to shatter his last hope of resisting the advance of Cornwallis and of successfully evading disaster, Greene disconsolately turns his horse's head and begins the long, weary ride to Salisbury. Money for his unpaid troops, inspiration for fresh efforts to enable Huger and Morgan once more to unite forces and present an unbroken front to the enemy—these are sorely needed now. Where are they to come from? This lonely ride, in the blackest hours of this wild night, is symbolic of the lowest ebb in the fortunes of the campaign in the South. It is the darkest hour just before the dawn.

After Morgan, who is stationed on the east bank of the Catawba, learns of the crossing of Cornwallis, at Cowan's Ford, he begins his retreat on February 1st towards the Yadkin along the Beattie's Ford, or Sherrill's Ford, Road to Salisbury. That afternoon the American troops march hilariously through the town, as they go occasionally punching out a window pane here and there with their bayonets. They encamp about half a mile east of town, on the Yadkin Road, in a beautiful grove with convenient springs and abundance of fuel ready to hand.* The surgeon of Morgan's army, Dr. Joseph Read, with the hospital stores and a number of wounded and disabled British officers who are prisoners, has reached Salisbury some time in advance of the main body of Morgan's command. Dr. Read at once establishes his headquarters at Steel's Tavern, facing on the main street of the town. While busily engaged here in writing paroles for such British officers as are unable from sickness and debility to proceed further, he glances through the window of his apartment overlooking the street and, in the dimness of the early dawn, observes approaching a solitary horseman enveloped in a long military cloak. A closer glance and he recognizes in the man riding up to the door, unaccompanied by his aides or a single individual, the leader of the American forces, General Greene. "It was impossible not to perceive in the deranged state of his dress and the stiffness of his limbs," says Dr. Read himself, "some symptoms of his late rapid movements and exposure to the weather."†

"How do you find yourself, General?" anxiously inquires the doctor.

To this inquiry Greene replies with the utmost dejection:

* In this grove is now located the residence of Hon. John Steele Henderson.

† Johnson's Life of Greene, Vol. I, ch. X, p. 417.

"Wretched beyond measure—fatigued, hungry, alone, penniless, and without a friend."

Mrs. Steel, who has come to the door on hearing the sound of voices, now steps forward, benevolence beaming from her countenance, and interjects with alacrity:

"That I deny"—and then, with an access of positiveness in her tone—"that I most particularly deny. In me, General, you and the American cause have a devoted friend. And this gentleman will not, I am certain, suffer you to be without a companion, as soon as the humane business about which he is employed, is finished. Only come in and rest and dry yourself, and in a very short time a hot breakfast shall cheer and refresh you."

The General, after his disagreeable ride of more than thirty miles in the rain, darkened by thoughts of the two disastrous skirmishes of the preceding day, at once enters the tavern, and disconsolately throws himself down into the nearest chair.

Mrs. Steel now busies herself in preparing refreshment for the tired traveler. In a short time a bountiful repast is spread before the distinguished guest, while a cheerful fire crackles on the hearth and sheds its genial warmth throughout the room. The hospitable greeting of Mrs. Steel, the comforting influences of the environment and the gratifying repast set before him, go far to restore the spirits of the disheartened general. When General Greene rode up to the door Mrs. Steel's quick ear had caught the general's plaint that he was penniless; and now, as he sits by the table, his head bowed upon his hand, she enters the room, carefully closes the door, and cautiously looks around to make sure they are not observed. Approaching General Greene and reminding him of the despondent words she had heard him utter on his arrival, Mrs. Steel once more assures him of her sympathy and friendship. Drawing from under her apron two bags of specie, gold and silver coins, the savings of years which she has carefully hoarded in these precarious times, she presents them to him eagerly, with these simple, but memorable words:

"Take them; for you will need them, and I can do without them."

Though history does not record the exact words of the grateful General, his biographer says that "an acquisition so important even to the public service, was not to be declined from excess of delicacy." We may well imagine that General Greene expressed his gratitude in some such way as this:

"May Heaven bless you for your kind words and generous act! These two bags of specie now represent the treasure chest of the American army. They will put shoes on barefoot soldiers, feed hungry men, and further the cause of liberty. I accept your generous gift most gratefully in behalf of the public service, since it is given so generously. 'Tis by such patriotic actions as this that revolutions are made."*

Doubtless Mrs. Steel, as Rumple says, could have filled General Greene's pockets with "proclamation money," then worth less than were Confederate notes in the beginning of the year 1865. But silver and gold coins were incredibly scarce in Revolutionary days, and no American officer or gentleman could fail to be sensible of the value of such a gift.†

* For the best accounts of the episode upon which the present recital is based, cf. Johnson's Life of Greene, vol. I, ch. X, p. 417; Jethro Rumple's History of Rowan County, ch. XVII; Foote's Sketches of North Carolina, ch. XXVI, pp. 354-5; Mrs. E. F. Ellet's Women of the Revolution (Jacobs, Phila., 1900), vol. I, ch. XXIII; Irving's Life of Washington, vol. III, p. 345; Wheeler's History of North Carolina, under "Rowan County." The episode has found its way into fiction also, notably in the novel of Cyrus Townsend Brady: When Blades are Out and Love's Afield (Lippincott, Phila., 1901).

† The Cyclopaedia of American Biographies, vol. IV, p. 4, says: "Elizabeth Maxwell Steele gave all her savings to General Greene on his retreat, thus enabling him to feed his troops and cross the Yadkin before its swollen waters impeded the pursuit of Cornwallis." Two circumstances may serve to demonstrate the value which specie possessed in those days, both intrinsically and in the popular mind. It is now universally recognized by historians

In a letter to Washington during this very retreat, Greene writes: "The miserable situation of the troops for want of clothing has rendered the march the most painful imaginable, many hundreds of the soldiers marking the ground with their bloody feet.—I have not a shilling to obtain intelligence with."* It was fortunate for General Greene that he visited Steel's Tavern when he did, i. e., on February 2, before Mrs. Steel had been despoiled of her property by the British. During their stay in Salisbury of two days, immediately following Greene's departure, the British levied upon the inhabitants for whatever they wanted. Says Mrs. Steel: "I was plundered of all my horses, dry cattle, horse forage, liquors and family provisions * * *."

VI.

Just before his departure from Salisbury, General Greene left at Steel's Tavern a memorial of very striking and unique character. While sitting in the dining room Greene's eye caught sight of the portraits of King George III and Queen Charlotte hanging on the wall, bearing record to a time long past when Americans loved the mother country and revered their sovereigns. These beautiful colored engravings had been presented to Mrs. Steel by her brother, James Maxwell, to whom they had been given, when he was a member of an embassy to England, by one of his friends, an official at the Court of St. James. The sight of the picture of George III filled General Greene's mind with mournful reflections over the sufferings which his countrymen were at that moment enduring, fleeing almost naked and with bare, bloody feet before the relentless pursuit of Cornwallis; and of the bloodshed in the struggle to throw off the shackles that one of the strongly contributory causes of the peasant revolt known as the Regulation was the scarcity of specie. After the Revolution, even, Thomas Person won great reputation as a philanthropist, a building at the University of North Carolina being named in his honor and still bearing his name, because his benefaction, though only $1,050, was paid in "hard money"—shining silver dollars.

*Greene Mss.

of slavery which Parliament and the English king were trying to fasten upon the colonies. With the generous gift of Mrs. Steel lying on the table before him, these sentiments returned to the General, mingled with a feeling of elation and confidence that now, succored in the hour of his need, he could once more fling defiance to British power and give King George full reason to regret his war upon the colonies. Taking a piece of charcoal from the fire-place he walked up to the picture of George III and wrote upon the back of it:

"O GEORGE HIDE THY FACE AND MOURN."

Then, turning the face of the British king to the wall, General Greene bade good-bye to his hospitable and patriotic hostess, and, mounting his horse, hurriedly rode away, with light heart to superintend and direct the retreat of his little army and provide for their transportation across the Yadkin. For as his biographer and descendant says: "Never did relief come at a more propitious moment; nor would it be straining conjecture to suppose that he resumed his journey with his spirits cheered and lightened by this touching proof of woman's devotion to the cause of her country."*

In addition to its intrinsic value, Mrs. Steel's gift encouraged Greene and heartened his jaded soldiery for that last burst of extra energy which seemed almost beyond human power. It gave him the spirit to direct that masterly retreat which, as Botta said, "would have done honor to the most celebrated captains of that, or any former epoch." Overtaking Morgan, Greene crossed the Yadkin with his forces, the militia, newly aroused, harassing the British at every turn—and, rescued as if providentially by the sudden rise of the river, soon effected a junction with Huger on the seventh of February. In the retreat that followed occurred the almost unprecedented spectacle: the Americans under Col. Otho Williams covering Greene's rear, the British under the lead of Cornwallis himself, marching for many miles parallel with, and in sight of, each other—without firing a shot. Finally, on February 14, Greene was enabled to cross the Dan—thereby concluding that remarkable retreat of more than two hundred miles of which Washington wrote to Greene: "Your retreat before Cornwallis is highly applauded by all ranks."

* George Washington Greene's Life of Greene, N. Y., 1871.

One month later, on March 15, at Guilford Court House, Greene forced conclusions with Cornwallis on ground astutely chosen by the former on February 10th preceding, and, after a stubborn struggle, yielded a bloody field and, superficially, a victory to Cornwallis.*

The victory was a barren one for the British arms, and left Cornwallis in a truly desperate plight. "My situation here," writes Cornwallis to Phillips from Wilmington, "is very distressing. Greene took advantage of my being obliged to come to this place, and has marched to South Carolina."

In a letter (Salisbury, April 19, 1781) to her brother-in-law, Ephraim Steel, of Carlisle, Pennsylvania, Mrs. Steel in one illuminating paragraph depicts the advantageous results for the country, wrought by the Battle of Guilford Court House:

"It comforts me to think that the enemy will probably never return. His Lordship soon after the 15th of March moved to Wilmington, and General Greene, by a masterly stroke, has turned rapidly towards Camden, in his rear, which I hope will fall into his hands before Cornwallis can reinforce the place. At least it will take the war out of this State. And leave his Lordship not one step further than before Gates' defeat."

* As contemporary evidence of the presumption that this battle was regarded by the American military leaders as a virtual victory for Greene, it is pertinent to cite a passage from a letter of Washington to Jefferson ("Headquarters New Windsor, April 18, 1781"), which has only recently been brought to light: "I am glad to learn from the Letter of General Greene, a copy of which Your Excellency did me the honor to enclose on the 28th. Ult. that the Action of the 15th. had been severely felt by the Enemy, that their retreat bore evident marks of distress, and that our Army in good spirits were advancing upon them." The reference, "the Action of the 15th.," is to the Battle of Guilford Court House. In his letter of March 16 to Governor Jefferson, Major Charles Magill writes from "Camp at the Iron Works, Gilford County":—"Never was ground contested for with greater obstinacy, and never were Troops drawn off in better order. Such another dear bot day, must effectually ruin the British army . . . " Calendar of Virginia State Papers, Vol. I, p. 574.

Out of the apparent defeat at Guilford Court House, that pivotal battle of the Revolution, was thus wrought the most conclusive victory, foreshadowing and making possible the ultimate triumph of American Independence only seven months later at Yorktown, on October 19, 1781.

Surely it is no exaggeration to assert that, in the darkest hour of Greene's career, when his fortunes were at their lowest ebb and his own dauntless mettle failed him, the gift of Elizabeth Maxwell Steel, loftily patriotic in its sentiment, providential in its timeliness, by its moral and inspiring effect, contributed in some appreciable measure to the ultimate achievement of American Independence.

VII.

The colored lithographs of King George III and Queen Charlotte, which are still carefully preserved, have had such curious and chequered careers that the story of their wanderings amply deserves recording. The following letter, for a copy of which I am indebted to the courtesy of Mr. W. J. Andrews, Raleigh, N. C., is self-explanatory. The original is among the Swain Mss., in the archives of the University of North Carolina:

JANUARY 14, 1846.

HON. DAVID L. SWAIN:

I have been thus long delayed in performing the agreeable duty assigned my by your kind letter by a long and painful illness of Mrs. McGinn, which has confined her to her chamber and her bed for several weeks.

At the earliest moment which made the application proper I spoke to her in regard to the subject of your communication. The acknowledgements of the Historical Society I expressed as you requested and solicited the interesting relic which has been so long preserved in her family. It is, I am happy to say, cheerfully given. The Society will not however be indebted for it to Mrs. McGinn. The engraving which, as you will observe, is executed in a superior style of workmanship was highly prized by Mrs. Steel, the grandmother of Mrs. McGinn, and was cherished during her life with great veneration. At her death it was given to her granddaughter, Elizabeth Steele, a sister of Mrs. McGinn, who was the wife of the Revd. James Bowman of Tennessee. Mrs. Bowman gave the engraving to a daughter of Mrs. McGinn, who bears her own name, a young lady not yet grown—who not only prizes it as a historical relic of interesting general associations but connected with a near and deceased relation. It was yielded therefore only from that sense of duty which the daughter of Dr. McCorkle has endeavored to faithfully impress on her own descendants. As to the autograph it no doubt is that of General Greene. The words express the feelings of the illustrious hero as to the character of George 3d, his conduct towards the colonies, and the effect of the war on the possessions of the British Government. They are greatly injured by time but in a favorable position you may distinguish each word if not each letter. "O George hide thy face and mourn" is the entire passage. The engraving, as I am informed by Mrs. McGinn, was procured while in England by a brother of her grandmother whose name was James Maxwell. He was from Pennsylvania, the residence of the family prior to their migration and settlement in our State. He had been educated in Edinburg where he studied the profession of medicine. He returned to Pennsylvania and afterwards visited England in some public capacity which is not now remembered. While there he obtained the Engraving of George the third—and engravings of other members of the royal family some of which are in a state of excellent preservation and which in style of execution will compare with the best specimens of the art under all the advantages of modern ingenuity. James Maxwell died at an early age, leaving to his sister the pictures to which I have referred and the memory of fine intellectual endowments and an exemplary life. I regret that no opportunity now occurs to transmit the engraving to its destined repository. It is somewhat impaired by time and it will require care to deliver it safely. The inscription by General Greene however which gives to it its value cannot be effaced by any accident likely to occur. I shall see to its preservation until some opportunity offers for its safe transmission to you. * * * I hope that you will be assured that it will afford me great pleasure to aid the Historical Society by any means in my power in collecting materials pertinent to its elevated object among the people of this revolutionary region.

I am, with great respect,

Truly yours,

JAMES W. OSBORNE.

To the

HON. DAVID L. SWAIN,

Chapel Hill, No. Carolina.

The Mrs. McGinn referred to in the above letter was a daughter of the Rev. Samuel Eusebius McCorkle and his wife, Margaret Gillespie, daughter of Robert Gillespie and his wife, Elizabeth Maxwell. I am indebted to Mr. R. D. W. Connor for permission to use the following letter which I recently discovered in the collections of the North Carolina Historical Commission:

PARIS, TENN., Mar. 2, 1859.

HON. DAVID L. SWAIN.

DEAR SIR:—The University of North Carolina was presented some years ago, by my Mother, with a portrait of George III. of England, that had formerly been the property of my great grand Mother, Elizabeth Steel.

As a Revolutionary relic the value of this portrait is enhanced by having on the back of it, in the hand writing of Gen. Green, the following, "King (sic) George, hide thy face and mourn." This portrait and that of Charlotte, his Queen, for many years hung side by side in the house of Mrs. Steel, and afterwards for more than a third of a century at Dr. McCorkle's, and then at my Mother's until they were separated by the king's being sent to Chapel Hill.

The Queen is now in my possession, and the object of this communication is to inform you, that I desire the old couple to be again united, and I therefore offer for your acceptance the portrait of the Queen. And if you can suggest any means by which it can be forwarded to Chapel Hill, I will cheerfully send it. If you will accept the gift, please address me at your earliest convenience, as I expect to change my location in a few months.

Respectfully yours, J. B. McGINN.

P. S. My address is, Rev. J. B. McGinn, Paris, Tenn.

The two pictures eventually reached Governor Swain safely. The picture of George III, doubtless because of its remarkable historic interest, was permitted by Mrs. McGinn to be displayed for a time in the court-house in Charlotte. The mention of this circumstance occurs in Foote's Sketches of North Carolina (p. 355), which was published in 1846. After the death of Governor Swain it was discovered that the relics of the North Carolina Historical Society were inextricably mixed with the personal effects of Governor Swain.

When the effects of Governor Swain's widow were sold in Raleigh on July 6, 1883, these pictures were bought by a young schoolboy. The story is so unusual, and the obligation towards him for preserving these pictures is so great that at my request he has given me the true history of his acquisition of the historic pictures.* The historian Wheeler says of the presentation by Mrs. Steel of the two bags of specie to General Greene: "This scene has been made the subject of both painting and sculpture."† The original painting of the scene was made by the artist Alonzo Chappel; and an engraving from the original painting, entitled "Female Patriotism—Mrs. Steel and General Greene," is to be found in J. A. Spencer's History of the United States, New York, 1874-1876, vol. 2, facing p. 121. For this information I am indebted to the Director of the Prints Division, Library of Congress. The whereabouts of the original painting I have been unable to discover. For the illustration accompanying this article (frontispiece) I am indebted to descendants of Mrs. Steel, Mrs. Eliza S. Lynch, and Mrs. E. E. McQueen, of Columbia, S. C., and to a descendant of

*"In the year 1882," says Mr. William J. Andrews, of Raleigh, N. C., "I was a pupil at the Lovejoy School House, then called the Raleigh Male Academy, Messrs. Fray and Morson, Principals. The N. C. History class recited in Mr. Morson's room, and the book used was the second edition of Moore's School History. I was not old enough to be in the class; but picking up a copy of the book belonging to one of the boys, which lay on my desk, I found this foot-note on the subject of the picture (I may not quote with perfect accuracy from memory): 'This picture with the writing still visible is in the possession of Governor Swain.' Knowing that Mrs. Swain lived in Raleigh and that my cousin, Miss Sallie Haywood, was a friend of hers, I asked Cousin Sallie to take me to see Mrs. Swain, so I could ask her to show me the picture. Being a small boy, and my request not seeming of much importance, I was put off from time to time until Mrs. Swain's death. The day before the sale, Cousin Sallie took me over the house with 'Old Aunt Thenie,' 72 years old, one of the old colored servants in the White family (Mrs. Swain was a Miss White). I finally found the pictures of George and Charlotte in the attic. Instinctively, I felt that here was the end of my quest, and on turning George around, I found the inscription in chalk as I had been told of it by my great grandmother Harris who had seen the picture when she was a young lady. This I learned at the age of four or five, while on a visit to my grandparents, Col. and Mrs. William Johnston, of Charlotte, N. C.

"Here now was I, a twelve-year old boy, with a chance to become the owner of a picture which I had longed merely to see. So I told Aunt Thenie that there were two old pictures in the attic that I wanted to buy next day at the sale. 'All right, honey,' she said, 'I'll take a rag up and wipe them clean and put them in the dining room.' The next day at the sale I waited until the auctioneer cried the pictures; and started them at five cents each. Some one bid ten, and I promptly raised to fifteen. The two pictures, George III and Queen Charlotte, were knocked down to me at thirty cents—every cent I had in my pocket.

"I knew and appreciated the value of my new possesssion. I consider that day spent at the Swain sale one of the red-letter days of my life."

Cf. also Program of Exercises for N. C. Day, Friday, Dec. 18, 1908, compiled by Mr. R. D. W. Connor.

† Reminiscences of North Carolina, Vol. II, p. 397.

General Greene, Miss Mary Ward Greene, of Newport, R. I. It is, examination has shown, a photographic copy of a wood cut of the original painting by Chappel. The picture possesses one remarkable feature, the head of Mrs. Steel, according to the testimony of Mrs. Lynch, having been copied from a miniature of her, and so represents her accurately as she really was.

No sculpture of the scene has ever come to my notice; nor have the efforts of the authorities in the Library of Congress been able to throw any light on the point. The plaque shown in the illustration accompanying this monograph was among the Swain effects. Through ignorance, and chiefly because it was partially mutilated, the plaque was thrown away as valueless. The aged servant, "Aunt Thenie" rescued it from the trash pile, and after gluing on the broken piece, gave or sold it to the present owner, Miss Sallie Haywood.*

The photograph of General Greene, accompanying the present monograph, was made from the famous portrait by Charles Willson Peale. For this photograph I am indebted to the kindness of the owner of the portrait, Mrs. William Brenton Greene, Jr., of Princeton, N. J. For permission to reproduce the pictures of King George and Queen Charlotte, I am indebted to Mr. W. J. Andrews, who also placed at my disposal the photograph of the plaque here shown.†

*At the top upon the scroll, may be distinguished the words "Gen. Greene" and "Mrs. Steel," above the heads of General Greene and Mrs. Steel, respectively. The artist who designed the plaque clearly copied the painting of Chappel.

† The inscription in Greene's handwriting on the back of King George's picture, now framed behind glass, is still perfectly legible, though now quite faint. A tracing in white paint on the glass cover, immediately above the inscription, makes it stand out, in the bold handwriting of Greene with startling distinctness. It is peculiarly interesting to observe that Greene seems first to have turned the picture upside down and begun to write—but realizing that the inscription would then appear upside down as the picture hung on the wall, with back to the front, he reversed the picture and wrote the inscription right side up. The photograph shows that he had already written "O G—," before he discovered his mistake.

In some quarters it was the habit of patriotic Americans to turn upside down, and leave hanging on the wall in this humiliating posture, pictures of George III. Pertinent to the incident of the present sketch is the following entry in the Diary of John Adams, II, 434:

Baltimore, February, 1777.

16. Sunday. Last evening I supped with my friends, Dr. Rush and Mr. Sargeant, at Mrs. Page's, over the bridge. The two Colonel Lees, Dr. Witherspoon, Mr. Adams, Mr. Gerry, Dr. Brownson, made the company. They have a fashion, in this town of reversing the picture of King George III in such families as have it. One of these topsy-turvy kings

VIII.

The episodes with which the present monograph deals have been made the subject of an interesting poem, by Grace Duffie Boylan, which appeared some years ago in the Chicago Journal. Mrs. Steel was a very religious and devout woman, properly indicated by the poem; the obituary notice, given later in this monograph, speaks for itself. The detail of her "hard, toil-roughened hand" must be granted to that excuse for inaccuracy euphemistically defined as "poetic license." Mrs. Steel assuredly left the polishing of her pans and the sanding of her floors to her servants. The poem, bearing these manifest inaccuracies, appears below:

THE DAME O' SALISBURY TOWN.

Elizabeth Steele of Salisbury Town
  Polished her pans and sanded her floor,
And sat to read in the sacred book
  Of the times when war shall be no more.

She had heard the boom of British guns
  As mothers hear who have sons to mourn;
Whose e'er the shot, and where'er its home,
  The heart in her kerchiefed breast was torn.

Elizabeth Steele had heard the news
  "King's Mountain's won and the red coats flee!"
But she only asked: "Goodsire, my boys—
  Is't well with them? Do they ride to me?"

But who can stop to count one, count two,
  When lives go out like a candle's flame?
What courier halts on his way to tell
  The price we pay for a battle's game?

---

was hung up in the room where we supped, and under it were written these lines, by Mr. Throop, as we are told:

Behold the man, who had it in his power
To make a kingdom tremble and adore,
Intoxicate with folly. See his head
Placed where the meanest of his subjects tread.
Like Lucifer, the giddy tyrant fell;
He lifts his heel to Heaven, but points his head to Hell.

She had heard how Morgan crossed the flood
  That rose a bar to the English breast.
And she whispered low: "Were any drowned?"
  And dreamed of two on the torrent's crest.

But who can stop for a woman's cry?
  The post must ride, be it woe or weal;
He struck his spurs, and he galloped by—
  And what could a mother do but kneel?

Hers was only to watch and wait,
  And hers was only to weep and pray;
Her part had been but to rear good sons
  And send them out to the guns that day.

She scoured, she sanded, she kept her peace,
  She spun her flax by the open door;
Then sat to read in the holy word
  Of the times when war shall be no more.

Nathaniel Greene, below Cowan's Ford,
  Had fought, had won, and had lost the field,
And his minute men with one accord
  Had vowed it better to run than yield.

Ragged and hungry and weary and cold,
  Penniless, friendless, and sick with defeat,
They came to the edge of Salisb'ry town,
  The bitter way of that great retreat.

Elizabeth saw the famished horde;
  She took them food and she gave them cheer,
She warmed and fed and comforted
  The sons some mothers were holding dear.

She gave her purse to the General's keep;
  " 'Tis all I have, but 'tis yours," she said,
And above her hard, toil-roughened hand
  Nathaniel Greene bent reverent head.

He raised his eye and his eagle glance
  Swept to the face of King George the Third,
That hung on the wall. He strode across
  And turned it around, with a trooper's word.

And scribed with a piece of chalk, like this—
'Tis plain to see on the canvas worn,
Bold was his hand with the pen or sword:
"Oh George! Oh King! Hide thy face and mourn."

Elizabeth then their knapsacks filled;
She pressed each hand and she touched each head,
As she would have wished those mothers far
To have blessed her lads—perhaps now dead!

But hark! A shout! A trample! A halt!
One cry—and a pris'ner bound and fast,
Elizabeth laughed in precious chains—
The arms of her own brave boys at last.

This is the tale of Elizabeth Steele,
Who fed Greene's host, and who won renown;
And I sing this song o'er a hundred years,
In praise of the dame o' Salisbury town.*

IX.

William Steel's brother, Ephraim, settled in Carlisle, Pennsylvania, some time shortly prior to 1769; and resided there for about forty-five years. He was a man of means and prominence in his community and his section. He enjoyed an extended political acquaintance, and persons in high authority consulted him on State and National affairs. Through his habit of preserving letters have come down to us today letters of Elizabeth Maxwell Steel, ranging over the period from 1778 to 1786. These letters, copies of which accompany the present monograph, are now in the possession of Misses Margaret A. and Martha J. Steele, of Carlisle, Pennsylvania, granddaughters of Ephraim Steel. For the copies and the photographic facsimile accompanying the present monograph, the writer is indebted to the courtesy of the Misses Steele, to Hon. John Steele Henderson, of Salisbury, N. C., who discovered the existence of the letters, and to Mr. J. Zeamer, the antiquarian, who prepared the elaborate sketch of the Steele family, in the volume entitled Biographical Annals of Cumberland County, Pennsylvania (Genealogical Publishing Co., Chicago, 1905).

* For copies of this poem, I am indebted to the kindness of Mrs. B. B. Taylor, of Macon, Ga., and Mrs. Clark Waring, of Columbia, S. C.

In one of her letters Mrs. Steel says: "You know I am a great politician." Indeed, these letters few in number though they be, contain most pertinent comments on contemporaneous events of vital interest during the most moving period in our Revolutionary history. For the most part, as was to be expected, they deal with family affairs, incidentally clearing up matters in which historians have either blundered or revealed ignorance. They show Mrs. Steel to have been a woman of deep piety, sound intelligence, and good judgment, and withal practical and patriotic. It is the hope of the writer that the Misses Steele will present the original letters of Mrs. Steel to the State of North Carolina.

ELIZABETH STEEL TO EPHRAIM STEEL.

DEAR BROTHER: SALISBURY, 15th May, 1778.

Since your departure I have received two letters from you, of March 22 & April 6th and I thank you for them both. Your own feelings may suggest the pleasure, or an idea of the pleasure I enjoy with them at present, for letters are the meeting and talking of absent friends. It gave me great pleasure to hear of your safe arrival and the welfare of your family, especially Little Billy who it seems is likely to outgrow his father—surely he will soon be a little giant. I'm sorry to hear of sister Nancy's illness. I hope her disorder will not hold her long. Your kindness in riding so far to see my son calls for thanks both from him and me. I hope he has not been ungrateful, and I now present you my heartfelt thanks on that account. I should be heartily rejoiced to see him quit the army, and betake himself to some business for life.* I present you my

* It appears that Mrs. Steel's son, John Steele, although only fourteen in 1778, had already joined the Continental army. Clearly Mrs. Steel is not referring here to her other son, Robert Gillespie, for in a letter of October 17, 1778, she informs her brother Ephraim that her son Robert has "gone into the army," whereas in the present letter, written five months earlier, she is expressing the wish that her son (obviously not Robert) would "quit the army." It is not mentioned by any biographer of John Steele, nor was it even known until the discovery of these letters, that he had ever served in the Continental army. Subsequent to this date (1778), John Steele studied under the Rev. James Hall at Clio's Nursery, or "The Academy of the Sciences," on Snow Creek. (Foote's Sketches of North Carolina, ch. XXXIV, pp. 330 et seq.) The copy of Virgil, with numerous signatures of "John Steele," which he used at this famous school, is still preserved.

thanks for the crisis No. 5, it gave me great pleasure by serving to brace our minds, long relaxed by the inaction of the armies thro the winter season. We hope, however, the spring and summer will produce some important event and pray you to pass no opportunity of giving us the news. My family, through the kindness of Providence, is well. My kindest regards to sister Nancy and all friends and be always assured that I am and shall continue

Your loving and affectionate sister,

ELIZ. STEEL.

ELIZABETH STEEL TO "MY SON" (PRESUMABLY JOHN STEELE).

SALISBURY, 7th July, 1778.

MY DEAR SON:

It is now a long time since I have had a letter from you, the cause I know not, but I can assure you that I have wrote two or three times since I received any account from you. Pray write me by the first opportunity.

Since you have chosen that manner of life, it would give me the greatest pleasure to hear of your acquitting yourself with honor and faithfulness to your country and yourself, and to hear of the contrary would give me much uneasiness.

I hope that you will not forget to apply to that power and wisdom which can enable and direct us to discharge the duties of every station. Many are the advices of this kind I have given you. I must take every opportunity to repeat them. Pray let them not be in vain. I should be glad to hear from you. Write me by the first opportunity. Friends here all are well. I am

Your affectionate mother, ELIZ. STEEL.

ELIZABETH STEEL TO EPHRAIM STEEL.

SALISBURY, July 30, 1778.

DEAR BROTHER:

Yours of June 26th I have received not long since. My son is not yet come home, but I have heard that he is on the way, in company with Capt. Cootes, who left him I suppose with you.

Mr. Beard, I believe, returned thro Yorktown and arrived some time ago in company with Mrs. Beard, which has changed her citizenship—Salisbury for Lancaster.* I am very sorry to hear of brother Thomas' misfortune and should be glad to be informed about the issue of his affair. I suppose it will reduce him to great difficulty and loss if he be forced to serve out his enlistment. However for his sake, if obliged to serve for my own and my country's sake, I hope the war will not long continue. Providence seems to be directing it to a final issue, at least on the continent, tho' perhaps the British government may not acknowledge our Independence till the end of the present war with France, which their political phrenzy may continue for two or three years to come till they be reduced to the last extremity. Please to give us the fate of New York. We hear it is to be attacked by the French fleet and American army, and we should be glad to have a more distinct account of the affair of the 28th. My little family is well. No remarkable alteration lately. I hope soon to sustain the very respectable and important character of GRANDMOTHER.

* The "Mr. Beard" here mentioned is doubtless Valentine Beard, a continental soldier in the Revolution, who fought under Washington, notably at the battles of the Brandywine and Germantown. He married a Miss Margaret Marquedant.

I am your affectionate
Sister
ELIZ. STEEL.

ELIZABETH STEEL TO EPHRAIM STEEL.*

SALISBURY, 15th Aug., 1778.

DEAR BROTHER:

Inclosed you will find some letters which lately came to hand; I wrote you a few days ago. Nothing more since, only that I have got a little grand-Daughter, this morning about 3 o'clock. Mother and child well for the time. All well.

Your sister,
ELIZ. STEEL.

ELIZABETH STEEL TO EPHRAIM STEEL.

SALISBURY, Oct. 17, 1778.

DEAR BROTHER:

Tho I have wrote since I have received any letters from you, yet I take this opportunity to inform you that I am well with the rest of my little family, without any other alterations in it than those you have heard, unless it be that my son Robert has gone into the army,† and I have heard designed to be enrolled with Major Davi-

* For its clearness of delineation and its brevity, this letter, in photographic facsimile, is reproduced in the present monograph.

† Robert Gillespie was an efficient and daring soldier. Col. Alexander Martin, writing from Salisbury to Gov. Thomas Burke, August 10, 1781, says: "Inclosed your Excellency hath the Resignation of Captain James Sheppard's Commission in the State Regiment, in favor of Mr. Robert Gillespie of this Place, who was formerly a Continental Lieutenant, and serving with reputation——." (Col. Rec. XXII; 555, 558.) Says Rumple, "He was of a peculiarly bold and defiant spirit, and when the British entered Salisbury, he rode in sight of them in a menacing manner. As he had but one companion, 'Blind Daniel,' so called from having lost one eye, a kind of hanger-on in Salisbury, of course he did not remain to carry out his menaces." (Rowan County.) He received his commission as Captain of State Militia, and he and his company were subsequently paid £2157-8-8 by the State for their services in defence of their country. (Report of Auditor of Salisbury District, Col. Rec., XXII, 1014.)

Salisbury 15th Aug. 1778

Dear Brother

Inclosed you will find some letters which lately came to hand; I wrote you a few days ago & nothing more since, only that I have got a little grand-Daughter this morning about 8 O'Clock mother and child well for the time. All well.

Your Sister

Eliz. Steel.

Facsimile of Letter by Elizabeth Steel.

son in Carlisle. If he has been with you I desire you to inform me, as I have not heard from him, since he left Halifax on the borders of Virginia.

His conduct in entering into the service has given me no small uneasiness; not that I disapprove the cause of liberty, but I thought him too young to launch out into the world. But I must resign him up to the conduct of Providence and endeavor myself to be resigned to the matter.

I have lately received a letter from brother Joseph which informs me of his wife's death, but for your satisfaction I'll send you his letter inclosed, especially as I am at a loss to guess his designs in leaving that state, or the continent, unless he be so unhappy as to disapprove our public measures. Give my compliments to brother Thomas, and please to inform me where he resides, that my future letters may find him. If you desire to write to brother Joseph, write immediately and I will forward your letter.

I am yours, etc., ELIZ. STEEL.

ELIZABETH STEEL TO EPHRAIM STEEL.

SALISBURY, 19th Oct., 1779.

DEAR BROTHER:

I embrace the present opportunity to make you some return for your favor by the bearer, Mr. May. Your letters arrived before Mr. McCorkle, who was detained longer than his own or our expectation but arrived safe about the middle of September. I was very sorry to hear of the death of your *worthy minister Mr. Steele. His death is much to be lamented, especially at this time when the number of clergymen is small and smaller still the prospect of others succeeding. You must however attempt, and I pray you may succeed in the obtaining another.

My little family is all with me, and well. Robert returned in the spring from his northern tour. The last accounts from Savannah mention that on the 9th instant a general attack was made on the enemy's lines in which we were repulsed with the loss of 150 killed and wounded. Verbal accounts also mention an express from the Spanish West India fleet, to (?) the French from our coasts to join them. Also the retreat of our army to Lewisburg. My little grand daughter walks and runs and dances and sings and talks—Hebrew for aught I know. Mr. and Mrs. McCorkle's compliments to you and Mr. Heap.

I am your loving and affectionate sister,

ELIZ. STEEL.

* No relative, so far as known, of Ephraim Steel.

P. S. Oct. 25.—We hear that the French fleet are only gone out to (?) with design to take the New York reinforcement, and that their army and ours still invest the British at Savannah.

ELIZABETH STEEL TO EPHRAIM STEEL.

SALISBURY, 29th April, 1780.

DEAR BROTHER:

I desire you to believe that all my letters are the efforts of friendship and affection, for you can't suppose them to be letters of business, as I have no occasion to write on those subjects. The happiness of all my friends is what I most sincerely desire, and therefore wish to hear frequently from you. I am sorry that I can't (knowing you to be a good Whig) make you happy with some good news from Charleston. I can only inform you that there have been several skirmishes before Charleston with various success. That the shipping has passed Fort Moultrie with considerable loss, and that we every day expect to hear of a general storm on, or the continued blockade of Charleston, 6 or 7 thousand we conjecture on each side. Charleston is nearly invested on all sides, and what will be the event time must determine.*

My little family are in their usual health. Little Nancy M. grows apace, and begins to chatter. Mr. and Mrs. McCorkle join in sending compliments to yourself and Master Billy and be assured that I am with great respect, Dear Brother,

Yours affectionately,

ELIZ. STEEL.

ELIZABETH STEEL TO EPHRAIM STEEL.

SALISBURY, July 13th, 1780.

DEAR BROTHER:

This will inform you that my little family are well but suffering with others the calamity of the times. You have had your time and now comes ours. We have been surrounded by Tory Insurrections, one party in the Forks of Catawba have been defeated with considerable loss.† Another from the forks of the Yadkin have been pursued but not overtaken. At present the state is uninvaded, but about five hundred are at the Waxaws.‡ The Tories are flocking in. South Carolina and Georgia are in the Enemies' hands. Our

* Charleston capitulated on May 12, 1780.

† Battle of Ramseur's Mill, June 20, 1780.

‡ Following the Battle of Ramseur's Mill, General Rutherford despatched Davie with his cavalry to Waxhaw Creek to watch the British, while he himself set off immediately in pursuit of Col. Bryan, who had succeeded in embodying a considerable force of Tories in the forks of the Yadkin, at the north end of Rowan, near Surry. By rapid marches, Bryan ultimately succeeded in escaping Rutherford, and in effecting a junction with a British force under Major McArthur.

army is advancing near Cheraw and I hope before this year be done the British and Tories will all be cooped up in Charleston. Pray give us the news with a paper or two from the North. My compliments to sister Nancy, Mr. Heap and family and all friends, Mr. Billy by name. I am your affectionate sister,

ELIZ. STEEL.

ELIZABETH STEEL TO EPHRAIM STEEL.

DEAR BROTHER: SALISBURY, Oct. 25, 1780.

With the utmost satisfaction I can acquaint you with the sudden and favorable turn of our public affairs.* A few days ago destruction hung over our heads. Cornwallis with at least 1500 British and Tories waited at Charlotte for the reinforcement of 1000 from Broad River, which reinforcement has been entirely cut off, 130 killed and the remainder captured.

Cornwallis immediately retreated, and is now on his way toward Charleston, with a part of our army in his rear, commanded by General Smalwood. The remainder are expected soon to march from Hillsborough under the command of Gen. Gates.

I should thank you for a line. It is a long time since I received one. Please to give us the northern intelligence. You know I am a great politician. Compliments to sister Nancy and children, Mister Heap and family, and Master Billy and be assured that I am with great respect, Dear Brother, Yours,

ELIZ. STEEL.

ELIZABETH STEEL TO EPHRAIM STEEL.

DEAR BROTHER: SALISBURY, 19th April, 1781.

Your obliging letter by Mr. Beard has come to hand. I most sincerely congratulate you on your matrimonial connections. May your lives be long and happy. I beg you to mention me most affectionately to Mrs. Steel, tho' unacquainted with her person or family. Please to mention me also to Master Billy.

In Feb. last the British were so kind as to pay us a visit, at a time when my little family were ill with the small pox, in which my little youngest granddaughter died, the rest have all happily recovered.†

*"The sudden and favorable turn of affairs" was created by the engagement here spoken of, which is none other than the famous Battle of King's Mountain, fought on October 7, 1780. Of Ferguson's force, 300 were killed or wounded; 100 regulars and 700 Loyalists were captured. The loss of the American "mountain men" was slight. The report of the victory was hailed as "great and glorious news." (General Gates to Thomas Jefferson, Gov. of Virginia.)

† For a full account of Cornwallis's stay in Salisbury, lasting from Saturday, February 3d, tothe following Monday night or Tuesday morning, cf. Rumple's Rowan County, ch. XVIII.

I was plundered of all my horses, dry cattle, horse forage, liquors and family provisions, and thought I escaped well with my house furniture and milch cattle. Some in this country were stripped of all these things.

It comforts me to think that the enemy will probably never return. His Lordship soon after the 15th of March* moved to Wilmington, and Gen. Greene, by a masterly stroke, has turned rapidly towards Camden in his rear which I hope will fall into his hands before Cornwallis can reinforce the place. At least it will take the war out of this state, and leave his Lordship not one step further than before Gates' defeat.†

Please to remember me in the most affectionate manner to sister Nancy. I have never been able to hear from our brother since the fall of Charleston, nor have I any way of writing to him—. I am with great respect your affectionate sister,

ELIZ. STEEL.

ELIZABETH STEEL TO EPHRAIM STEEL.

SALISBURY, March 17, 1786.

DEAR BROTHER:

I was very happy to receive a long letter from you, and especially as it gave me an account of your own, and the happiness of your little family. If an opportunity had immediately offered I could have wrote you the happiness of mine. About the date of your letter my children were all alive and all married. My son John living with me and practising merchandise. He is still living—has a little daughter Nancy—and is doing well. You have heard I suppose of his marriage, in Cross Creek, to a Miss Dolly Nessfield, daughter-in-law to a Mr. Cochran Merchant there.‡

But Robin, O my poor Robin! He is no more. He was married to a very worthy lady near Georgetown in So. Carolina, in the beginning of July, and died there in the latter end of September. He was taken with a putrid fever and died in a few days illness. You can hardly conceive of my distress. It was aggravated by the expectation of seeing him and his wife at the very time when came the dreadful news of his death. However, it was a little lessening of my grief to hear that he had altered the manner of his life, and had sometime before his death become serious and thoughtful. So that I have the comforting hope of meeting with him where friends shall never part.¶

* The date of the Battle of Guilford Court House.

† Battle of Camden, August 16, 1780.

‡ John Steele was married to Mary Nesfield on February 9, 1783.

¶ Both Wheeler and Rumple fall into the comprehensible error of stating that Robert Gillespie, here affectionately termed "Robin" by his sorrowing mother, died unmarried.

Mr. McCorkle and family are well. They have 3 children living, a son and two daughters, the eldest of which is mostly with me at the English school in town. I have no late accounts from brother Joseph, since the fall of Charleston, and can not tell whether he be living or dead, tho' I have made all the inquiry I could. Remember me most affectionately to your good lady—Master Billy—and Miss Dolly—give her on my account half a dozen kisses, tell all your and my friends that they are dear to me, and be assured that I am with greatest affection Your sister

ELIZ. STEEL.

X.

There can be no more fitting close to a monograph on Elizbeth Maxwell Steel than the obituary notice, inserted at the request of her son-in-law, Dr. Samuel Eusebius McCorkle, in the North Carolina Chronicle, or Fayetteville Gazette, January 3, 1791.

"Died, on Monday the 22nd of November, in Salisbury, of a lingering and painful illness, Mrs. Elizabeth Steele, relict of Mr. William Steele,—mother of the hon. John Steele, and Margaret MacCorkle, wife of the reverend Samuel MacCorkle.

"Her name and character are well known, but best by her most intimate friends. She was a devout worshipper of God; she was distinguished during the war as a friend to her country; twice supported with dignity the character of wife and widow—she was a most tender and affectionate parent, an obliging neighbor, frugal, industrious, and charitable to the poor.

"Her character will be better understood by the following letter, found among her choice papers since her death, than by anything that can be said of her. The letter is believed and appears to be her own diction, and is published exactly as it was found. It may be a useful lesson to all parents, and to all children, as well as her own. It bears the date February 5, 1783, when her other son Robert Gillespie was living and begins thus:

MY DEAR CHILDREN:—

If I die before any of you, I wish that this letter may fall into your hands after I am dead and gone, that you may see how much affection I have for you, and, that what I have often said when alive may be remembered by you when I am in eternity.

If the Almighty would suffer me to return to talk to you,

I think now I would take a pleasure to do it every day; if this can not be allowed me, I think it would be some satisfaction to see you, especially when you are reading this letter which I leave you as a legacy, to see what effect it will have on you, and whether it will make you think of what I have often told you.

I have many a time told you to remember your Maker, and ask him to guide you: it is a good old saying, "they are well guided whom He guides, and He leaves them that don't ask Him, to their own ways." I want you to keep out of bad company—it has ruined many young people. I want you to keep company with sober good people, and to learn their ways,—to keep the sabbath—to be charitable to the poor—to be industrious and frugal—just to all men, and above all to love one another.

Believe me, my children, if anything could disturb me in the grave, it would be to know that you did not live as a brother and sister ought to live: nothing could be worse except that you would not all follow me to heaven. Oh, my dear children, I have had a great deal of trouble and sorrow in raising you! If I should feel after death as I do now, I could never endure to see any of you without an interest in Jesus at the great day, and forced away, never more to meet again. Parting here with your parents you know had almost taken my life, when I had hope to see them again; but I am now sure I could not live to see any of you cursed by your Maker, and driven away to dwell forever with the Devil and his angels.

While I lived, you know that it was my great desire to have you all around me and near me here; but my great desire has been to have you in the world to come. Believe me, nothing could make me so happy as to have my three dear children there;—yes, and your children, and all your connections. I would wish to take you all to heaven. Then, think of the vanity of this world—think of Jesus, the Saviour,—death,—judgment—, and eternity; and don't forget the living and dying desire of your most affectionate mother till death and after death,

ELIZABETH STEEL.

"Folded in the foregoing letter was also found, in her own handwriting, the following prayer, which must please every pious mind:

O Lord, my God, thou great Three-One! I give myself to thee this day, to be thine, to be guided by thee and not by another; and I desire to take God for my God, Jesus Christ to be my Saviour, the Holy Ghost to be my sanctifier and leader. Lord, thou has promised that all that will come unto thee thou wilt in no wise cast out. All I beg in the name and for the sake of Jesus Christ, my Lord.

To this I set my hand, ELIZABETH STEEL.

"The date of the above was either not affixed or torn away from the paper.

"It can not be disagreeable to the serious mind to add that she was remarkably fond of the following hymn, and left it in her Bible, where it was found since her death, in the handwriting of her granddaughter, who had transcribed it for her:

The hour of my departure's come,
I hear a voice that calls me home;
At last, O Lord, let trouble cease,
And let thy servant die in peace.

The race appointed I have run,
The combat o'er, the prize is won,
And now my witness is on high,
And now my record's in the sky.

Not in mine innocence I trust,
I bow before thee in the dust,
And thro' my Saviour's blood alone,
I look for mercy at thy throne.

I leave the world without a tear,
Save for the friends I hold so dear;
To heal their sorrows, Lord, descend,
And to the friendless prove a friend.

I come! I come! at thy command,
I give my spirit to thy hand;
Stretch forth thine everlasting arms
And shield me in the last alarms.

"It would be a severe and ill-natured reflection on the religious taste of the present age to be making apologies for publishing the above memoirs, and therefore no apology is made. It is a debt due to an amiable character, and may not be without its use to the public."

PALMYRA IN THE HAPPY VALLEY

By Mrs. LINDSAY PATTERSON.

"Read the rede of this old roof tree;
Here be trust fast; opinion free;
Knightly right hand; Christian knee;
Truth in all things; wit in some;
Laughter open, slander dumb.

* * * * * *

Read the rede of this old roof tree."

These fragmentary lines are all that can now be recalled of an inscription in the hall of an English manor house belonging (I think) to Lord Lytton. We fortunate ones who knew Palmyra feel that it would have been equally appropriate for the old home with the four front doors that for a century were open to greet generation after generation, not only of kith and kin, but the stranger within the gates, doubly welcome were he penniless and friendless. Through those doors entered the sick to be nursed back to health; the weary and discouraged to be cheered and strengthened; the brides to be welcomed into the family; the babies to be properly admired; the aged to renew their youth; the young to frolic; and when the end came, out of them passed the blessed dead, to be tenderly carried to the little memorial Chapel of Rest at the top of the hill, for their long sleep in that quiet God's acre where the members of the family lie. Such was Palmyra in the Happy Valley, with the Yadkin River flowing through the meadows and the mountains round about her even as the Lord was round about Jerusalem.

* * *

No regular plan seems to have been adhered to in building the house. Dark passages and unexpected stairways led nowhere in particular; there were cubby holes and a secret closet, not with the traditional family skeleton, but an equally traditional and far more cheerful cask of old peach brandy hidden during war times and never since discovered by any amateur Christopher Columbus, though the search never flagged and the searchers never grew weary.

Palmyra in the Happy Valley.

In the great square parlor were the twin tables with overhanging mirrors; the stiff old family portraits and stiffer old mahogany furniture looking as if all had been in the same place, as they probably had, save for sweeping and dusting, for well nigh a century, for it was one of the unwritten laws of Palmyra that nothing was ever to be changed. In the parlor, too, was the curious built-in bookcase filled with absorbingly interesting old volumes, the most interesting ones, of course, being on the top shelf that just could be reached by placing a footstool on top of a chair and then standing on tiptoe; and the number of times I have risked my valuable neck rummaging through those books, and the number of shirt waists I have ruined, ripping out the arm seams, while stretching for the volumes in the back corner, are both simply past count. But the hours of pure joy that have been mine while reading those books, and the amount of delightful misinformation on every known subject that I've acquired, will cheer me on a weary pilgrimage through this vale of tears. There in an old medical book of 1688 I found the formulas for the "vulnerary potion" with which Rebecca dosed Ivanhoe when he was wounded.

A number are given, but probably the most efficacious was this one: "Compound of the roots of alcohol, dittany, cinqfoil, gentian, orrice, solomon's seal, valerian, the leaves of agrimony, bramble tops, plantain, red cabbage, daisies, golden rod, hart's tongue, herb trinity, sage, saxifrage, tansy, the flowers of clover, jilly flowers, lily, rose. To these add cloves, mace, mummy, cinnamon, lentisk wood, sassafras, river crabs, spermaceti, viper's flesh, prepared steel, vitriol of mars and crabs eyes levigated. Add red wine, boil, strain, and dulcify with white sugar."

One is now ready to believe any and all the statements of Sir Walter as to the instantaneous and startling effect of this vulnerary potion on the "Disinherited Knight."

There were the precious books of etiquette; sermons printed if not practiced, by Benjamin Franklin; ancient histories and novels and grammars and books of travel. On the second shelf was Jedediah, More's delightful "Geography of the Known World" when the Mississippi River was the boundary between Louisiana, New Spain and California on the West, and the United States on the East; when trappers and hunters, making the perilous trip down the Ohio, left civilization at Fort Pitt, passing no great states to the north of them, not even named lands, but "7 Ranges" "Army Lands" "Donation Grants from Virginia," "Ohio Company," "General Clarke's Grant, 150,000 acres," "Wabash Company," "Army Lands," etc. North Carolina reached from the Atlantic Ocean to the Mississippi with the "country of Frankland" (not "Franklin" as it is called now) in the center. The Blue Ridge was then the great "Laurel Ridge." In North Carolina, Salisbury, the Moravian Settlement, Tarborough, New Bern, Bath, Guilford, Fayetteville, Hillsburg, and Edenton, are the only towns with the exception of Nashville and the "Cumberland Settlement." The news items are intensely interesting. "The River Yadkin where it passes Salisbury is almost 400 yards broad and then narrows to the width of 80 or 100 feet. In this narrow part in the Spring of the year, shad are caught by hoop nets in the eddies as fast as the strongest men are able to throw them out. Perhaps there is not in the United States a more eligible situation for a large manufacturing town. The late war put a stop to the iron works though there is one each in Guilford, Surry, Wilkes—all on the Yadkin—and one in Lincoln." * * *

"The Moravians have several flourishing settlements in this State. These people, by their industry and attention to various manufactories, are very useful to the country around there. The inhabitants of Wilmington, Edenton, New Bern, and Halifax districts once professed themselves of the Episcopal Church, but the Clergy, at the commencement of the late war, having declared themselves in favor of Great Britain, had to emigrate. The inhabitants of the above mentioned districts seem now to be making the experiment whether Christianity can exist in a country where there is no visible church. Temperance and industry are not to be reckoned among the virtues of North Carolinians. The time they waste in drinking and gambling, cock fighting and horse racing, leaves them very little opportunity to improve their plantations or their minds. The general topic of conversation among the men, when cards, the bottle, and occurrences of the day do not intervene, are negroes, the prices of indigo, rice, tobacco, etc. They appear to have little taste for the sciences."

On these shelves, too, were the account books with names of the slaves and the clothes issued to them semi-annually; herb remedies for various diseases of man and beast; especially for wounds of which there seem to be a never-ending variety; there also the files of Blum's Almanac beginning with the very first one; catalogues, beginning with 1830 of the faculty and students of the University and numberless pamphlets containing the addresses to the student body by William Hooper, Walker Anderson, Dr. John Hill, Hugh McQueen, Robert Strange, William Gaston, William Mercer Green, George E. Badger and countless others, ending curiously enough, in 1860 with the baccalaureate sermon in Gerrard Hall by the Most Rev. Archbishop Hughes of New York on "The Christian Law of Charity" which, patience knows, just about that time, was rather celebrated by its breach than its observance.

Of much earlier date if having none of the homely charm of familiarity, were the political pamphlets. "The Political Jesuitism of James Madison, President of the United States, by an observant citizen of the District of Columbia 1812." "Speech of the Hon. John Marshall delivered in the House of Representatives on the Resolutions of the Hon. Edward Livingston, printed at the office of the True American, 1800." "Letters from an Irish Emigrant, 1798," "First Principles of Government, delivered at the Tribune of the French Convention, July 7, 1795" by Thomas Paine, author of the "Rights of Man" "Common Sense" etc., etc., "Causes of the Present War with France, by Hon. Thomas Eshill," "Messages of the Presidents of the United States," "Reports of the American Society for Colonizing the Free People of Color, 1833," yearly reports of National affairs from Senators at Washington, sermons innumerable, files of old newspapers, English Classics of that day, European Magazines, Dublin Review, Histories, sacred and profane. The variety and extent is astonishing when one considers what transportation facilities were during the early years of 1800. Certainly people who read then must have read more and better books than in this good year of grace.

* * *

At the end of the porch, way off from the rest of the house was the blessed "East Room" with its big four-poster bed where Macbeth himself could have slept, and so far forgotten the deep damnation of Duncan's taking off, that by morning he too would have been ready to join in the search for that elusive cask of old peach. Can't you shut your eyes now and see Mary making the fire and hear the flames crackle in the big fireplace, while she told you in that pleasant voice of hers, all the Palmyra news, and you wondered how long it would be possible to stay cuddled up in the soft featherbed and still not be late for that hickory smoked broiled ham; at least not later than the master of the household who was sure to be late enough to save the face of the most sleepy-headed visitor?

In the dining room with its big mahogany sideboard and side tables, was a young room of a china closet, with demi-johns of homemade apple vinegar, grape wine, blackberry cordial, and cherry bounce, while the top shelf held the quaint silver tea set, the old cut glass goblets and decanters and wine glasses, and the lower shelves, the gold band china set, the remnants of the still older plain white ones and the odds and ends of china and glass that had accumulated during all the years; and just outside the dining room was the closet with jars of brandy peaches and spiced pears and watermelon pickles, and jelly and preserves and canned fruits and vegetables, beyond count. And there was the upstairs back bed room, with another young room of a closet where the quilts and coverlets were kept. Was there ever such an assortment of handmade bed coverings, embroidered and pieced and appliqued and tufted and woven and knitted? Surely the women of Palmyra had for a pattern the wise woman of Proverbs who looked well to the ways of her household and ate not the bread of idleness, who laid her hands to the spindle, and whose hands held the distaff. Certainly they stretched forth their hands to the poor and needy and in their tongues was the law of kindness.

And don't you remember the great circular driveway bordered with blooming things from early spring until frost; and the garden—almost a farm in itself—with five rows of beans and a row of china asters; five rows of peas and a bed of roses, beets and zinnias, tomatoes and marigolds, potatoes and nasturtiums, corn and petunias, balsams and okra, and right by the gate the clump of lemon verbena?

I who spent so many happy days among the flowers can bring in return only this little sprig of rosemary for remembrance.

And there never was such a treasure trove as the attic, the final resting place of everything and anything that outlived its usefulness below stairs. Nothing at Palmyra was destroyed. Broken down mahogany tables and rickety chairs, candle moulds, spinning wheels and cradles were sent to the attic; while chests, hair trunks and barrels were packed with letters, deeds and papers, samplers, bonnets, laces, pincushions, wedding dresses, embroidery, fans, daguerreotypes, slippers, baby clothes, scent bottles, homespuns, quilts, carpet rags, yarns, cottons, the flotsam and jetsam of the long housekeeping years.

* * *

The inevitable changes of death have brought the letters and papers to the attic at Bramlette, where they fill boxes and boxes, so reading them is an interminable job, albeit a most fascinating one, beginning as they do about 1799, and running continuously down to 1908. The family connection was very large, scattered throughout Virginia, the Carolinas, Alabama, and Tennessee, and men, women, and children, and I am almost tempted to add the babe in its mother's arms, were most voluminous correspondents. The men's letters were largely of business matters, politics, crops, with passing mention of wife and babies. The women wrote of everything: the Indians, baby teething, new clothes, their daughters' beaux, neighboring gossip, parties, camp meetings, husbands and children. Yet throughout the century with new generations taking the place of the old, the ruling characteristics remain the same; an intense family affection, clannishness to the remotest kin by blood, an abounding hospitality, cheerful kindliness, and more particularly in the women, a deeply religious strain.

General Edmund Jones, Who Built Palmyra.

The earliest letters are addressed to Colonel Edmund Jones, Fort Defiance, Wilkes County. Later the title rises to the dignity of General and Brigadier General. Fort Defiance, built during the Revolutionary War, was the home of General William Lenoir, and is still owned by his descendants. Roosevelt in "Winning the West" quotes largely from the old hero's account of the battle of King's Mountain, speaking of him as a fine type of French Huguenot. He seems to have been one of the earliest settlers in Happy Valley, and no one knows how much land he "entered" there. Boxes of letters, his sword, wearing apparel and a letter from Washington are still treasured at "The Fort," as it is generally called. His daughter Ann, in 1798, married Edmund Jones, of Orange County, Virginia.

The first mention of Palmyra that I have been able to find is in a letter from Mrs. Israel Pickens (Martha Lenoir) whose husband had moved to Alabama where he became governor. She and Mrs. Edmund Jones were sisters. The letter is from Washington and dated January 10, 1815: "I hope when we return in March to find you comfortably situated in your new home in the midst of your cheerful little family." Letters from various relatives give other details. General Lenoir gave the tract of land on which Palmyra was built to his daughter, Ann, for a wedding gift. The home built by General Jones was a square building of red brick with small porch in front.

I have found but one letter from Mrs. Edmund Jones. It was written to General Jones, and it is easy to read between the lines, that the "heart of her husband safely trusted in her, and her children rose up and called her blessed" as she went about bravely bearing the burdens of that great plantation, his as well as her own, during his many absences in Raleigh as a member of the State Legislature. Then, as a century later, Palmyra was filled with company, evidently from the way in which they are mentioned, most welcome, but she adds: "The company of my beloved companion would be to me the most agreeable in all this world." All details are given of business matters on the farm—the slaves, the cattle, the crops, the children, the neighborhood, deaths, births, and marriages. Yet all are forgotten while she closes her letter with: "Should I live to see you again, there will be one glad person if no more. Most affectionately yours, Ann Jones."

* * *

Boxes of letters to General Jones from all classes and conditions of men from one end of the State to the other, and on all sorts of subjects, tell of his wide activity and patriotic labors for his State during his almost continuous service in the Legislature from 1798 until 1838. He died in 1844, his wife, a few years earlier. These letters give such a clear picture of the man to whom they were written, as well as of the times and of the writers, many of whose descendants read THE BOOKLET, that some are herewith reproduced.

They begin in 1799 with a notice from James W. Henry, of the War Department, that Mr. Larkin Jones, of Wilkes County, is appointed a Second Lieutenant in the Sixth Regiment of Infantry. Larkin was a younger brother of Edmund. On November 29, 1805, "John Haywood offers his respects to Mr. Jones and requests the favor of his company at dinner on Saturday next." The writing is beautiful with flourishes most carefully made.

John Haywood, of Halifax, was a judge of the Superior Court, in 1794, and author of "Manual of the Laws of North Carolina," "Haywood's Justice," and later, after his removal to that State, a "History of Tennessee." Chief Justice Henderson said of him that he "disparaged neither the living nor the dead when he said that an abler man than John Haywood never appeared at the bar or sat on the bench of North Carolina."

But styles are changing and Governor Hawkins is sending out very impressive printed invitations encircled by a fancy wreath. He "presents his respects to General Edmund Jones and requests he will do him the pleasure to dine with him on Saturday next, at 2 o'clock. Raleigh 10, December, 1812." Oddly enough, the invitations, instead of having the Raleigh address of General Jones (there as a member of the Legislature) are invariably written, "General Edmund Jones of Wilkes." Of another tenor is the next note. "General Smith presents his respects to Colonel Jones with whom he wishes to have an interview as quickly as possible." There is no date. Evidently General Smith was in too big a hurry to bother with dates, but wouldn't you like to know which General Smith, and what the flurry was about? Even the writing after all these years has never quieted down but gives the impression of worry and impatience. Waightstill Avery, whose writing in November, 1805, is none of the best, is one of the strictly few who stick to business and to business only, though he does take time to sign himself "Dear Sir, believe me to be with great respect, your very obedient servant." Robt. W. Williams asks that "that militia bill be called up this morning, December 14, 1805," and writes again on Sept. 1, 1802:

I congratulate you in your election again to become one of the legislators of our State. * * * It has been some time since you thought proper to come into the Legislature. * * * Much alarm has excited the minds of the people relative to the claims and suits brought by Lord Granville to recover all this country. But I take it, Sir, he can never recover. * * *

In case Mr. Blake Baker resigns this office of Attorney General, permit me to inform you, Sir, that I shall be a candidate for that appointment; any assistance which you may think proper to give me in the business, shall as a favor ever be remembered and gratefully acknowledged by, my dear Sir,

Your friend and well wisher,

ROBT. WILLIAMS.

My respects if you please to Genl. Lenoir.

There were two Robert Williams—both distinguished men—General Robert Williams, of Surry, and Dr. Robert Williams, of Pitt.

The next letter is so beautifully written and with such ornamental flourishes that it deserves to be on parchment. It is dated Surry, 3d November 1807, and is from "Jo. Williams." I fancy it must be Joseph Williams, one of the Surry delegates to the convention at Hillsboro in 1775 and a colonel of the militia during the Revolution.

SIR:—I've observed Mr. Gales has announced the death of Mr. John Hunt, late a clerk to the House of Commons. * * * In Consequence of which my son Williams intends offering his services, and which he would not presume to do had it not been for the death of Mr. Hunt. He is a tolerable good penman and I flatter myself would be adequate to the duties of that appointment. Should you also think so and can find a freedom in giving him your influence, the favor will ever be thankfully acknowledged by him and also by your most obedient JO. WILLIAMS.

Sept. 12, 1806, a note from S. Erwin. "I do hereby signify to you my resignation of the commission of Captain of the Horse for Burke County and request you to accept the same." In 1807 William Norwood, of Hillsborough, after giving all the family news, asks General Jones when he next comes to Raleigh to bring him two bushels of the "new kind of grass called Egyptian oats."

The Hon. Jesse Franklin, of Surry, U. S. Senator from 1807-1813 and governor in 1820, writes under date of 28th December 1812:

I am happy that the Legislature has put off the election for members of the Thirteenth Congress until August next leaving a Democratic House with the Governor. * * * With, respects to my successor, I hope he will turn out well. He is a man of talents. * * * You have no doubt seen in the Public Prints the disastrous Issue of the several attempts upon Canada. The papers contain all the information in our possession upon the subject. The last affair under General Smythe seems to have let him down in the eyes of his best friends. However when we consider the total want of discipline and the spirit of insubordination that exists among such hosts of the militia suddenly brought together, disaster in the execution of their plans of operation is not be wondered at. Upon the water we have been more successful. Our Navy has, whenever they have come in contact with the British upon anything like equal terms proved victorious. Congress have passed a law for building four shipes of 74 gunes each and six frigates of 44 guns each. * * * You will have seen that the pay of non commissioned officers and privates has been raised by a law of this session; privates to 8 dollars and the other about in the same proportion. * * * I shall be Happy to hear from you at any time, when time and opportunity may serve your convenience.

Your obt. Servant, J. FRANKLIN.

Quite a different point of view is given in the next letter from the seat of war. It is written from

CAMP NEAR BUFFALO, NIAGARA RIVER.
RIGHT WING NORTHERN ARMY,
20th Nov., 1814.

DEAR SIR:

You will excuse my not writing to you, as I had nothing interesting to communicate relative to the division of the army to which I am attached. In August last and some time previous the right wing or first division of the Northern army was stationed at Chazy and Champlain—near the line of Debarcation, and within six miles of the enemies' headquarter—the two armies continued in that situation or position several weeks, without fighting except Piquet fighting and shooting sentinels on post—a barbarous and unjustifiable mode of warfare—but the enemy commenced it (not us). Forsyth's brave rifle corps at length broke up the enemies inhuman traffic. * * *

On the 29th the army took up its line of march from Champlain for Buffalo, (sic) hundred miles to the west—and on the 12th Oct. the army arrived at Black Rock, having marched over mountains, through deserts, and swamps where the D—l himself would do well not to enter. On the 13th the army crossed the Niagara and pitched their tents on his majesty's soil, made immediate preparations to move down the Niagara meet the enemy and beat him. On the 14th the army was organized in the following order. 1st General Smiths Brigade composed of the 4th, 10th, 12th and seventeenth regiments to move in column of (?) preceded by four piece light artillery, one mortar—2 companies or troops cavalry flanked by six light companies and one rifle battalion, next in order, Genl. Bissel's Brigade advanced in rear in column or regts. flanked by six companies light troops one compr. Cavalry with the heavy artillery and one battalion ———. Genl. Brown's division, the brave heroes of Chippewa Bridgewater and Port Erie advanced one mile in rear, in order of battle, then in order the American army moved down the Niagara to Chippewa plains. On the 14th at 4 o'clock p. m. Smith's Brigade approached the enemy's advanced post, or advanced guard, they gave us a distant fire and retired from their works. On the 15th the army arrived on Chippewa plains, and discovered the enemy formed in order of battle, his left resting on the Niagara, and his right extending across the plains—our columns advanced until they gained an advantageous position, deployed and formed the line with the utmost coolness and anxiety for battle, the right of east brigade resting on the Niagara and the left extending across the plain—the brave Capt. Towson and ———— recd. orders to commence the action by advancing with 4 pieces artillery and one mortar; the enemy opened a fire from his whole line, but a well directed fire from our piece—our left troop and riflemen gaining his right flank and commencing a sharp fire, together with a number of shells bursting about their ears, caused the enemy to retreat to his works across the Chippewa. They fled a second time, the boasted Wellington troops, now commanded by Lieut. Genl. Drummond the Earl of Tweedsdale and Genl. Brigham, said to be six or eight thousand strong exclusive of Boltigeurs and Canadian militia. On the 15th our army advanced within six hundred yards of the enemy's batteries on the Chippewa. The right of each division resting on the Niagara and the left extended up the Chippewa river. The appearance of the American line was grand. An army of ten or twelve thousand well organized troops, arranged in order of battle at 1 o'clock P. M. The whole of our artillery and morters were ordered to advance within three hundred yards of the enemy's batteries on the open plain. The enemy commenced a fire from 5 batteries and immediately after our 18 prs. began to roar which caused a number of his majesty's fugitive banditties to retreat from behind their works but not before several shells bursted among them. At 2 P. M. two of the enemy's batteries were silenced and one piece dismounted. Dr. Sir, Never before did I feel such anxiety for battle—the delightful roar of the American artillery, the tremendous roar of the Niagara falls in full view, together with viewing the immense and increasing spray ascending from the falls, conspired to enliven the imagination and render the scene sublime. At 3 their batteries were silenced, the roar of our pieces ceased not—at 4 he recommenced a fire from one of his batteries but was soon silenced. We had but four killed and a few wounded, most of his shot passed over us.

Give my best respects to Genl. Wm. Lenoir. I reverence the names of the patriots of 76. I love them wherever they are. Whilste I continue to have an existence the names of those that fought for my freedom and delivered their country from tyranny and oppression shall be dear to me. I subscribe myself yours with the highest consideration of respect and esteem.

A. E. McKinzie,
Lieut. 10th Infty.

The last word is said by Hon. Meshack Franklin, a member of Congress from Surry, 1807-15, who writes from Washington, January 6th, 1814:

This day a message from the President was laid before Congress communicating the dispatch brought by flag of truce from the British government. Its contents are a proposition to open negotiations for a peace, Distinct from the Russian Mediations, to be negotiated at either Gothenburg in Sweden or at London. The proposition has been accepted on the part of this government and Gothenburg will be the place where the agents of the respective governments meet for the transaction of their business. We hope that it may lead to an honorable peace. With what sincerity, this proposition has been made, it is impossible to say, but if peace be the object, there is not doubt of a speedy arrangement of all the points in controversy, but whether it be serious or ——— no reduction ought to be made in the necessary preparations for the prosecution of the war.

Respectfully, your Obt. Servt.,
M. Franklin.

Hon. Lewis Williams, "Father of the House" for many years, gives voluminous details of the year's work in Washington.

In the annual message of the President, we were informed that the balance in the treasury on the 1st of January, 1828, was upwards of five millions of dollars;

The defensive establishments of the country, appear to be on a very respectable footing. The army consists of about six thousand men including officers, non-commissioned officers, musicians and privates. It is said to be organized according to the best plan, and is divided into seven regiments of infantry, and four regiments of artillery, distributed through the country at such points as will be most likely to render them serviceable. The aggregate militia force of the United States, including officers and men, is one million one hundred and sixty-eight thousand four hundred and nineteen.

The navy consists of seven ships of the line carrying seventy-four guns each, seven frigates of the first class, and four of the second class, sixteen sloops of war, and seven schooners. In addition to which, there are now building at different places in the United States, five ships of the line and six frigates. When these shall have been completed, our navy will be quite formidable for all the purposes of defence, that being the only object for which it should be maintained. For no one ever imagined the navy ought to be so large, as to stimulate us to engage in foreign wars, or to commit aggressions upon the rights of others.

In the year of 1792 there were 195 post offices, a revenue of $67,444, and 5,642 miles of post roads. In 1828 the number of post offices was 7,651, the amount of revenue $1,598,134, and 114,536 miles of post roads. It will be perceived that the increase in this establishment has been very great; but I would be willing to see it further extended, 'till every neighborhood, nay almost every citizen should be accommodated with a post office at his door, if he should think proper to have it so.

It has been again proposed to establish a post, and form a settlement at the mouth of Columbia river, on the Pacific Ocean. In my former communications to you, I have frequently had occasion, to notice this measure, and to state my objections to it. It seems to me impolitic to plant a colony at so great a distance from the settlements on the Atlantic and Mississippi. The people who might inhabit that region could never have a community of interest and feeling with us who live on this side of the Rocky Mountains; and the extension of settlements to that quarter would only lead to a dismemberment of the empire, whenever they should be able to protect themselves.

Another territorial government is proposed to be established in the North West, to be called "the government of Huron." The progress made in the creation of states and territories is evidence of the felicitous nature of our political system, and its capacity for extension over a much wider space than is now embraced by it. From thirteen states we have increased to twenty-four, and there will be four territories, if the government of Huron should be established. When these are admitted into the union, the number of states will be twenty-eight.

General and Mrs. Samuel Finley Patterson, and Their Son, Rufus Lenoir Patterson.

On the 11th of this month the votes for President were counted in presence of both Houses of Congress, and General Andrew Jackson declared to be duly elected President of the United States, for four years from and after the 4th of March next.—Whatever difference of opinion has existed among us in relation to this choice, we all must wish that the administration of General Jackson may be wise and virtuous:—if his measures are good they should be supported, but if bad they ought to be opposed.

As my term of service will expire on the 4th of March, you will be called on at the ensuing election to choose a Representative in the next congress of the United States. Permit me again to offer myself as a candidate for your suffrages, and to say that if elected, I will do the best I can to serve you faithfully and beneficially.

Your friend and fellow citizen,

WASHINGTON, Feb. 18th, 1829. LEWIS WILLIAMS.

* * *

After the death of General and Mrs. Jones, Palmyra was inherited by Edmund, the youngest and only surviving son, who had married his cousin, Sophia Davenport, and built "Clover Hill." General Jones' Daughter, Mrs. Samuel Patterson (Phœbe Caroline) who then was living in Wilkesboro inherited from her father's estate, lands in Mississippi. Brother and sister were devoted to each other, and in order to live near together, Edmund gave his sister Palmyra, taking in exchange the lands in Mississippi. Others say the place was bought outright by General Patterson because his wife wanted her old home. A letter says: "In 1851-52 General and Mrs. Patterson remodeled and enlarged the old home, adding the East and West wing, the dining room with its pantries, and the large room above with its closets. The large staircase was built in the hall between parlor and dining room, and a small staircase run up for private use from the 'dark room' in the center of the house. These improvements were made in contemplation of the marriage of the eldest son, Rufus, to Marie Louise, 4th daughter of Governor and Mrs. Morehead. The room over the dining room was built especially for the bed room of the bridal couple."

Family tradition tells a pretty story of the landscape gardening, which was planned on moonlight nights while Samuel and Phœbe Caroline wandered through the grounds with their arms around each other, locating drives and walks and gardens. After her death in the middle sixties, family tradition again comes to tell that he died of a broken heart, after she, his best beloved, was taken.

* * *

Of the charm Palmyra exercised upon all who came within its borders the countless letters bear ample testimony. One dealing especially with the old home as it was during the lifetime of General and Mrs. Patterson is such a perfect pen picture that I cannot do better than give it in its entirety. It is written by the only surviving granddaughter, Mrs. Albert Coble, of Statesville.

"Our history (Mama's children) is especially connected with Palmyra from the fact that we not only as children, spent every summer there, but that after our mother's death, Grandma came for us, and took us all home with her, and gave us the most devoted love and care for three years, until we moved back to Salem, and Louie, you know, always made his home there (I think our parents first moved to Salem in 1855).

"In giving the history of Palmyra, it seems to me that the principal thing to do would be to reproduce, if possible, the atmosphere of the place,—that feeling of hominess and happiness and good cheer which filled every one who came within its circle. There was Grandpa with his stately, noble bearing, always dignified, yet always affable; Grandma, gracious to strangers, cordial to friends, and affectionate to all the large circle of relatives. They kept open heart and open house where the young people loved to gather for their pleasure, where all summer long the relatives filled the house, and in the evenings the strains of music floated out upon the lawn, and the waltz was danced within the parlor and upon the long veranda, where often the house servants gathered in groups outside to see the fun. This home became especially during the war, the Mecca for the widow and the orphan. Refugees from the more Southern states came and remained for months. All were made welcome. The home was conducted like the old southern plantation. There were some 60 or 70 slaves. There were the blacksmith and carpenter shop, a shoe shop, a loom room, where those pretty spreads and counterpanes were made; there were spinners, gardeners, dairy maids, house servants, cooks and nurses, besides the coachmen, two hostlers, cow-herds, sheep tenders, the regular field hands, and about 20 little darkies who were called on to rake up leaves, play with the little white children, hold the ponies to feed on the grass, and one or two detailed to wave the peacock fly-brush and keep the flies off the table at meals. Generally, there was one too, to run backwards and forwards to and from the kitchen at breakfast and supper to bring the hot cakes.

"The life of the master and mistress was a very busy one. They rose early to look after the household, the servants, the stock etc. Grandpa made the round of the barns and stables early every morning to set each hand to his task, to see that the stock was well tended etc. There was a large number of horses and 12 cows were always milked. Grandma was up hours before her guests, seeing that the house was put in order, the breakfast properly under way, fresh flowers gathered for the table etc.

"Her lawn, flower-beds and garden took much of her attention. At the time the house was remodeled, the front lawn, circle and drive-way and flower-beds (as we knew them) were made, and almost every known flower and shrub of that day was secured and planted there, from the spruce pine of the mountains to the cypress of the coast, and from the mountain rhododendron to the tender crepe myrtle and yellow jessamine. I heard of Mrs. Folk's saying that Grandma knew more about trees and plants and just where and how to plant them than any one she ever saw. Besides this, Grandma was a beautiful seamstress (doing the most perfect darning I ever saw); She played well on the piano, guitar, and zither; she painted exceedingly well and wrote some beautiful poetry. Grandpa was particularly well informed in many lines; was exceedingly particular in writing and spelling, as well as in grammar and in the use of just the right word for the occasion, and used very fine English, although he went to work at 15 years and never returned to school.

"Of course, my most vivid recollections of Palmyra are of my happy childhood years there, and although a terrible war was raging about us, we were shielded from all harm and suffering. My father, who foresaw a long struggle, laid up many supplies in large quantities, beforehand, so that we never suffered the privations that many did. It always seemed to me that my grandmother's arms were the refuge from all trouble and sorrow. Cousin Laura Norwood voices the feelings of many when she says: 'When I first remember Palmyra the new house was complete in all its beauty, and to me, was the loveliest place on earth, pervaded by the very spirit of kindness and hospitality.'

"I see I have said nothing of the religious life at Palmyra, which pervaded everything. Grandpa and Grandma were two of the most devout people I have ever known. They carried their religion into their every day life, and its influence was felt by every one, from the most exalted visitor to the home, to the humblest slave. They were daily and loving readers of the Bible; they lived and taught the Golden Rule, and all, without any cant or sanctimoniousness. Grandpa held family prayers every night, and on Sundays, when there were not church services, he assembled the family and guests and read the morning service from the Prayer Book. The house servants also, were often present. All inmates were taught obedience and love to our kind Heavenly Father. Grandpa was brought up a Presbyterian, but not having joined the church before marriage, he went with Grandma and became a devoted Episcopalian."

* * *

The Biographical History of North Carolina says of General Samuel Finley Patterson, that "he was born in Rockbridge County, Virginia, on March 11, 1799 and at the age of fifteen was induced by his uncle, Major John Finley, to remove to Wilkesboro, North Carolina, where he was employed as a clerk in the store of Waugh & Finley until he attained his majority in 1821.

"In 1828 and 1829 he was Junior Grand Warden of the Grand Lodge of Masons of the State, and in 1830 and 1831 Deputy Grand Master; in 1833 and 1834 he was Grand Master, and no one in the State was more highly esteemed by his fellow Masons. His career had been one of unvaried success and good fortune. His association with the public men who during the fifteen years of his connection with the Legislature had been members of the General Assembly had won for him their confidence and esteem, and his promptness, fidelity and integrity had made a most favorable impression throughout the State. Having begun business on his own account upon leaving the employment of his uncle, he had so successfully managed his affairs that he enjoyed the reputation of being an excellent financier and business man. At the General Assembly of 1835, although he was a strong opponent of the policies of General Jackson, and the Legislature was largely composed of the friends of General Jackson, he was elected public treasurer of the State, succeeding William S. Mhoon. He held this position for two years, a part of the same time likewise discharging the duties of president of the Bank of the State, and adding to his reputation as one of the best financiers of North Carolina. But in 1837 he retired from office and returned to his business in Wilkesboro.

"In 1840, three days in June had been devoted to festivities celebrating the completion of the Capitol and of the Raleigh and Gaston Railroad, and in that year Mr. Patterson, who was an early promotor of internal improvements and an able financier, was elected president of that, the first railroad completed in the State, and he moved to Raleigh so as to discharge the duties of that office. In 1845, however, his father-in-law, General Jones, died, and Mr. Patterson resigned his position as president of the Railroad Company and returned to the Yadkin Valley, intending to devote the remainder of his life to his farming interests. Largely through his influence, in 1841, Caldwell County had been erected out of portions of Burke and Wilkes, and Mr. Patterson's home, known as "Palmyra," was in the new county. Immediately on his return to Caldwell County he was elected chairman of the Court of Pleas and Quarter Sessions, having the management of all the internal affairs of the county, and he held this office until the old system of county courts was abolished by the constitution of 1868.

"The next year, 1846, he was chosen to represent his county in the Senate, and was again elected in 1848.

"At that time the affairs of the Raleigh and Gaston Railroad had become hopelessly embarrassed. There was not business enough or sufficient earnings to pay the running expenses Governor Graham, Mr. Patterson and the other friends of internal improvements were greatly discouraged, and recognized that some great effort should be made to sustain the Raleigh and Gaston Railroad by constructing an interior line that would serve as a feeder to it and give it a greater volume of business, while at the same time affording needed facilities to other parts of the State. Mr. Patterson, who was among the foremost of those who advocated internal improvements, was Chairman of the Committee on Internal Improvements, and drew a bill proposing to charter a road from Raleigh to Salisbury, and giving some State aid to it. This measure, however, did not receive sufficient favor to secure its passage. The friends of internal improvements, then the most important matter in the public mind, were almost in despair. Mr. William S. Ashe, Senator from New Hanover, and a Democrat who differed with his party friends on this particular subject, was appealed to to prepare another bill. He did so, proposing to incorporate a road from Goldsboro to Charlotte, and appropriating $2,000,000 as State aid. At first the magnitude of this work and the great amount of money appropriated staggered even the most ardent of the advocates of internal improvements; but eventually that bill was substituted for the one proposed by the Committee on Internal Improvements and was passed by the casting vote of the speaker of the Senate. As Mr. Dudley was the leader of internal improvements in the east, so in like manner is the west indebted to Mr. Patterson for his efforts to promote the interests of the western part of the State in that respect.

"In 1854 he again served his people in the Legislature, being a member of the House of Commons, and during the War, 1864, he was for a third time elected to the Senate. After the restoration of peace, a convention was elected in October, 1865, and in 1866, there being a vacancy in that body from Caldwell County, he was elected a delegate to that convention. In the same year he attended what was known as the Philadelphia Peace Convention as one of the delegates from North Carolina, the object in view being to establish fraternal relations between the sections of the Union and to restore harmony and good will among the people. This convention was presided over by Reverdy Johnson, of Maryland, and was largely attended by delegates from the New England States; and while it had some effect in staying the hands of the irreconcilables in Congress for a time, it did not entirely defeat their will and purposes, and the next year the Reconstruction Acts, destroying the State governments at the South and establishing new State governments on the fundamental basis of negro suffrage, were passed.

"In 1868 General Patterson was nominated on the State ticket by the Conservative Party for the office of superintendent of public works, a new position established by the constitution of 1868. But he and his party at that election went down in hopeless defeat, the first, such as it was, that he ever met before the people. Among the less important places that Mr. Patterson held during his long career of public activity was that of clerk of the Superior Court and clerk and master in equity; in 1839 he was Indian commissioner; he was also elected by the Legislature Brigadier-General and afterward Major-General of the State militia, and he thus became entitled to be known as General Patterson.

"For many years he was a Justice of the Peace, and a Trustee of the State University for a third of a century.

"General Patterson was a member of the Protestant Episcopal Church, and for many years was vestryman, warden and lay reader of his parish church; and in 171 he was one of the lay delegates from the diocesan convention of this State to the general convention held in Baltimore.

"Such is the succinct record of his public life.

"Beginning as a clerk in the Legislature of 1821, there was not a year for a half a century in which he was not honored by the State of his adoption until, after fifty years of continuous service, he fitly closed his career by representing her in the grand council of the church he loved. What man in the State has ever lived a busier, more useful, purer life? Who, having so many and great trusts confided in him, has fulfilled them more worthily? He never sought any civil office which would withdraw him from North Carolina. His history, together with the history of a few of his peers and associates, was for many years the history of the State. Such men, so strong in mind and body, so pure in heart and hand, so steady, so resolute and so wise, during half a century of usefulness, influenced insensibly to themselves thousands whom they met and thousands more who honored them because of their acts. The study of his career and the character of men like him, who controlled the destiny of North Carolina in times past, will show something of the reason why the State has been so little known abroad, so loved and reverenced at home.

"They were like those Romans, spoken of by Sallust, who lived in the nobler days of the Republic, who would rather do great deeds than write about them—a people among whom the wisest were also the busiest citizens, and who, disdaining to cultivate their minds at the expense of their bodies, so used both to accomplish the greatest good to the commonwealth. General Patterson, although he held so many and various offices, and gave so much time and attention to public affairs, was for the last thirty years of his life properly a farmer. By this pursuit he supported himself while he served the people. His farm was a model of neatness and thrift; he was zealous in introducing new seeds, improved implements and better methods of cultivation; he was a constant reader and frequent contributor to the columns of agricultural journals, and was justly regarded as an authority in matters pertaining to husbandry. His domestic life was as even, as useful and as pure as his public life.

"His home was attractive, and in the company of his wife and two sons, Rufus L. Patterson and Samuel L. Patterson, he was entirely happy; but being given to hospitality, he rejoiced at the presence of many guests. No one who was ever a guest at 'Palmyra' can forget the stately figure which welcomed him or bade good-by with such kindly, heartfelt courtesy. Nor was his generosity confined to his own premises; many a poor neighbor, both white and black, lamented the death of the dear friend who never forgot either their necessity or their self-respect, and gave as delicately as wisely.

"He died at his home, January 20, 1874, as peacefully as he had lived."

* * *

Mrs. Samuel Finley Patterson was such a many sided woman that it is difficult to write of her. Judging from the silk gowns, bonnets, laces, embroideries, crepe shawls, fans, high heeled satin slippers, lace handkerchiefs, ribbons, scent bottles, (of which she had a wonderful collection) one would think that personal adornment was her ruling passion. Yet, looking over the great clothes chests and closets filled to overflowing with her handiwork—woven coverlets and blankets, quilts of every description, bureau and table covers, a mass of most intricate embroidery and lace, pincushions and bags, and embroidered collars and underwear, chair seats, and cross stitch pictures, one would come to the conclusion that needle work, and that alone, occupied her entire time. Then in wandering through the rooms admiring the quaintly beautiful china and cut glass, and silver, the beautiful old mahogany furniture that filled the house from attic to cellar, and reading the letters from guests who crowded the house to overflowing for so many years, one feels that she could have had time and taste for housekeeping and for that only. Her neatly kept account books with names of each slave, number of garments and shoes furnished each one, clothing purchased, contents of smoke houses, orders made for table linen, china and furniture—all show the business woman. She was a skilled musician, and the exquisitely painted landscapes on the wall proclaim her an artist. Her public spirit is shown in the letters and memorandum of her efforts in collecting funds to aid in purchasing Mt. Vernon from the Washington family. The work she did for that must have been very great, as the list is a long one of those who contributed, as well as of the meetings she held and people she visited to rouse interest in saving Washington's home from decay. In utter bewilderment, one turns to her letters as a court of last resort—and there are many of them—to father, brother, sisters, sons, husband, nieces, cousins, every relation is represented, and in each, she is the same; wise in counsel, most tender and loving, strong and capable. Her one thought seems to have been the happiness and well-being of her loved ones, and all her strength of mind and heart and body were given to making Palmyra the home to which their hearts turned. Nor did her interest end with kith and kin; friend and stranger received the same gracious help, if help were needed, the same comfort in sorrow, the still rarer sympathy in joy.

I once asked the late Mrs. Folk to tell me about her, and the reply was: "Mrs. Patterson and Mrs. Polk were the greatest women I have ever known, and of the two, Mrs.

Patterson was the greater. It was worth a trip to Palmyra to see her and General Patterson preside over a table full of guests; he so handsome and dignified and kindly; she so gracious and sweet to each one. I never knew a woman who understood so well the artistic arrangement of flowers and shrubs and trees. She was a born landscape gardener."

